HAB

HAANSBERGEN, John Van, a painter of Utrecht, who died 1705, aged 63. The figures which he introduced into his landscapes were much admired. He was pupil to Cornelius Poolemborg.

HAAS, William, a printer and type-founder, born at Basil, and eminent for his ingenious inventions. He was in the first part of life engaged in the military affairs of his country, and he established a school in which a new system of artillery was practised and recommended with great success. He afterwards devoted his time to printing, and was the first who engraved a French type in the style of Baskerville. He invented a new printing-press, and introduced a new method of printing geographical charts with moveable characters. He died at St. Urban monastery in Lucerne, June, 1800, aged 59. Many of his papers are preserved in the economical society of Basil.

HABAKKUK, the eighth of the minor prophets, supposed to be of the tribe of Simeon. He prophesied in the reign of Jehoiakim, and chose to remain among the ruins of his desolated country, rather than follow his people into captivity. His style is highly poetical, beautiful, and sublime.

HABERT, Francis, a native of Berry, one of the most ancient poets of France. He wrote some fables, besides Les Trois Nouvelles Deesses, &c. and died about 1569.

HABERT DE CERISI, Germain, an ecclesiastic of Bayeux, who wrote some poems. He defended the Cid of Corneille against the censures of Richelieu and of the academy, and died at Paris 1655.

HABERT, Henry Lewis, a member of the French academy, the friend of Gassendi, and the publisher of his works, with an elegant Latin preface. He wrote some epigrams and other poetical pieces, and died 1679.

HABICOT, Nicolas, a surgeon, born at

HAC

Bonay, in Gatinois. He was eminent in his profession, and wrote a treatise on the plague. He died 1624.

HABINGTON, William, an English writer, born at Hendlip, Worcestershire, 1605. As a catholic, he was educated at St. Omer's and Paris, but he refused to embrace the order of the Jesuits, and returned to England. He died 30th Nov. 1654. He wrote the Queen of Arragon,—Observations on the History of Edward IV.—and some poems.

HACHETTE, Jane, a heroine of Beauvais in Picardy, who successfully headed a body of women in an assault against the Bourguignons who besieged her native place, 1472. In commemoration of her intrepid conduct, an annual procession takes place at Beauvais on the 10th July, in which the women march at the head of the men.

HACKAERT, John, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam, 1635. The mountainous scenery in his landscapes is much admired.

HACKET, William, a fanatic in the reign of Elizabeth. After being a gentleman's servant, he married a rich widow, and when reduced to indigence by debauchery and extravagance, he became a highwayman, and then all at once aspired to the name of prophet. He was joined in his imposture by Coppinger and Arthington, men of some learning, and after imposing upon the credulity of the people of York and Lincoln, he came to London, as inspired by the Holy Ghost. He proclaimed that Jesus was come to judge the world, and his associates announced him by the words of "behold the king of the earth." The cabals which he raised called for the interference of government. He was tried and executed, 28th July, 1592. His blasphemies on the scaffold were most horrid, and evinced not only a mad enthusiast, but a most diabolical heart. Of his associates Coppinger died in prison, and Arthington upon his recantation was pardoned.

HACKET, John, an English prelate, born in London, 1st Sept. 1592. He was educated at Westminster school and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he became fellow and tutor. His great merit recommended him to bishop Andrews, and to Williams, bishop of Lincoln, to whom he became chaplain, and afterwards to James I. He took his degree of D.D. 1628, and was promoted to a prebend in Lincoln, and the rectory of Cheam in Surrey, and St. Andrews, Holborn. The troubles of the times not only prevented his farther advancement, but subjected him to persecution, though he concealed himself in retirement at Cheam. At the restoration he refused the bishopric of Gloucester, but soon after accepted that of Lichfield and Coventry. With great munificence he began the repairs of his cathedral, which had been nearly demolished by the civil wars, and after eight years labour, and the expense of 20,000*l.* nearly all his own, he completed the building in a splendid and most elegant manner. He was equally liberal in his benefactions to Trinity college, Cambridge, and other foundations. He died at Lichfield, Oct. 21, 1670, and was buried in his cathedral. He was twice married, and had children by both his wives. His son, Sir Andrew, master in chancery, erected a monument over him. He wrote "Loyola," a comedy, twice acted before James I. besides sermons, and a life of his great patron bishop Williams, &c. He was highly respected for learning, for piety, and every exemplary virtue.

HACKSPAN, Theodore, a Lutheran minister, first professor at Altorf, well skilled in oriental literature. His books on theological subjects were much esteemed in Germany. He died 1659.

HADDICK, N. count of, an Austrian general during the seven years war. He also distinguished himself against the Turks in 1789, and died the next year, aged 80.

HADDOCK, Sir Richard, a valiant admiral who distinguished himself on various occasions under Charles II. and his successors, and died, very old, 1714.

HADDON, Walter, an eminent English scholar, born in Buckinghamshire, 1516, and educated at Eton school and King's college, Cambridge. He took his doctor's degree in civil law, of which he became professor. In Edward's reign he was a zealous promoter of the reformation, and for his services he was made master of Trinity-hall, Cambridge, in the room of Gardiner, and afterwards, though not qualified, made president of Magdalen college, Oxford, but in Mary's reign he resigned his honours to avoid the disgrace of expulsion, and lived in concealment. The accession of Elizabeth restored him to public notice; he was made master of the court of requests, judge of the prerogative court, and one of the commissioners who visited Cambridge. In 1566 he was employed at Bruges to settle the commercial intercourse between England and the Netherlands. He died January, 1571-2, and was buried in Christ church, London. The chief writings of this pious, learned, and polite character were "Lucubrations," containing Latin orations, letters, &c.—a defence of queen Elizabeth against Osorio, &c.—poems. He assisted also Sir John Cheke in the compilation of the ecclesiastical law, called Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticæ. 4to.

HADRIAN. Vid. ADRIAN.

HAEN, Antony de, privy counsellor and physician to the empress Maria Theresa, was author of "ratio medendi," 17 vols. 8vo. and a treatise on magic. He died 1776.

HAERLEM, Theodore Van, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem. His Christ and his Apostles in the church of Utrecht are much admired. He died 1470, aged 60.

HAGEDORN, a German poet of the 18th century. His works, which are chiefly in imitation of Fontaine, display genius, vivacity, and great delicacy.

HAGEN, John Van, a landscape painter, born in Cleves. His pieces were much admired. He died at the end of the 17th century.

HAGGAI, the tenth of the minor prophets, lived in the reign of Darius Hystaspes. He was of the sacerdotal race, and according to Epiphanius was buried among the priests of Jerusalem.

HAGUENIER, John, a French poet, born in Burgundy. He died 1738. His pieces are on light subjects, but possess great wit and elegance.

HAGUENOT, Henry, author of a treatise de morbis externis capitis, 12mo.—otia physiologica—memoirs addressed to the academy of sciences, &c.—was a physician of Montpellier, who died 1776.

HAHN, Simon Frederick, author of the "history of the empire," and of "collectio monumentorum veter. et recent." 2 vols. 8vo.—was a very extraordinary character. At the age of 10 he knew several languages, and at 24 he was professor of history at Helmstadt. He was historiographer to the elector of Hanover, and died 1729, aged 37.

HAILLAN, Bernard de Girard, lord of, a French historian, born at Bourdeaux about 1535. He first appeared before the public as a poet, in his piece called "the union of the princes," and afterwards as the translator of Eutropius, of Tully's offices, and Æmylius Probus. In 1574 he was named historiographer of France, in consequence of his valuable book on the state and success of the affairs of France. In 1576 appeared his history from Pharamond to the death of Charles VII. the first history of France written in French. He did not continue this popular work beyond that time, though he promised it to Henry IV. as he considered himself too near the periods of which he was to treat, afraid that the sober truths of history might give offence. A continuation was added by the booksellers as far as 1627. He died at Paris, Nov. 23, 1610. He was originally a calvinist, but it is said he changed his religious opinions to please the court, where he was flattered and admired. Though accurate and impartial as a historian, he seems fond of displaying his title to the approbation of his country, by the style of his dedications and of his prefaces. He was at one time secretary to the embassy in England in 1556 and 1557.

HAINES, Joseph, better known by the name of count Haines, was a comedian of wit and great facetiousness. He was obscurely born, but the liberal subscription of a few friends enabled him to enter at Queen's college, Oxford, where his talents and manners gained him the friendship of Sir Joseph Williamson, afterwards secretary of state, and minister at Ryswick congress. He attended his friend as Latin secretary, but he betrayed his state secrets with which he was confidentially intrusted, and thus incapable of this office, he was recommended to Cambridge, which all at once he quitted to join a company of strolling players at Stirbridge fair. He gradually rose to some consequence, and was engaged at Drury-lane, where his education, his wit, and his agreeable conversation made him the friend and the associate of the great and the opulent. He went afterwards as companion to the English ambassador to France, and on his return again appeared on the stage. He died of a fever, after a few days' illness, in Hart-street, Long-acre, and was buried in St. Paul's churchyard, Covent-garden.

HAKEM, the third of the Fatimite caliphs, was a violent persecutor of the Christians and Jews. He pretended to be the visible image of God. He was assassinated by the intrigues of his sister, 1021.

HAKEWELL, George, an able divine, born 1579, at Exeter, son of a merchant. He entered at St. Alban's hall, and was elected fellow of Exeter college, Oxford. He was in 1616 made archdeacon of Surrey, and as chaplain to Charles prince of Wales, he might have risen to higher honours in the church, had he not written to oppose the union of his master with the infant of Spain. The king resented the remarks of the chaplain, and he was for some time imprisoned, and dismissed from about the prince's person. He was afterwards chosen rector of Exeter college, but the rage of civil war drove him to his rectory of Heanton near Barnstaple, where he died, 1649. Of his works the best known is his "apology or declaration of the power and providence of God in the government of the world, proving that it doth not decay," &c. in four books, 1627, with two additional books in an edition, folio, 1635.

HAKEWELL, John, brother to the preceding, was mayor of Exeter, 1632. Another brother, William, was of Exeter college, and afterwards of Lincoln's inn, and as he espoused warmly the party of the puritans, he published among other things, "the liberty of the subject against the power of impositions," &c. 4to.

HAKLUYT, Richard, a native of Eyton, Herefordshire, educated at Westminster school and Christ-church, Oxford. He took orders, and obtained the living of Wetheringset in Suffolk, and a prebend in Bristol cathedral, and afterwards at Westminster. He died 23d Nov. 1616, aged 61. He was not only an able divine but a learned cosmographer; and his collection of voyages in 3 vols. folio, is deservedly admired as a valuable performance. In honour of his services to geography, a promontory on the coast of Greenland was called by his name, by captain Hudson, in 1608. His son was a student of Trinity college, Cambridge.

HALDE, John Baptist du, a learned Jesuit, born at Paris, 1674. He is the author of a valuable work, "grande description de la Chine et de la Tartarie," 4 vols. folio; compiled from the curious and interesting observations of the missionaries of his fraternity. He collected also after father Gobien, "lettres edifiantes," in 18 vols. besides Latin poems and orations. He died 1743.

HALE, Sir Matthew, a learned lawyer, born at Aldersly in Gloucestershire, 1st Nov. 1600. He was educated at Wootton-under-Edge, under the puritanical vicar of the parish, and in 1626 entered at Magdalen-hall, Oxford, and three years after began to study the law at Lincoln's inn. Panting after distinction he now bid adieu to the follies and levities of youth, and of idle company, and devoting daily 16 hours to study, he enriched the resources of his mind with all the treasures of law, of philosophy, of science, and of divinity. When called to the bar, the integrity of his conduct recommended him to the public notice, not less than his superior abilities; and in those times of civil discord, he became the friend of royalists and of republicans by not mixing with faction. His extensive knowledge of the law was called into action in the defence of Strafford, of Laud, and even of Charles himself; but though the advocate of royalty, he refused not to take the covenant, and to appear as one of the commissioners who treated with the king's officers about the reduction of Oxford. Though the death of Charles shocked his feelings, he, however, yielded to the strong invitations of Cromwell, who knew his merits, and he accepted under him the office of one of the judges of the Common-bench. Scruples, however, soon arose, and after going two or three circuits, he refused to act as judge on the crown side; and when on the death of the protector, higher powers were offered him under his son Richard, he boldly rejected the new dignity, and refused to wear mourning. At the restoration he was marked out for the highest distinction as chief baron of the exchequer; and Clarendon in investing him with his office, declared that he knew no one more honest or more fit to preside in that court. For eleven years he endeared himself to the nation as an impartial judge, generous, diligent, and humane; and in 1671, he was promoted to the office of chief justice of England, where he displayed the same integrity, the same zeal, and the same unbiassed patient attention. Four years after, a sudden inflammation in the midriff produced an asthma and a rapid dropsy, which proved fatal 25th Dec. 1676. He was twice married, and by his first wife had ten children. He left his valuable MSS. to Lincoln's inn society. This great man, eminent not less for his learning, piety, and private virtues, than for his uprightness as a judge, wrote several valuable works on subjects of law, philosophy, and divinity; the best known of which are, the primitive originization of mankind considered and explained according to the light of nature, &c. folio—the history of the pleas of the crown, folio—the original institution, power, and jurisdiction of parliaments—contemplations moral and divine, 3 vols. Svo.—judgment of the nature of true religion, its corruption, &c.—difficiles nuge, &c.—essay on the gravitation, &c. of fluid bodies, &c.

HALES, John, called the ever-memorable, was born at Bath, 1584, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford. In 1605 he was chosen fellow of Merton; in 1612, made Greek professor of the university, and the next year admitted fellow of Eton college. In 1618, he went as chaplain with Sir Dudley Carleton, the English ambassador to the Hague, and was present at the synod of Dort, of the proceedings of which he wrote to his patron an impartial account, published in his golden remains. In 1638, he was by the friendship of Laud, made canon of Windsor, but the disorders of the times did not permit him to enjoy long these honours, and when he refused to take the engagement, he was stripped of his Eton fellowship, and of his other preferments, and reduced to the greatest distress, which he bore with Christian fortitude. He died 19th May, 1656, and was buried in Eton college churchyard. This worthy man, so much admired for his wit, his learning, and his politeness, wrote several works which appeared after his death in 3 vols. 12mo. or Svo.

HALES, Stephen, a native of Kent, educated at Benet's college, Cambridge, where he became fellow, 1703. He early devoted the great powers of his mind to botany, and experimental philosophy, and was the ingenious inventor of a machine which displayed the various motions of the heavens similar to a modern orrery. His learning and virtues recommended him to the great and the powerful; he enjoyed the esteem of Frederic prince of Wales, and was almoner to the princess, but satisfied with the rectory of Teddington near Hampton Court, he disregarded the higher preferments which the partiality and influence of friends might have procured. He died after a few days' illness, 4th Jan. 1761, aged 84, universally respected. He published in 1741, his invention of ventilators; and wrote besides four volumes of statistical essays, &c. and contributed some valuable papers to the philosophical transactions.

HALI-BEIGH, a native of Poland. His original name was Bobowski. He was, when very young, sold by the Tartars to the Turks, and educated in their religion. He was acquainted with 17 languages, and became dragoman or interpreter to the grand signior. He translated the English catechism into the Turkish language, and also the Bible. His chief work is a treatise on the liturgy of the Turks, their pilgrimages to Mecca, &c. published in Latin by Thomas Smith, Oxford, 1691. He had formed the design of returning to the Christian faith, when he died 1675.

HALKET, Lady Anna, was born in London, 1622, and married 1656 Sir James Halket, by whom she had four children. Her father Robert Murray was preceptor to Charles I. before he ascended the throne. She died 1699, and from her MSS. was selected a volume of meditations, printed at Edinburgh, 1701.

HALL, Joseph, an eminent divine, born July 1st, 1574, at Bristow park, Leicestershire. He entered at Emanuel college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and he distinguished himself in the university by his wit and learning. His "Virgide-miarum" or satires, in six books, appeared in 1597, and were again edited at Oxford, 1753. The friendship of Sir Robert Drury gave him the living of Hawstead, Suffolk, where he married, but in consequence of some dispute with his patron he resigned it, and was soon after presented by lord Denny to the donative of Waltham Holy Cross, Essex. Though he remained in possession of this preferment 22 years, his income was increased by a prebend in Wolverhampton collegiate church; and in 1616 by the deanery of Worcester. His learning had recommended him to prince Henry, to whom he was some time tutor, and to the king; and his abilities appeared so respectable, that he was one of the divines sent 1618 to the synod at Dort, from which, however, he soon returned in consequence of ill health, though not without the respect and gratitude of that dignified assembly. In 1624, he refused the see of Gloucester, but three years after he accepted that of Exeter, and in Nov. 1641, he was translated to Norwich. The following December, however, he was sent to the Tower by the parliament, with the rest of the bishops who protested against the exclusion of the spiritual peers from the upper house; and though released six months after by giving 5,000*l.* bail, he was still exposed to the persecution which in those turbulent times attended the clergy. Stripped of his dignities, and with all his revenues sequestered, he retired with difficulty to the obscurity of a little farm which he rented at Heigham near Norwich, where the last nine years of his life were spent. He died 8th Sept. 1656, aged 82: and as he said in his will that "God's house was not a fit repository for dead bodies," he ordered himself to be buried in the churchyard of his parish. To wit, learning, and judgment, this prelate joined the virtues of private life. He was pious, unaffected, and moderate in his religious opinions; and while he wrote against popery, he was equally severe against those who separate from the church from motives of party or innovation. Besides his satires, he wrote—Meditations,—Miscellaneous Letters,—Mundus idem et alter, a satirical piece, &c. His works, says Bayle, abound with fine thoughts, excellent morality, and a great deal of piety; so that he is not improperly called the English Seneca. They were in 5 vols. folio. His meditations on the histories of the Old and New Testament, have been modernized by Mr. Glasse of Hanwell, 4 vols. 12mo.

HALL, John, an English lawyer, and poet, born at Durham, Aug. 1627, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, which he left to study the law at Gray's inn. He was called to the bar, but his celebrity as a political writer recommended him to the parliament, and he was sent to Cromwell to Scotland, but he fell a sacrifice to his licentious intemperance, and died at Durham, 1st Aug. 1656. During his short life he gave strong proofs of his genius and abilities by the publication of "Horæ vacivæ, or essays,"—a translation of Longinus,—some poems, &c.

HALL, Henry, an English divine, born in London, 1716. He was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1738. In 1748 he was appointed librarian at Lambeth by Potter, and he was continued in his office by the next primate, Herring, who rewarded his merit by the rectory of Harbledown, the vicarage of Herne, and the sinecure of Orpington. In 1756 he exchanged Herne for East Peckham, and at the death of his patron in 1757, he resigned the place of librarian, and being appointed treasurer of Wells cathedral, he retired to Harbledown, where he died a bachelor, 2d Nov. 1763, after a short illness. This respectable man, beloved as a pastor for his benevolence, meekness, and exemplary conduct, published some occasional sermons, &c.

HALL, John, a surgeon of Maidstone, Kent, who flourished in the reign of Elizabeth. He published a compendium of anatomy, and other surgical works, besides hymns with musical notes, 1565.

HALL, Jacob, a rope-dancer in the age of Charles II. so graceful in his person, and so pleasing in his address, that he captivated several of the ladies of that licentious period, and especially the dutchess of Cleveland, who granted him a pension.

HALL, Richard, an English popish priest, who left England under Elizabeth to avoid the penal laws against his religion. He became divinity professor at Douay, and canon of St. Omer's, and wrote several theological books, especially the history of the troubles of his times, and died 1604.

HALL, Lyman, whose name is affixed to the declaration of American independence, was born in Connecticut, in 1731, and received a classical education. Having studied medicine he removed to Georgia in 1752, and established himself as a physician at Sudbury. At the beginning of the revolutionary struggle he entered with warmth into the defence of the colonial rights, and was a member of the republican conventions of Georgia in 1774 and 1775, and in the latter year was appointed by the parish of St. John's a representative in the general congress, and was elected again in July of that year by the whole province, on its accession to the confederation. He was an active and useful member of that body, and advocated the declaration of independence. In 1780 he again held a seat in congress, and the following year was chosen governor of Georgia. He died about the 60th year of his age. He possessed a strong and discriminating mind, a sound judgment, a happy talent for conciliating esteem and confidence, and did much by his mild and persuasive manners to unite the citizens of Georgia in the defence of their liberties.

HALLE, Peter, a French civilian and poet, born at Bayeux, in Normandy, 8th Sept. 1611. He was educated at Bayeux and Caen, and by his merit was raised to the office of rhetorical professor in the latter university. His eloquence in the delivery of an oration so pleased Seguer, the chancellor, that he presented him with a doctor's cap 1640, and carried him with him to Paris. Here his abilities were displayed to such advantage that he was offered the headship of five colleges, and was at last appointed poet to the king, and in 1646 reader of the Greek and Latin tongues in the royal college. In 1655 he began as professor of canon law to raise the character of that much neglected science, and by his "canonical institutions," published 1685, and other treatises on law, acquired a high reputation for learning, application, and judgment. He published also 1655, a collection of Latin poems, and died Dec. 27, 1689.

HALLE, Antony, a good Latin poet, professor of eloquence at Caen. He published a Latin grammar—some treatises—poetry, &c. and died at Paris, 1675, aged 83.

HALLE, Claude-Guy, director of the Paris academy of painting, was distinguished as a painter, and by his genius adorned several of the churches of the French capital, especially Notre Dame. He died highly respected 1736, aged 85. His son Noel was member of the academy of painting, and obtained the order of St. Michael for his services in reforming and improving the academy of painting at Rome. He died 1718, aged 70.

HALLER, Albert, an eminent Swiss physician, professor of medicine, chymistry, &c. at Gottingen. Scarce inferior to Boerhaave, his abilities adorned the university and raised it to celebrity. Besides medical tracts, such as disputationes anatomicæ, 8 vols. 4to.—disputationes de morbis, 7 vols. 4to.—elementa physiologiæ, 8 vols. 4to. &c. he wrote moral essays, religious pieces, and a few odes much admired in Germany for poetry, elegance, and sublimity. In 1760 he retired to his native city Berne, where, after enjoying the respect of his country as a senator and magistrate, he died 12th December, 1777, aged 75. His son, who died 1785, was equally eminent as a man of merit, and wrote biographie littéraire de la Suisse.

HALLEY, Edmund, a celebrated English philosopher, born 29th Oct. 1556, in St. Leonard's parish, Shoreditch. He was educated at St. Paul's school under Gale, and in 1673 became a commoner of Queen's college, Oxford, where he early devoted himself to those astronomical and geometrical studies which have rendered his name immortal. His first attempt was to correct the errors of Tycho Brahe, and to ascertain the place of the fixed stars; but finding that those of the northern hemisphere already engaged the attention of Flamstead and Hevelius, he set out under the protection of Charles II. and of the East India Company to St. Helena, where he formed a catalogue of those bodies which never appear above the horizon of Greenwich or Dantzick. After 2 years' residence there, he returned in 1678 to England, and his planisphere was so well received by the learned, that he was honoured with the degree of M.A. at Oxford by royal mandamus, and was admitted fellow of the Royal Society. In 1697 he visited Hevelius at Dantzick, at the request of the Royal Society, to adjust the dispute between that great philosopher and Hooke, in England, concerning the preference of plain or glass lights in astroscopical instruments. On his return he went upon a tour in company with his school-fellow the learned Nelson, and in his way to Paris he first observed that remarkable comet which at that time soon engaged the attention of the philosophers of Europe. After finishing his observations on this wandering body in the Paris observatory, with the kind assistance of the great Cassini, he passed to Lyons, and thence to Italy, where, upon his return to England in 1681, he left his friend Nelson. He now settled at Islington, after his marriage with the daughter of Mr. Tooke, the auditor of the exchequer, and devoted himself ardently to his favourite pursuits. In 1683 appeared his theory of the variation of the magnetical compass, and by his acquaintance with the great Newton, whom he visited at Cambridge to consult him on philosophical subjects, he had the opportunity of recommending, by an elegant copy of verses, the principia of the illustrious astronomer, which were then first presented to the world. In 1698 he obtained from king William the appointment of a vessel to enable him to improve and to mature his philosophical observations on the variations of the needle, and after proceeding as far as the line, he returned home with the intention of pursuing his discoveries in another voyage. The next year with bold zeal in the cause of science, he crossed the Atlantic ocean, and penetrated towards the south pole till the ice stopped his progress, and returning to England in 1700, he published the following year his general chart, showing the variations of the compass in those seas frequented by European navigators. In a third voyage he examined the course of the tides in the various parts of the English channel, and accurately ascertained the longitude and latitude of each headland, which he published in an elegant chart in 1702. At the request of the emperor of Germany he was sent by queen Anne to examine the coast of Dalmatia, where two convenient harbours were to be formed under his auspices for the reception of the commerce of the Mediterranean.— Though the design failed through the jealousy of the Dutch, Halley was honourably treated by the emperor, who presented him with a golden ring from his own finger, as a mark of respect. On his return to England in 1703, he was appointed Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford, and honoured with the degree of LL.D. In 1713 he was appointed secretary to the Royal Society, which he resigned in 1719, when he succeeded Flamstead in the Greenwich observatory, and in reward of his services he received, by the intercession of queen Caroline, the allowance of half pay as a captain of the navy. This great and good man, who had done so much for science and philosophy, was in 1737 attacked by a paralytic stroke, which gradually weakened his constitution, though it did not totally extinguish the powers of his mind. He expired easily and without a groan, as he sat in his chair, 14th Jan. 1741-2, in his 86th year. Besides the works already mentioned, astronomical tables, and several valuable papers in the philosophical transactions, Dr. Halley, at the request of his friend Aldrich, edited and translated the works of Apollonius.

HALLIFAX, George Saville, marquis of. Vid. SAVILLE.

HALLIFAX, Samuel, an English bishop, eldest son of an apothecary at Chesterfield. He was educated at Jesus college, Cambridge, and afterwards removed to Trinity hall, where he took the degree of LL.D. 1764. As professor of civil law in the university, he gained great reputation by his "analysis of the civil law." In 1776 he was created D.D. by mandate, and became afterwards chaplain to the king, rector of Worsop, Notts, master of the faculties in Doctors' Commons, and master of his college, which he resigned in 1781, when made bishop of Gloucester. In 1787 he was translated to St. Asaph, and died 1790, aged 60. He was a man of great erudition, commanding eloquence, and of amiable manners. His sermons at Warburton's lectures were much admired, and also his judicious analysis of Butler's Analogy. He was for some years Arabic professor at Cambridge.

HALS, Francis, a portrait painter of Mechlin, much admired, and considered inferior only to Vandyck. He died 1666, aged 82.

HALS, Dirk, brother to the above, was also a painter, whose genius led him to the humorous representations of festive and low scenes. He died 1656, aged 67.

HAMBERGER, George Albert, an eminent mathematician of Franconia, author of some valuable works on optics, hydraulics, and other philosophical subjects. He died at Jena, 1726.

HAMBERGER, George Christopher, a learned German, of the university of Göttingen. Besides other voluminous works he published Orpheus, with the assistance of Gesner. He died 1773, aged 47.

HAMEL, John Baptist du, a French divine, born 1614, at Vire, in Normandy, and educated at Caen and Paris. At 18 he published a tract on trigonometry with Theodosius's three books on spherics, and the next year he was admitted into the congregation of the oratory, where he continued 10 years, till he became curate of Neuilli on the Marne. In 1666 he was appointed secretary to the newly established academy of sciences, and he afterwards accompanied Colbert de Croissy, the French ambassador, at Aix la Chapelle and in England, where he gained the friendship of Boyle, Ray, and Willis. He returned to France through Holland, and in 1678 published his "philosophia vetus et nova," a valuable work, reprinted in 6 vols. 1681. In 1698 appeared his "Regiæ scientiarum academiæ historia," 4to. in four books, to which two were afterwards added. He also published, 1706, Biblia sacra vulgatæ editionis cum selectis notis, &c. besides other theological works. He died 6th Aug. 1706, of old age. To the character of a scholar he united that of a pious and worthy man, esteemed not only by the great and powerful, but by the poor, especially at Neuilli, where his annual visit, after he had quitted the cure, was regarded as a day of festivity.

HAMEL, du Monceau, Henry Lewis du, a native of Paris, inspector of the marine, and eminent for his knowledge of mechanics, agriculture, and commerce. He wrote treatises on trees, naval architecture, agriculture and other subjects, and died 1782, aged 82.

HAMILCAR BARCAS, the father of Hannibal, was distinguished as a general in Spain, where he founded Barcelona. He fell in battle B.C. 237.

HAMILTON, Patrick, a Scotch divine, related to James V. by whom he was made abbot of Ferne. His further advancement in the church was prevented by his adherence to the tenets of Luther, which so offended the catholic clergy, that at the suggestion of cardinal Beatoun, archbishop of St. Andrews, he was tried as a heretic, and condemned to the flames. He endured the cruel sentence with the most astonishing fortitude, 1527, aged only 23. His confession of faith was published by John Frith. He was not only pious, but learned and polite.

HAMILTON, Antony, count, a native of Ireland, of Scotch extraction. He followed the fate of the second Charles, and returned at the restoration, but was banished at the revolution. His genius, vivacity, and wit rendered him the companion of the great, and the ornament of every society. His works consisted of poems,—fairy tales,—and “Memoirs of the Count de Grammont,” which develop the licentious characters of the court of Charles II. He died at St. Germain’s 1720, aged 74.

HAMILTON, James, first duke of, son of James, marquis of Hamilton, was educated at Oxford, and succeeded to his father’s titles, 1625. With a mind ardent after adventures he went in 1631 with an army to the assistance of Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, and returned the following year. Distinguished at the English court by the favour and good opinion of the monarch, he was named a commissioner to settle the disputes which the presbyterians excited in Scotland on the subject of episcopacy, and for his services he was created duke of Hamilton and earl of Cambridge. After seeing the ruin of his master’s armies in England, he still maintained his cause in the north, but the superior power of Cromwell prevailed against him, and he was unfortunately defeated at Preston. Though promised that his life would be spared, the perfidious conqueror still treated him as an enemy, and caused him to be tried and to be beheaded, 1649, in his 43d year.

HAMILTON, William, duke of, born in 1616, was secretary of state for Scotland, and exerted himself zealously in the royal cause. He died 1652 of the wounds which he had received at the battle of Worcester, aged 36.

HAMILTON, George, earl of Orkney, was fifth son of lord Selkirk. He distinguished himself at the battle of the Boyne, and on other occasions, for which he was raised to the peerage by William III. His valour was equally displayed under Marlborough at Blenheim and Malplaquet. He died 1737.

HAMILTON, William, a poet, born at Bangor, who died 1754, aged 50. His works were printed at Edinburgh, 12mo. 1760.

HAMILTON, Sir William, a Scotchman of the noble family of that name, after receiving a liberal education improved his narrow circumstances by his marriage with a lady of fortune 1755. He was sent as ambassador to the Neapolitan court in 1764, and continued in that capacity till the year 1800, during which time he devoted himself ardently to the cultivation of science, and to the improvement of the fine arts. With the eye of a philosopher, and the taste of a man of genius, he visited and examined the wonders of Etna and Vesuvius, and not only collected from their volcanic eruptions the most valuable curiosities, but composed an interesting and admired performance. He also published Campi Phlegræi, 2 vols. folio, a curious and splendid work, and encouraged and contributed to the compilation of the Antiquités Etrusques, Grecques, et Romaines, edited from his cabinet by D’Hancarville. The philosophical transactions were also enriched by his learned commentaries, and the British Museum can boast of his valuable presents of antiquities and other curious donations. This active antiquarian, whose researches were so much applauded by all men of science, was honoured with the ribbon of the order of the Bath, while at Naples, and he received from the Sicilian king and his court every mark of attention and respect. Some years after the death of his first wife he married Miss Hart, who survived him. He died in London, May, 1803.

HAMILTON, Andrew, a native of Scotland, was appointed by William Penn deputy governor of Pennsylvania in 1701. He had previously been for several years governor of New-Jersey, of which colony he was one of the proprietors, and where he was succeeded by Andrew Bowne. He died December, 1702.  L.

HAMILTON, John, was appointed a member of the council of New-Jersey in 1713, and succeeded Mr. Anderson as commander-in-chief of the province as senior member in March, 1736. He continued at the head of the administration until 1738, and died in 1746.  L.

HAMILTON, James, governor of Pennsylvania, was a native of Philadelphia, and succeeded governor Thomas in 1748. He resigned in October, 1754, and was again appointed in 1759, and continued in the office till 1763, when John Penn arrived as governor. In 1771 the administration again devolved on him a short time. He held several other offices of distinction in the province, and enjoyed the esteem and confidence of the people. He died in New-York, while that city was occupied by the British, August 14th, 1783, aged 73.

 L.

HAMILTON, Alexander, first secretary of the treasury of the United States, and a general in the American army, was a native of the Island of St. Croix, and born in 1757. At the age of sixteen he accompanied his mother, who was an American, to New-York, and entered King’s college, where he remained about three years, and gave at that early period proofs of his extraordinary talents, by the publication of several papers vindicating the rights of the colonies, which exhibited such strength and sagacity, that they were ascribed to the pen of Mr. Jay. He entered the Ameri-

an army at the age of eighteen, as an officer of artillery, and soon attracted the notice of Washington, who in 1777 selected him as an aid with the rank of lieutenant, colonel. In the campaign of 1781 he commanded a battalion, and at the taking of York led the American detachment which stormed and took the British works. After the capture of Cornwallis, he retired from the service, and engaged in the study of the law. He entered on the profession in New-York, and soon rose to distinction in it. In 1787 he was appointed a member from New-York of the federal congress which formed the constitution of the United States, and in 1789, when the government was organized, was placed by Washington at the head of the treasury; where he rendered the most important services to his country by the measures he devised to procure a revenue and impart credit and prosperity to the nation. He had charge of the troops employed in 1794 to suppress the insurrection in Pennsylvania. Soon afterwards he retired from office that he might procure a more ample provision for his family by his profession. In 1798 when the provisional army was raised, at the instance of Washington, he was appointed the second in command. On the disbanding of the army he returned to New-York, where he continued employed in his profession till the 11th of June, 1804, when he fell in a duel with colonel Burr, vice president of the United States, and on the following day expired, universally lamented, second to none of his survivors in energy of understanding, extent of legal and political knowledge, lofty eloquence, integrity, and promise of usefulness to his country. He was the author of the letters of Phocion, written after the peace, in favour of the loyalist, and also of nearly all the numbers of the Federalist, a series of essays designed to explain and advocate the principles of the constitution of the United States.  L.

HAMILTON, Paul, secretary of the United States navy department, was a South Carolinian, and at the period of the Revolution rendered important services to the country by his zeal and firmness in the popular cause. He was appointed in 1799 comptroller of South Carolina, a station for which his methodical mind, quick discernment, and accurate knowledge of accounts eminently fitted him. He held the office five years, and rendered himself highly useful by the improvements he introduced into the system of finance. In 1804 he succeeded Mr. Richardson as governor of the state, and was succeeded in 1806 by Mr. Pinckney. In 1809 he was appointed secretary of the navy, and held the office till January, 1812, when he resigned. He maintained in the public stations which he occupied, a character of unimpeached integrity, and was generous and amiable in private life. He died at Beaufort, June 30, 1816.  L.

HAMILTON, Hugh, a learned prelate, was born in Ireland in 1729. He received his education in Trinity college, Dublin, where, in 1751, he obtained a fellowship. In 1758 appeared his treatise "De Sectionibus Conicis;" and the next year he was elected Erasmus Smith's professor of natural philosophy. In 1764 he accepted a college living, and thereby vacated his fellowship. After this he obtained the rectory of St. Anne's, Dublin; but relinquished it on being promoted to the deanery of Armagh. In 1796 he was consecrated bishop of Clonfert; from whence, in 1799, he was translated to Ossory, where he died Dec. 1, 1805. His works and life were published in 1809, in 2 vols. 8vo.—W. B.

HAMILTON, William, a historical painter, was born in 1750. He went to Italy when very young, and was there placed under the instruction of Zucchi, the painter of arabesque ornaments at Rome. On his return to England he became a pupil at the Royal Academy, and afterwards acquired considerable employment. In 1789 he was admitted a royal academician. He died Dec. 2, 1801.—W. B.

HAMLET, prince of Denmark, is immortalized in English literature by the pen of Shakspeare, who drew his materials from the relation of Saxo Grammaticus the Danish historian.

HAMMOND, Henry, an English divine born at Chertsy, Surrey, 18th Aug. 1605. He was educated at Eton, and Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1625. In 1633 he was presented to the living of Penhurst, Kent, by Robert earl of Leicester, who accidentally heard him in the pulpit, and thus nobly rewarded his eloquence and piety. He continued in this peaceful retirement, the zealous minister of his parish, till 1643, when his zeal in the royal cause rendered him obnoxious to the parliament, and 100*l.* were set upon his head. He fled in disguise to Oxford, and in 1644, at the request of his friend Dr. Potter of Queen's college, he published his "practical catechism," which gave offence to those who in the business of salvation regarded faith alone without works. He however defended himself against the attacks not only of Cheynell, but of 52 ministers in the province of London, and he continued to serve the cause of religion by other valuable tracts. At the treaty of Uxbridge he was appointed on the part of Charles I. and he displayed to great advantage his learning and eloquence in a dispute with Richard Vines, a presbyterian minister delegated by the parliament to meet him. To the archdeaconry of Chichester to which Duppa had presented him in 1644, the king in 1645 added a canonry of Christ church, and soon after he was chosen public orator to the university. He afterwards attended the king as chaplain during his confinement at Woburn, Caversham, Hampton Court, and the Isle of Wight, till he was dismissed in 1647 by the parliament, and permitted to return to Oxford. He was in 1648 stripped of his honours, and with Dr. Sheldon, confined a prisoner in Oxford by the parliamentary delegates, and ten weeks after conveyed to the house of Sir Philip Warwick at Clapham, Bedfordshire. When liberated in 1649, he retired to the seat of Sir John Packwood Westwood, Worcestershire, where the second Charles saw and commended his loyalty, and his firm adherence to the religion of his country. In 1653 he published his "paraphrase and annotations on the New Testament," which he had begun during his confinement at Oxford, a work of great merit, and general utility. He began afterwards a "paraphrase and commentary on all the books of the Old Testament," but his infirmities prevented his completing more than the Psalms, and the 3d part of Proverbs. He fell a martyr to the stone, accompanied by those other dreadful maladies the gout, the colic, and cramp, 25th April, 1660, at a time when the king, restored to the throne of his ancestors, was meditating to reward his meritorious services by raising him to the bishopric of Worcester. His works are collected into 4 vols. folio.

HAMMOND, Anthony, an English poet, whose family had long been settled at Somersham-place, Huntingdonshire. He was born 1663, and was educated at St. John's, Cambridge. He became commissioner to the navy, and was so eloquent in parliament that Bolingbroke called him the silver-tongued Hammond. Distinguished as a wit, and as a man of fashion, he was equally known as a poet and an author. He wrote the life of his friend Moyle, besides poems. He died about 1730.

HAMMOND, James, second son of the above, is distinguished as a poet. He was born in 1710, and educated at Westminster school, but he did not it seems enter at the university. He was early made equerry to the prince of Wales, and thus moving in the sphere of fashion he became the friend of Lyttleton, Cobham, and Chesterfield. His income was increased in 1733 to 400*l.* a year by the liberality of a dying relation, and in 1741 he was elected member for Truro, yet in the midst of pleasures and business he did not forget the calls of the muse, but often withdrew from festive scenes to the tranquillity of retirement and the meditations of literary life. His "love elegies" are elegant and valuable specimens of his poetical powers, and also his prologues, &c. He died at Stowe, the seat of his friend Cobham, June, 1742. His cruel mistress survived him till 1779, and died unmarried, bed-chamber woman to the queen. The elegies appeared after his death, recommended, says Dr. Maty, by the elegant pen of lord Chesterfield.

HAMON, John, a French physician of Cherbourg. He wrote on religious subjects and in a style much admired, and deserving the high commendation of Boileau. He died 1687, aged 69.

HAMPDEN, John, the illustrious patriot, was born of a very ancient family in Buckinghamshire, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. From the university he went to the inns of court in London, and was afterwards chosen in parliament. In 1636 he had the boldness alone and unsupported to resist the royal authority in levying ship money, and though he lost his cause he gained more admirers by the firmness and modesty of his conduct than the king obtained advantage by the successful issue of the trial. Thus proclaimed by the public voice a patriot, Hampden was now regarded as the leader of the popular party in the House of Commons against the king, and when the civil war broke out, he took up arms to defend what he considered as the rights of the people. In the field he showed himself courageous, intrepid, and active, but his career of glory was cut short by a fatal wound which he received in Chalgrove field, Oxfordshire, when fighting against prince Rupert 18th June, 1643. The bone of his shoulder was shattered by two bullets, and after suffering great pain from the wound, he expired six days after, to the universal regret of his party. This very extraordinary character, who, in every contest in the parliament and in the field, evinced such steadiness and perseverance in what he regarded as the cause of his country, is described by Clarendon as a great rather than a good man, and the noble historian applies to him what was applied to Cinna, that he had a head to contrive, a tongue to persuade, and a hand to execute any mischief.

HANSA, a Mahometan doctor, known for his extravagant attempts to eradicate the tenets of Mahomet, and to establish a new religion of his own. His book in opposition to the Alcoran was translated into French, and is called "evidences of the mysteries of the unity." It is written with great purity and elegance. He flourished about 1020.

HANCOCK, Thomas, merchant of Boston, Massachusetts, and a benefactor of Harvard college, was born in Lexington in 1703, and died in Boston in 1764. He bequeathed 1000*l.* to Harvard college for establishing a professorship of Hebrew and other oriental languages, 1000*l.* to the society for propagating the gospel among the Indians of North America, and 600*l.* to the town of Boston for the purpose of erecting an insane hospital. He was greatly respected for uprightnes and humanity, and was highly useful in many offices to which his fellow-citizens advanced him, and as a member of his majesty's council. ¶ L.

HANCOCK, John, LL.D. governor of Massachusetts, and a nephew of the preceding, from whom he inherited great wealth, was a native of Braintree, and born in 1737. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1754, and became a merchant. He was elected a member of the assembly in 1766, and soon distinguished himself by a talent for business, and a zealous opposition to the oppressive acts of the British. In 1774 he was president of the provincial congress, and the year after elected a member of the general congress which met at Philadelphia. He was chosen president of that body, and in that capacity signed the declaration of independence in 1776. His health declining in 1777 he left that appointment, and in 1780 was elected the first governor of Massachusetts under the new constitution; and held that office during the four succeeding years, and again from 1787 till 1793, when he died in the fifty-sixth year of his age. Governor Hancock possessed talents that always adorned the several exalted stations to which he was elevated. He was one of the first and most conspicuous actors in the great drama of the Revolution, and gained by his zealous devotion to his country a rank among the most distinguished of her benefactors. The charges against his talents and patriotism which were thrown out in the heat of party contentions, and which have gained a place in some of the histories of those times, impartiality never admitted, and had they been true, gratitude for the eminent services he rendered would not be forward to perpetuate them. In private life he was characterized by affability, urbanity, and distinguished liberality to the poor. ¶ L.

HANDEL, George Frederic, a celebrated musician born at Halle, Upper Saxony, 24th Feb. 1684. His father who was a surgeon intended him for the profession of the law, and that he might check his strong inclinations for music he prevented his access to all musical instruments. The son, however, in spite of his father's prohibitions, obtained a small clavichord, with which he amused himself every evening, at the top of the house, after the family had retired to rest. His accidental visit with his father to the court of the duke of Saxe Weisenfels, where his brother-in-law was valet of the household, enabled him at last to follow the bent of his genius. He played the church organ after the morning service, with such effect that the duke, who happened to be present, sensible of his promising powers, expostulated with his father, and obtained from him the permission of his being instructed in music. Under the care of Zackaw, at Halle, young Handel began to display that musical genius which marked him for immortality. At the age of nine he composed the church service for voices and instruments, and after equalling his master at Halle he passed to Berlin, where the king of Prussia witnessed and rewarded his astonishing powers. From Berlin he went to Hamburgh, where he was greatly noticed, but the honours which he received, excited the envy of other musicians, and one of them, as he was returning from the orchestra, made a violent push at him with a sword. The wound would have proved fatal had not Apollo, says his historian, interposed, and by means of a music book which he accidentally carried in his bosom, Handel was not mortally stabbed to the heart. It was at Hamburgh, where, at the age of 14, he produced Almeria, his first opera, with such effect that it was repeated thirty successive nights; and after staying here about five years he visited Florence. Here his Rodrigo was produced with universal applause; but not attached to any particular place, and too independent in spirit to be gained by the most liberal promises of patronage, he next went to Vienna, where his Agrippina, finished in three weeks, was performed for 27 successive nights. Afterwards he again visited Italy, and then returned to his native country, and from thence he passed through Hanover to England in 1710. His fame procured him here friends and admirers, he was flattered by the queen and nobility, and his Rinaldo, which he produced here, showed how well he was entitled to the public favour. After visiting the elector of Hanover he again returned to England, and that he might be induced to devote his services to the musical entertainment of the nation, not only a pension of 200*l.* a year was settled on him, but he was appointed composer to the Haymarket theatre. On the accession of George I. his pension was doubled by the monarch, who forgot the offence which Handel had offered him by not settling at Hanover; but after presiding nine years at the musical academy of the Haymarket, supported by the nobility, he found that his quarrels with the Italian singers who performed under him, rendered him unpopular, and by degrees his audience sunk away from him. Though he attempted to recover his popularity by visiting Italy, and introducing new singers, he found still that his opponents were too powerful; but after some time malice and jealousy ceased, and his merits were again permitted to shine in full splendour. In 1742, on his return from Dublin to London, he was invited to Covent garden, and here his oratorios were continued with increasing popularity till within eight days of his death. He expired the 14th April, 1759, and was buried in Westminster abbey, where a handsome monument, at his expense, was erected to his memory. His works, which are truly valuable, have been well edited by Dr. Arnold.

HANGEST, Jerome de, a doctor of the Sorbonne, who distinguished himself by his writings against Luther. He died at Mans 1538.

HANIFAH, a Saint among the Mussulmans, regarded as the head of the most ancient of all their sects. The other sects are those of Schiasi, of Malik, and of Hambel. He died at Babylon.

HANKINS, Martin, was born at Breslaw 1633, where he became professor of history, politics, and eloquence. His works evince the scholar and the critic. The best known of these is his book, "De Romanarum Rerum Scriptoribus," to which was added de Byzantin. Rerum Scriptor. Græcis. He died 1709.

HANMER, Meredith, D. D. a native of Flintshire, who became treasurer of Trinity church, Dublin, and died there of the plague 1604. He translated into English the ecclesiastical histories of Socrates, Eusebius, and Evagrius.

HANMER, Sir Thomas, a statesman born 1676, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ Church, Oxford. He was for thirty years member of parliament as representative of either Suffolk, Flintshire, or Thetford, and in 1713, he was chosen speaker, an office which he adorned by dignity of deportment, commanding eloquence, and great impartiality. He retired from public life and devoted himself to literary pursuits. He published an edition of Shakspeare, in an elegant and magnificent style, which he presented to the university of Oxford in six vols. 4to. He died at his seat, Suffolk, 5th April, 1746.

HANMER, Jonathan, a nonconformist divine, born at Barnstable, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.A. He was ordained by bishop Field, and was made rector of Bishop's Tawton, and lecturer of Barnstable, from which he was ejected 1662. He is the author of a view of ecclesiastical antiquity,—of a discourse on confirmation,—and other works. He died 1687.

HANNECKEN, Mennon, a historian and divine, born at Blaxan, Oldenbourg. He was professor of morals, theology, &c. at Marburg, and died at Lubeck 1671, aged 76. He wrote a Hebrew grammar,—an exposition of St. Paul's epistle to the Ephesians, &c.

HANNECKEN, Philip Lewis, eldest son of the preceding, was professor of eloquence and Hebrew at Giessen, and died at Wittenberg, 1706. His works were chiefly on theological controversy.

HANNEMAN, John, a painter at the Hague, known for historical pieces, and portraits, and as an excellent copyist of Vandyck. He was patronised by Mary princess of Orange, daughter of Charles I. and died 1680, aged 69.

HANNIBAL, a celebrated Carthaginian. At the age of nine he swore to his father eternal enmity to Rome, and through life he evinced how much he adhered to the solemnity of an oath. After taking Saguntum, and thus beginning the second Punic war, he crossed the Alps, and defeated the Romans at the great battles of Trebia, the Thrasymene lake, and Cannæ, with such terrible carnage, that during sixteen years, no general had the boldness to face him in the field. By invading Africa, the Romans forced the victorious Hannibal to come to the defence of his country, and at the battle of Zama he was defeated by Scipio. He afterwards led a wandering life at the courts of Antiochus and Prusias in Asia, and at last destroyed himself by poison when he was going to be betrayed into the hands of the Romans, B. C. 182.

HANNIBALIANUS, Flavius Claudius, nephew of Constantine, was murdered by Constantius, A. D. 338.

HANNO, a Carthaginian general, who made some curious discoveries in Africa, of which he wrote an account still extant.

HANNSACHS, a German poet born at Nuremberg. His works are swelled to five folio vols. but possess little to recommend them either in elegance or genius. He died 1576.

HANRIOT, Francis, a native of Nanterre, who during the revolution obtained the confidence of Marat and Robespierre, by the atrocity of his character, and the active part which he performed in the murder of the priests at the Carmes in September, 1792. By surrounding the convention with armed men, he obtained the decree of accusation against the Girondists, but though thus triumphant, the fall of Robespierre was but the forerunner of his own. He was guillotined 23th July, 1794, aged 33, execrated for his cruelty, rapine, and insolence.

HANSON, John, president of the American congress, was a delegate from Maryland, and one of the most distinguished members of that body for many years. He was elected president in November, 1781, and discharged the duties of the station with great ability and dignity till 1783, when he was succeeded by Mr. Mifflin, and died on the 13th of November of that year in Prince George county.  L.

HANWAY, Jonas, a benevolent character, born at Portsmouth 1712. He was early engaged with a merchant at Lisbon, and afterwards was connected with a house at Petersburg, in the business of which he travelled into Persia. On his return to London, in the retirement of private life he employed his large and honourably acquired opulence to the purposes of benevolence and humanity, and to his liberality and public spirit, among other institutions, the Marine Society, and the Magdalen Charity owe their origin. His services in the cause of philanthropy were such that several British merchants applied to lord Bute to distinguish him by some marks of public esteem, and he was accordingly made commissioner of the navy, and when after 20 years he resigned the office he was honourably permitted to retain the salary. His exertions to relieve the distresses of the chimney-sweepers, deserve also the highest praise, and to his humane intentions the establishment of Sunday schools is in some degree to be attributed. At his death, which happened 1786, a public subscription of several thousands was contributed to erect a monument to the memory of a man, who above all others had shone as a pattern of benevolence, virtue, and philanthropy. His publications are said to have amounted to nearly 70, the best known of which are an account of his travels through Russia, Persia, Germany, and Holland, &c. published 1753, 2 vols. 4to. and Domestic Happiness promoted. He is said to be the first who used an umbrella in the streets of London.

HARCOURT, Harriet Eusebia, a lady born at Richmond, Yorkshire. She travelled with her father over Europe, and at his death at Constantinople in 1733, she returned to England, and as she inherited a large property she began to establish a female monastery on her Yorkshire estate, and another in the Western Isles of Scotland. These institutions which were composed chiefly of foreign females, restrained by neither vows nor austere forms, were dissolved at the death of their patroness, which happened 1745, in her 39th year.

HARDENBURGH, Jacobus R., D.D. first president of Queen's College in New-Jersey, was a native of America, and without the aid of a collegiate education became eminent and useful, by the superiority of his mental powers, and diligence in cultivating them. He was settled over the Reformed Dutch Church at New Brunswick, New-Jersey, and on the establishment of the college there in 1770, was elected its first president, and continued in the office till his death in 1790, in his 53d year. He was highly respected for his learning and piety.  L.

HARDEK, John James, a native of Basil, who studied medicine at Rome, and in France. On his return to Basil he became professor of rhetoric and afterwards of medicine and anatomy, and was three times rector of the university. He was highly esteemed for his learning and abilities, and besides the honours bestowed by several princes, he was raised to the dignity of a Count by the emperor Leopold. He wrote prodromus physiologicus, &c.—apiarum—examen anatomicum cochleæ terrestris, &c. and died 1711, aged 55.—His brother James was professor of oriental languages at Leyden, and a learned divine. Before he took possession of his professional chair he travelled through Europe, and died at Constantinople.

HARDEBY, Geoffrey, an Augustine monk, confessor to Henry II. and professor at Oxford. He died in London 1360, author of some lectures on the Old and New Testament,—history of his order,—tract on evangelical poverty, &c.

HARDIME, Peter, a painter of Antwerp, who died 1748, aged 70. His four designs representing the four seasons with appropriate fruits are much admired in the monastery of the Bernardines at Antwerp. His brother Simon excelled as a flower painter, and died at London, 1737.

HARDING, John, author of an English chronicle, died 1461.

HARDING, Thomas, an English divine, born at Comb-Martin, Devonshire, 1512. He was educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford, where he became fellow 1536. He was made Hebrew professor of the university by Henry VIII. and when chaplain to the duke of Suffolk, he was concerned in the education of his daughter the lady Jane Grey. From a protestant under Edward, he became a strong catholic under Mary, and at the accession of Elizabeth, he lost his preferment and retired to Louvain, where he became, says Wood, the target of popery. He entered the lists of controversy with bishop Jewel, against whom, during 13 years, he wrote seven pieces in support of the catholic faith. He died about 1570.

HARDINGE, Nicolas, an eminent English scholar, born at Canbury near Kingston, Surrey, and educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. He was clerk to the House of Commons, and afterwards member for Eye, and secretary to the treasury. He died 9th April, 1758, leaving by his wife, lord Camden's sister, the present eminent counsel, G. Hardinge, &c. His Latin poems were much admired, and two of them are preserved in the the Musæ Anglicanæ. He wrote besides "Denhill Iliad," a poem, and other things. To an extensive knowledge of history, law, and the English constitution, he united a correct taste formed by an intimate acquaintance with classical literature. His valuable library was sold by auction 1759.

HARDINGE, George, son of the preceding, was born in 1744. He received his education at Eton, and went from thence to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he had Dr., afterwards bishop, Watson for his tutor. In 1769, he was created M. A. by mandate, and the same year was called to the bar by the society of the Middle Temple. By the influence of his maternal uncle, lord Camden, he obtained a silk gown, and in 1782 was appointed solicitor-general to the queen. He also became counsel for the East India Company, and had a seat in parliament. In 1787, he was made senior justice of the counties of Brecon, Glamorgan, and Radnor, and two years afterwards, attorney-general to her late majesty, who honoured him with her confidence and conversation. He died at Presteigne, on the circuit, April 26, 1816. Mr. Justice Hardinge was a man of learning, a good lawyer, and of infinite pleasantry. Besides several speeches in parliament, and at the bar, which have been printed, he wrote—1. "A Series of Letters to Burke on the impeachment of Hastings," 8vo. 2. The Essence of Malone, or the beauties of that fascinating writer, 8vo., an ironical attack on Malone's life of Dryden. 3. Another Essence of Malone, 8vo. 4. "The Filial Tribute" on the death of his Mother, 12mo. 5. Three Sermons by a Layman. 6. An Essay on the Character of Jonathan. 7. The Russian Chiefs, an ode. His miscellaneous works and correspondence have been published by Mr. Nichols, with the life of the author.—W. B.

HARDION, James, member of the academy of inscriptions, was born at Tours. He died at Paris, 1766, aged 80. He published "Universal History," 18 vols.—a treatise on French poetry and rhetoric, 3 vols. and other works.

HARDOUIN, John, a French Jesuit, born at Quimper, in Brittany, 1647. He distinguished himself for his criticism and extensive erudition, as well as by the singularity of his opinions. He published, in 1684, "nummi antiqui populorum et urbium illustrati," and afterwards was engaged in the edition of the classics, for the use of the Dauphin, especially Pliny, 5 vols. 4to. He next attempted religious subjects, and in 1693, came out, in 2 vols. 4to. his "Chronologiae prolusio, &c." in which he maintains that the many authors which the moderns regard as ancient, are only impositions upon the credulity of the world by the artifice of the monks of the 13th century. Homer, therefore, and a long list of literary heroes are hurled down from their height of antiquity, and Cicero alone, with Pliny's natural history, and Virgil's Georgics, and Horace's satires and epistles, are permitted to retain the reverence paid to them through successive ages. His learning was thus lost in wild reveries, and while he wished to prove that the Æneas of Virgil is no other than Jesus Christ, and the Lalage of Horace the Christian religion, he imposed upon his own understanding, and gave way to the greatest absurdities, which public authority at last was called upon to repress. His opinions were ably opposed by La Croze, by Le Clerc, and others, but though he pretended to make a recantation of his errors, he yet continued to maintain them. With the approbation of some of the French clergy, by whom he was assigned a pension, he prepared a new edition of the councils, in 12 vols. folio, which, however, was prohibited by the parliament. This extraordinary character died at Paris, 3d Sept. 1729, aged 83, and after his death appeared some of his posthumous works. De Boze wrote his epitaph, and after mentioning his learning, he concludes by describing him as a man, "qui Scepticum piè egit, credulitate puer, audacia juvenis, deliriis senex."

HARDUIN, Alexander Xavier, a native of Arras, secretary to the academy of his country. He was also an advocate and a poet, but he is better known as a grammarian. He died 1788, aged 70. He wrote dissertations on vowels and consonants, and other works.

HARDWICKE, Philip York earl of, an eminent English lawyer, born at Dover, 1st December, 1690, and educated under Mr. Samuel Morland of Bethnal Green. He studied law in the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar in 1714, and in 1718 was chosen member for Lewes. His great abilities, and the friendship of Parker the chancellor, raised him, in 1720, to the office of solicitor-general, and in four years after he was appointed attorney-general. In the trials of Laver, of Kelley, and others, he displayed great eloquence, extensive knowledge of law, and honourable candour and lenity. Upright in his conduct, and biassed by no influence of favour or of party, he acted up to the impartial dictates of his conscience, and in some cases even voted against those friends to whose favour or kindness he owed his elevation. In 1733, he was made chief justice of the King's bench, with a double salary of 4000*l.* and soon after a baron of the realm, and on the death of lord Talbot, he was appointed lord chancellor, February 1736-7. In 1754 he was raised to the dignity of an earl, and two years after he resigned the high office which for twenty years he had supported with honour, with impartiality, and with general approbation. During these times of public danger and official embarrassment only three of his decrees were questioned, and on examination they were affirmed by the lords. To his great knowledge of law, he joined a high respect for the constitution of his country, and while he was eager to despatch the often protracted business of chancery, he applied his commanding talents to the relief and the comforts of the subject, in the planning and improving the bills introduced to the legislature. This excellent character, pious as a Christian, eloquent as an orator, dignified as a judge, well informed as a politician, as much beloved in private as he was honourably respected in public life, died 6th March, 1764, at his house in Grosvenor-square. He was buried at Wimpole, Cambridgeshire, near his wife, daughter of Charles Cocks, brother of lord Somers. His son and successor in the title distinguished himself while at Cambridge as the author of Athenian letters, in which he was assisted by his brother Charles. He also published sir Dudley Carleton's correspondence while ambassador from the first James to the States General, and some other state papers. He died 1760, aged 70.

HARDY, Alexander, a French dramatic writer, whose plays it is said amounted to six hundred, of which, however, only 41, in six volumes, 8vo. were printed. With great facility of composition he often wrote 2000 lines in 24 hours, and completed his play in three days. He was the first French dramatist paid for his pieces. He died at Paris 1830.

HARDY, Sir Charles, was appointed governor of New-York in 1755, and continued two years in office. He was descended from a distinguished naval commander under Queen Anne; was an admiral in the British navy, and was appointed commander-in-chief of the grand western squadron in 1779, in which year he died at Spithead.

☞ L.

HARDY, Josiah, governor of New-Jersey, was appointed in 1761, and succeeded by Franklin the following year. He was previously an eminent merchant of London, and brother of Sir Charles.

☞ L.

HARE, Francis, an English prelate bred at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, of which he was fellow. He became tutor to lord Blandford, son of the illustrious Marlborough, and by his friendship rose to the office of chaplain general to the army, and afterwards of dean of Worcester, and bishop of Chichester, with the deanery of St. Paul's till his death, 1740. He has been accused by some of skepticism, but falsely, though he treats in a manner more ludicrous than dignified the study of Scripture, in his "difficulties and discouragements, &c." He opposed Hoadly in the Bangorian controversy, and published other works, besides Terence with notes in 4to.—

the psalms in the Hebrew in the original metre, a work censured by some learned men, and especially by Lowth in his lectures.

HARIOT, Thomas, an English mathematician, born at Oxford 1560. He was educated at St. Mary hall there, where he took the degree of B.A. He went over to America with Sir Walter Raleigh, whom he instructed in mathematics, and at his return he gave to the public an account of Virginia, reprinted in Hackluyt's voyages. He was afterwards patronised by Henry, earl of Northumberland, who liberally allowed him an annual pension of 120*l.* and who, when confined in the tower, forgot the horrors of imprisonment and persecution, in his interesting conversation. He lived for some time at Sion college, and died at London, July 21st, 1621, of a cancer on his lip. His "ephemeris chryometrica" is preserved in Sion college in MS. and from his "artis analyticae praxis," published after his death, it is said Des Cartes drew many of his improvements in algebra. Wood has impeached his character as to his religious principles; but while he describes him as a deist, others regard his attachment to the doctrines of the church, and his veneration for the holy Scriptures as incontrovertible.

HARIRI, an Arabian author, born at Barsa, in the kingdom of Babylon. He wrote Almakamah, or 50 assemblies, that is, conferences, &c. published by Golius in Arabic and Latin, Leyden, 1666, six of which were translated into English by Chappelow, Arabic professor at Cambridge 1767. He died 1122.

HARLAY, Achille de, a learned president of the parliament of Paris, after De Thou. During the commotions of the league he maintained with firmness and dignity his attachment to the king, and without yielding to the intrigues of the factious and the disloyal, he supported with increasing reputation the upright conduct of the magistrate. He died universally respected, at Paris, 23d Oct. 1616, aged 80.

HARLAY de Sancy, Nicholas de, counsellor of the parliament of Paris, and afterwards ambassador of France in England; was very zealous in the service of Henry III. On the accession of Henry IV. he changed his religion to please his master, to whom he endeared himself by his attention and his obsequiousness. He died 13th Oct. 1629, aged 84.

HARLAY, Francis de, archbishop of Rouen, and afterwards of Paris, was the favourite of Anne of Austria, and afterwards of Lewis XIV. though little entitled by his private manners, say some historians, to the notice of the great. He died 6th August, 1695, aged 70. His life has been written by Le Gendre.

HARLAY, Achille de, first president of the parliament of Paris, was an upright magistrate, and a respectable subject. In his conversation he was particularly jocose, and often forgot the dignity of his rank or situation to indulge his inclination for a witty or severe allusion. He died 23d July, 1712, aged 73.

HARLEY, Robert, earl of Oxford, was eldest son of sir Edward Harley, and was born in Bow-street, Covent-garden, 5th Dec. 1661. He was educated at the private but respectable school of Mr. Birch at Shilton near Burford, Oxon, and there he laid the foundation of that extensive knowledge, and that general information which raised him to the highest honours. At the revolution he levied a troop of horse in favour of William, and soon after was chosen member for Tregony, in Cornwall, and then for Radnor, which he represented till he obtained a seat in the upper house. In Feb. 1701-2 he was chosen speaker of the house of commons, and continued in that high office that and two successive parliaments. In 1704 he became one of the privy counsellors, and the same year was made secretary of state. In 1706 he was one of the commissioners to settle the union with Scotland, and in 1710, he was raised to the office of one of the commissioners of the treasury, and of chancellor of the exchequer. In March, that year, his life was attempted by the marquis of Guiscard, a French papist, who, when examined before the privy council, stabbed him with a pen-knife, for which offence he was sent to Newgate, where he died soon after. The danger thus incurred increased the popularity of the secretary, who, after some weeks' confinement, was, on his appearance in the house, handsomely congratulated by the speaker. In 1711, he was raised to the peerage by the queen, and the same year appointed lord high treasurer of Great Britain, an office which he resigned 1714, four days before the queen's death. In 1715 he was impeached by the commons of high crimes and misdemeanours, and after two years' confinement he was tried and acquitted by his peers, July 1st, 1717. He died 21st May, 1724, aged 63. Though abused and vilified by his rival in power, Bolingbroke, not only in the senate but in a letter to sir William Windham, he possessed great talents, and was not devoid of those amiable virtues which attend and support the good man, and which have been deservedly illustrated by the immortal pen of his contemporary, Pope. As a patron of learning the public respect his character, and the valuable collection which he made of MSS. and of rare and curious books, after being augmented by his son, now adorns the shelves of the British museum.

HARLOW, George Henry, a painter, was born in the parish of St. James, Westminster, in 1787. He was a posthumous child, but his mother took great care of his education, and allowed him to follow the bent of his inclination for the arts which he studied, first under Drummond, and next under Sir Thomas Lawrence, after which he went to Italy. Previous, however, to his going abroad he painted some historical pictures of great merit, particularly one of Henry VIII., queen Catherine, and cardinal Wolsey. During his residence at Rome, in 1818, he made a copy of Raphael's Transfiguration, and executed a composition of his own which was exhibited by Canova, and afterwards at the academy of St. Luke's. This promising artist died soon after his return to England, Jan. 28th, 1819.—W. B.

HARMER, Thomas, a dissenting minister of Waterfield in Suffolk, born at Norwich. He is author of "observations on passages of Scripture," 4 vols. 8vo. a valuable work often edited. He wrote also notes on Solomon's song, and other works, showing in the most respectable light his extensive learning and his perfect acquaintance with oriental literature. He died 1788, aged 73.

HARMODIUS, Vid. ARISTOGITON.

HARO, Don Louis de, nephew and heir of Olivarez, the famous Spanish minister, was equally celebrated as the favourite of Philip IV. He was not only prime minister, but a negotiator, and had a long conference with Mazarin to settle the peace with the Low Countries and with France, in 1659. He was as respectable in private life, as he was distinguished in the cabinet. He died 17th Nov. 1661, aged 63.

HAROLD I. king of England, was son of Canute. The interference of Alnot, archbishop of Canterbury, who considered him as illegitimate, and who would consecrate none but the son of queen Emma, proved the source of civil discord. Harold, however, possessed power and influence, and, by seizing the throne, he became master of his half-brother Alfred, whom he confined in a monastery, after putting out his eyes. He died the 5th year of his reign, in 1039, and without issue.

HAROLD II. son of earl Godwin, took possession of the English crown on the death of Edward the Confessor. His claims to the sovereignty were opposed by his brother, but after defeating him in the north with great slaughter, he found that another competitor, William of Normandy, had invaded the kingdom. He marched bravely to repel this formidable invasion, and fell, nobly fighting at the head of his troops, 14th Oct. 1066, the first year of his reign. Though Harold must be considered in some degree as a usurper, yet his bravery, his wisdom, and his virtues, exhib-hit him to the view of history in the most amiable light. Had he defeated the Normans in the field of Hastings, he might have adorned his reign by the arts of peace, and, endeared to his people by the intrepidity with which he exposed his life in the defence of his native country, he might have given birth to a new era of national prosperity, political justice, and honourable industry, and prevented that tyranny, and that devastation, which ever attends the steps of a foreign, arrogant, and suspicious usurper.

HARPALUS, a Grecian astronomer, inventor of the cycle, afterwards improved by Meton, B. C. 480.

HARPALUS, an officer intrusted by Alexander with the treasures of Babylon. The trader was too tempting for the avidity of Harpalus, who plundered the treasury and fled away.

HARPE, John Francis de la, a French writer of great eminence. He was of Swiss parentage, and was born at Paris 20th Nov. 1733, and educated in the college of Harcourt. He began early the profession of writer, and his earl of Warwick, a tragedy, in 1764, procured him great applause and some money. He published various other dramatic pieces, besides poems rewarded with prizes from different learned bodies, elegies of Fenelon, Catinat, Charles V. &c. highly and deservedly admired. His chief work is a complete course of literature, 12 vols. 8vo. As a critic, his powers were advantageously displayed in his lectures at the Lyceum, and his abilities, his taste, and genius as a poet, a philosopher, and as a man, are sufficiently displayed in his writings. During the revolution he, like other literary characters, supported the principles of republicanism; but when he saw terror prevail, and religion degraded, his sentiments were seriously changed. Though condemned to be deported, he escaped from his persecutors, and died at Paris, 1803. His other works are very numerous.

HARPOCRATION, Valerius, a rhetorician of Alexandria, A. D. 180, author of a lexicon on the 10 orators of Greece, published by Aldus 1603, and by Gronovius 1696.

HARPSFIELD, Nicholas, an English divine, archdeacon of Canterbury. His attachment to the popish religion under Elizabeth, exposed him to persecution; he was imprisoned for some years, and died 1572. He wrote a history of Wickliffe's heresy—an ecclesiastical history of England, &c.

HARRINGTON, sir John, an English poet, born at Helston, near Bath. As his father was imprisoned for holding conference with Elizabeth, in Mary's reign, the princess stood godmother to his son in proof of her patronage, and his learning and acquirements proved him not unworthy of royal favour. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and before he was 30 he published a translation of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. He was knighted on the field by the earl of Essex, and under James he was created a knight of the Bath. He drew upon himself the attack of the clergy by writing, for the use of prince Henry, a tract against married bishops. His works were published by the Rev. H. Harrington, under the title of "Nugæ antiquæ," and contain a miscellaneous collection of curious pieces in verse and prose. He had formed the plan for a history of his own times, which he did not execute. He died 1612, aged 51.

HARRINGTON, John lord, eldest son of lord and lady Harrington, to whose care James I. intrusted the education of his daughter Elizabeth, afterwards the wife of Frederic king of Bohemia, was early distinguished by his talents and his genius, and by his intimacy and correspondence with Henry prince of Wales. When at Rome he, as well as his tutor, Tovey, was strongly solicited by the Jesuits to abandon his religion, but when entreaties were unavailing, it is said that the holy fathers artfully administered poison to them, in consequence of which the tutor soon after died, though the pupil's stronger constitution struggled longer against the deleterious effects. This promising youth, however, died some time after his return to England, 1613, aged 22. His Latin letters to the prince are extant.

HARRINGTON, James, an eminent political writer, born January, 1611, at Upton, Northamptonshire. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, where he had Chillingworth for his tutor, and after three years' residence, on his father's death, 1622, he set out upon his travels. In Holland he served for some time in lord Craven's regiment, and afterwards travelled through Flanders, Germany, France, and Italy. His time, meanwhile, was usefully employed in making deep and important observations on the manners and the government of the nations which he visited, and while he refused to pay homage to the pope of Rome by kissing his toe, he cultivated the friendship of men of letters, and, in considering their various advantages in the cultivation of science, he regarded Venice by her situation and constitution superior to the rest of the world. After his return to England, Harrington sided with the parliament, but he never could obtain a seat in the house. His independent spirit, however, was admired and respected, and when the commissioners removed the captive king from Newcastle nearer London, he was selected to attend upon his person.

The unfortunate monarch was pleased with his conversation; he parted with him at Hurst castle, with bitter concern, by the rude interference of the republicans, and when led to the scaffold he again distinguished his favourite, and rewarded him on that awful occasion with a token of his esteem. The death of Charles deeply affected Harrington, but while his friends attributed his retirement to melancholy or discontent, he silenced their reproaches by producing his celebrated work, "Oceana," which at first was regarded as a severe satire on Cromwell's usurpation, but was afterwards permitted to appear dedicated to the protector, by the interference of lady Claypole, his favourite daughter. The work was read, but not approved, by Cromwell, who disdained to resign the power acquired by his sword to the visionary dreams of new politicians. Harrington in the mean time found his labours attacked by various pamphlets, which he boldly answered, and to prove the practicability of his republican plan he established a society at Miles's coffee-house, Palace-yard, where the public regulations he proposed were fully debated before crowded audiences. Principles which favoured the establishment of a republican government upon a broad basis could not be agreeable to the royalists, and therefore, at the restoration, Harrington was regarded as a secret enemy, and though living in retirement he was, in December, 1661, seized by order of the king, and committed to the tower, as guilty of treasonable practices. These accusations, though supported by the authority of chancellor Hyde, may be considered as founded on imaginary grounds, while the criminality of Harrington may be viewed in his severe reflections against the royal family. With unfeeling bitterness he not only decried the character of Mary, queen of Scots, and treated her son James as a worthless impostor, but he loaded the memory of Charles with every foul epithet; and, forgetful of his former attachment, he described him as a tyrant at last cut off by God's avenging hand. After some time he was removed from the tower to St. Nicolas's island, opposite Plymouth, and afterwards to Plymouth, where, by the advice of his physician, Dunstan, he mixed improperly too much guaiacum with his coffee, for the cure of the scurvy, and brought on a gradual delirium. As his relations had given bail for his appearance he was liberated from confinement, and as he had some intervals of reason, he was permitted to retire to Scotland, where he married the daughter of sir Marmaduke Dorrell, of Bucks, a lady to whom he had formerly paid his addresses, and with whom he spent the remainder of his life. He died of the palsy, at Westminster, 11th Sept. 1677, and was buried in St. Margaret's church, near the remains of Raleigh. There were not wanting some who attributed his disorder to political causes, and who considered his delirium as occasioned by the malice of his enemies, who dreaded the satire of his pen. His works were collected by Toland, 1700, in 1 vol. folio, but Dr. Birch's edition of 1737 is more full and correct. Besides his Oceana, which, as mentioned already, contained the visionary plan of a pure and independent republic, he attempted poetry, but with no creditable success.

HARRINGTON, Henry, a descendant of sir John Harrington, was born at Kelston, the family seat, in Somersetshire, Sept. 29, 1729. He had a private education, after which he went to Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts, and entered upon the study of physic. He proceeded to his doctor's degree in that faculty in 1762, and about the same time settled at Wells, from whence he removed to Bath, where he continued to practise with reputation, till his death, Jan. 15, 1816. Dr. Harrington was an excellent classical scholar, a good poet, and devotedly attached to music. He composed several admirable catches, and other pieces of a higher description in his favourite science. His other publications are—1. An Ode to Harmony. 2. An Ode to Discord. 3. The Witch of Wokey; a ballad in the old English style. 4. The Geometrical Analogy of the Doctrine of the Trinity. He was the father of the corporation of Bath, in which city he founded a musical club, called the Harmonic Society.—W. B.

HARRIS, Walter, an English physician, in the reign of William III. He wrote some well-esteemed books on the diseases of children.

HARRIS, Robert, a native of Broad Camden, Gloucestershire, educated at Oxford. During the rebellion he opposed the king, and was made by the parliament rector of Petersfield, and president of Trinity college, Oxford, where he died 1658, aged 80. He wrote sermons—remedium contra avaritiam—tractatus de novi testat. fœdere—epistolæ apologeticæ, &c.

HARRIS, William, a dissenting minister, who resided at Honiton, where he died 4th Feb. 1770. He was an able scholar, and was honoured, in 1765, by the Glasgow university, with the degree of D.D. He wrote, though not very accurately, an account of the lives of James I. Charles I. Oliver Cromwell, and Hugh Peters, in 5 vols. 8vo. He prepared also materials for an account of James II. which he did not complete.

HARRIS, John, secretary to the royal society, translated Pardie's elements of geometry, and died 1730. He was an able mathematician, and a good divine, and first projected the plan of a Cyclopædia, or dictionary of sciences, which appeared in 2 vols. folio, 1710, the title of Lexicon Technicum, to which a supplement was added in 1736. The works of Chambers, and the improvements of Dr. Rees and others have superseded this now obsolete performance.

HARRIS, William, author of sermons on the principal representations of the Messiah in the Old Testament,—of funeral discourses and other religious tracts, was for 40 years minister of a dissenting congregation at Crutchedfriars, and died 1740, aged 65.

HARRIS, James, Esq. an eminent scholar, son of a sister of Shaftesbury, the author of the characteristics. He was born in the Close, Sarum, 1709, and after an education at the grammar-school there, he entered at Wadham college, Oxford, but took no degree. He was member for Christ-church in several parliaments, and in 1763 was made one of the lords of the admiralty, and soon after removed to the treasury, and in 1774, he was appointed secretary, and comptroller to the queen, which office he retained during life. He died after a long illness 21st Dec. 1780. His works are three treatises concerning art, music, painting, and poetry; and Happiness, 8vo. 1745,—Hermes, or a philosophical inquiry concerning universal grammar, 1751, 8vo. an able composition, commended by many, and particularly by Lowth, philosophical arrangements, and philosophical inquiries, 2 vols. 8vo. published after his death. His works have been edited by his son lord Malmesbury, with an elegantly written account of his life.

HARRIS, James, earl of Malmesbury, was the son of the author of "Hermes," and born at Salisbury, April 9th, 1746. He was educated at Merton college, Oxford, where he was created doctor of civil law in 1793. He began his diplomatic career at the court of Spain, and in 1772, went as envoy to Berlin. In 1776 he was appointed minister at Petersburg, and in 1779 received the order of the Bath. In 1784 he was sworn a member of the privy council, and the same year went as ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Hague. In 1788, he was created baron Malmesbury, and in 1795 he concluded the marriage of the prince of Wales and the princess of Brunswick, whom he accompanied to England. The year following he was appointed to negotiate with the ministers of the French republic at Lisle, but without effect. He was raised to the earldom in 1800, and in 1807, was made lord lieutenant of Hampshire, and governor of the Isle of Wight. He died Nov. 21st, 1820. His lordship published—1. Introduction to the History of the Dutch Republic, 8vo. 2. The works of James Harris, Esq., with Memoirs of his Life, 2 vols. 4to.—W. B.

HARRISON, William, an ingenious youth, fellow of New college, Oxford. He was tutor to one of the duke of Queensbury's sons, and was recommended by his wit, genius, and learning, to dean Swift, who procured for him from St. John, the respectable office of secretary to the English ambassador at the Hague, lord Raby, and afterwards lord Stafford. Under the expectation of higher appointments, he was unfortunately carried off by a short illness, in London, 14th Feb. 1712-13. He wrote some elegant poetical pieces, many of which are preserved in Nichols's and Dodsley's collections. Not only Swift, but Young, Tickell, and others, have spoken with great respect and affection of the amiable character which he supported.

HARRISON, William, an English writer, author of the pilgrim, or the happy convert, a pastoral tragedy, 1709.

HARRISON, John, an eminent and well-known mechanic, born at Foulby near Pontefract, 1693. His father was a carpenter, and he was brought up to his business, but he was doomed to extend his reputation beyond the limits of an obscure village. He had early a strong propensity to wheel machinery, and as his father was occasionally employed in repairing clocks, he improved in his knowledge of the power of movements. In 1700, his father removed to Barrow, Lincolnshire, and there he obtained from a neighbouring clergyman a MS. copy of Saunderson's lectures, which he transcribed, and from which he drew a hitherto unknown fund of knowledge. He made some ingenious experiments, and in 1726, produced two clocks, chiefly of wood, with the compound pendulum, which were so accurately constructed that they varied scarce a second in one month. He visited London 1735, and by the kindness of Dr. Halley was recommended to that ingenious artist, G. Graham, who admired and encouraged his great talents, and advised him to complete his machines to present to the board of longitude. In 1735, his first machine was approved by the board, and he was sent to Lisbon to try its accuracy and its properties. Thus patronised he produced another more simple machine in 1739, and again a third, in 1749, but while he considered his labours as arrived to the highest degree of perfection, he discovered that greater accuracy might still be obtained, and a fourth time his machine, six inches in diameter, and in the shape of a watch, was constructed. The correctness of this machine was ascertained by the author's son in a voyage to Jamaica, and in another to Barbadoes, and as his discovery came within the meaning of the act of the 12th of Anne, he claimed, and obtained, though with some trouble, the liberal reward of 20,000*l.* from parliament. These four curious machines were deposited in the observatory at Greenwich, where it is said they are now buried in oblivion. A time-piece on the same principles, was constructed by Mr. Kendal, for Cook's voyage, and was found extremely accurate. The last time-piece made by this ingenious artist erred only four seconds and a half in ten weeks. After a life thus devoted to the service of the public, this worthy character died 1776, of the gout, at his house, Red-lion square, aged 80. Though ingenious as a mechanic, he was very incorrect as a writer, and never could express himself in a clear and simple style. He was also an excellent musician, and he is said to have constructed a curious monochord.

HARRISON, John, colonel in the parliament army, was son of a butcher, and one of the judges of the unfortunate Charles. He was employed to lull into security the unsuspecting Fairfax, and was with him on his knees in the hypocritical semblance of prayer, till the execution was over. He was tried and executed for his perfidy after the restoration.

HARRISON, Robert Hanson, sustained the offices of chief justice of the general court of Maryland, and governor of the state. In 1789, he was appointed one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States, but declined accepting the office, which was afterwards conferred on Mr. Iredel. He was a man of distinguished merit, and possessed the unbounded confidence of his fellow-citizens. He exerted himself in the prosecution of the revolutionary war, with great ardour, and in his station as judge and governor displayed very superior talents. He died at his residence on the Potomack, in Charles county, April 2d, 1790, aged 45.  L.

HART, John, one of the signers of the declaration of American Independence, was born in the township of Hopewell, Hunterdon county, New-Jersey, in the year 1703. He had no more than a good English education, and was a respectable farmer who lived and died in the same township in which he was born. He was for a number of years prior to the revolutionary war, a member of the colonial legislature of New-Jersey, and was greatly respected for his good sense, patriotism, integrity, and moral excellence. These characteristics led his fellow-citizens to make choice of him as a delegate to the national congress, where he had the honour to be one of the illustrious band who declared the country independent. He retained his seat in congress until his death, which occurred in 1779. His strong mind and pure character gave him much influence, and rendered him a very useful and important actor in the interesting scenes of that day.  L.

HARTE, Walter, a native of Marlborough, Wilts, known as a poet and historian. His poetical pieces called Amaranth, were published in 8vo. besides a history of Gustavus Adolphus, 2 vols. 4to. and essays on husbandry, 8vo. He died 1773.

HARTLEY, David, an English physician, son of a clergyman, born about 1704, and educated at Jesus college, Cambridge, of which he was a fellow. He practised physic at Newark, afterwards at St. Edmundsbury, and then in London, and lastly at Bath, where he died, 30th Sept. 1757. His chief work is observations on man, his frame, his duty, and his expectations, 2 parts, 1749, 2 vols. 8vo. besides some letters in the philosophical transactions. He also wrote about Mrs. Stevens's quack medicines as a solvent for the stone, which procured her from parliament 5000*l.* The doctor died of the stone at last, though it is said he had taken to remove it above 200*lbs.* weight of soap.

HARTMAN, John Adolphus, a native of Munster, who from a Jesuit became a Calvinist, and was appointed professor of philosophy and poetry at Castel, and afterwards historical professor at Marburg, where he died, 1744, aged 64. He wrote Historia Hæssiaca, 3 vols.—vita pontific. Roman. &c.—Harangues, &c.

HARTSOEKER, Nicolas, a native of Gonda, son of the minister of the place. He laboriously devoted himself to mathematics and natural philosophy, and became professor of philosophy at Heidelberg, and mathematician to the elector palatine. He wrote, besides some small pieces, a course of natural philosophy in 4to. and died 1725, aged 69.

HARTUNGUS, John, a native of Millinberg, professor of Greek at Heidelberg, where he was educated. He for some time bore arms against the Turks, and died 1579. He wrote some notes on the three first books of the Odyssey, besides a Latin translation of Apollonius.

HARVARD, John, minister and founder of Harvard college, came to Massachusetts in 1636-7, and after preaching a short time at Charlestown, died in 1638. He left a bequest of near 800 pounds to the school at Cambridge, which the next year was constituted a college, and called by his name in commemoration of his liberality.  L.

HARVEY, William, an English physician, celebrated as the first discoverer of the circulation of the blood. He was born at Folkstone, 2d April, 1578, and educated at Canterbury school and Caius college. Cambridge. At the age of 19 he travelled through France and Germany, to Padua, where he studied medicine under some eminent masters, and where he took the degree of M.D. in 1602. On his return to England he was incorporated to his doctor's degree at Cambridge, and then came to settle in London, where he married. In 1604, he was admitted candidate of the college of physicians, three years after fellow, and in 1615, lecturer of anatomy and surgery. In 1616, he laid open his discovery of the circulation of the blood, in his lectures, the MS. of which is preserved in Sir Hans Sloane's papers. It was published in 1628, and dedicated to Charles I. after the ingenious author had in his lectures for nine years confirmed and illustrated it, by reasons and arguments the most convincing and satisfactory. This curious and important discovery produced an astonishing revolution in the practice of physic, and it is not to be wondered that so many laid claims to the honours and celebrity which belonged to Harvey alone. Not only father Paul vindicated the merit of the discovery, but Hippocrates was asserted by his editor Vanderhinden, to be the original author of this newly revived opinion. In 1632, Harvey was made physician to the king, and he shared his dangers at the battle of Edge-hill, and in consequence of his loyalty, he was incorporated M.D. at Oxford, and in 1645, made warden of Merton college, which the following year he resigned, on the surrender of the city to the parliament. In 1651, he published his "exercitationes de generatione animalium, &c." which might have been rendered more valuable by some important additions and anatomical observations, had not the papers of the author been profanely plundered and destroyed in London by the republicans during the civil wars. In 1654 he was chosen president of the college of physicians, but his infirmities were so great that he recommended Dr. Prujeau for his successor. As he had no family he honourably made the college his heirs, and after he had built them a combination room, a library, and a museum, he presented them with the deeds of his estates, and founded the commemoration which annually on the 18th Oct. records the liberality of its benefactors, and the meritorious services of its founder. This great man died 3d June, 1657, and was buried at Hempsted, Herts. Under his picture in the college, on a brass plate, is a long but nervous inscription which commemorates his services and his virtues. His works were edited by Dr. Lawrence, with a life prefixed, in 2 vols. 4to. 1766.

HARVEY, Gideon, an English physician, born in Surrey. After studying the languages in the Low Countries he was admitted of Exeter college, Oxford, 1655, and then he applied to physic at Leyden under some eminent masters. He was physician to Charles II. in his exile, and also to the English army in Flanders. He afterwards travelled through Germany, Italy, and Switzerland, and on his return to England was made physician in ordinary to the king, and also to the Tower. He died 1700, but he derived little fame, and less profit from his publications. He was perpetually at war with the college of physicians, whom he attempted to ridicule in a piece, 1683.

HARVEY, Sir John, governor of Virginia, was sent out to that colony as a commissioner in 1623. He was a member of the provisional government in 1625, and assumed the administration in 1629. He was one of the most rapacious, tyrannical, and unpopular of the royal governors, and was suspended by the assembly in 1635, and impeached, but restored by the king the next year, and continued in the office till 1639.  L.

HARWOOD, Edward, a dissenting minister, born in Lancashire. He died 1794, aged 65. He wrote various works, but he is best known as the author of a "view of the various editions of the Greek and Roman classics," which has passed through several editions, and has appeared in almost every European language. After presiding over a congregation at Bristol he came to London, where he lived by correcting the press, by teaching the classics, and by his various publications. It is said that he refused very liberal patronage to join the church of England.

HASE, Theodore, professor of Hebrew at Bremen, his native town, died 1731. He was a man of extensive learning, and published some valuable "dissertations," &c.

HASE, James, brother of the preceding, was also a man of classical knowledge, and author of some elegant tracts. He died 1723.

HASSELQUIST, Frederic, a learned botanist, born 1722, at Tournalla in East Gotha. The early death of his father left him in indigent circumstances, but he maintained himself at the university of Upsal by instructing some of his fellow-pupils, and he displayed so much diligence in the study of physic that he received a royal stipend. He published an "essay on the virtue of plants," and was encouraged by his friend and master Linnæus to undertake a voyage to Palestine to examine its natural history. He was conveyed by the Levant company to Smyrna, and for two years was engaged in making a most valuable collection of curiosities. When on his return in 1752 he was overpowered by the heat of the climate and by fatigue, and died near Smyrna. His curiosities were seized by his creditors, but the queen of Sweden discharged his debts, and Linnæus arranged the publication of his papers.

HASTED, Edward, a topographer and antiquary, was born at Hawley, the seat of his family, in Kent, in 1732. He devoted the greatest part of his life to the labour of compiling a History of his Native Country, which was published in 4 vols. folio 1799. Having reduced himself to narrow circumstances, he was presented by lord Radnor to the mastership of the hospital at Corsham, in Wiltshire, where he died in 1812.—W. B.

HASTINGS, Elizabeth, daughter of Theophilus earl of Huntingdon, was celebrated for her personal accomplishments, but more for her private and public acts of charity which were never exceeded by any female in the kingdom. The distresses of the poor and unfortunate in every place and situation were her peculiar care, and a splendid fortune was appropriated solely to their relief far and near. This virtuous and amiable character is well depicted under the name of Aspasia by Congreve in the 49th number of the Tatler. She died 1740, most universally and deservedly lamented.

HASTINGS, Warren, was born in 1733, at or near Daylesford, in Worcestershire, the manor of which had been in his family for many generations, though at the time of his birth it had gone into other hands. His father was a clergyman in low circumstances. However, the son obtained a good education at Westminster school, from whence he was sent to India, as a writer in the company's service in 1750. On his arrival in the east, he applied with diligence to the duties of his station, and at his leisure studied the oriental languages. After fourteen years residence in Bengal he returned to England, but in 1769, he went out as second in council at Madras, where he remained about two years, and then removed to the presidency of Calcutta. This was a critical period, and the state of Hindostan soon became perilous from the increasing power of Hyder Ali, the sovereign of Mysore, and the intrigues of the French, who were taking advantage of the rupture between Great Britain and her colonies. In this exigency the governor general had to depend solely upon his own exertions; and he succeeded beyond all expectation, in saving British India from a combination of enemies. Notwithstanding this, party spirit at home turned the merit of Mr. Hastings into a crime, and charges were brought against him in parliament. He returned in 1786, and an impeachment followed, which, in all its stages, lasted nine years, and ended in his acquittal. After this he led a retired life on the wreck of his fortune, and an annuity from the company. He lived, however, to see his plans for the security of India publicly applauded; but he received no other compensation for the injury he had sustained, than that of being sworn a member of the privy-council. He died Aug. 22d, 1818. Mr. Hastings was a man of mild and unassuming manners, an elegant scholar, and a good poet. He wrote—1. A Narrative of the Insurrection at Benares, 4to. 2. Memoirs relative to the State of India, 8vo. 3. A Treatise on the Means of guarding Houses against Fire, 8vo. 4. Fugitive Poetry.—W. B.

HATSELL, John, clerk of the house of commons, was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, after which he became a member and senior bencher of the Middle-temple. He entered early as an assistant-clerk of the house of commons under Mr. Dyson, and in 1768, became chief clerk. He retired from that situation with the thanks of the house, in 1797, and died at Marden Park, in Surrey, Oct. 15th, 1820. His remains were buried in the Temple-church. Mr. Hatsell published the precedents of the house of commons.—W. B.

HATTON, Sir Christopher, chancellor under Elizabeth, was a man of learning and great integrity, but it is remarkable that though placed in so high a situation he had not been bred to the law. His decisions, however, were never impeached, as he was guided by justice and impartiality. It was by his advice that the unfortunate Mary submitted to her fatal trial. He was born at Holdenby in Northamptonshire, from an ancient Cheshire family, and died 1591.

HAVERCAMP, Sigebert, an eminent critic, professor of history, eloquence, and Greek at Leyden. His editions of Josephus, Sallust, Eutropius, Tertullian, &c. are considered by learned men as very valuable. He died at Leyden 1742, aged 58.

HAVERS, Clopton, an English physician, who published in 1691, a curious treatise on the bones. He died in the beginning of the 18th century.

HAUSTEAD, Peter, a comic writer, author of "the rival friends," acted before Charles I. and his court at Cambridge. He was in orders, and published some sermons in London, 1646.

HAUTE-FEUILLE, John, an ingenious mechanic, son of a baker, was born at Orleans 1647. He was the inventor of the steel springs in pendulum watches, afterwards improved by Huygens. He was an ecclesiastic and held some preferment. He also wrote some curious pamphlets on clocks, &c. and died 1724.

HAUTEROCHE, Noel le Breton de, a French dramatic poet, and actor, who died at Paris 1707, aged 90. His pieces are numerous and possess some merit.

HAUTETERRE, Anthony Dadin de, professor of law at Toulouse, was a native of Cahors, and died 1682, aged 80. He wrote Gesta regum et ducum Aquitanix, two vols. 4to.—a treatise on monastic life, &c.—and various other works which display great erudition and a deep knowledge of jurisprudence.

HAWES, Stephen, a native of Suffolk, educated at Oxford, and made groom of the privy chamber to Henry VII. He was well skilled in French and Italian poetry, and wrote the temple of glass, copied from Chaucer's house of fame,—the pastime of pleasure, completed 1506, and eleven years after printed in 4to. by Wynkyn de Worde with wooden plates.

HAWES, William, a physician, was born at Islington, Nov. 23th, 1726. He was brought up to the profession of an apothecary, which business he carried on in the Strand till 1780, when, having taken his degree, he commenced practice as a physician. Long before this he had acquired deserved popularity, by his zealous exertions in establishing the Royal Humane Society; to which institution he may be said to have devoted his whole life. He died at Islington, Dec. 5th, 1808. Dr. Hawes published—1. "An Account of Dr. Goldsmith's last illness," 8vo., which he attributed to an improper use of James's powder. 2. An Address on Premature Death and Premature Interment. 3. An Examination of the Rev. John Wesley's Primitive Physic. 4. An Address to the Legislature on the Humane Society. 5. An Address to the King and Parliament, with Observations on the general Bills of Mortality. 6. Transactions of the Royal Humane Society.—W. B.

HAWES, Thomas, an English divine, was born at Truro, in Cornwall, about 1736. He served his time to an apothecary, but afterwards went to Cambridge, where he took the degree of bachelor of laws. On entering into orders he became assistant to Mr. Madan at the Lock chapel, on whose recommendation he accepted the presentation to the rectory of All-Saints, Aldwinkle, in Northamptonshire, upon an implied promise of resignation; but when the time expired, he refused to give up the living, which occasioned much censure on the Calvinistic methodists. At last the countess of Huntingdon compromised the affair, and her chaplain held the living to his death. That lady also intrusted him with the management of her chapels and the seminary which she had founded for the education of young students in divinity. When the missionary society was formed he also took the lead in its direction, and obtained a doctor's degree from Scotland.

He died in 1820. His principal works are—1. A volume of Sermons. 2. A Commentary on the Bible, 2 vols. folio. 3. History of the Church, 3 vols. 8vo. 4. Life of the Rev. William Romaine, 8vo. 5. State of Evangelical Religion throughout the World, 8vo.—W. B.

HAWKE, Edward lord, son of a barrister, entered early in the naval service to which he was to add so much glory. In 1734 he was made captain of the Wolf, and he soon distinguished himself under the English admirals Matthews, Lestock, and Rowley, off Toulon, and took a Spanish ship of superior force, the Pader of 60 guns. In 1747, he was made rear admiral of the white, and that year he defeated a French fleet, and took two ships of 74 guns, one of 70, two of 64, and one of 50, for which he was honoured with the ribbon of the Bath. In 1748, he was made vice-admiral of the blue, and two years after of the white, and in 1757, he assisted on the expedition against Rochefort. In 1759, he was sent off Brest, from which the French fleet escaped, but he pursued them and attacked them off Belleisle, and totally defeated them, for which he received a pension of 2000*l.* from the king. In 1765 he was appointed vice admiral of Great-Britain, and first lord of the admiralty, and in 1776 raised to the peerage. This heroic commander, who ranks so high in the annals of his country, died at his house at Shepperton, Middlesex, Oct. 14th, 1781.

HAWKESWORTH, John, an eminent English writer. He was born 1715 at Bromley, in Kent, and bound to the business of a watchmaker, which he early abandoned for public life, and literary pursuits. His wife it is said kept a boarding school at Bromley, and by the means of a lady of some influence and consequence in Indian affairs, he became known to the commercial world, and was elected a director of the East India Company. His "Adventurer," was so popular a performance, that archbishop Herring conferred upon him, though a dissenter, the Lambeth degree of LL.D. He was appointed to digest the narrative of the South Sea expeditions, a labour for which, say some critics, he was not adequate, as his talents tended more to influence the passions in animated descriptions, than interest the heart in the cold detail of a journal. Though he received the high sum of 6000*l.* for his trouble, it is asserted that he died of chagrin for the unfavourable reception of his narrative, though some say he died of high living. He died 16th Nov. 1773, aged 58, and in Bromley church, Kent, where he was buried, is an elegant monument which records his services, in appropriate language borrowed from the last Adventurer.

HAWKINS, Sir John, an English admiral, born at Plymouth. He was for seven years in the merchants' service, and signalized himself under Elizabeth, especially against the invincible armada, when he was rear-admiral, [and in several expeditions to the West Indies, where he died 1595.

HAWKINS, Sir John, a native of London, who acquired some eminence in the law as an attorney, and became known as the friend and companion of Dr. Johnson. He commenced author by publishing in 1760, an edition of Walton's angler, besides various communications to the gentleman's magazine, and other periodical works, and in 1761 he was made justice of peace for Middlesex, and in 1772, knighted for dispersing some rioters in Moorfields. The greatest of his works is his History of Music, in five vols. 4to. which contains very useful and curious particulars. His Life of Johnson is not a very creditable performance, as it was hastily finished to gratify the wishes of the booksellers. Sir John died 1789, aged 70.

HAWKINS, William, governor of Georgia, was elected in 1811, and died at Sparta, May 17th, 1819.  L.

HAWKSMOOR, Nicolas, an architect, pupil to Sir Christopher Wren. Though he possessed genius he did not much improve on the principles of his illustrious master, but frequently deviated from them. He was clerk of the works at Greenwich, under William and his two successors, and had other places of trust and emolument, he was also employed as surveyor of the new churches built by queen Anne's act. Among others the church of St. George's, Bloomsbury, is particularly censured, as it exhibits an irregularly absurd steeple, with the statue of George I. elevated to the top, with the lion and unicorn as supporters. He planned several private mansions, and gave the design of the Radcliffe library at Oxford. He died 1736.

HAWKWOOD, Sir John, an English general in the service of Edward III. He was born at Sible Hedingham in Essex, where his father was a tanner, and he was for some time apprentice to a tailor, but he soon, says Fuller, turned his needle into a sword, and his thimble into a shield, at the sound of Edward's wars. He signalized himself so much under the king and the black prince, that from a private soldier he became a captain, and was knighted; but at the peace of Bretigni in 1360, he found himself too poor to maintain his dignity, and therefore he associated with others into a corps called "les tard venus," whose employment was to gain support by plunder as a marauding party. With these desperate followers, whose numbers daily increased, Sir John penetrated into Italy, and enriched himself by the plunder of the clergy. In 1364, he entered into the service of the Pisan republic, in which he behaved with great bravery. In 1387 he armed in defence of the Florentines, and his masterly retreat from the superior forces of his able antagonist Venni, and a difficult and dangerous country, is celebrated as exhibiting the most heroic courage, with coolness, judgment, and perseverance. Though at the peace of 1391, the Florentines disbanded all their forces, yet they retained still Hawkwood at the head of 1000 men. He died in Florence 1393, 6th March, at an advanced age, and his funeral was celebrated with unusual magnificence, and his remains deposited in the church of St. Reparata. A cenotaph was erected in the church of his native town, which still perpetuates his memory, as an able and heroic general, whose character, if taxed with ferocity or with the unprincipled passions of a lawless freebooter, must be defended by the barbarity of the times, which regarded valour, however disgraced by bloodshed and rapine, as one of the noblest virtues of man. As a proof of his charity it may be mentioned, that he founded an English hospital at Rome for the entertainment of poor travellers.

HAWLEY, Gideon, missionary to the Indians, was a native of Connecticut, and was graduated at Yale College in 1749. He entered on his labours among the Indians at Stockbridge in February, 1752. The next year he visited the Iroquois on the Susquehannah, and meeting a favourable reception, devoted himself to their instruction till intercepted by the French war in 1756. He afterwards served as chaplain in an expedition against Crown Point, and in 1758, was settled as teacher of the Indians at Marshpee, Massachusetts, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was happily adapted for the employment to which he devoted himself, and highly useful to the Indians. He died October 3d, 1807, in the eighty-first year of his age.

 L.
HAY, James, came to England with the first James, and was the first Scotchman raised to the English peerage, successively by the titles of lord Hay, viscount Doncaster, and earl Carlisle. He was employed by his master in various embassies, and went to France to negotiate a marriage between the prince of Wales and Henrietta Maria of France. He died 1636.

HAY, William, an English writer, born at Glenburne, Sussex, about 1700, and educated at Headley school. In 1734, on lord Hardwicke's promotion, he was elected member for Seaford, which he represented till his death. He espoused the cause of Sir Robert Walpole, whom he defended in some pamphlets, and by whom he was rewarded with the place of commissioner of the victualling office. He died 19th June, 1755. He wrote "religio philosophi," &c.—a translation of Hawkins Browne's de immortalitate animæ,—The epigrams of Martial modernized, &c. besides an essay on deformity, in which he descanted with humour and liveliness on his own personal imperfection, observing that of the 558 members of the commons' house, he was the only man of bodily deformity. His son was equally deformed, and was cruelly put to death by Cossim Ali Kawn, at Patna, 1762. Hay's works were published by his daughter, 2 vols. 4to. 1794.

HAYDN, Joseph, a musical composer, was born of low parentage, at Rhorau, in Austria, in 1733. At an early age he was received into the choir of the cathedral at Vienna, where he was not only taught to sing, but to play on the harpsichord and violin. On the breaking of his voice he was dismissed from the cathedral, after which he subsisted by teaching music and composition. In 1761, he entered into the service of the prince Esterhazy, as the director of his music. In 1791, he came to England, and while here was created doctor in music at Oxford, and published several of his works. In 1796 he returned to Germany, after which he composed his sublime oratorio of the "Creation," and the "Seasons." He died in 1809. His works are very numerous, and highly valued.—W. B.

HAYER DU PERRON, Peter le, a native of Alençon, born 1603. He distinguished himself by his poems, odes, songs, and sonnets, which possess merit.

HAYER, John Nicholas Hubert, a French ecclesiastic, born at Sare-Louis, 15th June, 1708. He displayed his zeal and learning by his able works—on the immortality of the soul, three vols. 12mo. on the existence of God. He died at Paris 16th July, 1780.

HAYES, Charles, an ingenious author. He was of such a timid and modest disposition, that he prefixed his name to none of his many valuable publications, except to his treatise on fluxions, in folio, 1704. He was many years deputy-governor to the Royal African company, and on its dissolution in 1752, he retired to solitude and study at Down in Kent. He died 18th Dec. 1760, at Gray's Inn, where two years before he had taken chambers, in his 82d year. His works were "the moon, a philosophical dialogue,"—a new and easy method to find the longitude, and other works.

HAYLEY, William, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was born, Nov. 9th, 1745, at Chichester, of which cathedral his grandfather was dean. He received his education, first at the school of Kingston-upon-Thames, and next at Eton, from whence he removed to Trinity college, Cambridge. On leaving the university, he retired to his estate of Earham in Sussex, where he resided till the loss of his son, about 1800, so afflicted him that he removed to Felp-ham. He died Nov. 12th, 1820. His principal poems are—1. An Essay on Painting. 2. An Essay on History. 3. An Essay on Epic Poetry. 4. The Triumphs of Temper. An edition of these, with other poems and plays, was printed in 6 vols. 8vo. His principal prose works are—"An Essay on Old Maids," 3 vols. and the "Lives of Milton, Cowper, and Romney the Painter."—W. B.

HAYMON, a native of the Tyrolese in the 15th century, remarkable for his gigantic stature, said to have been 16 feet in height, with proportionable strength. His tomb is to be seen at Inspruck.

HAYNES, Hopton, assay master of the mint, and tally writer of the exchequer, was a man of great integrity, and distinguished as the author of "the Scripture account of the attributes and worship of God, and of the character and offices of Jesus Christ," published after his death. He died 19th Nov. 1749.

HAYNES, Samuel, son to the above, was tutor to lord Salisbury, who rewarded his services with the living of Hatfield, and afterwards that of Clothall. He was also canon of Windsor. He died 9th June, 1752. He published in 1740 "a collection of state papers," in folio.

HAYNES, John, governor of Massachusetts and Connecticut, was a native of Essex, England, and came to Boston in 1633. Two years after he was chosen governor of Massachusetts. In 1636 he, with Mr. Hooker and several others, removed to Hartford, Connecticut, and in April, 1639, he was elected the first governor of the colony, and held the office every second year from that time until his death, in 1654. He was well qualified for that station by an excellent understanding, prudence, public spirit, and piety; and rendered essential service to the colony by his wealth as well as talents. L.

HAYWOOD, Sir John, an English historian, doctor of laws in the university of Cambridge. He is the author of "the lives of the three Normans, kings of England, William I. and II. and Henry I." dedicated to Charles prince of Wales, of the first part of "the life and reign of Henry IV." dedicated to Robert earl of Essex, for which he suffered imprisonment, on account of some offensive passages about hereditary right, of "the life and reign of Edward VI. with the beginning of Elizabeth's," and of other works, especially on divinity and pious subjects. He was made historiographer of Chelsea college, 1610, and knighted by James 1619. He died 27th June, 1627.

HAYWOOD, Elizabeth. Vid. HEYWOOD.

HAZAEI, servant of Benhadad, king of Syria, was sent by his master in his illness to inquire of Elisha the prophet, concerning the issue of his complaint. On his return he murdered his master, and ascended his throne, B.C. 839.

HEAD, Richard, author of "the English Rogue"—"the art of wheedling"—"the humours of Dublin," comedies, and other dramatic pieces; was a native of Ireland, and after being at the university of Oxford, became a bookseller in London. He was drowned when going to the Isle of Wight, 1678.

HEADLEY, Henry, a native of Norwich, educated there under Dr. Parr, after which he went to Trinity college, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree in arts. He married early, and fell a victim soon after to a rapid consumption, 1788, aged only 23. He possessed genius and talents, which he displayed in his volume of poems. He wrote some of the papers of the Olla Podrida; and besides various communications to the Gentleman's and European magazines under the signature of T. C. O. he published select beauties of ancient English poetry, with curious and interesting remarks, 2 vols. 8vo.

HEARNE, Thomas, a learned English antiquary. He was born 1680 at White Waltham, Berks, where his father was parish clerk; and as he displayed early proofs of genius and application, he was noticed by Mr. Cherry of Shottesbrooke, and by the advice of Mr. Dodwell, then resident there, he was taken into his patron's family, and liberally and honourably treated as one of his sons. After a previous good education, he entered at Edmund-hall, Oxford, under Dr. Mill, the editor of the Greek Testament, and soon distinguished himself as an accurate collator of MSS. and as an indefatigable antiquarian. In 1699 some of his friends wished to send him as missionary to Maryland, but he preferred the learned retirement of Oxford and the valuable stores of the Bodleian, to difficulties and fame abroad; and after being for some years one of the librarians of that noble collection, he was appointed in 1715 archetypographer of the university, and squire beadle of the civil law. These offices, however, he soon after resigned, as he refused to take the oaths; and though preferment was offered to him, he declined it from the same delicate scruples of conscience. He died at Oxford, 10th June, 1735, aged 55, and was buried in St. Peter's churchyard, where his epitaph by himself says, "he studied and preserved antiquities." By a life of economy he saved about 1300*l.* which were found among his papers, and distributed among his poor relations. With the most indefatigable application, but often without taste and judgment, he sent a great number of publications to the press, not less than 38. The majority of these were editions of different authors; but they generally appeared accompanied with long laboured prefaces and miscellaneous observations, often not relevant to the subject. Among the best known of his works are, "Reliquæ Bodleianæ," "Ductor Historicus," "Lealand's Itinerary," 9 vols.—"the history of Glastonbury," "Spelman's Alfred," "Camden's Annales," &c. He wrote besides indexes to several works, as Clarendon's history, &c.

HEATH, James, an English historian, born 1629 in London, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford, of which he was a student. He was ejected in 1648 for his loyalty, and by his imprudence, and a foolish marriage, he soon reduced his patrimony, so that he maintained himself by correcting the press, and by his pen. He died of a dropsy and consumption, Aug. 1664, leaving several children to the parish. He is author of a brief chronicle of the late intestine war in the three kingdoms, 1661, 8vo. afterwards improved and republished, and again continued to 1675 by Phillips, Milton's nephew,—of a new book of loyal martyrs, &c.—of the glories of Charles II.'s restoration,—of a brief and exact survey of the Netherlands.

HEATH, Benjamin, town clerk of Exeter, is known as an able scholar. He published an essay to prove the divine existence and attributes, 1740—the case of the county of Devon, with respect to the duty on cider and perry—a revival of Shakspeare's text, 1765—and notæ, sive lectiones ad tragicorum Græcorum veterum, Æschyli, &c. 4to. 1752, a work which displays great critical knowledge. He was created LL.D. at Oxford, 31st March, 1762. The time of his death is not mentioned. His brother Thomas, alderman of Exeter, wrote an essay towards a new version of Job, 1755.

HEATH, Nicholas, archbishop of York, and chancellor of England in Mary's reign, was born in London, and educated at Christ college, Cambridge. He was deprived of his offices for refusing to take the oath of supremacy, and died at Cobham, 1560.

HEATH, Thomas, brother of the archbishop, was a Jesuit, sent by his order as missionary to England in 1563. As he was disguised as a puritan, he was permitted to preach in Rochester cathedral, but whilst inveighing against the liturgy, he dropped by accident a letter from his pocket, which being carried to the bishop, proved him to be a Jesuit, and occasioned his imprisonment and his exposure on the pillory. He died soon after in confinement.

HEATH, William, major general in the army of the American revolution, was born at Roxbury, Massachusetts, March 2d, 1737, and was bred a farmer. He early displayed a predilection for the profession of arms, and made himself acquainted with military tactics. The provincial congress soon after its organization, appointed him one of the committee of safety, and in February, 1775, one of their generals of militia; in which capacity he served till the organization of the continental army under general Washington, when he received the commission of brigadier general. After the removal of the army to New-York, he was advanced to the rank of major general, and took command of the troops stationed near King's-bridge; and after the retreat from New-York, was stationed for some time on the North river. In 1777 he was removed to the chief command at Boston, at which place the captured army of Burgoyne was stationed. He remained there till June, 1779, when he returned to the main army, and was invested with the chief command of the troops on the east side of the Hudson; and in the autumn of that year, was intrusted with the chief command of all the troops and posts on that river. In the plan of the campaign of 1781, the command of the right wing of the army was assigned to him; and he was left in charge of the troops on the Hudson during the expedition against Cornwallis. He continued with the army in that station till it was disbanded in 1783. The evening of his life he spent at his seat in Roxbury, enjoying the high respect of his fellow-citizens. That the part he acted during the war was less brilliant than that of many other officers, seems to have arisen from his being stationed at a distance from the field of almost all the important operations.

HEATHCOTE, Ralph, D.D. at Cambridge, was author of sylva—a sketch of Bolingbroke's philosophy—a tract against the Hutchinsonians, and other works. He died 1795, aged 74.

HEBENSTREIT, John Ernest, an eminent physician, born at Nevenhoff, 1702. He was educated at Jena, and afterwards removed to Leipsic, where he spent much of his time, and died 1756. He wrote various tracts, and among them—Carmen de usu partium—de homine sano, &c.—oratio de antiquitatibus Romanis, &c. His brother, John Christian, was an able divine, and a very learned Hebraist. Both brothers are mentioned with great praise by Ernesti.

HEBER, son of Selah and father of Pheleg, died at the age of 464, B.C. 817. From him the Jews derive their name of Hebrews.

HEBERDEN, William, a physician, was born in London in 1710. He received his education at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and obtained a fellowship. In 1739 he proceeded to his degrees in physic, and practised with reputation in the university about ten years, during which time he read a course of lectures in his college. In 1746 he became a fellow of the college of physicians, and, in 1749, a member of the Royal Society. He now settled in London, and, in 1766, recommended to the college the plan of the "Medical Transactions," to which he was a contributor, as he also was to the Philosophical Transactions. In 1778 the Royal Society of Medicine at Paris chose him an associate. He died May 17, 1801. He published "Antutherica; an Essay on Mithridatium et Theriaca," 8vo.; and after his death appeared "Gulielmi Heberden Commentarii de Morborum Historia et Curatione." He was one of the writers of the Athenian Letters, and communicated notes to Gray's Hudibras.—W. B.

HEBERT, James Rene, a native of Alencon, whom the French revolution raised to consequence. As the writer of the Pere Duchesne, an abusive paper, he acquired popularity among the terrorists, and by bitterly inveighing against the unfortunate queen, he maintained the character of brutality, violence, and cruelty, which had encouraged and defended the horrors of the 10th of August, and the murders of September. By attempting to oppose the power of the commune of Paris to the authority of the convention, he drew upon himself the vengeance of Robespierre, and was guillotined 24th March, 1794. This worthless character, who had organized the feasts of reason in contempt of religion and of another life, died like a coward.

HECATÆUS, a historian of Abdera, at the court of the Ptolemies. He wrote commentaries on Hesiod, Homer, &c. besides a valuable history of the Jews.

HECHT, Christian, a native of Halle, minister of Essen, East Friesland, died 1748, aged 52. He wrote commentaria philologico-critico-exegitica—and antiquitas Haræorum inter Judæos in Polonia, besides some German tracts.

HECK, Nicholas, a Dutch painter, born 1580, well acquainted with the powerful effects of the chiaro obscuro. His landscapes and historical pieces are much admired.

HECK, Martin Heinskirk, son of the preceding, was eminent for the beauty and correctness of his landscapes.

HECK, John Van, a painter of Oudenard, who studied at Rome, and became known for the delicacy and correctness of his flowers, and his Roman landscapes. He died about 1689, aged 64.

HECKEWELDER, John, many years employed by the Moravian brethren as a missionary to the Delaware Indians, was a native of England. From his secluded situation little was known of him until through the agency of Doctor Wistar he was brought into notice, and elected a member of the American Philosophical Society. He was appointed one of its literary and historical committee, and communicated a history of the manners and customs of the Indian nations who once inhabited Pennsylvania. It was published at Philadelphia, 8vo. 1819, and is the most valuable work extant on the subject. He also published in 1820 a narrative of the Moravian mission among the Delawares, &c. from 1740 to 1808, and furnished several communications for Barton's medical and physical journal. He died at Bethlehem, January 31, 1823, in the 79th year of his age.  L.

HECQUET, Philip, a French physician, born at Abbeville. He practised there, and at Port-royal, and afterwards at Paris, where he died in the Carmelites' convent, 11th April, 1737, aged 76. He was a great friend to bleeding and to the good effects of warm water; and this opinion has tended to immortalize him in the pages of Gil Blas, under the name of doctor Sangrado. He was a man of great abstemiousness, and exemplary piety, and published some medical works, especially on the indecency of men midwives—and in favour of mothers suckling their own children—on digestion—on the plague, &c. Le Fevre de St. Marc has written a prolix account of his life.

HEDELIN, Francis, an advocate, afterwards abbé of Aubignac and Meimac, was born at Paris. The favour of Richelieu, two of whose nephews he educated, raised him to consequence, so that he aspired to the name of scholar, poet, antiquarian, and preacher. He was of such a haughty temper, that he was embroiled in various quarrels, especially with Corneille, Menage, Mad. Scuderi, &c. He died at Nemours, 1676, aged 72. His chief works are, "Pratique du Theatre," a book of no great merit, but censorious, and such as to have passed to a fourth edition—"Zenobia," a tragedy in prose, and a very dull performance, according to the prince of Condé's remark, and other works of little consequence.

HEDERICUS or HEDERICH, Benjamin, author of the well-known Greek lexicon, first published at Leipsic in 8vo. 1722, and republished in England by Young and Patrick, was born at Grosse-hayn in Misnia, 1675. He published besides an edition of Empedocles de sphaera, and "notitiâ auctorum." Ernesti, who improved his lexicon, 1767, speaks of him as not a profound Greek scholar. He died 1748.

HEDLINGER, John Charles, a Swiss engraver, whose medals are much admired.

He was member of various learned academies, and died 1771, aged 80.

HEEDE, William and Vigor Van, two brothers, painters, born at Furnes. They painted historical pieces with great success. William, whose works are most esteemed, died 1728, aged 68; and the other 1708, aged 49.

HEEM, John David de, a painter of Utrecht, whose fruits and flowers were greatly admired. He died 1674, aged 74. His son Cornelius rivalled him in the beauty and correctness of his pieces.

HEEMSKERK, James, a Dutch admiral, born at Amsterdam. He was sent in 1596 under Barentein, to discover a northeast passage to Asia, and brought back his ships safe, after the death of the commander of the squadron. He was in 1607 sent as vice-admiral against the Spaniards, but fell in the battle, after defeating a superior force in the Mediterranean, and capturing the enemy's admiral John Alvarez Davila.

HEEMSKIRK, Martin. Vid. HEMSKIRK.

HEERE, Lucas de, an admired painter of Ghent, whose historical pieces are said to be in a very superior style. He died 1584, aged 50. His father was a good statuary, and his mother excelled as a painter.

HEGESIPPUS, a Jew who became a Christian at Rome, 157, and wrote a history of the church to his own times, some fragments of which are preserved. He died 181.—Another of the same name wrote an account of the destruction of Jerusalem.

HEIDEGGER, John Henry, a protestant divine, born at Ursevellon, near Zurich. He was professor at Heidelberg, afterwards at Steinfurt, and then at Zurich, where he died 1698, aged 65. He published "Exercitationes selectæ de historiâ sacrâ Patriarcharum"—"de ratione studiorum"—"tumulus Tridentini concilii"—"historia papatus," &c.

HEIDEGGER, John James, a native of Zurich, son of a clergyman. He married in Switzerland, but in consequence of an intrigue left the country, and when fifty years old, came to England on a negotiation for the Swiss. His embassy failed, and with it his resources, so that he engaged as a private soldier in the guards for protection and support. His conduct and address, however, were such, that he soon gained the attention of his superiors, and obtained the appellation of the Swiss count. By means of his friends, who were numerous in the fashionable world, he raised a subscription in 1709 to furnish the opera of Thomyris, which was performed at the Haymarket, and with such success that he not only gained 500 guineas, but recommended himself to the public notice by his taste and judgment in the management and decorations of the theatre.

George II. who was fond of operas, patronised him, and he soon obtained the management of the opera house in the Haymarket, and presided over the masquerades, and was made master of the revels. Thus patronised by the king, flattered by the nobility, and courted by all, he contributed to the amusement of the public, as the arbiter elegantiarum, but while he thus raised an annual income of 5000*l.* he did not accumulate property, but expended his money in the luxuries of his table, and in honourable acts of extensive charity. His memory was so retentive that he, once walked from Charing-cross to Temple-bar, and back again, and at his return wrote down every sign on either side of the Strand. When discoursing on the most ingenious nation in Europe, he claimed the merit himself, and said, I was born a Swiss, and came to England without a farthing, where I have found means to gain 5000*l.* a year, and to spend it. Now I defy the most able Englishman to go to Switzerland and either to gain that income, or to spend it there. He died 4th February, 1749, aged 90, and was buried at Richmond, Surrey. He left a natural daughter, married in 1750 to captain, afterwards admiral, Denis.

HEIL, Daniel Van, a painter of Brussels, born 1604. His houses on fire are much admired.

HEIL, John Baptist, brother to Daniel, was born at Brussels, 1609, and became eminent as a historical and portrait painter.

HEIL, Leonard Van, brother of the preceding, was also born at Brussels, and evinced a superior genius in the painting of flowers and insects.

HEIN, Peter, a Dutchman, who from obscurity rose to the command of the fleets of his country. He defeated the Spaniards on the coast of Brazil, 1626, and was killed off Dunkirk in a battle against the French, 1629. The state of Holland honoured his memory with great respect, and condoled with his mother, who coolly observed, I always said that Peter was an unlucky dog, and would come to an untimely end.

HEINECCIUS, John Gottlieb, a German lawyer, born at Eisemberg, 1631. He was counsellor and professor of philosophy, and afterwards of law at Halle, from whence he removed to Franeker in 1724, and three years after, at the request of the king of Prussia to Frankfort on Oder. In 1733 he resumed his former engagements at Halle, where he died 1741. His works are numerous and respectable, on jurisprudence, logic, and morality. They were collected at Geneva in 8 vols. 4to. 1744.

HEINECKEN, Christian Henry, a remarkable child, born at Lubeck, 6th Feb. 1721, and died there 27th June, 1725. At 10 months' old he could talk, and before he was 12 months he knew the principal facts mentioned in the five books of Moses, and in another month he gained a complete knowledge of the rest of the Old Testament, and in an additional month of the New. His mental powers continued to increase so that at the age of four he could prove the doctrines of divinity from the Bible, was acquainted with ecclesiastical history, and could repeat 80 psalms, 200 hymns, &c. and understood and spoke perfectly the German, Latin, French, and Low Dutch. These astonishing abilities were just shown to the admiration of the world, and then snatched away. Martini of Lubeck has published a dissertation on him.

HEINSIUS, Daniel, an eminent scholar born at Ghent, May, 1580. After studying at the Hague, in Zealand, and at Franeker, where he displayed great abilities, he came to Leyden, and at the age of 18 he was seated in the chair of Greek professor, and afterwards succeeded his friend and instructor, Joseph Scaliger, in the professorship of politics and history. He died 25th February, 1655. He was distinguished as a man of extensive learning, and great application, and possessed of a correct taste and sound judgment. He not only enriched by his labours Silius Italicus, Theocritus, Hesiod, Seneca, Homer, Theophrastus, Hesychius, Livy, Ovid, Terence, Horace, &c. but he wrote also some prose works abounding with wit, and chaste satire. He was honoured and respected not only by the learned but even by princes, and especially Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, the republic of Venice, and Pope Urban VIII.

HEINSIUS, Nicholas, son of the preceding, was born at Leyden, 1620. He was eminent as a poet and critic, and deserved the flattering appellation of the "swan of Holland." Though employed in the affairs of the state, he devoted much of his time to the muses, and edited several classical authors, Virgil, Ovid, Valerius Flaccus, Claudian, &c. His poems were often reprinted, but the best edition is that of Amsterdam, 1666. He died at the Hague, 1631, respected at home and abroad.

HEINSIUS, N. grand pensionary of Holland, died at the Hague, 3d Aug. 1720, aged 87. He was in the service of William prince of Orange, and distinguished himself as a negotiator in France, against the destruction of whose power he afterwards directed all the energies of his country. During the 30 years in which he was grand pensionary, he displayed great vigour of mind, but in his views of humbling the pride of Lewis XIV. he brought great difficulties and immense debts upon Holland, so that the people saw his retirement from power with pleasure and exultation.

HEISS, N. a German author, who published an indifferent history of the German empire in 1684, in 2 vols. 4to.

HEISTER, Lawrence, a native of Frankfurt on the Maine, professor of medicine at Altorf, and afterwards at Helmstadt, where he died 1758, aged 73. He was the learned author of "Compendium anatomicum"—"institutiones chirurgicæ."—"de medicamentis German. indigenis suffic."—"compendium institutionum medicarum," &c. His son Elias Frederick published "Apologia pro Medicis Atheismo accusatis," and died at Leyden, 1740.

HELE, Thomas, a native of Gloucestershire, who served in the army, especially in Jamaica, and at the peace of 1763, travelled through Italy, and in 1770 settled at Paris. He became so well acquainted with the French language that he wrote some plays, which were received with great applause on the Paris theatres, and highly admired. His comedies, it is said, are full of plot, lively, and interesting, and the dialogue is pleasing, and expressed with neatness and elegance. He died of a consumptive disorder at Paris, Dec. 1780, aged about 40. His "Jugement de Midas," and his "Amant Jaloux," are particularly esteemed by French writers.

HELENA, St. wife of Constantius Chlorus, and mother of the great Constantine, was born of obscure parents in Bithynia. When divorced by the marriage of her husband with Maximilian's daughter, she retired with resignation from the court, but the elevation of her son to the throne restored her to the dignity of her rank, which she adorned by devotion and Christian charity. She was the founder of various churches, and in her travels into the Holy Land she is said to have discovered the true cross. She died in the arms of her son, 328, aged 80.

HELIODORUS, bishop of Tricca in Thessaly, in the fourth century, was the author of the loves of Theagenes and Chariclea, condemned by a synod of bishops.

HELIOGABALUS, M. Aurel. Antonin. succeeded to the Roman empire after the death of Macrinus, though only 14. Though popular in the beginning of his reign, he became cruel, vindictive, and licentious, and was assassinated A.D. 222.

HELLENICUS, a Greek historian, who died B.C. 411.

HELLOT, John, author of Part de la teinture des laines et elosses de laine, 12mo. and other works of merit on philosophical and chymical subjects, was member of the Paris academy of sciences and of the London Royal Society. He also conducted for some time the Gazette of France, and was distinguished as an able chymist. He died at Paris, 15th Feb. 1766, aged 80.

HELMBREKER, Theodor, a painter, born at Haerlem, 1624. He was pupil to Peter Gribber, and studied in Italy, and after being some time resident at Haerlem he returned to Rome, where he died 1694. His pieces, especially in history and landscape are much admired.

HELMONT, Matthew Van, a painter of Antwerp, happy in the representation of shops, chymical laboratories, markets, &c. He died 1726.

HELMONT, John Baptist Van, a learned scholar and physician, born at Brussels, 1577. He studied at Louvain, but after refusing to devote himself to divinity, he turned his attention to medicine, and took his degrees in that science. His application to chymical experiments, and to the investigation of the power of herbs and plants led him to superior practice, and so extraordinary were some of his cures considered, that he was brought before the inquisition as a magician, who removed human diseases by more than human art. He succeeded, however, in clearing himself from the imputation, and retired to the greater freedom of Holland, where he died Dec. 30, 1644. He was, says Lobkowitz, his biographer, pious, learned, famous, a sworn enemy of Galen and Aristotle. The sick never languished long under his hands, being always killed or cured in two or three days. He was sent chiefly to those who were given up by other physicians, to whose great grief and indignation the patients were often unexpectedly restored to health. His works, chiefly against the Peripatetics and Galenists, were published in folio by his son, who acquired some fame as a physician, and was falsely called in his epitaph, "nil patre inferior." He died 1699, aged 81.

HELOISE, the mistress of Abelard, is celebrated for her beauty and her misfortunes. She died 1163. Vid. ABELARD.

HELSHAM, Richard, M. D. professor of physic and natural philosophy in Dublin college. He was author of 23 very popular lectures on natural philosophy published after his death by Dr. Robinson, and frequently reprinted.

HELSE, Bartholomew Van der, a painter of Haerlem, who died 1670, aged 57. His representation of the train bands of Amsterdam was much admired by sir Godfrey Kneller, and is preserved in the town house of the capital.

HELVETIUS, Adrian, a Dutch physician, born 1656. He was by accident at Paris when a violent dysentery prevailed there, and his remedies proved so successful that Lewis XIV. presented him with 1000 louis d'ors for the discovery of his potent medicine. He declared it to be ipecacuanha. He afterwards settled at Paris, and was made physician to the duke of Orleans, and inspector general of the military hospitals. He died 1721. He left some works, the best known of which is a treatise on the most frequent maladies, &c. 2 vols. 8vo.

HELVETIUS, John Claude, son of the preceding, died 1755, aged 70. He was first physician to the French queen, counsellor of state, and member of several learned academies. He cured Louis XV. of a dangerous disorder, and gained the confidence and good opinion not only of the court but of the poor, by his skill, attention, and great humanity. He published "L'idée generale de l'économie animale," 1722, 8vo.—"Principia Physico-medica, in tirinum medicinæ gratiam conscripta," 2 vols. 8vo.

HELVETIUS, Claude Adrian, son of John, was born at Paris 1715, and educated with great attention under father Porée. He had a strong desire to appear as an author, but his first production "de l'esprit," in 1 vol. 4to. and afterwards in three, 8vo. 1758, exposed him to the censure of the parliament, who condemned his publication as calculated more for the encouragement of vice than an incitement to virtue. Thus disgraced, he came to England in 1764, and the next year visited Prussia, where the king honourably received him. On his return to France, he retired in privacy to his estate at Voré, in the bosom of his family. As he was rich, he showed himself charitable to the poor, and benevolent to all. He died of an attack of the gout, Dec. 1771. Besides his atheistical book "de l'Esprit," he published "le Bonheur," a poem in six cantos, written in an affected style,—"de l'Homme," 2 vols. 8vo. a work as dangerous as unphilosophical, and as impious as the first—and the "Child of nature improved by Chance," a licentious romance. As Helvetius was a man of mild manners, and of a benevolent disposition, it may surprise us, that books so little calculated to improve humanity should proceed from his pen.

HELVICIUS, Christopher, professor of Greek and eastern languages, and of divinity, at Giessen university, was born 1581, at Spredlingen near Frankfort. He was educated at Marburg, and early displayed a poetical genius, and at 20 was capable of teaching Hebrew and Greek, two languages which he spoke with great fluency. He died in the flower of his age, 1617, and his immature death was deplored with feeling and sorrow by all the German poets of the Augsburg persuasion. Besides poetry, he published Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Syriac grammars—a Hebrew and Latin lexicon—and some chronological tables.

HELYOT, Peter, an ecclesiastic of English extraction. He was of the order of Picpus near Paris, which was a branch of the Franciscans, and after 23 years' labour, he published in 8 vols. 4to. a history of the monastic orders, religious and military, &c. a work full of learned research and general information. He died 1716, aged 56.

HEMELAR, John, a learned man, born at the Hague, of so amiable a character for probity and disinterestedness as to deserve to be compared, says Gronovius, with the Roman Atticus. He resided six years at Rome, and preferred to the office of librarian of the Vatican a canonry in the cathedral of Antwerp. He devoted himself much to polite literature and the science of medals, and he lived in friendly intimacy with Grotius, Lipsius, and other eminent men. He published valuable commentaries on the medals of the Roman emperors from Julius Cæsar to Justinian, from the cabinet of Arschot and Rocoxius. Besides this work, which is now rare, though three times printed; he wrote poems and orations, and died 1640.

HEMMERLIN, or MALLEOLUS, Felix, a canon of Zurich in 1428. He is author of "Opuscula varia, scilicet de nobilitate et rusticitate dialogus," &c.—"variæ oblectationis opuscula," &c. comprised in a folio volume, and full of coarse humour.

HEMMINGFORD, Walter de, a canon of Gisborough abbey, in Yorkshire, author of a history of England, from 1066 to 1308. The work is respectable for accuracy and exactness. He died at Gisborough 1347.

HEMSKIRK, or HEEMSKIRK, Martin, a peasant's son, born in a village of that name in Holland, 1498, and distinguished as a painter. After studying three years at Rome, he settled at Haarlem, where he died 1574, aged 76. His pieces were admired by Michael Angelo, by Vasari and others, but though he possessed great merit, his figures show that he did not understand the chiaro oscuro.

HEMSKIRK, Egbert, a Dutch painter, known for his success in delineating droll subjects and grotesque figures.

HEMSKIRK, Egbert, called the younger, son of the preceding, united to great abilities, a lively imagination and a humorous taste. Some of his pieces in which he represents devils and witches are admired. He died 1704, aged 59.

HEMSTERHUIS, or HEMSTERHUSIUS, Tiberius, a learned critic, born at Groningen, 1st Feb. 1635, son of a physician. He studied at Groningen and Leyden, and at the age of 19 was appointed professor of mathematics and philosophy at Amsterdam. In 1717 he removed to Franeker, where he succeeded Lambert Bos as Greek professor, and in 1740 he was appointed to the chairs of Greek and of history at Leyden, where he died 1766. He published the three last books of J. Pollux's onomasticon 1706, for which he was complimented by Bentley, select colloquies of Lucian, and his Timon, 1708—The Plutus of Aristophanes, with the scholia, 1744—part of an edition of Lucian—notes and emendations on Xenophon Ephesus, and other equally learned works. He is praised by Ruhnkenius as a critic of very superior powers.

HENSTERHUSIUS, Francis, son of a physician of Groningen, and grandson of Tiberius, was in the service of the United States, and died 1790. He was an able author, and wrote œuvres philosophiques, translated into French, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1793, and other works.

HENAULT, John d', a French poet, son of a Paris baker. He travelled into Holland and England, and was patronised by the superintendent Fouquet, by whose means he obtained the receivership of taxes at Fores, and other employments. He became a man of celebrity by his poetical pieces, and proud of his distinction he affected the debauchee and the impious atheist as the friend of Spinoza, but after a life of dissipation and profaneness, the approach of death seemed so terrible that he became a coward, and renounced with sorrow and deep contrition the follies and wickedness of his prosperous days. He died 1682. His best pieces are said to be his sonnet on the miscarriage of Mad. de Guerchi, and his satirical poem on Colbert, in consequence of the fall of his patron. He printed at Paris, his "œuvres diverses" in 12mo. 1670. He translated the three first books of Lucretius, but by the advice of his confessor he destroyed them. Only 100 lines, copied by his friends, were preserved, which are much admired by Voltaire.

HENAULT, Charles John Francis, a celebrated historian, born at Paris, 8th Feb. 1685. He early discovered a sprightly and benevolent disposition, but after being two years at the congregation of the oratory, he quitted it for the more gay society of the wits of the age. The dispute between Rousseau and de la Motte, however, gave him a disgust for the fallacious intimacies of the learned and the great; and devoting himself more particularly to his own improvement, he obtained the prize of eloquence in the French academy, 1707, and another the following year. In 1713 he produced on the stage a tragedy, under the disguised name of Fuselier, but though it was received with indifference by the public, he regarded it as a valuable composition, and as such permitted Horace Walpole, with whom he became acquainted in 1768, to print it at Strawberry-hill. Though unsuccessful as a poet, he rose to honour as a politician. He became counsellor of parliament 1706, president of the first chamber of inquest 1710. and in 1718 he accompanied the French ambassador Morville to Holland, where his abilities were respected by the Dutch, and particularly by the pensionary Heinsius. In the midst of his political occupations, Henault paid deep and lasting attention to history, and at last published his history, the result of 40 years' laborious reading and study under the modest name of "an Essay," in 1744. It met with astonishing success, and not only became popular in France in nine editions, but was translated into English, German, Italian, and even Chinese. This valuable work raised him to the honour of a seat in the academy of belles lettres at Paris, and other learned societies, and he was afterwards appointed superintendent of the queen's house. He was now courted by the wit and fashion of the court, and his house was the receptacle of whatever was innocently gay, pleasing, and agreeable. For the entertainment of the queen and her court, he wrote three lively comedies, one of which, "le Reveil d'Epimenides," who is said to have slept 27 years, proved particularly agreeable, and he produced, at the queen's request, a fourth piece, called Hebe. This most respectable character died 24th Dec. 1771, aged 86. In the midst of prosperity, he practised benevolence and charity; he was pious and resigned under afflictions, grateful to providence for the blessings which he enjoyed, and his manners and devotion were truly exemplary. His wife, to whom he was married 14 years, died 1728, leaving no issue. He adopted as his own children, his sister's three sons and two daughters, and had the happiness to see them form respectable connexions.

HENDERSON, Alexander, a Scotchman, who acquired some celebrity at the head of the Presbyterian party. He was one of the divines sent to meet Charles I. at Newcastle, 1646, but though he possessed eloquence and abilities, it is said, that in disputing with the monarch about episcopacy, he found his arguments too futile to resist the superior reasons of his unfortunate master. This it is said had such effect upon his spirits, that he died soon after, and in his last moments, expressed great contrition for the severity and rancour with which he had opposed the king's measures in Scotland.

HENDERSON, John, an English actor of eminence, born in London. He at first learnt painting under Fournier, an able artist, but he quitted him to work in the shop of a silversmith, and after his death he appeared on the stage at Bath, 1772, in the character of Hamlet, under the assumed name of Courtney. The opinion which he had formed of his theatrical powers, was greeted by the applauses of crowded audiences, and after acquiring cetebrity in provincial companies, he, for the first time, presented himself before a London audience, at the Hay Market, under Coleman, as Shylock. The approbation with which he was received excited him to greater exertions, and he soon became the popular representative of Falstaff, Richard III. Pierre, and other difficult characters at Drury Lane. He died suddenly 25th Nov. 1785, of a spasmodic affection in the brain, aged 38. His life has been published by Ireland.

HENDERSON, John, an extraordinary character, born at Bellegrance in Ireland 1757. He was educated in the principles of Wesley's persuasion, and who for some time settled near Bristol as a schoolmaster, and under him he made such astonishing progress, that he taught Latin in Kingswood school at the age of eight, and Greek in lady Huntingdon's college in Wales, when he was no more than 12. These extraordinary powers were seen and encouraged by dean Tucker, who sent him to Pembroke college, Oxford, where he staid long enough to take his first degree, but was not admitted to orders, though his friends wished to see his oratorical abilities exerted in the pulpit. These brilliant parts were unfortunately clouded by great and often offensive singularities. In his person, he affected great negligence, his long unpowdered hair gave him an air of religious melancholy, he never wore a neck-cloth, his buckles on his shoes were of the most diminutive size, and the rest of his dress exhibited him particularly hostile to the reigning fashions of the times. Though eagerly courted in the university for his great fund of knowledge, and the the inexhaustible resources of his mental powers, he at length rendered himself disagreeable by the lateness to which he protracted his visits. Seldom in bed before the dawn of day, he rose late in the afternoon, as if setting at defiance the powers of nature, he would often go half naked to the pump, and desire the college servants to pump over him for several minutes, and then in that condition he retired to his bed. Those who frequented his company have often been astonished at the vastness of his powers, which adorned with all the flowers of oratory and elegant language the most abstruse and barren subjects. Though well skilled in general knowledge, he was particularly attached to physiognomy, alchymy, and the occult arts, and in some instances he has been known to prostitute his great talents in diving into futurity, and anticipating the mournful accidents of life. This eccentric genius died in Pembroke college 2d Nov. 1788, and was carried by his father to Bristol to be there interred.

HENGIST, a Saxon chief who came to England at the request of king Vortigern, whom he assisted in repelling the Picts. The British monarch married Rowena, the daughter of his ally, and Hengist, in reward for his services, obtained the kingdom of Kent, and died 489.

HENLEY, Anthony, an English senator, born of a respectable family in Hampshire. He was educated at Oxford, and early distinguished himself for his classical taste. In London he gained the friendship and familiarity of the great, and as the associate of Dorset and Sunderland he figured in the circles of fashion, and passed at Will's and Tom's as a man of wit and facetiousness. As his affections were benevolent and his heart generous, he was addressed by the poets and writers of the age as a patron and a guide, and the command of an independent fortune of upwards of 3000*l.* a year was in the midst of mirth and gallantry liberally applied to the remuneration of the flattering muse. In 1698, soon after his marriage with the daughter of the Hon. Peregrine Bertie, he was elected member for Andover, and in succeeding parliaments for Weymouth. He was in his political career a firm and eloquent whig, and he drew upon himself the persecution of the tories by moving the house to address the queen to confer some ecclesiastical dignity on Mr. Ben. Hoadly, whose attachment to the revolution was then publicly known. As a writer he distinguished himself by various anonymous publications, and in the Tatler and Medley appeared many of his pieces, remarkable for their wit, ease, and fluency, and for that genius and vivacity with which he assumed the character and language of masters and servants, peasants and tradesmen, parents and children. He was very fond of music, and in his summer recreations he had a private theatre at Southwick, where Betterton, Booth, Mrs. Barry, and other great performers were generally invited to exhibit and join their abilities to his exertions, for the amusement of his friends. He died 1711, universally lamented. His second son became Lord Northampton, and chancellor of England.

HENLEY, John, well known by the appellation of "orator Henley," was born at Melton Mowbray, 3d Aug. 1692, where his father was vicar, and after receiving instruction in the grammar-school of his native town, and that of Oakham, Rutland, he entered at the age of 17 at St. John's college, Cambridge. When he had taken his bachelor's degree he was invited by the trustees of Melton school to take care of that foundation, and he raised it from a languishing to a flourishing state. He now courted the public approbation by the appearance of his Esther, a poem, and when he had entered into orders he left the country for fame and preferment in the capital. Followed as a preacher determined to create public notice, he introduced regular action into the pulpit, and courted popularity a thousand ways, but when disappointed of the preferment he expected, he formed a plan for lectures and orations. Every Sunday he discoursed on theological subjects, while Wednesday was reserved for political subjects, into which he poured much of the gall of satire against the great, the powerful, and the learned. To this acrimonious spirit he indeed owes the distinguished place which he holds in Pope's Dunciad, as "the zany of his age." Admission was procured to his oratorical theatre by the payment of a shilling, and as the lowest of the people formed the most numerous part of his audience, the daily advertiser generally announced the topics which were to be discussed on each day, by this artful and commanding preacher at his oratory near Lincoln's Inn Field's. He died 14th Oct. 1756. He published an account of himself and his adventures, and it is easily discovered that to personal vanity he added effrontery, and obtained popularity by bold invectives and satirical censoriousness. The medals which he struck for admission to his lectures represented a star rising in the meridian with "Inveniam viam aut faciam." Hogarth has immortalized his name by introducing him into two of his humorous pieces, in one of which he is christening a child, and in the other he appears on a scaffold with a monkey by his side with the motto "amen," and with other appropriate figures. Henley it is said gained 100*l.* a year by editing a periodical paper called the Hip Doctor, which was a farrago of nonsense. On one occasion he filled his oratory with shoemakers, by announcing to them he would teach a new and short way of making shoes, which was by cutting off the tops of boots.

HENLEY, Samuel, a divine, who, previous to the American war, was professor of moral philosophy in the college of Williamsburgh, in Virginia. On leaving that country he became an usher in Harrow school, and afterwards rector of Rendlesham, in Suffolk. In 1805 he was appointed principal of the East India college, at Hertford; on which occasion he obtained the degree of doctor in divinity. He died at Rendlesham in 1816. Dr. Henley published—1. Three Sermons preached in America. 2. Dissertation concerning the controverted Passages in St. Peter and St. Jude, on the Angels that sinned, 8vo. 3. Observations on the Fourth Eclogue, the Allegory in the Third Georgic, and the Design of the Æneid of Virgil, 8vo. 4. Essay toward a new Edition of the Elegies of Tibullus, with a Translation and Notes, 8vo. He has also some papers in the Archæologia; and was the editor of "The History of the Caliph Vathek."—W. B.

HENNINGES, Jerome, a German historian in the 16th century. He devoted himself much to genealogical history, and his "Theatrum Genealogicum," 6 vols. folio, 1598, is a valuable work, containing the account of several of the chief families of Germany, &c.

HENNUYER, John, bishop of Lisieux, is justly celebrated for his great humanity at the dreadful massacre of St Bartholomew. He boldly opposed the king's orders to assassinate the protestants, and instead of violating their persons, he openly protected them; yet for this opposition to tyranny, he was never censured by the monarch; so great was the respect paid to his persevering virtue and dignity. He died 1577, universally lamented and revered for his mildness, humanity, and piety.

HENRION, Nicholas, a native of Troyes, in Champagne, member of the academy of inscriptions. He was engaged in composing a work on the weights and measures of the ancients, of which his death in 1720, at the age of 50 prevented the completion. With an extravagant imagination he described Adam as 132 feet 9 inches high, and Eve 118 feet 9 inches, but gradually reduced the size of his gigantic heroes, and made Abraham 27 feet, Moses 13, Hercules 10, and Alexander only 6.

HENRY I. surnamed the Fowler, emperor of Germany, was son of Otho duke of Saxony, and elected to the throne 919. He was a brave and politic prince, he exerted his influence among the princes of Germany to restore union; and to render the country more powerful, he built and fortified towns to withstand the attacks of the barbarians. He confirmed his regulations by the establishment of wise and salutary laws, and the introduction of the patrician order for the distinction and encouragement of merit. In war he was successful against the duke of Bavaria, he conquered the Bohemians, Sclavonians, and Danes; and invaded the kingdom of Lorraine, and defeated the Hungarians at the famous battle of Mersburg. He died 2d July, 936, aged 60, and was succeeded by his son Otho.

HENRY II. emperor of Germany, surnamed the Lame, was grandson of the preceding, and ascended the imperial throne 1002. After defeating the duke of Bavaria, he re-established Benedict VIII. in the holy see, and was crowned by him at Rome 1014, with great solemnity. He also drove the Greeks and Saracens from Calabria, and after restoring tranquillity over Italy and Germany, and every where leaving marks of his great generosity, and extensive benevolence, he died 13th July, 1024, aged 47.

HENRY III. emperor of Germany, succeeded his father Conrad in 1039. After making war in Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia, he passed into Italy, and expelled from the papal throne Benedict IX. Sylvester III. and Gregory VI. and in their room elected Clement II. by whom he was crowned. He died at Botfeld in Saxony, 5th Oct. 1056, aged 39, and was buried at Spire.

HENRY IV. the aged or great, emperor of Germany after his father Henry III. though only six years old, was governed during his minority by the wisdom of his mother Agnes. When grown up to manhood, Henry displayed ability in opposing the insurgents of Germany and Saxony, but when he supplicated the interference of pope Gregory VII. to restore order by his spiritual authority among his rebellious subjects, he found himself accused of simony, and other crimes before the holy pontiff. The charge was not unfounded. Henry had not scrupled to sell the highest dignities of the German church, and the pope, proud of his power as umpire, abolished by his decrees the investitures that had already taken place. Henry in revenge assembled a council at Worms, 1076, and not only deposed the pope, but ordered his person to be seized. Clement in consequence of this hurled his anathemas against Henry, and so formidable was the spiritual power that the princes of Germany prepared to execute the decree, when Henry, afraid of the influence of his enemies, repaired to the residence of the pope, and for three days of mortification and penance, solicited his forgiveness. This humility was superciliously contemned; but while Henry meditated vengeance, the pope appointed Rodolphus duke of Swabia, emperor in his place. Henry defeated and slew his antagonist at the battle of Volckheim, and then formally deposing the pope, elevated in his room Guibert archbishop of Ravenna, and supported him by besieging and reducing Rome under his power by force of arms. In the midst of his triumphs Henry found himself attacked by his children, his son Conrad revolted and obtained the crown of Italy, and Henry the other son, supported by Pascal II. and by the German rebels, placed the imperial crown on his head 1106. While Henry wished to effect a reconciliation with these unnatural children, he found himself abandoned by his former friends, and rudely treated in his person by his son, and he retired to Cologne, and then to Liege, where his misfortunes raised him a few adherents.

His forces were however soon defeated, and the unfortunate monarch, indigent and persecuted, applied to the bishop of Spire for a lay prebend, which was refused. Thus a wanderer, without resources, and without friends, he at last entreated his ungrateful son to permit him to hide his misfortunes in the obscurity of Liege, where he soon after died 7th Aug. 1106, aged 56. He was a brave prince, and was present in 66 battles, but the greater part of his misfortunes arose from the blind confidence which he placed on worthless ministers and favourites.

HENRY V. or the young, was born 1081, and deposed his father, Henry IV. 1106. Though he had opposed his father he pursued the same measures, and obliged the pope, Pascal II. to restore to him the power of ecclesiastical investitures, of which Henry IV. had been deprived by Gregory VII. The papal power, however, was too great to be successfully resisted, and Henry, already excommunicated, submitted to the pleasure of the new pope, Gelasius II. though he had violently opposed his election. Henry died at Utrecht, 23d May, 1125, aged 44, leaving behind him the odious character of an unnatural son, an impious hypocrite, an insidious neighbour, and an oppressive master.

HENRY VI. surnamed the severe, succeeded his father Frederic Barbarossa on the throne of Germany 1190. He behaved with great cruelty towards the family of his wife Constance, daughter of Roger king of Naples, and had the meanness to detain Richard I. of England, who, when shipwrecked on the coast of Dalmatia, had been seized by Leopold duke of Austria, and sold into the power of the emperor. With the large sums of money obtained for the ransom of his illustrious captive, Henry made war against Sicily, where his arms plundered and desolated the country. He was at last poisoned by his wife Constance, 28th Sept. 1197, aged 32.

HENRY VII. son of Henry count of Luxemburg, was elected emperor 1308, and was the first thus raised to the imperial dignity by the suffrages of the six electors. He visited Italy, where the factions of the Guelphs and Gibelins had every where spread devastation and misfortune, and in the midst of these public disorders he was obliged to enter Rome sword in hand. He was crowned by the pope in the church of the Lateran, and died the next year, 25th Aug. 1313, aged 51, as he was preparing to subdue Italy by the power of his arms.

HENRY, Raspon, Margrave of Thuringia, was, upon the deposition of Frederic II. by Innocent IV. raised to the imperial throne, 1246, but he died the following year of a wound received in battle, or as some say of a broken heart, because defeated by his competitor.

HENRY I. king of France, succeeded his brother Robert 1031. He was engaged in a civil war through the intrigues of his mother Constance, who wished to place her second son, Robert, on the throne, but by the assistance of Robert duke of Normandy, the father of William the Conqueror, he defeated his enemies. He was afterwards reconciled to his brother, and granted him the dukedom of Burgundy. He died at Vitry en Brie, 4th Aug 1060, aged 55, in consequence of taking an improper medicine, highly respected as a good warrior, and a benevolent man.

HENRY II. succeeded his father Francis I. as king of France 1547, and continuing the war which then raged between his country and the English, at length obtained an honourable peace, and the cession of Boulogne for a stipulated sum of money, 1550. The following year he engaged in a league with the elector of Saxony, and the Margrave of Brandenburg, against Charles V. and he had the good fortune of reducing Metz, Toul, and Verdun. When however his antagonist had reconciled himself to his German adversaries, Henry was alone left to maintain the war; but though in want of money he ably supported the glory of his arms, by the brave defence of Metz against an army of 100,000 men. The theatre of the war was removed to the Netherlands, and at last a truce was agreed upon for five years between the belligerent powers, but on the abdication of Charles V. his son Philip renewed the war with unusual vigour, supported by the English forces, and his army entering Picardy under the command of the brave duke of Savoy, defeated the French at the famous battle of St. Quentin, 1557. This fatal day was in some degree retrieved by the capture of Calais from the English, and the reduction of some other places, and at last peace was restored between the contending powers, but on terms not sufficiently advantageous to France. More fully to effect a reconciliation, Henry gave his daughter to the king of Spain, and his sister to the duke of Savoy, but the rejoicings which accompanied this union proved fatal to the monarch. Henry was accidentally wounded in a tournament by the count of Montgomery, and died in consequence of it, 10th July, 1559, aged 41.

HENRY III. king of France, was the third son of Henry II. and was born 19th Sept. 1551. He was carefully educated under the eye of his mother Catherine de Medicis, and, when duke of Anjou, he was elected king of Poland, on the death of Sigismund Augustus, 1573, and he quitted this dignity three months after to succeed his brother Charles IX. on the French throne. In 1575 he gained the battle of Dormans, and made a peace at Blois with the Huguenots, to whom he granted religious toleration and various privileges. These concessions displeased the catholics, and were at last revoked in 1585, and from this measure arose those civil dissensions which almost ruined the kingdom. France was then torn by the three parties of the three Henries, one of which, the royalists, was headed by the king, the other, called the league, by Henry duke of Guise, and the third, called the Huguenots, by Henry king of Navarre, presumptive heir to the French throne. After some time Henry was reconciled to the Guises, and supported by the pope he directed all the powers of his kingdom against the king of Navarre and the protestants. The battle of Coutras, however, 1587, checked the hopes of the catholics, but the victorious king of Navarre found, in offering honourable terms of peace, that his enemies, though defeated, were not subdued, and, though Henry might be desirous of accommodation, his new friend, the duke of Guise, was too proud and too ambitious to consent. These jarring interests soon proved the views of party, the French king wishing to repress the power of Guise, in vain attempted to prevent his entrance into Paris, and when he summoned the states general to assist him with their counsel at Blois he found his powerful rival there ready to dispute his authority. Though a reconciliation was hastily effected between two men who in reality meditated each other's downfall, soon after Henry caused Guise to be assassinated, and for this perfidious deed found himself abhorred by his subjects, deposed by the ecclesiastics of the assembled Sorbonne, and excommunicated by the pope. Thus exposed to universal detestation, Henry could no longer find support among his subjects, he applied to the new head of the league for reconciliation, and to the pope for pardon, but when abandoned by all he implored the protection of the king of Navarre. The king of Navarre marched to his assistance, and, forgetting their former animosities, the two monarchs employed all their resources to destroy the power of the league. Their united efforts might have proved successful, when Henry was stabbed in the belly by James Clement, a fanatical priest, and died of the wound on the morning, 2d Aug. 1589, aged 39. Though debauched, cruel, and revengeful, Henry possessed great courage, and often distinguished himself in the field. In his person the house of Valois, which had reigned over France 261 years, became extinct. It was in his reign that the military order of the holy ghost was established.

HENRY IV. deservedly surnamed the great, king of France and Navarre, was born 13th Dec. 1553, at Pau, the capital of Bearn. His father was Anthony of Bourbon, and his mother, Jane d'Albret, daughter of the king of Navarre. He received an excellent education, and early imbibed the precepts of the heroes of ancient times, and chiefly amused himself with the lives of Plutarch. As he had been brought up in the principles of the Calvinists, he was declared head of the protestants at Rochelle, 1569, and he engaged warmly in the civil wars which at that time distracted France. He distinguished himself at the battles of Jarnac, and of Moncontour, and after the peace of St. Germain, he visited the court of France, and two years after, 1572, married Margaret de Valois, sister of Charles IX. During the rejoicings which took place on this occasion, the infamous massacre of St. Bartholomew was perpetrated, and Henry, oppressed by the violence of the times, was obliged to renounce his religion rather than perish by the hands of an assassin. He at last escaped from his persecutors, 1576, and placed himself at the head of the Huguenots, and displayed his valour and the great resources of his mind at the siege of Cahors, and at the battle of Coutras. He had succeeded, in 1572, to the kingdom of Navarre, and as the descendant of Lewis IX. he succeeded to the throne of France on the death of Henry III. 1589. His elevation gave offence to the heads of the opposite factions, who suspected the sincerity of Henry's religious principles, but he confirmed his power by the victories of Arque and of Ivry, and at last, to silence all opposition, he pronounced his abjuration, and his adherence to the catholic tenets at St. Denis, before his coronation, and on the following year, 1594, Paris opened her gates to her heroic conqueror. By consulting the chief men of the nation, at Rouen, Henry was enabled to secure the good will and the affection of his subjects, and in making peace with the Spaniards, 1598, he restored tranquillity to the nation. Though now in his conduct and in his government entitled to the attachment of his people, Henry unfortunately found that the spirit of faction was not extinguished; by promulgating an edict of toleration at Nantes he offended the bigoted catholics, and many secret measures were planned to sacrifice his life, by the offended Jesuits. Barriere first attempted to destroy him, Chatel afterwards wounded him in the mouth, 1595, and two others meditated his destruction, but the bloody deed was perpetrated by Ravaillac, 14th May, 1610, who stabbed him to the heart in his coach in the streets of Paris. The civil dissensions which prevailed in the reign of Henry, did not permit his prejudiced subjects to appreciate his great qualities, but no sooner had he perished by the dagger of the assassin, than his merits were fully acknowledged by all parties. The wisdom of his measures, the mildness of his government, and his love for his people, and for the happiness of France, have been echoed from every corner of the kingdom, and his name is still revered by the nation not only as a great, but a benevolent king, truly the father of his people.

HENRY I. king of England, and duke of Normandy, was the third son of William the Conqueror, and succeeded to the crown on the death of William Rufus, 1100, during the absence of his elder brother Robert in Italy. This usurpation displeased the absent prince, who returned to England to claim his kingdom sword in hand, but Henry had the art to prevail on Robert to resign his pretensions for a stipulated sum of money. Jealousy thus excited between the brothers, and checked for a time, again was kindled into a war, but Robert was defeated in Normandy, and dragged a prisoner to England, where the last years of his life were past in close confinement in Cardiff castle. In his government Henry was wise and moderate, though he exercised absolute power. He opposed the encroachments of the church of Rome; he not only patronised learning, and restored the university of Cambridge, but deserved the name of Beau Clerc from his intimate acquaintance with literature. He was severe against robbers, but he had the good sense to abolish the curfew bell so galling to the English, and he established a universal standard of weights and measures. While he watched over the prerogative of the crown he had respect for the liberties of the people, and from the charters which he granted may be derived the freedom of which the nation is now so deservedly proud. Henry died in Normandy, 1185, aged 68, and was buried in Reading abbey. As his only son had been drowned in crossing from Normandy, he left his possessions to his daughter Matilda, but Stephen usurped the crown at his death.

HENRY II. king of England, son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, duke of Anjou, by Matilda, daughter of Henry I. was born 1132. In 1150 he was made duke of Normandy, and the next year married Eleanor, the heiress of Poitou and Guienne, and in 1153, on the death of Eustace, Stephen's son, he was acknowledged successor to the English throne, which he ascended the next year. To his extensive possessions in France he added Brittany by conquest, and he afterwards conquered Ireland, which since that time has formed part of the British dominions. Though wise in his government, Henry had to struggle with the clergy, whose ambition it was his wish to repress. The murder of Thomas a Becket, the primate, which was falsely attributed to the king, tended, however, to increase rather than diminish the power of the church, and the monarch could reconcile himself to the offended pope only by solemnly exculpating himself on oath of the alleged crime, and by submitting patiently with every mark of penance and contrition to the discipline inflicted on him by the monks of Canterbury. Though respected at home and abroad, and successful in his expeditions against France and against Scotland, Henry did not, however, find that happiness at the close of life which he might deserve. His children, excited by the arts of the French king, rebelled against him, and their ingratitude proved so grievous that it is said he died of a broken heart, when he found his favourite son, John, in the number of his enemies. He expired at Chinon, in Touraine, 6th July, 1189. The reign of Henry was marked by the striking character of firmness, wisdom, valour, genius, and popularity. He reformed abuses, corrected the laws, repressed the power of the barons, and advanced the interests and the consequence of the people. Unfortunately, however, these high qualities were obscured by excessive pride, boundless ambition, and an unceasing propensity to sensual pleasures, which not only revolted the affections of his queen from him, but tended to embitter the close of his life.

HENRY III. was son and successor of John on the English throne, 1216. He lost by his ill conduct the provinces of Normandy, Anjou, Poitou, Maine, and Touraine, which were conquered by the king of France, and after a disgraceful campaign he retired to England, where the barons, headed by Montfort, made war against him, and took him prisoner at the battle of Lewes. The valour of his son Edward again set him at liberty, at the battle of Evesham, but Henry was not become wiser by adversity, and instead of devoting himself to the prudent and impartial government of his people, he gave loose to every base and intemperate pleasure; and while he could levy money to satisfy his favourites and parasites, he permitted the pope to plunder the clergy, and to impoverish the kingdom. This worthless monarch, to whose weakness indeed the people of England may be said to owe the establishment of their democratic government, died after a long reign of 56 years, 15th Nov. 1272, aged 65.

HENRY IV. king of England, son of John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, the third son of Edward III. ascended the throne after the deposition of Richard II. 1399. This usurpation excited the civil wars between the two roses, or the houses of York and Lancaster. Henry, after a useful, rather than a splendid reign, died 20th March, 1413, aged 46, and was succeeded by his son.

HENRY V. son and successor of Henry IV. was remarkable in his youth for his debauchery, and the wildness of his conduct. Better reflection, however, produced the happiest reformation, and when raised to the throne, he bid adieu to the companions of his licentious hours, and displayed the great and virtuous monarch. He formed the resolution of conquering France, and after taking Harfleur, and ravaging Normandy, he fought the celebrated battle of Agincourt, in which his 15,000 men obtained the victory over 52,000 French men. Three years after, he again visited France, and every where proved victorious, so that he was received at Paris as the future master of the kingdom. He married Catharine of France, and was declared heir to the kingdom after the death of Charles VI. the reigning monarch: but whilst these successes promised stability and security to his power, the sudden attack of a fistula, at that time considered as incurable, proved fatal. Henry died at Vincennes 31st August, 1422, aged 36, highly respected for valour, prudence, benevolence, and the regular observance of every religious and moral duty.

HENRY VI. son of Henry V. was only 10 months old when he succeeded his father on the English throne. The death of his grandfather, Charles VI., soon after left him also the title of sovereign of France; but a rival arose in the duke of Orleans to dispute his title under the name of Charles VII. Though the young king was crowned with every appearance of popularity at Paris, and though his cause was ably supported by the valour of his uncle, the duke of Bedford, yet the English affairs began to decline at the appearance of Joan of Arc. This famous heroine relieved Orleans, which the English were besieging, and inspiring courage in her countrymen, and superstitious terror in her enemies, she recovered, with astonishing rapidity, the vast territories which had cost so much English blood to acquire. The death of Bedford hastened also the downfall of the English power in France, and Henry, when come to years of manhood, did not display those powers of mind, and that decision of character so necessary in times of danger and civil war. Though his wife, Margaret of Anjou, possessed great talents, and even the valour which distinguished the heroes of those days, he was nevertheless unsuccessful in the battles between the two roses. He was taken prisoner and led about as a captive; but though he recovered his liberty by the fall of Richard duke of York, his opponent, it was only to be exposed to fresh insults. The fallen duke's son, Edward, laid claim to the crown, and had abilities and troops to support those pretensions, and after various battles he at last prevailed in the fight of St. Alban's, and was proclaimed king. Henry, who had remained a passive spectator of the ambition and of the courage of his wife, and of the slaughter of his people, was sent to the tower, where he was soon after murdered, as it is supposed by the duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III. 1471. There was such mildness and moderation in the character of the unfortunate Henry, that in private life he would have been a most amiable man.

HENRY VII. son of Edmund, earl of Richmond, and of Margaret, of the house of Lancaster, was enabled, by the assistance of the duke of Brittany, and of Charles VIII. of France, to invade England, and to defeat the usurper, Richard III. The battle of Bosworth field, and the death of Richard, 1485, left Henry in peaceful possession of the throne. He was crowned on the field of battle, and devoted himself to improve and to protect those dominions which his valour had acquired, and his prudence merited. His tranquillity, however, was disturbed by the arts of two impostors, one of whom, Lambert Simnel, son of a baker, assumed, at the instigation of the lady Margaret, sister of Edward IV. the title of Richard the duke of York, who had been murdered in the tower by the duke of Gloucester. The impostor for a while succeeded, but Henry at last obtained possession of the person of his ignoble rival, whom in derision he made a scullion in his kitchen. The other impostor was Perkin Warbeck, the son of a Jew, who personated young Edward V., and after he had for some time alarmed the kingdom, he was taken and executed at Tyburn. The reign of Henry formed a new era in the English history. The happiness of his people was the guide of his conduct, and though he loved money, it is certain that no monarch ever contributed more to the establishment of commerce, to the encouragement of industry, and to the protection of arts. He had discovered how dangerous the overgrown power of the nobles is to the monarch, and to the people, and wise laws therefore were enacted to curb their ambition, and to treat them as subjects and no longer as petty sovereigns. This great and good king died 22d April, 1509, aged 52. He had married Elizabeth, the daughter of Edward IV. and he thus united the claims of the two rival houses, which had so long deluged England in blood.

HENRY VIII. son and successor to Henry VII. ascended the throne 1509, at the age of 18. The salutary instructions which he had imbibed under his father, for a while guided the young monarch, whose reign was wise, popular, and useful. Arbitrary in his conduct, and capricious in his opinions, Henry soon, however, showed himself a tyrant. He was persuaded by the emperor Maximilian, and by pope Julius II. to make war against France, and his invasion of that kingdom was attended with success; but pleasure, and not military glory, was the ambition of the monarch, and at the persuasion of his favourite, cardinal Wolsey, he soon made peace to be enabled to dissipate in licentious enjoyments the money which he had acquired by conquest and by treaty. When the reformation was begun in Germany by the preaching of Luther, Henry, who was well skilled in school divinity, defended the papal power against the reformer, and with such effect, that the pope in flattery called him defender of the faith. His attachment to Rome soon after vanished, when the pope refused to grant him a divorce, and empower him to marry Anne Boleyn, of whom he was enamoured. Unable to prevail with the pope to separate him from his queen, with whom he had lived eighteen years, but with whom he now scrupled to cohabit because she had been his brother's wife, he declared war against the church of Rome. He not only proclaimed himself head of the church, but he abolished all the monasteries over the kingdom, and seized the ecclesiastical funds, which were lavished wantonly on his favourites and parasites. Thus married to Anne Boleyn, he soon changed his affections to another object, and conducting the ill-fated queen to a scaffold, he took for his third wife Jane Seymour, who the next year died in child-bed. His fourth wife was Anne of Cleves, whom he divorced as he found her more corpulent and less agreeable than he expected; and for his fifth he took Catherine Howard, who soon after expired on the scaffold on a charge of adultery. He afterwards married Catherine Parr, widow of lord Latimer, who survived him, and after a reign of turbulence, violence, and oppression, he expired 23th January, 1547, aged 57. Though Henry was the unworthy instrument of the introduction of the reformation into England, he must be detested in his character as a capricious, unfeeling, and licentious tyrant; of whom it was truly said, that he never spared a man in his anger, nor a woman in his lust. During his reign, Fisher, sir Thomas More, Cromwell, and other illustrious characters were sacrificed to the passions of the monarch, and no minister could ever be either so virtuous or so favoured as to escape the resentment of a changeful despotic master. Out of the dissolved monasteries Henry founded six new bishoprics, Oxford, Peterborough, Bristol, Chester, Gloucester, and Westminster, the last of which has since been incorporated with that of London.

HENRY, prince of Wales, eldest son of James I. was a most promising and amiable youth. He died 1612, aged 18, universally lamented by the nation, who viewed in him their future friend and common benefactor.

HENRY, of Huntingdon, an ancient historian, whose history of England to the year 1154, was published by Saville, 1576. He was archdeacon of Huntingdon and canon of Lincoln, in the 12th century, and wrote besides a Latin treatise on the Contempt of the World, &c.

HENRY, Philip, an English nonconformist divine, called by some of his party, "the good and the heavenly," was born at Whitehall, 1631, and educated at Westminster school, under Busby. In 1648 he was admitted a student of Christ church, and after taking his master's degree he went into Flintshire, as tutor to the sons of judge Puleston, where he was ordained according to the forms of the presbytery, and where he married the heiress of Dan. Matthews, of Broad-oak, Shropshire, and thus acquired independence and ease. At the restoration he refused to conform, and therefore was ejected. For the last twenty-eight years of his life, he resided at Broad-oak, and there behaved with great moderation, benevolence, and in an exemplary manner; but still adhered to the dissenting principles by preaching to some few in a barn.

HENRY, Matthew, an eminent dissenting divine, son of the above, was born 1662. He was carefully instructed under the watchful eye of his father, and early initiated in classical literature; but though he entered at Gray's inn, and there for some time studied the law with zeal and assiduity, he had a strong predilection for divinity, and after his return into the country began to preach. He was invited to a congregation at Chester, where he was ordained, and where he lived twenty-five years. He was afterwards prevailed upon to remove to Hackney, near London. He died of an apoplectic fit at Nantwich, 1714, and was buried in Trinity church, Chester. His great worth was ascertained by the various funeral sermons which his death occasioned. As a writer his labours are highly valued, as the author of some sermons, and other theological pieces, and practical divinity, but especially his Expositions of the Bible, in 5 vols. folio, a valuable and most excellent performance.

HENRY, Robert, a Scotch divine, born February 18, 1718, at Muir-town, St. Ninian's, where his father was a farmer. After being at the school of St. Ninian, and of Stirling, he completed his studies at Edinburgh, and became master of Annan grammar-school. In 1748 he was invited to Carlisle by the presbyterians there, and was ordained their minister, and after 12 years' residence among them, he removed to Berwick-on-Tweed, where he married the daughter of Mr. Balderston, a surgeon. In 1768 he was appointed minister of the New-Gray-friars at Edinburgh; and two years after the degree of D.D. was honourably conferred upon him by the university; and in 1776 he became colleague minister in the old church, where he continued till his death, November, 1790. Dr. Henry is author of a history of England, on a new plan, which he first conceived in 1763, but did not produce before the public till 1771. He arranges his materials under seven interesting heads, civil and military history, the history of religion, the history of the constitution and laws, the history of learning and learned men, the history of arts, that of commerce, money, &c.—and lastly, that of manners and customs. This laborious work, of which the second 4to. volume appeared in 1774, the third 1777, the fourth 1781, the fifth 1785, and the sixth, which is posthumous, 1793, has merited the public approbation by the large editions which have been printed in a 4to. and 8vo. form. The Scotch critics indeed at first censured the work, but the English regarded it with more propitious omens, and the author for 1000*l.* conveyed his property in his volumes to Messrs. Cadell and Strahan, and reflected with satisfaction that his history produced him altogether no less than 3300*l.* Dr. Henry in his private character was an amiable man, fond of society, and in his clerical conduct he was exemplary and devout.

HENRY, David, a respectable printer, born in December, 1710. He is particularly known as the conductor of the gentleman's magazine for above fifty years, in the management of which he succeeded the original proprietor, Cave, whose sister he married 1736. Besides valuable communications to his magazine, he published a System of Husbandry, 1772—an Account of the Voyages round the World, four vols. 8vo. 1774, and other smaller works. He died 5th June, 1792.

HENRY, Patrick, governor of Virginia, was born 29th May, 1736, in Hanover county of that state. His education was obtained at a common school, and he rose to distinction by the superiority of his endowments. After spending some time in agriculture and merchandize, he studied law, and soon rose to eminence in the profession, rather by his resistless eloquence than the extent of his legal knowledge. In 1765 he was elected a member of the house of burgesses, and by some resolutions he introduced in reference to the stamp act, obtained the honour of being the first in commencing the opposition to the measures of the British government, which terminated in the revolution. In 1774 he was elected a member of the continental congress, and again the following year, and distinguished himself in those bodies by his eloquence and zeal in the cause of liberty. On the retreat of lord Dunmore in 1776, he was appointed the first republican governor of Virginia, and was afterwards repeatedly re-elected to the office. In 1788 he was chosen a member of the convention of Virginia appointed to consider the constitution of the United States, and exerted himself strenuously to prevent its being accepted. In 1795 he was nominated by Washington secretary of state, and by Adams, in 1799, envoy to France, but he declined the employments. His death took place on the 6th June, 1799. Governor Henry was plain in his person, simple in his manners, and of amiable dispositions. His knowledge seems not to have been extensive either of law or politics, but the powers of his understanding and imagination were masterly, and the attractions of his eloquence irresistible.

HENRY, John, governor of Maryland, was one of the delegates from that state to congress in 1778, and for several succeeding years. In 1789 he was elected a senator of the United States. He was elected governor in 1797, and died at Easton, December, 1798.

HERACLITUS, a philosopher of Ephesus, 500 years B.C. called the mourner, from his weeping at the follies of mankind. He died aged 60.

HERACLIUS, son of Heraclius governor of Africa, dethroned Phocas, and ascended the throne of Constantinople, 610. He defeated Chosroes, the Persian king, who had laid waste Palestine, and he recovered the Cross, which he carried back to Jerusalem on his shoulders. In his reign there were severe theological disputes, and the Saracens began their hostilities against the Roman power in the east. He died 641, and was succeeded by his sons Heraclius, Constantine, and Heraclionas. Heraclius was poisoned a few months after by his mother-in-law Martina.

HERACLIUS, patriarch of Jerusalem, disgraced himself by his licentiousness and hypocrisy. He was greatly displeased with Henry II. of England, because, in consequence of his determination to do penance for Becket's murder, he did not undertake a crusade to Jerusalem.

HERALDUS, Desiderius, or HERAULT, a counsellor of the parliament of Paris, author of several learned works, among which were "Adversaria," 1599; besides notes on Tertullian's Apology, on Minutius Felix, Arnobius, Martial, &c. He died June, 1649. His son was minister of the Walloon church in London, and fled during the civil wars to France, as a royalist; at the restoration he obtained a canonry in Canterbury cathedral. He published some sermons.

HERBELOT, Bartholomew, a well-known French orientalist, born at Paris, 14th December, 1625. He applied himself assiduously to the oriental languages, especially Hebrew, and after visiting Rome and Italy for eighteen months, he settled at Paris, where he became interpreter for Eastern languages. He again went to Rome in 1666, and was received every where with uncommon respect, not only by the learned, but by the duke of Tuscany, who liberally entertained him in his palace, and presented him with some valuable oriental manuscripts. The homage paid to his abilities abroad, rendered him more respected at home. Colbert recalled him to patronise him, and he quitted Florence, to the great regret of the duke. While in Italy, he began his Bibliothèque Orientale, containing whatever related to the knowledge of the Eastern world, and he completed it in France. It was originally written in Arabic, but he translated it into French. He died 8th December, 1695, before the printing of his work was finished, which was not indeed published before 1697, in a large folio. This learned man, respectable in the possession of all the virtues of private life, wrote also a Turkish, Arabian, Persian, and Latin dictionary, &c. which have never been published. The best edition of his Bibliothèque, is in six vols. 8vo. Paris, 1782.

HERBERT, Mary, sister of Sir Philip Sidney, and countess of Pembroke, is known as the translator of Annus, a tragedy, from the French, in 12mo. 1595, and of the Psalms of David. She died at her house, Aldersgate-street, London, 25th Sept. 1621; and this epitaph was placed on her grave by the pen of Ben Jonson:

*Underneath this sable hearse
Lies the subject of all verse,
Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother,
Death! e're thou killest such another,
Fair, and good, and learned as she,
Time shall throw a dart at thee.*

HERBERT, Edward, lord Herbert of Chisbury, Shropshire, was born at Montgomery castle, in Wales, 1581. He was educated at University college, Oxford, and after travelling abroad, he was made a knight banneret, and counsellor to the king, and was afterwards sent as ambassador to Lewis XIII. of France, to interfere for the protestants of that kingdom. Though for a while disgraced, in consequence of a quarrel with De Luines, the French minister, he was restored to favour, and made an Irish peer in 1625, and a peer of England, 1631. During the civil wars he forgot the kindness of his master, and sided with the parliament. He died at his house Queen-street, London, 20th Aug. 1648, and was buried in St. Giles's church, in the fields. He wrote various books, the best known of which are, de Veritate, in which he supports the tenets of the deists, a work refuted by Gassendi—the History of the Life and Reign of Henry VIII. a performance of merit—de Religione Gentilium—memoirs, &c.

HERBERT, George, brother to the preceding, was born at Montgomery castle, 3d April, 1593, and educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was in 1619 chosen orator of the university, in which office he continued eight years, and when he was disappointed in court favours he took orders, and obtained a prebend in Lincoln cathedral, and Bemerton rectory in Wilts. He died about 1635, and left behind him an excellent character, not only as an excellent divine, but as an elegant poet. His poems, consisting of the Temple—Priest to the Temple, &c. were published together in 12mo. and though now little read, were once highly esteemed.

HERBERT, William, earl of Pembroke, was born at Wilton house, and educated at New college, Oxford, and in 1601 succeeded to his paternal titles and estates. He was in 1626 elected chancellor of Oxford, and made steward of the royal household, and he died suddenly four years after. His poems were published in Svo. 1660.

HERBERT, Thomas, a native of York, related to the Pembroke family. He was educated at Jesus college, Oxford, from which he removed to Trinity college, Cambridge, and then went abroad. After four years' absence he returned, and in 1634 published his interesting travels in Asia and Africa, in folio. During the civil wars he joined the parliament, but afterwards deserted a cause which he began to regard as violent and unconstitutional, and he was reconciled to his royal master, whom he attended in his captivity. He was at the restoration created a baronet. He died at York, 1st March, 1682. He wrote besides Threnodia Carolina, or the Historical Account of the two last Years of the Life of Charles I. Svo. Several of his MSS. are preserved at Oxford, and at York.

HERBIN, Augustus Francis Julian, an oriental scholar, was born in France in 1783. He composed an Arabic grammar, printed at Paris in 1803; also a treatise on Ancient Music, and an account of Hafiz, the Persian poet, with specimens of his works. He died in 1806.—W. B.

HERBINIUS, John, a native of Bitchsen, in Silesia, who was deputed by the protestants of Poland to those of Germany. His observations in his travels on cataracts and water-falls, were published in 1678 in 4to. called de Admirandis Mundi Cataractis, &c. He wrote also Terræ Motus Examen—de Statu Ecclesiarum Augustanæ Confessionis in Polonia, 4to. &c. He died 1676, aged 44.

HERDER, John Gottfried, a German writer, was born in Prussia in 1741. He was educated for the church; and in 1774 became first preacher to the court of Saxe Weimar, ecclesiastical counsellor, and vice president of the consistory. He died in 1803. His best works are—1. Three Fragments on the new German Literature. 2. On the Writings of Thomas Abbt. 3. On the Origin of Language. After gaining a reputation by these productions, he published "Outlines of a Philosophy of the History of Man," of which an English translation appeared in 1800. Its obscurity, however, is an antidote to its infidel tendency.—W. B.

HERERAS, Ferdinand de, a poet of Seville, who published some elegant lyric and heroic poetry, 1582. He wrote also in prose the Life of Sir Thomas More—an Account of the War in Cyprus—and the Battle of Lepanto, &c.

HERISSANT, Lewis Anthony Prosper, son of a printer, was born at Paris, and died there 10th Aug. 1709, aged 24. He was eminent as a poet, and as a physician, and wrote l'Eloge de Gonthier d'Andernach crowned by the faculty of medicine—l'Eloge de Ducange—poem on Printing—Bibliothèque physique de la France—Catalogue raisonné des Plantes.

HERITIER, Nicolas P, a French poet, nephew to du Vair keeper of the seals. He became by purchase treasurer of the French guards, and afterwards historiographer of France. He wrote two tragedies, Hercule Furieux, and Clovis, and other fugitive pieces, and died 1680.

HERITIER, Marie Jeanne P, de Villandon, daughter of the preceding, was born at Paris 1664. She was member of the academy of Jeux Floraux, and of the Ricovrati at Padua, and deserved the distinction which she received for her genius and abilities. Her works are both prose and verse. She wrote la Tour Tenebreuse, a tale—les Caprices du Destin, a novel—l'Avare Puni, in verse, and other poems, besides a translation of 16 of Ovid's epistles. She died at Paris 1734.

HERITIER DE BRUTELLE, Charles Lewis P, a native of Paris, eminent for his botanical knowledge. He published in London the Flora of Peru, from the valuable collection of plants, &c. brought from Peru and Chili by Dombey, in 1784, and on his return to Paris, he printed another work called Flore de la Place Vendome. This learned and ingenious man was assassinated on his return from the National Institute at Paris, 10th Aug. 1801, and his murderers were never discovered. He was then 56 years old. He wrote besides Stirpes Novæ, folio 1784—Cornus Sisteus, folio 1789—Sertum Anglicum, &c.

HERLICIOUS, David, a German astrologer, born 1557. He acquired celebrity and money by his almanacs, and pretended prophecies.

HERMAN, Paul, a botanist of Halle in Saxony, who was physician to the Dutch settlements at Ceylon, and afterwards became botanical professor at Leyden, where he died 1695. He wrote a catalogue of the plants in the public garden of Leyden, 8vo. —Cynosura Materiae medicæ, 2 vols. 4to. —Lugduno-Batavi Flores—Paradisus Batavus—Museum Zeylanicum, 1717.

HERMANN, James, a mathematician of Basle. He was for three years mathematical professor at Padua, and afterwards assisted the Czar Peter in the establishment of his academy, and then was appointed morality professor at Basle, where he died 1733, aged 55. He wrote several works on mathematics:—Responsio ad Considerationes de Princip. Calculi Different.—de Phoronomia—de Nova Accelerationis Lege, &c.—Disquis. de Vibratibus Chordarum tensorum—Solutio Problematis de Trajector. cuvar.

HERMANT, Godefroi, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Beauvais 1617, and patronised by the bishop of that see. He became rector of the university of Paris 1646, and died 1690. He possessed learning and application. His works are chiefly on theological subjects, besides the lives of St. Athanasius, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, &c.

HERMAS, Pastor, or shepherd, one of the fathers, supposed to have died at Rome, 81 A. D. and to be the person mentioned in the epistle to the Romans. His "Shepherd," was translated into English by archbishop Wake.

HERMES, Trismegistus, an Egyptian priest, who instructed his countrymen in hieroglyphics, &c. He flourished A. M. 2076.

HERMIAS, a heretic of Galatia in the second century. He considered the soul as formed of fire and spirit, and asserted the materiality of God, and the eternity of the world.

HERMILLY, Vaquette d', author of the history of Majorca and Minorca, and of a translation of Ferrara's history of Spain, and of father Feijo's Critical Theatre, was a native of Amiens, and died at Paris 1778, aged 71.

HERMOGENES, a rhetorician of Tarsus in the second century, whose works are edited, Geneva, 1614, 8vo.

HERMOGENES, a heretic of Africa in the second century. He was of the Stoic sect, and regarded idea as the mother of all the elements.

HEROD the Great, was born at Ascalon in Judæa, and made tetrarch or king by Anthony. He died three years after the birth of our Saviour, aged 70.

HEROD ANTIPAS, son and successor of the great Herod, repudiated his wife to marry Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, and put John the Baptist to death. It was before him that our Saviour was made to appear by Pilate.

HERODIAN, a Greek historian, A. D. 247. His History of Rome in eight books, was elegantly translated by Pohtian.

HERODOTUS, a historian of Halicarnassus, called the father of history. He wrote an account, in nine books, of the wars of Persia against Greece, till the reign of Xerxes, and received the universal applause of the Greeks at the Olympic games. He flourished 444 B. C. The best edition is Wesseling's 1763.

HEROPHILUS, a physician of Chalcedon, 570 B. C. He was an able anatomist, and is said to have discovered the lacteal vessels.

HERRERA TORDESILLAS, Antonio de, a celebrated Spanish historian. He was at first secretary to Vespasian Gonzaga, viceroy of Naples, and afterwards historiographer of India, with a pension, in which honourable office, he published his general history of India, from 1492 to 1554, in 4 vols. folio. He died 1625, aged 60; and a little before his death, he had been made by Philip IV. secretary of state. His Indian history is a most valuable performance, very accurate, though the style is now and then too inflated. He wrote also a History of Spain, three vols. folio, not equally esteemed.

HERRING, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, was born 1693, at Walsoken, Norfolk, where his father was rector. He was educated at Wisbech school, and in 1710, entered at Jesus college, Cambridge. He was elected fellow of Corpus-Christi in 1716, and became tutor there, and when in orders, minister of Great Shelford, &c. In 1722, he was made chaplain to Fleetwood, bishop of Ely, and four years after, chosen preacher at Lincoln's Inn, about which time he took his degree of D. D. and was nominated chaplain to the king. In 1731, he was made dean of Rochester, in 1737 consecrated bishop of Bangor, and in 1743, translated to York. At the breaking out of the rebellion, the archbishop exerted himself actively to rouse the people in his county and around him to a sense of their duty, and by his eloquent appeal, procured a subscription of 40,000*l.* for the defence of the country, which was immediately seconded by the kingdom. These high services were rewarded by his elevation to the see of Canterbury, on the death of Potter 1747. A violent fever in 1753, shattered his constitution so much, that he afterwards retired to the privacy of Croydon, where he saw none but his immediate friends. He died after a languishing illness of four years, 13th March, 1757, and was privately buried in Croydon church, according to his desire. Herring was as amiable in private as he was respected in public life. He liberally expended 6000*l.* in the repairs of Lambeth and Croydon palaces and gardens, and was a noble contributor to several charities. In 1763, his sermons on public occasions, were published, and a volume of his letters has been presented to the world by the Rev. Mr. Duncombe.

HERSCHEL, Sir William, an eminent astronomer, was born at Hanover, November 15th, 1738. He entered the Hanoverian regiment of guards as a musician at the age of 14, and about 1757 proceeded with a detachment of the regiment to England, where he employed himself for many years as a performer and teacher of music. About 1770, he commenced the study of Astronomy, and on March 13th, 1781, discovered the planet Georgium Sidus. He soon after received a pension from his majesty which enabled him to give up his professional engagements and devote his attention exclusively to astronomical investigations. In 1787 he completed his great telescope of forty feet, with which he discovered in 1789 the sixth and seventh satellites of Saturn. His discoveries were communicated as they arose, to the Royal Society, and form an important part in the published transactions of that body from 1782 to 1818. He died August 23d, 1822, in his 84th year.

HERSENT, Charles, or Hersan, a French divine, known by his severe satire against Richelieu, whom he accused in his book called, "Optati Galli de cavendo Schismate," of intentions of separating the Gallican church, like the English, from the see of Rome. The book was answered by three or four writers at the suggestion of the cardinal, but the writer escaped his pursuit by flying to Rome, where he drew the vengeance of the inquisition upon him, by his opinions on the doctrine of grace. He was excommunicated for contumacy, and returned to France, where he died 1660. He wrote besides a paraphrase on Solomon's Song, &c.

HERSEY, Ezekiel, physician of Hingham, Massachusetts, was graduated at Harvard college in 1728, and at his death in 1770, left a bequest to that institution, of 1000 pounds sterling for the establishment of a professorship of anatomy and surgery. His widow also presented the college the same sum for that purpose. His brother Abner Hersey, physician of Barnstable, likewise bequeathed to that institution the sum of 500*l.* towards founding a professorship of the theory and practice of physic. He also gave 500*l.*, the interest of which he directed to be expended in the gratuitous distribution of religious books in the towns on Cape Cod.

HERTZBERG, Ewald Fredericbon, a native of Pomerania, raised by his abilities to a high situation in the office of secretary of foreign affairs at Berlin, and afterwards employed as ambassador at Vienna. His knowledge of political affairs was eminently displayed in his essay on the Population of the Marche of Brandenburg, which was in 1752, rewarded with the prize of the Berlin academy of sciences, and in consequence of his experience in diplomatic affairs, and his deep acquaintance with the interests of states, every paper of importance, and every memorial of communication with foreign powers was submitted to his enlightened mind. He was thus raised to the highest offices in the kingdom, and ennobled. He died 1795, aged 70.

HERVEY, James, an eminent divine, born at Hardingstone, Northamptonshire, and educated at Northampton grammar-school, and Lincoln college, Oxford. In 1736, he served the curacy of Weston Favel for his father, and afterwards removed to Biddeford, and in 1750, succeeded on his father's death to the livings of Weston and Collingtree. In the discharge of his pastoral duties, he was zealously active and vigilant, in his conduct exemplary, and in his manners pious, humane, and charitable. His heart was so warmly actuated by benevolent motives, that he expressed a wish to die "even with the world," and therefore his income and the profits which he derived from his popular and valuable publications were carefully devoted to the comfort and support of the poor and wretched in his neighbourhood. This good and benevolent character, whose constitution was undermined by a slow consumption, died on Christmas-day 1758, aged 44. As a scholar, his abilities were respectable, he was well skilled in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and in his compositions he aimed not so much to be polished and sublime, as to be plain and useful. His Meditations among the Tombs, and Reflections in a Flower Garden, were first published in 1746, and as they were well received by the public, he added another volume, and Theron and Aspasio, or Dialogues and Letters on the most important subjects, 3 vols. 8vo. appeared 1755, a work strongly supporting the doctrines of Calvin.—He wrote besides sermons—Letters to J. Wesley—Letters to lady Frances Shirley—an edition of Jenks' Meditations, &c. His works have been edited in 7 vols. 8vo. 1796, with his life prefixed.

HERVEY, Augustus John, earl of Bristol, was early engaged in the navy, and in 1744 married Miss Chudleigh, afterwards better known as dutchess of Kingston. He was in 1747 made post captain, and served with credit in the Mediterranean. He was in 1763 groom of the royal bed-chamber, and in 1771 was made a lord of the admiralty, and three years after succeeded to his brother's title and estates. In 1768 his wife had her marriage annulled in the Commons, but the proceedings were reversed by the House of Lords 1775, and she was declared guilty of bigamy. The earl died 1779, and was succeeded by the bishop of Derry his brother.

HERWART, or HERVART, John Frederic, of Augsburg, chancellor of Bavaria, at the beginning of the 17th century, was author of some curious and extravagant publications. He wrote Chronologia Nova et Vera, two parts, 4to. 1622 and 26.—Admiranda Ethicæ Theologicæ Mysteria Propalata, de Antiquissima Veterum Nationum Superstitione, qua Lapis Magnes pro Deo habitus, colebatur, &c.

HESHUSIUS, Tillemannus, a German divine, born at Wesel, dutchy of Cleves, 1526. He taught theology in various parts of Germany, but was every where disliked, in consequence of his turbulent and restless spirit. He died 1588. He wrote Commentaries on the Psalms—on Isaiah—on St. Paul's epistles—a Treatise on Justification and the Lord's supper, &c.

HESIOD, a celebrated Greek poet of As-cra in Bœotia, wrote the Works and the Days, a poem on agriculture—Theogony, an interesting account of ancient mythology—the shield of Hercules, a fragment. He lived, according to the best account, in Homer's age, B. C. 907.

HESSE, William, prince of, was illustrious for the patronage which he extended to learning, and for the judgment and success with which he cultivated literature. He built an observatory at Cassel, and was assisted in his observations on the heavenly bodies by Juste Byrge and Christopher Rothman. He died 1597. His observations were published at Leyden, 1618.

HESSELS, John, or Hesselius, theological professor at Louvain, was born 1522. He distinguished himself at the council of Trent, by his eloquence and erudition, and by a perfect knowledge of the works of Austin and Jerome. He died of an apoplexy, 1566, and was buried in St. Peter's church, Louvain, where he was a canon. He wrote various controversial works against the protestants.

HESYCHIUS, a grammarian of Alexandria, author of a valuable Lexicon of Greek words, published 2 vols. folio, 1766.

HETZER, Lewis, a German socinian. His translation of the Bible into German, printed at Worms, in folio, 1529, was suppressed, and few copies can now be found. He died 1540.

HEVELIUS, John, or Hevelke, a celebrated astronomer, born at Dantzic, 28th Jan. 1611. As his parents were respectable in rank and fortune, he received a very liberal education, but his attention was particularly bestowed upon natural philosophy, and under the care of Crugerus, his friend and preceptor, he made a most rapid progress in mathematics. He spent four years in travelling over Holland, England, France, and Germany, and at his return home he was engaged in civil affairs, till Crugerus, who knew his abilities, prevailed upon him to devote himself fully to astronomy, as a science by which he might obtain distinction and fame. The more conveniently to pursue this study he built an observatory at the top of his house, and as he had learned to work in wood and metals, he constructed his own mathematical instruments. His observations were first directed towards the moon, and, in 1647, he published at Dantzic his Selenographia, sive Lunæ Descriptio, &c. in which he gave an accurate account of its appearance and spots, and also of the phases of the other planets. Flattered with the applause of the learned on his labours, he continued his astronomical observations, and published various tracts on the heavenly bodies. In 1668 appeared his "Cometographia," a book which he made known in England by sending a copy of it to Hooke, of the London Royal Society. This literary intercourse, however, was not productive of great service to science, but rather of abusive language, and while Hevelius asserted that distance and altitudes could be taken with plain sights nearer than a minute, Hooke denied it, and thus each defended, with unpardonable acrimony, his position, and the goodness of his particular telescope. In 1673 the first part of his "Machina Cœlestis" appeared, which, as it supported his former assertions, was attacked by Hooke with such virulence that, in 1679, Dr. Halley, at the request of the Royal Society, examined the instruments of both the disputants, and made a favourable report of both, though later experiments have given the preference to Hooke. The second part of the Machina Cœlestis was published in 1679, in which year he suffered a most irreparable loss by the destruction of his house, of his instruments, and astronomical apparatus, &c. by fire. This learned man died on his birth-day, 1687. To the reputation of a great astronomer he added the character of an upright magistrate.

as he was raised by the voice of his fellow-citizens to the office of burgomaster of Dantzic, which he discharged with fidelity and applause. Many of the letters which he received from learned men, and also from princes and potentates, were published after his death, 1682, all expressive of the high respect in which he was held in the republic of letters.

HEVIN, Prudent, an able surgeon, author of Pathologia Chirurgica, 2 vols. 8vo.—Memoir on Strange Substances in the Esophagus, &c. died at Paris, 1789, aged 74.

HEURNIUS, John, a physician, born at Utrecht, 1543. After studying in foreign universities he became medical professor at Leyden, where he died of the stone, 1601. He is said to have been the first who lectured at Leyden on human bodies. He published Hippocrates in Greek and Latin, and wrote several works, the best known of which is his treatise on the disorders of the Head. His works were published, folio, Leyden, 1658. His son Otto became eminent as a medical man.

HEUSCH, William de, a landscape painter of Utrecht, who studied under John Both, at Rome, and died at the end of the 17th century. His nephew Jacob was equally eminent, and died 1701, aged 44. Another of the same family, of the name of Abraham, was also eminent as a painter of insects, flowers, and plants.

HEUSINGER, John Michael, a Saxon divine, born at Sunderhausen, Thuringia, Sept. 1690. He studied at Gotha, Halle, and Jena, and, in 1715, he settled at Giesen, where he took pupils. In 1722 he went to Laubach, and, in 1730, was made professor at Gotha, and, in 1738, he removed to the same but more lucrative situation at Eisenach, where he married, and where he died, March, 1751. He is eminent for his piety, good temper, and sound judgment; and of his learning the best proofs are, his valuable editions of some of the classics, and various philological treatises.

HEUSINGER, James Frederic, nephew to the preceding, was born 1719, at Usingen, in Wetteravia, and educated at Gotha under his uncle. After teaching philology for some time at Jena, he removed, in 1750, to Wolfenbittel, as second master of the school there, in which he succeeded as head master, 1759. He supported the character of an able preceptor, an acute critic, and a polite scholar, and died 1778, well known by some learned observations on the Ajax and Electra of Sophocles, and other tracts.

HEWES, Joseph, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was a delegate from North Carolina to the first continental congress which convened at Philadelphia, and continued a member until his death, which took place during the session of that body, November 10th, 1779. He possessed a strong mind, and great decision of character, and devoted himself with eminent zeal and industry to the duties of his station until his health sunk under his too intense application. His private life was amiable, as his public services were honourable and useful.  L.

HEWSON, William, an able anatomist, assistant, and afterwards partner, to Dr. William Hunter. An unfortunate dispute separated these able men, and Hewson read anatomical lectures in his own house. He died 1774, aged 35. He wrote Inquiries into the Properties of the Blood, and the Lymphatic System, two vols. 8vo.—He maintained, also, for some time, a literary dispute with Dr. Abraham Monro, about the discovery of the Lymphatics in the vessels of oviparous animals.

HEXHAM, John of, an English Benedictine, whose historical works in the 12th century possess great merit.

HEY, John, a learned divine, was born in 1734, and educated at Catherine-hall, Cambridge, from whence he removed in 1758 to a fellowship in Sidney college, where he proceeded through all the degrees to that of doctor in divinity, in 1780, when he became the first professor of divinity on the Norrisian foundation, which chair he resigned in 1795. He was for many years rector of Passenham, in Northamptonshire, and of Calverton, in Buckinghamshire, but resigned both, in 1814, to settle in London, where he died in 1815. His works are, 1. Redemption, a Seatonian prize poem. 2. Lectures on Divinity, 4 vols. 8vo. 3. Seven Sermons on several Occasions, 8vo. 4. Discourses on the malevolent Sentiments, 8vo. 5. Observations on the Writings of St. Paul.—W. B.

HEYDEN, John Van der, a landscape painter, born at Gorcum, in Holland. He died 1712, aged 75. His pieces, representing buildings, &c. are much admired.

HEYLIN, Peter, a native of Burford, Oxfordshire, born 29th November, 1600. He was educated at Hart-hall, and afterwards elected fellow of Magdalen college, where he read lectures on cosmography. He published, in 1621, his Microcosmus, or description of the world, which became very popular, and procured him great celebrity. In 1629 he was made chaplain to the king, by the recommendation of Laud, and of lord Danby, and, in 1631, he was promoted to the rectory of Hemmingford, a prebend of Westminster, and the living of Houghton, Durham. In 1633 he took his degree of D.D. and, in 1687, he was made rector of Islip, Oxfordshire, which the next year he exchanged for South-Warborough, Hants; but, while he expected higher preferments, he found his hopes shattered by the violence of civil war, and he was, therefore, not only stripped of his benefices and property, but declared a delinquent by parliament. He fled from the fury of his persecutors, and concealed himself for some time at Winchester, then at Minster-Lovel, Oxfordshire, and afterwards at Abingdon, where he devoted himself to literature. At the restoration he was reinstated in all his ecclesiastical honours, but while he expected in higher dignities the reward of his faithful services in favour of royalty, he sunk under a severe disease, 8th May, 1662, and was buried in Westminster abbey. This able and indefatigable writer, whom Wood declares to have been endowed with singular gifts, of a sharp and pregnant wit, solid and clear judgment, published, besides, a history of the reformation in England—history of the Presbyterians, folio—Life of archbishop Laud, folio, &c. His description of the world, from a small 8vo. originally, was swelled, in subsequent editions, under the name of Cosmography, to a large folio.

HEYWOOD, John, an English poet and jester, born in London, and educated at Oxford. He was one of the first who wrote English plays, but the brilliancy of his wit, and the liveliness of his disposition, rendered him better known to his contemporaries than the effusions of his pen. He was particularly noticed by sir Thomas More, and by Henry VIII. and he was equally the favourite of queen Mary, whom it is said he entertained and amused even upon her death-bed. As he was a bigoted papist, he left England on the accession of Elizabeth, and retired to Mechlin, where he died, 1565. Besides his plays, he wrote 500 epigrams, the Spider and Fly, a parable, in 77 chapters, at the beginning of each of which appears the figure of the author, near a window hung with cobwebs, flies, and spiders. He had two sons, the eldest of whom was Ellis, fellow of All-Souls, Oxford, 1457, and so perfect as an Italian linguist, that he wrote a book called "Il Moro." He became a Jesuit at Louvain, where he died 1572.

HEYWOOD, Jasper, youngest son of John, was born in London, 1535, and educated at Merton-college, Oxford, of which he was fellow, and from which he was expelled for immorality, 1558. He was next fellow of All-Souls, but soon after left England, and, in 1562, became a Jesuit, at Rome. He was provincial of the Jesuits in England, and died at Naples, 1597. He wrote, besides three tragedies of Seneca translated, various poems—and the "Paradise of Dainty Devices," 1573, 4to.

HEYWOOD, Thomas, an actor and writer of plays, under Elizabeth and her two successors. Out of the 220 plays which it is said he wrote, only 24 remain, but of no great reputation. The time of his death is unknown. He was a good linguist, if we are to judge from his translations from Lucian, Erasmus, &c.

HEYWOOD, Oliver, a native of Bolton, Lancashire, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He was ejected, in 1662, from his living of Coley, Yorkshire, for non-conformity, and he afterwards continued to preach privately, for which he was excommunicated. He died 1702, aged 73. He wrote Heart's Treasure, 12mo. 1667—Closet Prayer, 12mo.—Meetness for Heaven—Life of Augier, 8vo. &c.

HEYWOOD, Eliza, a voluminous female writer, born in London. Her abilities were displayed in novel-writing, but her "Court of Arimania" and "New Utopia" do not show her in a favourable light as a moralist, and in consequence of the licentious tendency of her works, though some say from personal motives, Pope gave her a distinguished place in the Dunciad. Her other works were more in favour of virtue, and deserve commendation, especially the Female Spectator, 4 vols.—Epistle for the Ladies, 2 vols.—Betsey Thoughtless, 4 vols.—Husband and wife, &c. She attempted dramatic poetry, but without success, and her appearance on the stage was equally unfavourable. Though thus licentious in some of her writings, she has never been accused of immorality in her conduct, but she is described as modest, affable, and virtuous, and of a very lively disposition, and unusual gayety of spirits.

HEYWOOD, Nathaniel, a native of Bolton, Lancashire, deprived of his living for nonconformity in 1662. He published some sermons, and died 1677.

HIACOMES, the first Indian convert to Christianity in New-England, and minister at Martha's Vineyard, embraced the truth of the gospel under the instruction of the Rev. Thomas Mayhew, and soon learning to read, began in 1645 to preach. In 1770 he was ordained pastor of an Indian church on that island, and continued to labour with exemplary piety and encouraging success till his death about the year 1790.

HICETAS, a philosopher of Syracuse, 340 B.C. He supposed that the sun and the stars were fixed, and he gave to the earth a circular motion.

HICKES, George, an eminent English divine, born 20th June, 1642, at Newsham, Yorkshire, and educated at North Allerton school, and in 1659 admitted at St. John's college, Oxford. He afterwards removed to Magdalen college, and Magdalen hall, and in 1664 was chosen fellow of Lincoln college, where he became an able and active tutor for seven years. In 1673 he accompanied his friend and pupil, Sir George Wheeler on his travels, but left him in France, as he was obliged to return to Oxford to take his degree of B.D. At Paris he became acquainted with Henry Justell a man of consequence and information, who intrusted him with some MSS. to present to the university of Oxford. In 1676 he was made chaplain to the duke of Lauderdale, whom he accompanied the next year to Scotland, where his grace was high commissioner for the king. He was honoured, at the request of Dr. Sharp, archbishop of St. Andrew's, with the degree of D.D. from that university, which was confirmed at Oxford in Dec. 1679. After obtaining various pieces of preferment, he was made dean of Worcester 1683, and the next year the vacant bishopric of Bristol was marked for him, but the king's death prevented his elevation, as his zeal against popery was far from recommending him to the favour of the successor on the throne, James II. He afterwards accepted from the bishop of Worcester the rectory of All-church near that city, but at the revolution he was ejected from all his ecclesiastical honours, as he refused to take the oaths of allegiance. When Talbot, afterwards bishop of Oxford and of Durham, was nominated in the gazette, dean in his room, he boldly claimed his right, and affixed a paper to that purpose on the entrance into the choir of the cathedral. This step of course exposed him to the resentment of government, and therefore to avoid persecution he left the kingdom, till some years after, in 1699, the chancellor, lord Somers, out of respect for his great abilities obtained an act of council to stop all proceedings against him. After his deprivation, Hickes was sent by his fellow-sufferers to James into France, and in 1694 he was on his return, with the approbation of the exiled monarch, consecrated suffragan bishop of Thetford, by the bishops of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough. Though some have accused him of a wish to take the oaths of allegiance, to preserve his preferments, his known integrity and undaunted firmness forbid the belief of it. After being grievously afflicted with the stone, he died 15th Dec. 1715, in his 74th year. Dr. Hickes was a man of very extensive erudition, well acquainted with the fathers, and with the doctrines of the primitive church, but it is to be lamented that his great powers were engaged chiefly only in controversial pamphlets, which are forgotten as soon as read. His principal works are on the old northern languages, and their antiquities, besides some sermons and treatises, &c. amounting to 26 in number.

HICKES, John, brother to the preceding, was ejected from the living of Stoke in Devonshire 1662, for refusing to take the oaths. He joined in 1685, the duke of Monmouth's rebellion, and for this disloyal act he was seized and executed.

HICKMAN, Henry, fellow of Magdalen college, Oxford, was ejected in 1662, for nonconformity. He died about 1688, minister of the English congregation at Leyden in Holland. Besides other works he attacked Heylin's quinquarticular history, &c.

HIERO I. king of Syracuse, after Gelon his brother, B.C. 478. He is immortalized by the pen of Pindar for his victories at the Olympic games.

HIERO II. king of Syracuse, B.C. 263, was the enemy, but afterwards the friend, of the Romans.

HIEROCLES, an enemy and persecutor of the Christians in the fourth century. He not only exercised cruelty, but wrote some books against the Christians, mentioned by Lactantius and Eusebius.

HIEROCLES, a platonic philosopher of Alexandria in the 5th century, author of seven books on Providence, &c.

HIFFERMAN, Paul, an author, born in the county of Dublin 1719, and educated for a popish priest at Dublin and in France. He however preferred the study of physic, and for some time practised in Dublin, but his indolence was such that he relinquished the profession for the laborious life of an author, and came to London 1753. He recommended himself by some of his pieces to the learned and witty of the times, and by the effusions of his pen and the contributions of his friends, he contrived to live. Though acquainted with Foote, Garrick, Goldsmith, Murphy, Bickerstaff, and others, he yet seldom appeared decently respectable. His resources indeed were not always very honourable, and so great were his eccentricities, that he never would mention where his lodgings were. He died June, 1777, and it was then discovered that he lodged in one of the obscure courts near St. Martin's lane. Dr. Hifferman, as he was called, wrote the "Ticklers," a set of political papers in Dublin 1750—"the Tuner," another political paper, London 1753—Miscellanies in prose and verse—the earl of Warwick, a tragedy from La Harpe—and other trifles neither elegant nor popular.

HIGDEN, Ralph, an early English chronicler, who died 1363. He is author of Radulphi Higdeni Polychronici Libri VIII. &c. the best edition of which is that of 1642. It extends from Adam to 1357, and though only the last is original, the whole is respectably written and often quoted.

HIGGINS, or HIGINS, John, an English divine educated at Oxford, and engaged in the instruction of youth at Wimsam and Ilminster in Somersetshire. He published "Flosculi of Terence"—Holcot's dictionary—and other school-books, besides controversial tracts concerning Christ's descent into Hell, and an edition in 1587, of the Mirror for Magistrates. He died it is supposed after 1604.

HIGGONS, Sir Thomas, an English writer, born at Westburgh, Shropshire, where his father was rector, and admitted at St. Alban's hall, Oxford, where however he took no degree. He married the much defamed widow of Robert earl of Essex, at whose funeral he pronounced an oration 1656, afterwards published. He next married the sister of John Greenvill earl of Bath, and in 1658 and 1661 was member for Malmsbury and Windsor, and such were his services to the crown considered, that he received a pension of 500*l.* a year, besides handsome presents and the honour of knighthood. In 1669 he was sent as envoy to invest the duke of Saxony with the order of the garter, and four years after he was ambassador to Vienna where he remained three years. He died of an apoplexy in the court of King's Bench, where he was summoned as a witness, 24th Nov. 1691, and was buried in Winchester cathedral near his first wife. He wrote a panegyric to the king 1660—the History of Isoof Bassa 1684—the Venetian triumph translated into English, besides his oration on his wife, which did as much honour to his sensibility, his affection, and the goodness of his heart, as it rescued from infamy, the character of an injured and innocent wife. That oration was seen and highly approved by Mr. Granger.

HIGGONS, Bevil, younger son of the preceding by his second wife, entered 1686 at the age of 16 at St. John's college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Cambridge, and then to the Middle Temple. He wrote the Generous Conqueror, or the Timely Discovery, a tragedy, acted at Drury-lane, and published 1702—a poem on the Peace of Utrecht.—Remarks on Burnet's History of his own Times—a View of English History, with reflections political, &c. to the revolution of 1688. He was a firm adherent to the house of Stuart, and he accompanied James II. in his exile, and died in France 1735.

HIGHMORE, Joseph, an eminent painter, born 13th June, 1692 in the parish of St. James, Garlick-hithe, London. He early showed a strong inclination for painting, but his father bound him as clerk to an attorney, and for a while he was withdrawn from his favourite pursuits. Nature however prevailed over parental authority, and young Highmore, guided by his own genius and instructed by such rules as he found in books, gradually distinguished himself, and became a professed artist in 1715 at the expiration of his clerkship. In 1716 he married the daughter of Mr. Hiller, and as his reputation increased, he removed from the city in 1724 to a house in Lincoln's inn fields. His engagements now grew upon him; he was employed in drawing the knights of the Bath, on the revival of the order, and afterwards he painted the portrait of the duke of Cumberland, and some time after of the prince and princess of Wales, and of the chief nobility. In 1732 he visited Holland, and examined the valuable picture gallery of Dusseldorff, and in 1734 he made another excursion to Paris, where he saw, by the favour of cardinal de Polignac, the famous groupe of the court of Lycopedes, which was afterwards destroyed by the Russians at Charlottenburgh in Prussia. In 1744 he painted a set of paintings on the history of Pamela, just published, and thus became acquainted with the excellent author Samuel Richardson. In 1753, at the institution of the academy of painting, he was appointed one of the professors, and he deserved the honour not only as an artist, but as an elegant writer. He published "an Examination of Reubens' two paintings in the banqueting house," in 4to—Practice of Perspective on the principles of Dr. Brook Taylor, &c. 1763,—essays moral, religious, &c. with a translation of Browne's Latin poem on the immortality of the soul, 1766, 12mo—Observations on Dodwell's Christianity not founded on argument, &c. His paintings during a practice of 46 years are numerous, the best known of which are Hagar and Ishmael, now in the Foundling Hospital, the good Samaritan, the finding of Moses, the Harlowe family from Clarissa, the Graces unveiling Nature, on memory from Reubens, &c. On the marriage of his daughter in 1761 to Mr. Duncombe he retired from business, and after selling his collection of pictures, he went to settle with his son-in-law at Canterbury. Here he spent his life in ease and literary employments, and often contributed to the Gentleman's Magazine. An even temper, and a most benevolent disposition lent their aid to support a constitution naturally strong and vigorous, and he lived to his 88th year. He decayed gradually, and as if falling asleep gently expired 3d March, 1780. He was buried in the south aisle of Canterbury cathedral. Besides his daughter, he had one only son, Antony, of his own profession.

HIGHMORE, Nathanael, an eminent anatomist, born at Fording-bridge, Hants. He is the first Englishman who wrote a systematical treatise on the structure of the human body, and he was indefatigable in the pursuit and improvement of anatomical science. He died 21st March, 1684, aged 71. His works are "Corporis Humani Disquisitio Anatomica," folio, 1651—the History of Generation—de Passione Hysterica, 8vo. 1660.

HILARION, a native of Gaza, who after seeing the anchorite of St. Anthony in Egypt, laid the foundation of a similar order of monastic life in Palestine. He died in Cyprus 371, aged 80.

HILARIUS, a Romish saint, bishop of Arles. He died 449, aged 48. He wrote Homilies—the life of St. Honoratus, his predecessor in the see of Arles, and other smaller works.

HILARIUSE, Joseph, a native of Enzesfeld, educated among the Jesuits, and made teacher of grammar and rhetoric at Vienna, where he was appointed præfectus rei numariæ. He renounced the order of the Jesuits 1770, and became director of the imperial cabinet of medals, &c. and dean of philosophy. As a medalist and antiquarian he was particularly eminent. He died 1798, aged 61.

HILARY, St. a native of Poitiers in France, who was late in life converted to Christianity, and was in 355 made bishop of his native town. He ably defended Athanasius at the council of Beziers against Saturninus, and for his zeal was banished by the emperor Constantius into Phrygia. He died 367. His works have been edited Paris, 1693.

HILDEBERT, bishop of Mans, and then archbishop of Tours, was born at Lavardin. Though according to Bayle, he is accused by Yvo, bishop of Chartres, with licentiousness and intemperance before he was admitted into the church, yet he became one of its brightest ornaments for piety, learning, and holiness. He was very severe against the vices and the corruptions of the court of Rome, in a letter which he published in lively, elegant, and animated language. He also wrote a Description of Rome in Latin verse. He died before the middle of the 12th century.

HILDESLEY, Mark, an English bishop, born at Marston, Kent, 1699, and educated at the Charter house, London, and Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, 1723. In 1731 he obtained the college living of Hitchin, and four years after that of Holwell in Bedfordshire, where he zealously devoted himself to the spiritual care and instruction of his parishioners. On the death of that amiable prelate Dr. Wilson, bishop of Sodor and Man, the duke of Athol fixed upon Hildesley as a successor, and for piety, goodness, and exemplary morals, a better choice could not be made. The new prelate took leave of his Hitchin congregation with affectionate tenderness, and when he revisited them afterwards with friendly humility, he was greeted with respect and homage by crowded multitudes. In his diocese he was enabled to see the completion of his worthy predecessor's translation of the Bible into the Manx language, in 1755. He died of a paralytic stroke, Dec. 7th, 1772, and was buried near bishop Wilson.

HILL, Joseph, an English divine, born at Leeds, 1624, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and Magdalen, of which he became a fellow. As he was strongly attached to the doctrines of the puritans, he was ejected at the restoration for non-conformity, and went over to Holland. He was in 1667 pastor of the English church at Middleburg, and at last settled at Rotterdam, where he died 1707. He is chiefly known for his edition of Scævillus's Greek Lexicon improved with 8000 new words, 1676. He wrote also dissertations on the antiquity of temples and churches.

HILL, William, an English scholar, fellow of Merton college, Oxford, and afterwards master of a school in Dublin, where he died 1667. He prepared an edition of Dionysius Periegetis, with learned and critical annotations, which was published 1688, in London.

HILL, Aaron, a poet, born 10th Feb. 1685, in Beaufort buildings, London, of a respectable Wiltshire family. He was educated at Westminster school, but the ruin of his father by mismanagement, left him in 1669 in distressful circumstances, but the next year he determined to go to Constantinople, to see his relation lord Paget the English ambassador there. The visit was not unwelcome to lord Paget; by his friendship young Hill was enabled to travel over Egypt and part of the east, and on his return to England with him he was presented to many of the courts on the continent. Some time after he accompanied Sir William Wentworth in the tour of Europe, and was absent for 3 years. On his return he claimed the public notice by the publication of his "Camillus," a poem on lord Peterborough the general in Spain; and about that time, 1709, being made manager of Drury-lane theatre, he wrote his first tragedy, "Elfrid, or the Fair Inconstant," finished at the request of Booth in little more than a week. In 1710 he was master of the Opera house, Hay-market, and wrote the opera of "Rinaldo," the first piece set to music by Handel in England. A quarrel, however, with the lord chamberlain, put a speedy end to his theatrical career, and in 1715, as appears from his letter preserved in the Harleian MSS. he undertook to extract from the beech nut, an oil as sweet as that of olives; but though he obtained a patent, and promised an annual million to the nation, his prospects vanished, and his hopes were disappointed. He therefore again wrote for the stage "the Fatal Vision, or the Fall of Siam," and in 1718 published "the Northern Star" a poem on the Czar Peter, which was some time after handsomely rewarded with a gold medal from the empress Catharine. In 1728 he engaged in a contract to supply the navy with timber from Scotland, but his schemes, like the former, proved abortive, and after travelling into the north of Scotland, he retired to York, where he published "the Progress of Wit," against Pope's Dunciad. In 1731 he had the misfortune to lose his wife, after a happy union of 20 years, and the birth of nine children. He survived her till 1750, and expired 8th Feb. in the very minute, it is said, of the earthquake, and was interred in Westminster abbey by the side of his beloved wife. Four volumes of his poems have appeared since his death, in which is Merope, a tragedy borrowed from Voltaire, and introduced at Drury-lane, by Garrick. Though possessed of good natural talents, he never rose to great celebrity as a writer. His thoughts were always expressed with affectation, and by attempting too much, he never effected any thing with complete success. He is now known as a writer cotemporary with Pope, but his poetical effusions have sunk into oblivion.

HILL, Sir John, an indefatigable English writer, born 1716, son of a clergyman at Spalding or Peterborough. He was bred an apothecary, and for some time practised in St. Martins' lane, Westminster, but an early marriage accompanied with no fortune obliged him to apply to other resources besides the medical profession. As he knew something of botany, he turned his thoughts to that science, but though patronised by the duke of Richmond and lord Petre, he found the success of his project inadequate to his expectations, and indeed to his indefatigable exertions. He next applied to the stage, but after some exhibitions at the Hay-market and Covent-garden, he was convinced that nature had not formed him for a theatrical hero. By the friendship of Folkes, and Baker, respectable members of the Royal Society, he was introduced to the notice of literary men, and in 1746 he published by subscription a translation of Theophrastus's treatise "on gems," which increased his fame, his friends, and his resources. Flushed with his literary labours, he began to compile a general natural history in 3 vols. folio, and next undertook with G. L. Scott, a supplement to Chambers's Dictionary. Besides these, his attention was engaged in the publication of the "British Magazine," and of "the Inspector," a periodical pamphlet, which he rendered palatable to the public by the little anecdotes, the private scandal, and the public intrigues, with which his attendance at different places of general amusement made him acquainted. Success now rendered him vain, and with the diploma degree of M.D. from the university of St. Andrews, he assumed the character, the language, the dress, and the equipage of a man of fashion. As his publications were numerous, he acquired a large and regular income, but the freedom with which he treated public and private characters often exposed him to personal violence, so that in one instance he was caned at Ranelagh by an Irish gentleman who considered himself as ridiculed by him. Thus by degrees he exposed himself to the contempt of the world, and by a paper war with Woodward, with Fielding, and others, he rendered himself obnoxious to the malevolence of all, and sunk in the general estimation. From a writer he became an empiric, and by the preparation of the essence of water-dock; of tincture of valerian; of the pectoral balsam of honey, and other simple medicines, he again procured a comfortable income. The patronage of the earl of Bute also was extended to him, and with his approbation he undertook that pompous and voluminous work, called "a System of Botany," and by presenting a copy of it and of some of his other works to the king of Sweden, he was in return invested with one of the orders of knighthood, and assumed the title of Sir John. This extraordinary character died Nov. 1775, of the gout in his stomach. He possessed great natural talents, but the rapidity with which he wrote, and the wish of obtaining popularity, prevented that elegant polish, and highly finished diction, which entitle the labours of genius and perseverance to more than temporary fame. It is said, though scarcely credible, that from the variety of subjects which his prolific pen treated, he gained an income of 1500*l.* a year, an enormous sum for compositions which were mostly compilations, and depended chiefly on the fashions, the prejudices, or the frailties of the times. His novels, as filled with personal abuse on the well-known characters of those times, possess little merit; his three dramatic pieces, Orpheus, the Critical Minute, and the Route, rise not above mediocrity, but his "Essays," and some of his philosophical treatises, are entitled to greater praise. By his dispute with Garrick he drew upon himself the severe reflections of that keen satirist, and of other poets. In an epigram Garrick says of him,

*For physic and farces his equal there scarce is,
His farces are physic, his physic a farce is.*

HILL, Robert, an extraordinary character, born 11th Jan. 1699, at Miswell near Tring, Herts, by profession a tailor and stay-maker. In the midst of his obscurity and poverty, he aspired after fame, and by great labour and perseverance, he made himself a perfect master of several languages by books only. He became known to the public by means of Mr. Spence, who in 1757, published a comparison between him and Magliabecchi, and endeavoured to raise a subscription in his favour. He was seven years in acquiring a knowledge of Latin, and 14 in learning Greek, but he made himself master of Hebrew in a little time. He wrote Remarks on Berkeley's Essay on Spirit—the Character of a Jew—a Criticism on Job. He died after a confinement of 18 months to his bed, July, 1777, at Buckingham.

HILL, Thomas Ford, an English antiquary and philologist, who died 1795.

HILL, George, a learned divine of the church of Scotland, was born at St. Andrews, in 1748. He was educated at the university of his native place, where he first obtained the Greek professorship in the college of St. Salvador, and afterwards that of divinity. He next became principal of St. Mary's-college, chaplain to the king for Scotland, and fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. Dr. Hill died in 1820. He published—1. A volume of Sermons. 2. Theological Institutes, 8vo. 3. Lectures upon the Old Testament, 8vo. —W. B.

HILLEL, the elder, a Jewish doctor of the Mischna, born about 30 years B.C. He was president of the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem, an office which remained in his family for six generations. He defended the oral traditions of the Jews, and reduced them into six treatises.

HILLEL, the prince, great-grandson of Judas Hakkadosh, was one of the writers of the Gemara. He flourished in the middle of the fourth century.

HILLIARD, Nicholas, a native of Exeter, goldsmith, carver, and portrait painter to queen Elizabeth. He drew the queen's whole length sitting on her throne, and acquired also much celebrity by a highly finished portrait, in water colours, of Mary queen of Scots, in her 18th year. His pieces were so much admired, that Donne said in his "Storm," a hand, an eye, by Hilliard drawn, is worth a history. He died 1619, aged 72.

HIMERIUS, a Greek grammarian, born at Prusias in Bithynia, in the age of Constantius and Julian. He kept a school at Athens, and was a violent opponent of the Christians.

HINCKLEY, John, a native of Warwickshire, educated at St. Alban's-hall, Oxford, where he took the degree of D.D. 1679. He was vicar of Coleshill, Berks, and rector of Drayton, Leicestershire, by the patronage of his friends the Purefoy family, and afterwards became rector of Northfield, Worcestershire. He died April 13th, 1691. He published some assize sermons, preached at Reading and Abingdon—a Persuasive to Conformity, in a Letter to his Dissenting Brethren—Fasciculus Litterarum, or Letters on several Occasions, 8vo. 1680, &c.

HINCMAR or HINCMARUS, archbishop of Rheims, 685, was a zealous supporter of the Gallican church, but too severe against a monk called Godescalcus. He was driven from his bishopric by the incursions of the Normans, and died at Epernay, 882. His works were published 1645, by Sirmont, in 2 vols. He wrote on theology and history with great spirit, though in barbarous language.

HIPPARCHIA, a woman who lived for some time with Alexander the Great, and afterwards married the stoic Crates. She was eminent as a philosopher, and wrote some treatises.

HIPPARCHUS, son of Pisistratus, was slain by Harmodius and Aristogiton, B.C. 528; and the tyranny of his family was soon after abolished at Athens by the banishment of his brother Hippias.

HIPPARCHUS, an astronomer of Nicæa in Bithynia, celebrated for the catalogue of stars which he made, preserved in Ptolemy's Almagest. He died about 125 B.C.

HIPPOCRATES, a native of Cos, celebrated for his knowledge of medicine, of which he is properly called the father. He died about 361 B.C. His works have been edited Vienna, 2 vols. folio, 1740. The modern inhabitants of Cos show still with pride the spot where he once resided.

HIPPONAX, a Greek satirist, known particularly for the severity of the lampoon with which he lashed two brothers, sculptors, who had ridiculed his deformities, and with such effect, that they hanged themselves. He flourished 540 B.C.

HIRAM, king of Tyre in the reign of David and Solomon. As he was at peace with the Jewish nation, he supplied Solomon with timber, gold, and other ornaments, which he wanted for the completion of the temple. He died 1000 B.C. in the 60th year of his reign. It is said that the letters which passed between him and Solomon are extant.—The architect who superintended the building of Solomon's temple at the request of the Tyrian king, was also of the name of Hiram, and a native of Tyre.

HIRE, Laurence de la, a French painter, born at Paris, 1606. His landscapes were much admired, though he was deficient in the rules of perspective. He died 1656.

HIRE, Philip de la, a painter, son of the preceding, born at Paris, 1677. He imitated the manner of Watteau, and was admired for his landscapes and portraits. He died 1719.

HIRE, Philip de la, a celebrated French mathematician, born at Paris, 18th March, 1640. His father, Laurence, who as mentioned was a painter, educated him in the principles of his art, but his deep application to mathematics and geometry marked him early for astronomical fame. After his father's death, he resided four years in Italy for the benefit of his health, and soon after his return to Paris he was elected member of the academy of sciences 1678. He was employed with Picard and Cassini, under the liberal patronage of Colbert, to make observations for the improvement of the map of France; and for this important purpose he visited with the eye of a philosopher, Bretagne, Guienne, Calais, Dunkirk, and Provence, in 1679, and the three following years. He was after Colbert's death engaged in taking levels for the grand aqueducts projected by the munificence of Lewis XIV. but besides these public employments, and the labours which devolved upon him as professor of the royal college, and of the academy of architecture, he devoted himself to other scientific pursuits. While the day was employed in study, the night was frequently passed in astronomical observations, and painting occasionally amused a vacant hour. This great and good man died April 21st, 1718, aged 78. He was twice married, and was father of eight children. Fontenelle wrote an eulogium upon him. His works are numerous, the most valuable of which are Nouvelle Methode en Geometrie, &c. 4to.—De la Cycloide, 12mo.—Nouveaux Elements des Sections Coniques, &c.—La Gnomonique, 12mo.—Sectiones Conicæ, in IX. libros, &c. folio, a most valuable work—Tabulæ Astronomiæ, 4to.—Vetereum Mathematicorum Opera, Gr. and Lat. folio, 1693. Besides several pieces in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences.

HISCAM, or HISJAM, 15th caliph of the Omniades, and fourth son of Abdalmelech succeeded his brother Jezid II. 723. He conquered Khacam of Turkestan, and made war against Leo the Isaurian. He was always attended with 600 camels to carry his splendid wardrobe. He died 743.

HOADLY, Benjamin, a learned prelate, born Nov. 14th, 1676, at Westerham in Kent. His father was for some time master of Norwich grammar-school. Young Hoadly entered at Catherinc-hall, Cambridge, 1692, and became afterwards a fellow of the society. In 1706, he began his literary career by an attack on Atterbury's sermon at Mr. Bennet's funeral, and two years after he attacked another sermon of the same author, on the Power of Charity to cover Sin. His "Measures of Obedience," on the doctrine of non-resistance, so pleased the Commons in 1709, that they petitioned the queen to reward his services in the cause of civil and religious liberty, by some honorary preferment. He was, however, neglected, though made rector of Streatham, Surrey, by Mrs. Howland, till the reign of George I. when he was, in 1715, raised to the see of Bangor. Party disputes, however, and the fear of his personal enemies, detained him in the metropolis, so that he never visited his bishopric. At this time his sermon on the words, "my kingdom is not of this world," produced a violent dispute for many years, known by the name of the Bangorian controversy, which, though at first it attacked the temporal power only of the clergy, soon extended to the rights of princes. In this controversy he had for opponents, Dr. Snape, and the still more formidable William Law, who in some points triumphed in the general opinion over him. He afterwards opposed Hare on the nature of prayer, and asserted that a calm, dispassionate, and rational address was the most acceptable to heaven, while his opponent recommended a warm, enthusiastic zeal. From Bangor he was translated to Hereford, and afterwards to Salisbury, and lastly to Winchester, where he continued 26 years. He died 17th April, 1761, aged 85, and was buried in Winchester cathedral, where a neat monument, with a Latin inscription, drawn by himself, records the events of his life. He was twice married, and by his first wife had two sons, Benjamin and John, the last of whom survived him. As a writer he possessed great abilities; he was a keen disputant, but his style was inelegant, and his periods, as Pope observes, "were of a mile." In his religious opinions he was a great latitudinarian, so that it has been wondered on what principles he continued through life to profess conformity, as on several occasions he seemed far from strictly adhering to the tenets of the Anglican church, and regarded reason more as the guide of the Christian than the pure precepts of the gospel. His writings, which are numerous, are enumerated in the Biographia Britannica, on the authority of his son. They have appeared in 4 vols. folio. Aken-side, among other poets, has paid a handsome tribute to his memory.

HOADLY, John, D.D. a prelate of Ireland, was a younger brother of the bishop of Winchester, and born near London, 1678. He was chaplain to Bishop Burnet, and received some valuable preferments in the church from him, and from the lord chancellor, King. In 1727 he was made bishop of Leighlin and Fernes in Ireland; in 1730 he became archbishop of Dublin, and in 1742, archbishop of Armagh, primate and metropolitan. He died in 1746. He published some sermons and controversial tracts.  L.

HOADLY, Benjamin, M.D. eldest son of the bishop Winchester, was born 10th Feb. 1705-6, in Broad-street, and educated at Newcome's school, Hackney. He entered at Benet-college, Cambridge, 1722, under Herring, afterwards primate. He studied mathematics under the blind professor Saunderson, and then took his degree in medicine. When the king visited Cambridge in 1728, Hoadly's name was on the list of those who were to be presented to the degree of M.D. but it is supposed that he was omitted by the illiberality of Dr. Snape, who hated his father, and he was admitted about a month after by mandamus. He was made register of Hereford by his father, and appointed physician to the king's household in 1742, and to the prince of Wales, 1746. He died 10th Aug. 1757, at Chelsea. He was twice married, but his only child, by his first wife, died an infant. He distinguished himself as the author of three letters on the Organs of Respiration, read at the college of physicians, 1740—Oratio Anniversaria, &c. 1742—Observations on Electrical Experiments, 1756, 4to. and the Suspicious Husband, a comedy of great merit and popularity.

HOADLY, John, LL.D. youngest son of bishop Hoadly, was born in Broad-street, 8th Oct. 1711, and educated at Hackney-school, where he acted with great applause Phocyas in the Siege of Damascus. He entered in 1730 at Corpus Christi, Cambridge, and soon after at the Temple, but he abandoned the profession of the law, and took the degree of LL.B. in 1735, and the same year was appointed chancellor of Winchester by his father, and admitted into orders. He was then made chaplain to the prince of Wales' household, and held the same office with the princess dowager, 1751. Preferments crowded afterwards thick upon him, the most valuable of which were a prebend of Winchester, the rectory of St. Mary, near Southampton 1743, that of Overton 1746, and the mastership of St. Cross in 1760. He received the degree of doctor from Lambeth, and it was the first honour of that nature conferred by Herring the primate. He died 16th May, 1776, and with him the name of Hoadly became extinct. He wrote five dramas, the Contract, a comedy—Love's Revenge and Phœbe, two pastorals—Jeptha, and the farce of Truth, two oratorios,—besides some other dramatic works, left in MSS. among which was a tragedy on lord Cromwell. He also wrote some poems, preserved in Dodsley's collection, and at all times showed himself so fond of a theatrical life, that he seldom had any friends in his house, whom he did not solicit to undertake a character in some interlude at his own private theatre. He published also his father's works in 3 vols. folio.

HOAR, Leonard, M.D. president of Harvard college, Massachusetts, was graduated at that seminary in 1650, and three years after obtained the degree of doctor of medicine at Cambridge, England; but devoting himself to the ministry, he was settled at Wensted, from which in 1662 he was ejected for nonconformity. In 1672, he returned to New-England, and was elected president of Harvard college, and continued in the office till 1675, when he resigned. His death took place the same year. He was respectable in learning, and exemplary in piety, but had not the talents for government which his station in the college required.

HOBART, Noah, minister of Fairfield, Connecticut, was graduated at Harvard college in 1724, and ten years after was ordained at Fairfield, where he remained till his death in 1773. He possessed a mind of great acuteness, and distinguished himself among his cotemporaries by the extent of his learning, and by several able publications in defence of the doctrines and rites of the congregational churches, in controversy with writers in favour of episcopacy.

HOBART, John Sloss, judge of the district court of New-York, and estimable for talents and integrity, died on the 4th February, 1805. After having held several important stations in that state during the war of the revolution, he was at its close appointed a judge of the supreme court, and in 1798, elected a senator of the United States.

HOBBS, Thomas, an eminent philosopher, born 5th April, 1588, at Malmesbury, Wilts, where his father was minister. He entered at Magdalen hall, Oxford, in 1603, and five years after he went to reside in the family of the earl of Devonshire as tutor to his son, with whom he made the tour of Europe. By the friendship and kindness of this illustrious family, he was introduced to persons of rank and literary fame, he was noticed by the great lord Bacon, by lord Herbert of Cherbury; and Ben Jonson, with fond partiality, revised his translation of Thucydides, which he published to warn his countrymen against the dangers of civil dissensions. In 1626 he lost his patron the earl of Devonshire, and two years after his pupil, and so severely did he feel the affliction, that to disperse his grief, he travelled with sir G. Clifton's son over the continent. His abilities and his character were so well known that lady Devonshire insisted on his superintending the education of the young earl, and in the confidence of this illustrious family, he visited again the continent with his pupil, and at Paris was introduced to the society of Mersenne, and other learned men, and at Pisa he had frequent intercourse with the celebrated Galileo. On his return to England, he published his book called de Cive, and he afterwards made his political and moral opinions public in his Leviathan, but the tumults of civil war were too violent for him, so that he retired to Paris, to live in the society of the learned. His intimacy with Des Cartes was interrupted by a controversial dispute, but Gassendi remained his friend to the latest period of life. In his controversy with Cavendish about the quadrature of the circle, Hobbes showed such abilities that he was recommended to instruct the prince of Wales, afterwards the second Charles, in mathematical knowledge, and so zealous and so important were his services considered, that at the restoration the monarch treated his preceptor with marked respect. The public opinion, however, soon after represented Hobbes as a dangerous man; and when the House of Commons censured his treatise de Cive, and his Leviathan, as intended to subvert religion and civil government, Charles reluctantly withdrew his patronage from him. In his old age he was visited not only by men of eminence and dignity in foreign countries, but by princes and ambassadors, who were anxious to pay respect to a man whose writings and opinions were so celebrated in Europe. He was attacked by a suppression of urine in November, 1679, while at Chatsworth, the seat of his patron the earl of Devonshire, and soon after a stroke of the palsy came to increase his sufferings, under which he sunk the 4th of December following, aged 92. In his character Hobbes exhibited the profound reasoner, the erudite philosopher, and the refined writer. His abilities were of a superior order, and therefore it is to be lamented that such powers of mind should be directed to unworthy purposes. While in the family of the earl of Devonshire, where he lived the best part of his life, as in his own house, he frequently attended the chapel, and received the sacrament, yet he occasionally turned his back upon the preacher, observing that he could teach him nothing but what he knew before. That presumption which trusts to itself, without the assistance of a superintending Providence, is not only irreligious, but dangerous to society; and while Hobbes affected at one time to respect the institutions of his country, he would at another disregard as futile and incongruous those laws which bind man to man as dependent on the will of an overruling Providence. His purpose was to strike at the root of all religion, natural and revealed, and while he pretended to represent the Scriptures as derived from mere human tradition, he endeavoured to destroy God's moral government of the world, and to reduce man to the degraded state of animal nature, which views a rival and a foe in every face, and elevates force and cunning into the room of benevolence, and the mildest and most humane virtues of the heart. The principles of Hobbes were confuted by many able and learned opponents, especially by Harrington, Tenison, Filmer, Parker, Henry Moore, Cumberland, Cudworth, and others. His other works were, a treatise on Human Nature—de Corpore Politico, or the Elements of Law—de Mirabilibus Peccis, or the Wonders of the Peak, a poem—Homer translated into English verse—Letter on Liberty and Necessity—Elements of Philosophy—six Lessons to the Professors of Mathematics—Marks of absurd Geometry, &c.—One of his maxims was, that bad means might be applied to procure a good end; for, says he, if I were cast into a deep pit, and the devil should put down his cloven foot, I would readily lay hold of it to get out. In spite of all his philosophy, it is said, that he was childishly afraid of apparitions, and that he would never remain alone in a house if he possibly could prevent it.

HOBBERMA, Minderhout, a painter born at Antwerp 1611. He studied nature, and his landscapes had peculiar beauty and grace. They are now very scarce.

HOCHE, Lazarus, a native of Versailles, son of a hostler, made upon the early death of his father, a chorister in the church of St. Germain-en-laye, by the kindness of the rector. He was afterwards a helper in the royal stables, and at the age of 16 he enlisted in the army, and became a corporal. The revolution came to raise him from obscurity; he was by courage and coolness distinguished in several engagements, and soon rose to the highest rank in the army. Though imprisoned for some time under the tyranny of Robespierre, he was restored to liberty, and passed a glorious campaign against the Austrians in Alsace, and afterwards went to La Vendée, and to Quiberon, where he behaved with great cruelty towards the emigrants, and put to death the heroic Charette. He was intrusted with the command of the troops which were to invade Ireland at the end of 1795, but the expedition failed, after attempting to land in Bantry bay, and Hoche, though for a while regarded with coolness, was sent to the armies of the Sambre and Meuse. In this new scene he displayed great bravery and address against the Austrians on the Rhine, but died suddenly at Wetzlar in 1797, aged 30, in consequence of a cold caught in the midst of his military exertions. His life has been published by Rousselin, 2 vols. 8vo.

HOCHESTETTER, Andrew Adam, a protestant divine, born at Tubingen 1668, where he became professor of eloquence, philosophy, and divinity, and at last rector of the university. He died there, April 1717. His chief works are, Collegium Puffendorfanum,—de Festo Expiationis et Mirco Azazel,—de Conradino, ultimo ex Suevis duce, de Rebus Elbigensibus.

HODGES, Nathaniel, an English physician, son of the dean of Hereford. He was educated at Westminster school, and entered as student at Christ church 1643. In 1659 he took the degree of M.D. and settled in London, where he remained during the prevalence of the plague, and thus acquired an extensive practice and a great reputation. Misfortunes, however, succeeded prosperity, and he was thrown for debt into Ludgate prison, where he died 1684. He was buried in St. Stephen's church, Walbrook. He wrote Vindiciæ Medicinæ et Medicorum, 1660,—Loimologia, or a Latin account of the plague of London 1665, printed 1672, and translated into English by Dr. John Quincy, 1720. This account is considered as very valuable from the diligence and accuracy of the author.

HODY, Humphrey, an English divine, born 1st January, 1659, at Odcombe, Somersetshire, where his father was rector. He entered at Wadham college, Oxford, 1676, of which he became fellow eight years after. At the age of twenty-one he published his Dissertation against Aristæus' History of the seventy-two Interpreters, which was received with general applause by the learned world, though Vossius alone, who had embraced a different opinion, loaded it with abuse, and ridiculed the author, contemptuously calling him Juvenis Oxoniensis. To this attack from Vossius, inserted in an appendix to his Pomponius Mela, Hody did not deign to give an answer till more than 20 years after. In 1704, therefore, he published his book, "de Bibliorum Textibus Originalibus," &c. in which he refuted the objections of Vossius, and proves that the Septuagint was translated not by order of the Ptolemies, though in their reign, but by the Hellenist Jews, for the use of their countrymen. In 1689 he published his Prolegomena to Malcla's Chronicon, and the next year he was made chaplain to bishop Stillingfleet. In consequence of the deprivation of the bishop for refusing allegiance to king William, he was engaged in a controversy with his friend Dodwell. The spirit and abilities which he displayed in this war of pamphlets, so pleased Tillotson, that he made him his domestic chaplain 1694. He was equally patronised by the next primate Tenison, at whose request he wrote Animadversions on Collier's Pamphlets, who had with two others pronounced absolution in a solemn manner, on Perkins and Friend when executed for the assassination plot. In 1698 he was made regius professor of Greek at Oxford, and 1704, was nominated archdeacon of Oxford. He died 20th January, 1706, and was buried in the chapel of Wadham college, to which he was a great benefactor by the foundation of ten scholarships of 10*l.* each for the cultivation of Hebrew and Greek. He left a MS. account of the learned Greeks who had fled into Italy by the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, which appeared in 1742 under the care of Dr. S. Jebb. He had published in 1701 a History of English Councils and Convocations, and of the English clergy's sitting in Parliament.

HOE, Matthias de Hoeneegg, a German divine, born at Vienna, Feb. 24, 1580. He was preacher to the elector of Saxony at Dresden, where he died 4th March, 1645. He was an able and a zealous Lutheran, and he wrote with great spirit against both Calvinists and papists. His writings are chiefly controversial.

HOECK, John Van, a painter, born at Antwerp 1600. He studied under Rubens and visited Rome, where the pope and cardinals highly favoured him. He was afterwards patronised at Vienna by the emperor Ferdinand II. His portraits and historical pieces are much admired. He died 1650.

HOECK, Robert Van, a painter of Antwerp, who died in the middle of the seventeenth century. His best performances are military pieces, in which his figures appear with great judgment and advantage.

HOEL, Gerard, a painter, born at Bommel 1648. He was director of the academy of painting at Utrecht, and distinguished himself by the superior interest of his historical pieces and of his landscapes, some of which are preserved in the house of lord Albermarle, and in the palace of Stragenberg. He died 1733.

HOELTZLINUS, Jeremias, a philologist, born at Nuremberg. He settled at Leyden, and published there a very learned edition of Apollonius Rhodius 1641, the year of his death. Ruhnkenius, however, censures him as an editor.

HOESCHELIUS, David, a learned German, born at Augsburg, 1556. After teaching long in the college there, he was appointed principal of the society, and also librarian. He was a judicious and indefatigable collector of MSS. and he evinced his learning by his publication of some of the fathers, of Origen, Basil, Philo Judæus, &c.—besides Applan, Procopius, Anna Comnena, &c. He died at Augsburg 1617, universally lamented. As a proof of his attention and discipline at the head of his college, it is mentioned that he furnished to the bar 1000 of his pupils, and 2000 to the church.

HOFFMAN, Maurice, a physician, born

Furstenwalde Brandenburg 20th Sept. 1621. His fondness for literature, and his indefatigable application surmounted all the opposition which his parents made against his studious pursuits, and in 1637 he was permitted by his father to improve himself in the college of Cologne. The death of his father now left him his own master, and he came to Altdorf the next year, where his mother's brother was professor of physic, and after profiting by his advice and instruction he went to Padua, where by the dissection of a turkey-cock he discovered the pancreatic duct, from which his friend Versungus ascertained the same vessel in the human body. Hoffman after three years' residence at Padua, returned to Altdorf, where he began to practise as physician. In 1648 he was made professor of anatomy and surgery, the next year of physic, and 1653 of botany, and director of the physic garden. His abilities and reputation were such that many of the German princes appointed him their physician. He died of an apoplexy 1698, aged 76. He had 18 children by three wives. He wrote Altdorfii Deliciae Hortenses, 4to.—Appendix ad Catalogum Plantarum Hortens. 4to.—Deliciae Sylvestres, 4to.—Florilegium Altdorsinum, 4to.

HOFFMAN, John Maurice, son of the preceding by his first wife, was born 1656 at Altdorf. After studying at Hertzpruck, Altdorf, and Frankfort on the Oder, he went to Padua for two years, and then making the tour of Italy he returned home and took the degree of M.D. In 1677 he was made professor extraordinary in physic, and increased so much in reputation that the margrave of Anspach in 1695 appointed him his physician. He travelled with his illustrious patron into Italy, and after his death in 1703 he held the same honourable rank with his successor, at whose strong invitations he removed to Anspach 1713, and died 1727. He had succeeded his father as botanic professor and director of the physic garden at Altdorf 1698. He had five children by his wife. He published some valuable botanical works, and de Differentiis Alimentorum, 4to. 1677.

HOFFMAN, Frederic, an eminent physician, born at Hall near Magdeburgh 1660, where he became professor of physic 1693, and where he continued till his death 1742. He visited Holland and England, where he became acquainted with the learned men of the times, especially Paul Herman, and Robert Boyle. He took no fees, but was supported by an annual stipend. His works in six large folios, Geneva, 1748-54, contain much valuable matter, with some frivolous and puerile conjectures.

HOFFMAN, Daniel, a Lutheran divine, professor at Helmstadt, at the end of the 16th century. He engaged in the popular and theological controversies of the times, and opposed Beza on the subject of the Eucharist. He was censured by an assembly of divines 1593, and threatened with excommunication if he did not subscribe to the opinions of his persecutors, against whom he published a laboured apology.

HOFFMAN, Gasper, a professor of physic at Altdorf, born at Gotha 1572. He died 1649, leaving behind him some valuable medical works.

HOFFMAN, John James, a laborious compiler, born at Basle. Few particulars are known of this indefatigable man. He published at Geneva 1677, in 2 vols. folio, his great work, "Lexicon Universale, Historico-geographico-poetico-philosophico-politico-philologicum," to which he was induced by success to add a supplement. The Leyden booksellers in 1698, having been favoured with all the improvements and corrections of the author, published the work in 4 vols. folio, with a new preface by the author. He died, Greek professor at Basle, 1706, aged 71.

HOGARTH, William, a celebrated painter, born in the parish of St. Martin Ludgate, London, 1697. His father, who was a schoolmaster, and occasionally a corrector of the press, bound him apprentice to an engraver of arms on plate, but his genius led him to cultivate painting. The first piece by which he distinguished himself was a representation of Wanstead assembly, about 1720, and he was now engaged on his own account in engraving arms and shop bills, and in designing plates for booksellers. His cuts for Hudibras, for Apuleius' Golden Ass, and other works, are still preserved as curiosities, but his powers were exerted with singular effect, not only in portrait painting, but in whimsical and humorous representations. By degrees he thus rose from obscurity to fame, and in 1730 married Sir James Thornhill's daughter. Though the match was altogether against the knight's consent, yet they were reconciled, and the father-in-law afterwards had reason to be proud of the connexion which his daughter had formed. During his residence at South Lambeth, soon after his marriage, he contributed largely to the embellishment of Vauxhall gardens, and for his pieces the proprietor, Tyers, complimented him with a golden ticket of admission, with this honourable motto, "In perpetuum beneficii memoriam." In 1733 his Harlot's Progress recommended him powerfully to the public notice, and thus by the most striking scene in conveying a simple girl through all the horrors and vicissitudes of the wretchedness of a prostitute to a premarture death, he exhibited a lesson to the understanding, and most sensibly touched the heart. Thus successful in a new mode of conveying moral instruction, he devoted himself to the delineation of other equally interesting and appropriate characters, and to the accuracy of his figures must be added the faithful representation of the dress, the manners, and the particularities of the age. The Midnight Conversation, the Rake's Progress, the Marriage a-la-mode, the Happy Marriage, and other works, succeeded each other, and ensured to the artist the high and undisputed character of great genius, strong originality, and successful delineation. After the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, he visited France, and while taking a drawing of the gates of Calais, he was arrested as a spy, but soon liberated, a circumstance which he has beautifully recorded in his "O the roast beef of Old England," 1749. In 1753 he appeared before the public as an author, and in his Analysis of beauty, he made many sensible and original remarks on his profession. He first asserted that a curve is the line of beauty, and that round swelling figures are most pleasing to the eye, and the opinion has been supported by other eminent writers, as the language of truth and nature. In his conduct Hogarth was a very absent man. One of his letters to Dr. Hoadly was directed "to the Doctor at Chelsea," and it reached his friend to be preserved as a monument of his singularity. When he set up his carriage he paid a visit to Beckford the lord mayor, and being let out by a different door from the mansion-house, he hastened to his apartments in Leicester-square through a violent shower of rain, and never recollected that he had left his coach behind, till his wife inquired for it. Though he possessed in an incredible degree the powers of bringing his rivals or enemies to ridicule or infamy, yet Hogarth never used the dangerous talent in a vindictive degree, though perhaps his representation of Churchill as a canonical bear, and his portrait of Wilkes may be said not lightly to reflect on his judgment or good sense. He expired at his house Leicester-square, 25th Oct. 1764, in consequence of aneurism, and was buried in Chiswick churchyard, where an inscription by his friend Garrick marks his grave. Great as an artist, Hogarth was respectable as a private man; he was liberal, generous, and hospitable; and had education, and an earlier acquaintance with the polite world worn away some of the asperities of his character, he might have been regarded as an amiable man. A very entertaining account of the life and labours of Hogarth has appeared by the pen of John Ireland, called "Hogarth illustrated," 1792, and "Graphic Illustrations," &c. an additional work has been published by Samuel Ireland.

HOPENLOHE, Prince de, general of artillery in the imperial army, distinguished himself against the Turks in Transylvania in 1788, and against the French in the battles of Famars and Mormal in 1792. He was intrusted with the command of the army on the Rhine, and died whilst in that office, Aug. 1796.

HOLBACH, Paul Thiéri, baron de, an eminent mineralogist, born in the Palatinate, and for his learning made member of the academies of Manheim, Paris, Petersburg, Berlin, &c. He wrote L'Art de la Verrerie de Neri—Mineralogie de Wallerius, 2 vols.—Elemens de la Morale Universelle, ou Catechisme de la Nature—Introduction à la Mineralogia, &c. and died at Paris 1789, aged 66.

HOLBEIN, John, better known by the German name of Hans, a celebrated painter born at Basil, Switzerland, 1498, or three years earlier according to Charles Patin. He studied under his father who was a painter, but soon eclipsed him. He painted our Saviour's passion in the town-house of Basil, and in the fish-market, a dance of peasants, and death's dance. These pieces gained him much celebrity, and also the friendship of the great Erasmus, who pitied and in vain endeavoured to reform his roughness of manners, and his culpable partiality for low company and for drinking. He was invited by an English nobleman who saw him at Basil to visit England, and at last in his eagerness after fame, and in his wish to avoid the ill humour of a termagant wife, and by the advice of Erasmus, he began to travel towards England, and almost begged his way on his journey. He was received with great friendship by the lord chancellor, Sir Thomas More, in whose house he resided nearly three years, while employing his pencil in drawing the portrait of his patron and of his friends. When asked the name of the nobleman who had accidentally promised him protection in England, he said he had forgotten it, but added that he remembered his features, and immediately drew a likeness so correct, and so accurate, that the noble stranger became known to the chancellor and his friends. Some time after Sir Thomas exhibited the productions of Holbein accidentally to Henry VIII. who was so pleased with them that he took the illustrious painter under his immediate patronage, and sent him to draw the picture of the dutchess Dowager of Milan, whom he designed for his fourth wife after the death of Jane Seymour. He was afterwards employed to draw the portrait of Anne of Cleves, which proved too flattering to engage the fastidious affections of Henry. Holbein after giving the world a great number of valuable portraits of the personages of the court, and of various noblemen, unfortunately died of the plague at his lodgings in Whitehall 1554. This excellent artist, says Du Fresnoy, "was wonderfully knowing and had certainly been of the first form of painters, had he travelled into Italy, since nothing can be laid to his charge but only that he had a Gothic gusto." He performed indeed better than Raphael, and with some of his portraits, none of Titian's could come into competition. Henry VIII. was so sensible of his merit that in defending him from the vengeance of an offended nobleman, he said to his persecutor, I can when I please, make seven lords of seven ploughmen, but I cannot make one Holbein even of seven lords.

HOLBERG, Louis de, a Danish writer, born at Bergen, Norway, 1685. He rose from obscurity by his application and diligence, and after travelling over Europe supported merely by his own personal exertions, he returned to Copenhagen, where he became assessor of the consistory court. He gained great celebrity by his works, which were a valuable history of Denmark, 3 vols. 4to.—some comedies,—2 vols. of Moral Thoughts,—the Danish Spectator,—and a satirical romance, like Gulliver's Travels. By economy and by his literary labours he acquired a handsome fortune, and was a great benefactor to the university of Zealand, and also gave 16,000 crowns to portion a number of Danish young women. He died 1754.

HOLCROFT, Thomas, a miscellaneous writer, was born in Orange-court, Leicester-fields, Dec. 22, 1744. His father was a shoemaker in low circumstances, and the son, early in life, was employed in the stables of the honourable Mr. Vernon. He also worked at his father's business, but left it, and tried his fortune on the stage without success. He then turned dramatic writer, in which he had better luck; and some of his plays were very popular at the time. Besides these productions, he wrote several novels, and translated a number of books from the French and German languages. At the commencement of the revolution he espoused the cause of the republicans, and was committed for high treason; but when Hardy, Tooke, and Thelwall were acquitted, he was discharged without trial. His last speculation was a publication of his travels in Germany and France, in two vols. 4to. He died in 1809.—W. B.

HOLDEN, Henry, an English divine, of great erudition, and strict integrity. He was a Roman catholic, and settled at Paris, where he died 1662. His works are, Analysis Fidei, reprinted by Barbou 1766—Marginal Notes on the New Testament, 2 vols. 12mo. 1660—a Letter concerning White's Treatise de Medio Animarum Statu, 4to. 1661.

HOLDEN, Samuel, a benefactor of the colonists of New-England, was an Englishman, and died in London in 1740. His donations, and those of his family, to religious and useful objects, in America, amounted to about 10,000 pounds New-England currency. Holden chapel, of Harvard college, erected by their donation, derived from them its name. ☞ L.

HOLDER, William, an English divine, born in Nottinghamshire, and educated at Pembroke-hall, Cambridge. In 1642 he was made rector of Blechingdon, Oxfordshire, and, in 1660, he took the degree of D.D. He was afterwards canon of Ely and St. Paul's, fellow of the Royal Society, subdean of the Royal Chapel, and subalmoner to the king. He died at Amen Corner, London, 24th Jan. 1696-7, and was buried in St. Paul's. He was well skilled in music, and wrote a treatise on the principles of harmony, and also a discourse concerning time, with application to the natural day, lunar month, and solar year. He gained some credit by teaching Pop-ham, a man of some distinction, who was deaf and dumb, to speak, but as the pupil forgot what he had been taught, and again recovered it by the instruction of Dr. Wallis, of Oxford, a controversy on the subject, between these two learned men, arose, and was conducted, in some pamphlets, with more acrimony than moderation.

HOLDSWORTH, Edward, an elegant scholar, educated at Winchester school, and admitted of Magdalen college, Oxford, 1705. After being some time tutor, he refused, when elected fellow in 1715, to take the oath of allegiance to the Hanoverian succession, and returning from Oxford, spent the rest of his days in travelling with pupils of distinction. He died of a fever, at lord Digby's, at Coleshill, Warwickshire, 30th Dec. 1747. He was author of that elegant poem "Muscipula," translated by Dr. J. Hoadly in Dodsley's Miscellanies, and wrote, also, a dissertation on the Pharsalia and Philippi mentioned in the Georgics, besides remarks on Virgil, published by Mr. Spence, 1768. He understood Virgil, says Mr. Spence, "better than any man I ever knew."

HOLE, Richard, a native of Exeter, educated there and at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took the degree of LL.B. 1771. In 1792 he succeeded to the living of Faringdon, Devonshire, on the presentation of the bishop of Exeter, besides which he afterwards obtained Inwardleigh vicarage. He published Ossian in a poetical dress—Ode to Imagination—Homer's hymn to Ceres, translated 1781—Arthur, an Epic Romance, with notes—Remarks on the Arabian Nights Entertainments, &c. 1797, 12mo.—besides odes in the Devonshire collection of poems, and Essays in the Exeter society publications, &c. He died 1803.

HOLINGSHEAD, Raphael, an English chronicler, descended from a family which lived at Bosely, Cheshire. Few particulars are known respecting him, but he appears before the public as author of "Chronicles," first published 1577, 2 vols. folio, and in 1587 in three. The second edition contained some passages offensive to Elizabeth, and therefore they were cancelled in the second and third vol. though afterwards printed separately. In these chronicles, which gave an interesting account of England, of Ireland, and of Scotland, Hollingshead had for coadjutors, Hooker, Harrison, Stanihurst, Boteville, and others, who at that time were respectable writers, and like himself, well versed in antiquarian history. The work was afterwards continued by Stow, Thin, Fleming, and others, from 1577 to 1586. The time of his death is uncertain, but, from his will, prefixed by Hearne to Camden's Annals, he died between 1578 and 1582.

HOLL, Francis Xavier, a Jesuit, born at Schawndorf. He was professor of belles lettres, and of ecclesiastical law, in several of the German universities, and died at Heidelberg, 6th March, 1784, aged 64. He wrote Statistica Ecclesiae Germaniae, 8vo. a useful work.

HOLLAND, Philemon, a native of Chelmsford, educated at Cambridge, under Dr. Whitgift. He was elected master of Coventry free-school, but besides the duties of this station, he practised physic, and with some degree of success and celebrity. He was a good scholar, and increased his reputation by his translations of Livy, of Xenophon's Cyropædia, of Pliny's Natural History, and of Camden's Britannia. He died at Coventry 1636, aged 85.

HOLLAR, or HOLLARD, Wentzel, or Wencelaus, an eminent engraver, born at Prague, Bohemia, 1607. He was intended for the law, but the ruin of his family by the sacking of Prague, in 1619, rendered his subsistence precarious, and he left home in 1627, determined to support himself by his own exertions. In several towns of Germany he devoted himself attentively to drawing and design, and in taking geometrical and perspective views of fortresses and buildings, so that he acquired early eminence, and at the age of 18 was known as an able artist. He chiefly employed his powers in copying heads and portraits from the best painters, and in delineating with great beauty and accuracy small and delicate views of some of the cities on the banks of the Rhine. His reputation, acknowledged by his countrymen, became known to lord Arundel, the English ambassador at the court of Ferdinand II. who, in 1636, noticed him by every mark of kindness, and took him in his retinue. Hollar accompanied his noble patron to England, and soon engaged in the service of the print-sellers. His first work in England was a view of Greenwich, published 1637. His abilities were afterwards engaged in taking different views, and, in 1640, he was introduced to the royal family, to instruct the prince of Wales in the art of designing. That same year appeared his "Ornatus Muliebris Anglicanus," representing the dress of English women of various ranks, a work greatly esteemed among connoisseurs. The breaking out of the civil wars proved unfortunate to his labours, and after his patron, lord Arundel, had returned to the continent, he grew obnoxious to the parliament as the friend of the royal family, and chiefly for employing his graver to preserve the portraits of so many of the loyalists. He was taken prisoner at the surrender of Basin-house, 1645, but afterwards escaped and went over to Antwerp, where lord Arundel had fixed his residence. In this retirement he employed himself in etching the portraits of some of the great men of the times, but without the wish or the means of improving his fortune. In 1652 he was persuaded to return to England, where, with fresh assiduity, he devoted himself to labour, and with such perseverance, that he never would be interrupted till his hour-glass was exhausted. It is said that he suffered greatly in his property by the fire and the plague of London, 1665. About 1669 he was sent by the king to take a view of the garrison, town, and neighbouring landscapes of Tangier, on the coast of Africa, and after his return he, in 1672, went into the northern counties to draw representations of the principal cities, churches, &c. of that part of the kingdom. This illustrious artist, whose labours were so numerous and so varied, was never free from the persecutions of creditors, so that after exerting himself to give celebrity to others, he found that independence could never be in his power, either for want of economy, or more probably the illiberality of his employers. He had, it is said, in his 70th year, an execution in his house in Gardiner's lane, Westminster, and begged only the liberty of dying on his bed, without being conveyed to any prison but the grave. He died 23th March, 1677, and was buried in the new chapel yard, St. Margaret's, Westminster. It is impossible to enumerate all his works in etching, which embrace not only the noble collection of his friend lord Arundel, and the choicest pieces of Titian, Durer, Holbein, Vandyck, Breughel, Teniers, and many others, but also the heads of the most eminent men in church and state, in the army, in literature, and every department of science and of fame, besides landscapes, views, &c. of the most capital places of Europe. He was very exact in affixing his cipher and the date to his pieces, which has proved of great service in ascertaining historical facts.

HOLLIS, Thomas Pelham, succeeded his father as baron Pelham, and, in 1711, his uncle John, as duke of Newcastle. His attachment to the house of Hanover was rewarded by various honours and high offices. He retired from administration soon after the accession of George III. and was succeeded by lord Bute. He died 17th Nov. 1768, aged 75.

HOLLIS, Denzil, lord, one of the five members whom Charles I. went to the house of commons personally to accuse and to arrest. This weakness on the part of the king greatly increased his popularity, but he was not successful in his opposition to the independents, and to the ambitious views of Cromwell. Though he favoured the cause of the presbyterians, he was deemed worthy to be noticed by the second Charles, and to be raised to the peerage. He died 1680, aged 83.

HOLLIS, Thomas, a munificent benefactor of Harvard college, Massachusetts, who founded the professorship of theology and mathematics in that institution, and also presented to it a philosophical apparatus and many valuable books. He was born in England, in 1659, and died in 1731, highly respected as a merchant, and esteemed as a Christian. His nephew, Thomas Hollis, who died in 1774, presented to the library of that college benefactions amounting to about 1400 pounds sterling.

☞ L.

HOLLIS, Thomas, an English gentleman, born in London, 14th April, 1720. At the age of 14 he was sent to Amsterdam, to acquire the French and Dutch languages, and after 15 months' residence he returned to England, and, after his father's death, in 1735, he was placed by his guardian, under the tuition of professor Ward. In 1740 he entered at Lincoln's Inn, and became a law student, but he never made the law his profession. In 1743 he travelled with his friend Mr. Brand through Holland, the Netherlands, part of France, of Switzerland, and Italy, and again, in 1750, he made another tour, and visited the chief places in the north of Germany, with the rest of Italy, Sicily, Malta, and France, of which travels the journal is said to be extant in MS. He attempted, at his return, to get into parliament, but his views were disappointed, and he went to reside on his estate of Corscombe, Dorsetshire. He was, in his principles, a dissenter, and a warm advocate for the liberty of the subject, so that he not only made a collection of books and medals to illustrate and uphold his favourite system, but he presented, anonymously, as an Englishman, two large and choice collections of books to the public library of Bern, as a lover of liberty, of his country, and of its excellent constitution, as established at the revolution. His liberality was extended to other countries, to Genoa, Venice, Sweden, Leyden, Russia, &c. as well as to his own countrymen. He died suddenly, of an apoplexy, on new-year's day, 1774. He is described, by his cotemporaries, as a man of large fortune, above half of which he devoted to charitable purposes. His property he left to his friend Brand, who consequently took the name of Hollis, and was as zealous a friend of liberty as his departed benefactor. Mr. Hollis, to spread more widely his principles, published, at his own expense, new editions of Toland's life of Milton, of Algernon Sydney's discourses on government, and meditated an edition of Andrew Marvell's works. When his house in London was on fire, in 1761, he calmly walked out, only taking under his arm an original picture of Milton.

HOLMES, George, born at Skipton in Craven, Yorkshire, was clerk to the keepers of the records in the tower for nearly 60 years. His abilities were employed by lord Halifax to methodize the valuable records deposited in the tower, and he received for his trouble an annual salary of 200*l.* He was also barrack-master of the tower. He died 16th Feb. 1748-9, aged 87. His son and only child died long before him, aged 25. Mr. Holmes republished the 17 first volumes of Rymer's Fœdera. His valuable collection of books, prints, coins, medals, &c. were sold by auction, 1749. His portrait was engraved by the society of antiquaries, with every mark of respect and commendation bestowed on his indefatigable labours. His widow received 200*l.* for his papers, which were deposited as a sacred pledge in the tower.

HOLMES, Dr. Nathaniel, a learned Hebraist, author of the Resurrection Revealed, fol. 1654, in defence of the Millennium. He was ejected from the living of St. Mary Staining, London, in 1662, for nonconformity, and died 1678.

HOLMES, Robert, a native of Hampshire, educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He devoted himself early to biblical criticism, and in the beginning of the French revolution went to Paris, to examine the manuscripts and versions of the Scriptures preserved in the public libraries of France. His services to sacred literature were honourably rewarded, and he became successively canon of Salisbury, of Christ-church, and then dean of Winchester, which last preference he enjoyed not two years. He died at Oxford, 12th Nov. 1805, aged 56. He published the Bampton Lectures in 1782—Divinity Tracts, 8vo. 1788—Alfred, an ode, with six sonnets, 1778—An Ode for the duke of Portland's Installation, 1793—a Latin Letter to the Bishop of Durham respecting his Collation of the Septuagint, fol.—The Prophecy of Daniel according to Theodotian, and the LXX, 4to.—besides single sermons on the resurrection, and another preached before the house of commons, &c. Dr. Holmes took his degree of D.D. in 1786, and in 1790 he succeeded Thomas Warton as poetry professor. Of his Collation of the Septuagint MSS. 5 vols. in folio, have appeared, and reflect highly on his industry, great perseverance, and solid judgment.

HOLSTEIN, Cornelius, a painter of Haerlem, brought up by his father, who was of the same profession. The ceiling of the treasury at Amsterdam, and other pieces, are proofs of his superior abilities. He died about the end of the 17th century.

HOLSTENIUS, or HOLSTEIN, Lucas, a German divine, born at Hamburgh, 1596, and converted from protestantism to the catholic religion by the Jesuit Sirmond. He studied at home and Paris, and went afterwards to Rome, where he was patronised by cardinal Barberini, and Urban VIII. and his two successors. He was made a canon of St. Peter's, and librarian of the Vatican, and in 1665 went as ambassador from the pope to Christina, queen of Sweden, whose profession of catholic faith he received at Inspruck. He died at Rome 1661, aged 65. Though very learned he published only a dissertation on the life and writings of Porphyry, besides some notes on the Argonautica of Apollonius—on the Fragments of Demophilus, &c.

HOLT, Sir John, lord chief justice of the king's bench, was born at Thames, Oxfordshire, 1642. He was educated at Abingdon school, where his father was recorder, and afterwards entered as gentleman commoner of Oriel college, Oxford. In 1658 he entered at Gray's Inn, and when called to the bar, he distinguished himself as an able counsellor. In the reign of James II. he was elected recorder of London, from which, 18 months after, he was removed for opposing the abolition of the test act. In 1686 he was made sergeant at law, and at the revolution he was elected to the convention parliament, and soon after his services in the cause of loyalty were rewarded with the first seat in the court of king's bench, and a place in the privy council. In 1700 he declined succeeding lord Somers as chancellor, and remained in the king's bench, where he presided with firmness, patience, and dignity, and maintained the honour of his situation even in opposition to the two houses of parliament. Impartial and unbiassed as a judge, he watched with jealous care over the privileges of the people, and deserved by his uprightness and integrity the high character of Verus, applied to him in the 14th number of the Tatler. While in office he was solicited to support with his officers a party of the military, which were sent to disperse a riot, occasioned in Holborn by the frequent and violent practice of decoying young men for the plantations. Suppose, said the judge to the messenger, that the populace should not disperse at your appearance, what are you to do then? Sir, replied the officer, we have orders to fire on them. Have you, sir, said the judge, then take notice of this, if there be one man killed, and you are tried before me, I will take care that you, and every soldier of your party, shall be hanged. Sir, added he, go back to those who sent you, and tell them that no officer of mine shall attend soldiers, and let them know, at the same time, that the laws of this kingdom are not to be executed by the sword; these matters belong to the civil power, and you have nothing to do with them. The chief justice immediately, with his tipstaves and a few constables, repaired to the spot, and after addressing the populace, and promising the punishment of those who had excited the public indignation, he dispersed the mob quietly. This great and upright judge died after a lingering illness, March 1709, leaving no issue. He published 1708 a Report of Cases in Pleas of the Crown in the reign of Charles II. &c.

HOLT, John, a miscellaneous writer, was born at Mottram, in Cheshire, in 1742. He was schoolmaster and parish clerk at Walton, near Liverpool; where also he engaged in agricultural pursuits, and died in 1801. His works are—1. Characters of the Kings and Queens of England, 3 vols. 12mo.—2. An Essay on the Curl in Potatoes.—3. Agricultural Report for Lancashire, 8vo. At the time of his death he was employed in a History of Liverpool.—W. B.

HOLWELL, John Zephaniah, an Englishman, governor of Bengal, and one of those unfortunate men confined in the black hole of Calcutta, 1756, of which he published an interesting narrative. He wrote also several pieces on East India affairs, and died 1798.

HOLYDA, Barten, an English divine, born at Oxford, 1593, son of a tailor. He was educated at Christ-church, where he was student, and in 1615 he took orders. In 1618 he went as chaplain with Sir Francis Stewart to Spain, and on his return was made chaplain to the king, and archdeacon of Oxford. In 1642 he was made D.D. and during the civil wars he remained con-reared in the neighbourhood of Oxford, but afterwards he submitted to the parliament, and under their regulations took the living of Chilton, Berkshire. At the restoration he came to settle at Hsley, Berks, and was restored to his former preferments. He died at Hsley, 2d Oct. 1661. It is said his temporizing manners prevented his elevation to a bishopric. He published twenty sermons, besides some poems, and "the Survey of the World," a poem in 10 books, 1661, and also a Translation of Juvenal and Persius, not very poetical, says Dryden, but very faithful, and accompanied with valuable notes.

HOLYOAKE, Francis, a learned scholar, born at Nether Whitacre, Warwickshire, about 1567. He studied at Oxford, and in 1604 became rector of Southam, Warwickshire. He suffered greatly during the civil wars, for his attachment to the royal cause, and died 1653, and was buried at Warwick. He published an etymological dictionary of Latin words, first printed 1606, 4to. and edited the fourth time 1633.

HOLYOAKE, Thomas, son of the preceding, was born at Southam, 1616, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was captain in the king's army, and for his services was made D.D. For some time he practised physic, and then took orders, and had some valuable livings. He died 1675, leaving a dictionary English and Latin, and Latin and English, published 1677, and borrowed from his father's labours.

HOLYOKE, Edward, president of Harvard college, was a native of Boston, Massachusetts, and graduated at the seminary, over which he afterwards presided in 1705. After having been employed as a tutor in the institution for some time, he was in 1716 settled in the ministry at Marblehead, where he continued to labour with reputation, till in 1737 he was elected president of Harvard college. He remained in that office, for which he was happily fitted by his learning and the dignity of his manners, till his death in 1769.

HOLYWOOD, John, called also Sacrobosco, of Halifax, a mathematician, born at Halifax, Yorkshire, though said by some to be an Irishman, and by others a Scotchman. He was educated at Oxford, and then went to Paris, where he died 1256. He wrote De Spharâ Mundi—de Anni Ratione—de Algorismo.

HOMBERG, William, an eminent chymist, born at Batavia, in Java, 3d Jan. 1652, where his father was arsenal governor. Returning with his father to Europe, he entered into the army, and afterwards studied at the universities of Jena and Leipsic, but the sciences had greater attraction for him than the law, for which he was intended. Botany, chymistry, and medicine were his favourite pursuits, and he was encouraged in his designs by the friendship of Otto de Guericke. To improve himself he travelled to Italy, Hungary, Bohemia, Sweden, and France, and under the patronage of Colbert, determined to settle at Paris, where he renounced the protestant for the catholic religion in 1682. The death of Colbert altered his resolution, and he retired to Rome, where he began to practise physic. In 1690 he again returned to Paris, and had the good fortune to be appointed chymist, and then physician to the duke of Orleans, the regent. He died of a dysentery, Sept. 1715, at Paris, seven years after he had married the daughter of the physician Dodart. The writings of Homberg are chiefly preserved in the memoirs of the academy. He is known for his successful experiments, and for his discoveries in chymistry, especially that of the Bologna stone, and its phosphoric appearances after calcination. He was a frequent correspondent on scientific subjects with Boyle, and other learned men.

HOME, David, a Scotch divine, educated in France. He was employed by James I. to reconcile the differences between Tilenus and Du Moulin, on the subject of Justification, and thus to introduce an amity of sentiments on religion throughout Europe. The time of his death is not recorded. He wrote Apologia Basilica, seu Machiavelli Ingenium examinatum, 4to.—L'Assassinat du Roi, ou Maximes du Vieil de la Montagne practiquées par le defunt Henri le Grand, 1617—and some pieces in the Deliciæ poetarum Scotorum.

HOME, Henry, lord Kaines, a learned Scotch judge, known also as an elegant writer. After being long eminent as a lawyer, he was in 1752 raised to a seat among the lords of session, and while he faithfully discharged his duty to the public, he devoted usefully his time to literature. He died 26th Dec. 1782, after having been several years senior lord of session. His writings are, essays on several subjects, concerning British Antiquities, &c. 1746—Essays on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion, 1751, Svo.—Historical Law, 1759—The Principles of Equity, fol. 1760—Elements of Criticism, 3 vols. Svo. 1762, a valuable book often re-edited—The Gentleman Farmer, 1777—Loose Hints upon Education, 1781—The History of Man, or Sketches, 4 vols. Svo. 1782.

HOME, John, a Scotch writer, was born in Roxburghshire, in 1724. He was educated at Edinburgh for the church; but, in the rebellion of 1745, he entered into the royal army, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Falkirk. He contrived, however, to make his escape, and in 1750 was ordained as minister of Athelstaneford, in East Lothian. His tragedy of "Douglas" was performed at Edinburgh in 1756, which gave such offence to the presbytery, that the author, to avoid ecclesiastical censure, resigned his living. In 1763 he was appointed a commissioner for sick and wounded seamen, and the exchange of prisoners. He was also named a conservator of the Scotch privileges at Campvere, in Zealand. In 1778 he obtained a captain's commission in the duke of Buccleugh's fencibles. He died Sept. 4, 1808. Besides the play of Douglas he wrote four others, which are sunk in oblivion; as also is the last work which he published, "The History of the Rebellion," 4to.—W. B.

HOMER, the father of poetry, is supposed to have flourished about 907, B.C. His history is so obscurely known, that not less than seven cities disputed the honour of giving him birth. Besides his two immortal works, the Iliad and the Odyssey, he wrote Batrachomyomachia, or the battle of the frogs and the mice, and Hymns to the Gods.

HOMMEL, Charles Frederick, a writer of Leipsic, who died 1781, aged 59. He wrote, De Legum Civilium et Naturalium Naturâ—Oblectamenta Juris Feudalis, sive Grammaticæ Observationes Jus Rei Clientelaris, et Antiquitates Germanicas variè illustrantes—Literatura Juris—Jurisprudentia Numismatibus illustrata, &c.—Corpus Juris Civilis cum notis Variorum, &c.

HOMMOND, Charles Francis P, a native of Chaulness, near Noyon, who devoted his life to the instruction of youth at Paris, and in the provinces. He died at Paris, 31st December, 1794, aged 66. He wrote, De Viris Illustribus Urbis Romæ—Epitome Historiæ Sacræ—a Grammar, &c.

HONDEKOETER, Gilles, a painter, born at Utrecht, 1583. His landscapes and flowers were much admired.

HONDEKOETER, Gysbrecht, son of Gilles, was born 1613, and excelled in the lively and natural representation of fowls.

HONDEKOETER, Melchior, a painter, son of Gysbrecht, born at Utrecht. He died 1695, aged 59. His landscapes introduced especially in the back of his pictures, possess great elegance and beauty.

HONDIVS, Abraham, a painter, born at Rotterdam. He died 1691, aged 53. His best piece is the burning of Troy, in which he has introduced a great variety of figures, with boldness and exquisite judgment.

HONDIVS, Jesse, a native of Wackerne in Flanders, who died 1614, aged 48. He was eminent as an engraver on copper and ivory, in which he was self-taught, and as a letter-founder. In 1607 he published Descriptio Geographica Orbis Terrarum, folio, besides, Theatrum Artis Scribendi—Gerhardi Mercatoris Atlas—and Italiæ Hodiernæ Descriptio. He constructed two globes in London, remarkable for beauty and size, and settled in Amsterdam.

HONE, George Paul, a lawyer, born at Nuremberg 1662. He was counsellor to the duke of Meimingen, and bailiff of Coburg, where he died 1747. He wrote Iter Juridicum per Belgium, &c.—Lexicon Topographicum Franconiæ—History of the Dutchy of Saxe-Coburg, &c.

HONESTIS, Petrus de, or Petrus Damiani, an Italian, born at Ravenna 1006. His great piety recommended him to pope Stephen, by whom he was made bishop of Ostia, and a cardinal, and in 1059 he was employed by pope Nicolas II. to reduce the church of Milan to the observation of celibacy, which he effected with difficulty. In 1061, he abdicated his bishopric and retired to a cell, but the next year the pope called him away, and sent him as his ambassador to France. In 1072 he reconciled the see of Ravenna to the pope, and died the same year, aged 66. His works are numerous, chiefly consisting of epistles addressed to the clergy, little esteemed now.

HONORIUS, second son of the great Theodosius, was emperor of the west, while his brother Arcadius sat on the throne of Constantinople. He disregarded the ravages of Alaric the Goth in the indolence of his palace at Ravenna, where he died 423, aged 39.

HONORIUS I. pope, after Boniface V. 626, died 12th Oct. 638. He presided over the church with great zeal and wisdom, though he is blamed for yielding to the artful insinuations of Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, on some controversial points.

HONORIUS II. Lambert, bishop of Ostia, was made pope 1124, after the death of Calixtus II. though at the same time, and in the same church, another party elected Theobald, under the name of Celestinus. The influence of Honorius, however, prevailed, and Celestinus yielded to his rival, who died 14th Feb. 1130.

HONORIUS III. Censio Savelli, was elected after Innocent III. He confirmed the order of St. Dominic, and that of the Carmes, and preached without effect a crusade to the Holy Land. He died 18th March, 1227. A work called, Conjuraciones, &c. has appeared under his name.

HONORIUS IV. James Savelli, was elected pope, 2d April, 1285, and died 3d April, 1287. He ably defended the rights of the Roman church, and supported the crusades.

HONTAN, Baron de, a native of Gascony, in the 17th century, known by his travels in North America, which he published in a barbarous style, and filled with disguised facts, and many improbabilities. He was originally a soldier in Canada, and after rising to the rank of an officer, he was broke for quarrelling with the governor of Newfoundland, and then went to settle in Denmark. An edition of his travels is from Amsterdam, 2 vols. 12mo. 1705.

HONTHEIM, John Nicholas de, author of Historia Trevisensis Diplomata et Pragmatica, 5 vols. folio—De præsentis Statu Ecclesiæ, 5 vols. 4to. a work which excited some controversy, was suffragan to the archbishop of Treves, and died 1790, aged 90.

HONTHORST, Herard, a painter of Utrecht, who studied under Bloemart. His night pieces are much admired, especially his Christ brought before Pilate, in which the light from the torches is made to illuminate the whole piece with astonishing effect. He died 1660, aged 68. His brother William was equally eminent as a historical and portrait painter, and died 1683.

HOOF, Petrus Cornelius Van, a poet and historian, born at Amsterdam 1581. He was made knight of St. Michael by Lewis XIII. and died after a short illness, as he was going to attend the funeral of Fred. Henry prince of Orange, 1647. He wrote epigrams, comedies, and other poems—A History of the Low Countries from Charles V.'s Abdication, to 1598, 2 vols. folio—A Latin History of Henry IV. of France.—A Dutch translation of Tacitus, highly esteemed, as the author read the original fifty-two times, to understand more perfectly his meaning.

HOOGVEEN, Henry, a Dutch philologist, born at Leyden, Jan. 1712. Though his parents were poor, yet his education was liberal, and at the age of 15, he began to teach others to support himself, and his parents. In 1732, he was elected undermaster of the school of Gorcum, and nine months after went to settle at Woerden, where he married. In 1733, the year he lost his wife, by whom he had three sons and two daughters, he removed to the school of Culemburg, where he took a second wife. In 1745, he was invited to Breda, but for a while the fears of invasion, and of a French army, disturbed his residence, though at last he lived there 16 years, and in 1761 he removed to Dort, and three years after to Delft, where he died Nov. 1st, 1794. His works were, an edition of Vigerus de Idiotismis Linguæ Græcæ—An inaugural speech at Culemburg—An elegiac poem and other poetical pieces—and Doctrina Particularum Linguæ Græcæ, 2 vols. 4to. 1769, a work of great learning, and universally applauded, besides a posthumous work, Dictionarium Analogicum Græcum, printed at Cambridge, with an account of his life, by his son, his successor at the school of Delft.

HOOGSTRAETEN, Theodore Van, a painter of Antwerp. His landscapes were much admired. He died 1640, aged 44. His son, Samuel, was equally eminent for his skill, not only in landscapes but in portraits. He died 1678, aged 51.

HOOGSTRAETEN, James, a Dominican, and inquisitor general, is known by the virulence with which he wrote against Luther, Erasmus, Reuchlin, and others. He died at Cologne, 1527.

HOOGSTRATEN, David Van, professor of belles lettres at Amsterdam, was born at Rotterdam 1658. In a thick fog, Nov. 13th, 1724, he lost his way, and fell into a canal, and in consequence of the accident, he died eight days after. He wrote Latin poems—Flemish poems—Notes on Cor. Nepos, and Terence—a Flemish and Latin Dictionary, &c.

HOOGUE, Romain de, a Dutch engraver and designer. His principal works are, Plates for the New and Old Testament, published by Basnage, folio, 1704—Plates for the Egyptian Hieroglyphics, Amsterdam, folio—Plates to Fontaine's Fables, 2 vols. 8vo. 1685—to Boccace—to the tales of the Queen of Navarre, &c. His pieces are greatly esteemed, and bear a high price.

HOOKE, Robert, was born 18th July, 1635, at Freshwater, in the Isle of Wight, where his father was minister. He was intended for the church, but the weakness of his constitution prevented it, and after being for some time left to his own amusement, he was placed under the care of Sir Peter Lely, but the smell of oil colours increased those violent headachs to which he was liable, and rendered his improvement as a painter impossible. He next was taken into the house of Dr. Busby, and there gradually acquired a perfect knowledge of the learned languages. About 1653, he went to Christ Church, and soon after his introduction to the philosophical society at Oxford enabled him to display and to cultivate his mechanical abilities. He assisted Willis and Boyle in their chymical experiments, and improved himself in astronomy under Seth Ward, and soon became eminent for his inventions and improvements in mechanics, and in astronomical instruments. In 1662 he was unanimously appointed curator of the experiments of the Royal Society; and when the charter of institution was granted to that learned body, his name was inserted among the council. He was, in 1664, made professor of mechanics to the Royal Society by Cutler, and the next year he was elected to the geometrical chair in Gresham college. Upon the destruction of London by fire, he produced an ingenious plan for the rebuilding of the city, but though it was not adopted, he was so far complimented by the lord mayor and corporation as to be appointed one of the surveyors. In 1668 he was engaged in a warm dispute with Hevelius of Dantzic, with respect to the dioptric telescopes.

which he regarded as superior to those with plain sights; but though he was blamed for his assertions, it is now proved that his opinion was the more correct. In 1671 he attacked Newton's theory of light and colours, and with some degree of success; but when in 1686 he laid claim to the discovery of the force and the action of gravity in preference to the great philosopher, his pretensions were regarded with indifference, and considered as the effects of arrogance and ambition. He was in 1691, created M.D. by Tillotson; but the wishes of his friends that he might be enabled to complete a description of the various instruments which his ingenuity had discovered, proved unavailing, as a gradual decay rendered him unfit for laborious exertion. He died at his lodgings, Gresham college, 3d March, 1702, and was buried in St. Helen's church, Bishopsgate-street. Though possessed of such mental powers, Hooke was in his temper penurious and mistrustful, unsociable and suspicious, and in his person he was uncomely and vulgar, short of stature, and of a pale and meagre aspect. In his religious character, however, he was very devout and humble, and nothing fortunate or pleasing ever happened to him without drawing from him ejaculations of gratitude and thanks to the divinity, as his diary every where mentions. He wrote Micrographia, or Philosophical Descriptions of Minute Bodies made by magnifying glasses, with Observations and Inquiries, folio, 1666. His posthumous works appeared 1705, folio, under the care of R. Walker, secretary to the Royal Society, to whom the MSS. had been referred.

HOOKER, Nathanael, an English historian, of whom few particulars are known. He was one of the many who suffered in the South Sea scheme, but he afterwards was patronised by the dutchess of Marlborough, who gave him 5000*l.* to assist her in the arrangement and digestion of her papers, for a history of her conduct at court till the year 1710. The work was finished 1742, 8vo. but the historian quarrelled with the dutchess, and was dismissed. As he was a mystic and quietist, and strongly attached to the tenets of Fenelon, he was the friend of the catholics, and it is said that he introduced one of his priests to Pope's bed-side to receive the confession of the dying poet, a circumstance which highly offended Bolingbroke. Hooke is particularly known as the historian of Rome, in 4 vols. 4to. from the foundation of the city to the end of the republic. The first volume appeared in 1733, the second 1745, the third 1764, and the fourth 1771. He wrote besides Observations on the Roman Senate, and a translation of Ramsay's Travels of Cyrus. He died 1764.

HOOKER, John, an eminent antiquary, born at Exeter 1524, and educated at Oxford. He travelled into Germany, and on his return settled at Exeter, which he represented in parliament 1571. He died 1601. He was author of a Description of Exeter, and of some part of Hollingshed's Chronicle.

HOOKER, Richard, nephew to the preceding, was a celebrated divine, born at Heavitree, near Exeter, 1553. His great abilities were early observed by the schoolmaster under whom he studied at Exeter, and by the kindness of his uncle he was introduced to bishop Jewell, who with uncommon liberality sent him as clerk to Corpus Christi, Oxford, and settled a pension upon him. The death of his patron for a while obscured his prospects, but he found a friend in Dr. Cole, the president of his college, and in Sandys, bishop of London; and in 1577, his merits recommended him to a fellowship in his college. He took orders in 1581, and soon after formed an imprudent marriage with a woman, who, without personal accomplishments, and without fortune, rendered his life, by her peevish manners, painful and uncomfortable. In 1584 he obtained the living of Drayton Beauchamp, Bucks, where the following year two of his pupils, Sandys, the son of his patron, and Cranmer, the nephew of the great Cranmer, visited him with marks of sincere respect, and heartfelt commiseration. Sandys reported to his father the indigent circumstances of his learned tutor, and the bishop, in return for the attention paid to his son, procured for this neglected man the mastership of the Temple, 1585. In this new situation Hooker had to struggle with Travers, the afternoon lecturer, who through disappointment so far forgot his duty, as to attack his coadjutor in the pulpit, and it was pleasantly observed by some of the congregation, that the forenoon sermon spake Canterbury, and the afternoon, Geneva, alluding to the principles to which the two rivals were attached. After defending himself with vigour and dignity against his opponent, Hooker obtained permission from Whitgift to exchange his preferment, and in 1591, he removed to the rectory of Boscomb, Wiltshire, to which was added the prebend of Nether-haven in Sarum church. In 1595 he was presented by the queen to Bishop's Bourne rectory in Kent, and here he passed the rest of his life, and completed his great work, Ecclesiastical Polity, which he had begun at Boscomb. In crossing between London and Gravesend by water, he unfortunately caught cold, which brought on a severe illness, which proved fatal, 2d Nov. 1600, in his 47th year. The fame of Hooker rests upon that incomparable work the Ecclesiastical Polity, in eight books, a work admired not only in England, but on the continent. It is said that the pope, Clement VIII. who declared that he knew no English writer who deserved the name of author, no sooner heard the contents of this immortal work, than he exclaimed, there is no learning that this man hath not searched into. His books will get reverence by age, for there is in them such seeds of eternity, that they will continue till the last fire shall devour all learning. Besides his answer to Travers's Supplication, Hooker published some sermons. His works have been edited folio and also in an Svo. form at Oxford.

HOOKER, Thomas, first minister of Hartford, Connecticut, was born at Marshfield, England, in 1586, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, of which he was afterwards elected a fellow. He was in 1626 chosen lecturer at Chelmsford, but was soon silenced for nonconformity. In 1633 he came to New-England, and after preaching some time at Cambridge, in June 1636, removed with several others, and commenced the settlement of Hartford, where he continued in the ministry till his death in 1647. He was eminent for talents and learning, of great dignity and energy as a preacher, and one of the best and most useful of the founders of the colonies. Several valuable volumes were selected from his manuscripts and published after his death.

HOOLE, Charles, a native of Wakefield, Yorkshire, educated at Lincoln college, Oxford. He was elected master of Rotherham school, but during the civil wars he came to London, and acquired some celebrity as a public teacher. His services to literature and to education, were acknowledged by the gratitude of bishop Saunderson, who gave him the rectory of Stock in Essex, and a prebend in Lincoln cathedral. Besides a translation of Terence's plays, he published a good edition of the Greek testament, and wrote also various useful school-books. He died 1666.

HOOLE, John, a native of London, son of a watch-maker, whose mechanical genius was much admired in the construction of the machinery of the scenes in Covent-garden. The son received a good education under Mr. Bennet, known to the public by his edition of Ascham's works; but when admitted clerk at the India house, at the age of 18, he devoted much of his time to literary pursuits, and to the study of modern languages, especially Italian. Besides three tragedies, Cyrus, acted at Covent-garden 1768, Timanthes, acted 1769, and Cleonice, acted 1775, he published spirited and much admired translations, in English metre, of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, and Tasso's Jerusalem. He wrote besides some original poems, and published the life of Mr. Scott of Amwell. This ingenious poet died 1803, aged 76.

HOOPER, George, an English prelate, born at Grimley, Worcestershire, about 1640, and educated at Westminster-school, from whence he went to Christ church as student, 1656. Highly distinguished as a scholar, he, in 1672, was made chaplain to Morley, bishop of Winchester, and soon after to Sheldon, the primate, who gave him the rectory of Lambeth, and the precentorship of Exeter. In 1677 he became D.D. and the same year was made almoner to the princess of Orange, whom he attended in Holland. He refused in 1680 the divinity professorship at Oxford, and in 1691, was made dean of Canterbury. In 1701 he was offered the primacy of Ireland by lord Rochester, the viceroy; and soon after Anne's accession, he was nominated bishop of St. Asaph, and half a year after, removed to Bath and Wells, where he continued to reside for 24 years. He died at Barkley, Somersetshire, 1727, and was buried in the cathedral of Wells. Besides three sermons, he published various tracts on theological and other subjects,—a Latin tract on Divorce,—an Inquiry into the State of the Ancient Measures, the Attic, Roman, and especially the Jewish, with an Appendix concerning our old English Money and Measures of Content, 1721. A beautiful edition of his works appeared at Oxford, in 1757, folio.

HOOPER, or HOPER, John, an English bishop and martyr, born in Somersetshire, and educated at Oxford. He was for some time of the fraternity of the Cistercian monks, but disliking their principles he returned to Oxford, and became a convert to the tenets of Luther. Upon the enacting of the statute of the six articles, he fled for safety, and after various escapes in France, in England, and in Ireland, he settled in Switzerland, and married, and then devoted himself to the study of Hebrew. On the death of Henry VIII. he returned to London, where he became a popular preacher, and distinguished himself as the accuser of Bonner. By the interest of his friend lord Warwick, he was nominated bishop of Gloucester 1550, and he was consecrated, though he refused to wear the canonical habits as approaching too near to popish forms, and two years after he obtained besides the see of Worcester in commendam. This worthy prelate, under the bloody reign of Mary, was marked for destruction. Neither his popularity as a preacher, his hospitality and benevolence as a prelate, nor his exemplary manners as a man, could save him from the flames. He was condemned to be burned, and he suffered the execution of the sentence at Gloucester, with becoming fortitude 1555, in his 60th year. His writings, and especially his letters preserved in Fox's monuments of the church, are excellent specimens of his learning, and of his mental abilities.

HOOPER, William, a member of congress from North Carolina, and one of those who signed the declaration of American Independence, was a native of Boston, Massachusetts, where he was born, June 17th, 1742. He was the son of a respectable minister of the episcopal church in that town; received the early part of his education under the direction of John Lovel, a teacher of great celebrity in his day; and completed his academical course in Harvard university, in which he was honourably distinguished, and graduated in 1760. He studied law under the care of James Otis, Esq. a celebrated patriot and orator of Boston. In 1764, attracted by some particular friends who sustained an influential character in North Carolina, he removed from Boston to that province, and commenced the practice of the law, in which he was highly successful. When the contest between Great Britain and the colonies came on, he took the side of liberty and independence. He was early elected a member of the legislature of North Carolina, and in that body, as well as by several popular publications, he plead with much zeal, eloquence, and effect, the cause of his country. In 1775, he was delegated by the legislature of the province to the American congress; was present at the declaration of independence, and had the honour of signing that instrument. He continued to occupy a seat in congress, until 1777, when his private affairs compelled him to resign. He, however, continued to fill various public stations in his adopted state, until 1787, when he finally retired from all public employment, and died in 1790, in the forty-ninth year of his age. He was a man of superior talents, of truly impressive eloquence, and of great activity, probity, public spirit, and genuine patriotism.

L.

HOORNECK, John, a Dutch divine, born at Haerlem, 1617. After studying in his native city, and at Leyden and Utrecht, he entered into the ministry at Cologne, 1652, and eleven years after returned to Holland. In 1644 he was raised to the chair of divinity professor at Utrecht, and appointed minister in ordinary in the church there, and after filling those two important offices with great ability and universal approbation, he was invited to similar employments at Leyden, 1654. He died 1666, aged 49. His works are various, on polemical, practical, historical, and other subjects; and throughout life he displayed, says Bayle, the complete model of a good pastor, and divinity professor.

He married 1650, at Utrecht, and left two sons.

HOPKINS, Ezekiel, v learned prelate, born at Sandford, Devonshire, where his father was curate. He was chorister of Magdalen college, Oxford, and at the age of sixteen was made usher of the college school, and some time after its chaplain. He became a popular preacher among the Presbyterians and Independents, and therefore the bishop of London refused to admit him to one of the city churches, in consequence of which he went to settle at Exeter. Here he was seen and admired by lord Robartes, afterwards earl of Truro, who gave him his daughter Araminta in marriage, and when lord lieutenant of Ireland, presented him to the deanery of Raphoe. The earl besides so strongly recommended him to lord Berkeley, the next viceroy, that he was in 1671 made bishop of Raphoe, and in 1681, translated to Londonderry. He left his diocess in 1688, when persecuted by lord Tyrconnel, and came to England, where he was elected minister of Aldermanbury, 1689, where he died 19th June, 1690. He was an able and interesting writer. He published five sermons, besides an Exposition of the ten Commandments, and an Exposition of the Lord's prayer.

HOPKINS, Charles, son of the preceding, was born at Exeter, and educated at Dublin, and afterwards at Cambridge. During the Irish rebellion of 1688, he was a zealous partisan in favour of William, and at the end of the troubles he returned to England, and became the associate of men of wit and fashion. In 1694 he published some epistolary poems and translations, and in 1695, produced "Pyrrhus," a tragedy, with an epilogue by Congreve. He was also the friend of Dryden, and by his "Art of Love," gained the acquaintance of the earl of Dorset; but his intemperance and debauchery soon proved fatal. He died 1699, in consequence of his excesses, aged 36. He wrote besides a translation of Ovid's History of Love, 2 tragedies, Boadicea, and the Female Warrior, &c.

HOPKINS, John, another son of the bishop, born January 1st, 1675. He had poetical powers, and published 1698, the Triumphs of Peace, or the Glories of Nassau—the Victory of Death,—and also Amasia, or the Works of the Muses, a collection of Poems, 3 vols. 1700. The particulars of his life are unknown, but it is supposed that like his brother, he was an unfortunate man.

HOPKINS, Edward, governor of Connecticut, was born at Shrewsbury, England, in 1600, and became a merchant in London. In 1637, he came to New-England, and settled at Hartford, where he was soon elected governor, and held the office a number of years. He afterwards returned to England, and became warden of the fleet, commissioner of the admiralty, and a member of parliament. He died in 1657. He was characterized by uprightness, prudence, and piety. He left the sum of 1500 pounds for the encouragement of learning in New-England, 1000 of which was appropriated to the support of grammar-schools in New-Haven, and Hartford, and the remainder to Harvard college.

HOPKINS, Stephen, LL.D. one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was born in Scituate, Rhode-Island, in March, 1707. He was descended from worthy ancestors, who were among the earliest settlers of Providence plantations. He possessed talents of a superior order, and having cultivated them with great assiduity, sustained a high rank among the political and literary characters of New-England. He was called into public life at a very early age, and in the various offices of legislator, chief justice, and governor of the colony, member of congress, and chancellor of the college, conducted with great dignity and ability. He was also extensively engaged in trade, navigation and manufactures, and was distinguished for his enterprise and public spirit. In 1757, he was a delegate to the congress which assembled at Albany, and one of the committee, which, on that occasion, drew up a plan of union for the colonies. In 1755, he was elected governor, and continued to sustain the office with the exception of four years, until 1768. On the approach of the revolution, he was called to exhibit his wisdom and patriotism on a more important theatre. No individual in the colony enjoyed more entirely the confidence of his fellow-citizens. In 1773, he was a delegate to the assembly from Providence, and a member of the committee of correspondence then appointed. In 1774, he was elected a delegate to congress, and remained in that office until after the establishment of independence. For several years before his death he suffered a paralytic affection, the effects of which are apparent in the signature of his name to the declaration of independence. He died July 20th, 1785, aged 79. He was the author of "the Rights of the Colonies Examined," which was published by order of the general assembly of Rhode-Island.

HOPKINS, Samuel, D.D. minister of Newport, Rhode-Island, was born at Waterbury, Connecticut, in 1721, and graduated at Yale-college, in 1741. Having studied theology with Mr. Edwards, of Northampton, he was in 1743, settled in Great Barrington, Massachusetts, where he continued till 1769, when he was dismissed, and soon after resettled at Newport, Rhode-Island. He continued there until his death, in 1803, eminently distinguished for piety and devotedness to the labours of his office. He possessed a vigorous mind, and a love of searching for the reasons of mysterious events in the divine government, that led him to the adoption of some peculiar opinions, such as that sin is necessary to the divine glory—that submission to God includes a willingness to suffer the punishment of sin in the future world, if necessary to His glory. It is from his name, that the term Hopkinsianism is derived. His chief publication was a system of Theology in 2 vols. 8vo.

HOPKINSON, Francis, a poet, and judge of the United States district court, for Pennsylvania, was born in that state, in 1738. At the commencement of the revolution he resided in New-Jersey, and was sent by that state to congress, in 1776, and signed the declaration of independence. After the peace, he held a place for some time in the loan-office, and was afterwards a judge of the admiralty for Pennsylvania; but in 1790, was advanced from that station to a seat on the bench of the district court of the United States. He died on the 9th May, of the following year. He was distinguished for vivacity and wit, and published, during the revolution, several poetical pieces which were highly popular. The chief among them was "The Battle of the Kegs." His writings were published in 1792, in three volumes, octavo.

HOPRON, Arthur, an able mathematician, son of Sir Arthur Hopton. He was born in Somersetshire, and educated as a gentleman commoner at Lincoln college, Oxford, where he took his first degree, and then removed to the Temple, London. Though he died at the early age of 26, 1614, he wrote some valuable treatises on the Geodetical Staff for Surveying, 4to.—the Topographical Glass, with the uses of that Instrument, the Theodolite, Plain Table, and Circumferenter, 4to.—a Concordance of Years according to the English Account, 8vo.—Prognostications from 1607, to 1614, &c. He was the intimate friend of the great Selden.

HOPTON, Ralph, lord, an English nobleman, who distinguished himself by his valour in the Low Countries, and afterwards in the king's service during the civil wars. His troops were under the best discipline, and with them he defeated Sir W. Waller, at Stratton, 1643; but though victorious he was obliged to retreat before the superior numbers of general Fairfax. He died at Bruges, 1652.

HOPTON, Susanna, a lady of Staffordshire, born of respectable parents. Though beguiled to conform to the tenets of the church of Rome by the arts of Turburville, a priest, she afterwards was reconciled to the protestant faith, and died at Hereford, 1709, aged 82, after surviving several years her husband Richard Hopton, one of the Welch judges. She wrote Daily Devotions, Hexameron, or Meditations on the six Days of the Creation,—and also corrected the devotions in the ancient way of Offices, published by her friend Dr. Hickes.

HORAPOLLO, or HORUS APOLLO, an Egyptian grammarian in the age of Theodosius. His two books on Egyptian hieroglyphics have been edited by Pauw.

HORATI, three brothers at Rome, who fought against the three Curiatii of Alba, B.C. 667, and conquered.

HORATIUS, Cocles, a Roman, celebrated for the valour with which he defended a bridge over the Tiber against the army of Porsenna. After the cutting down of the bridge he swam across the river with his armour.

HORATIUS, Q. Flaccus, a celebrated Roman poet, whose great abilities recommended him to the notice of Mæcenas, and of Augustus, with whom he lived in habits of intimacy and conviviality. He died eight years before Christ. His odes in four books, his episodes, satires, epistles, and Art of Poetry, are well known.

HORMAN, William, a native of Salisbury, educated at Winchester school and New-college, where he became fellow. He was in 1485 made master of Eton school, and also fellow, and afterwards vice-provost of the college. He died 1535. He was a good botanist as well as an able divine, and published Herbarum Synonyma—and also Indices to the writers de Re Rusticâ.

HORMISDAS, a pope and saint of the Romish calendar, elected to the papal chair 514. He assembled a council to condemn the tenets of the Eutychians, and died 523. Several of his letters are extant.

HORMISDAS II. king of Persia, succeeded his father, the great Chosroes, 578. His subjects revolted against him at the instigation of Varanes, his general, whom he offended by sending him a female dress because he had been defeated by the Romans. Hormisdas was deprived of his sight by the successful rebel, and died 590.

HORNE, George, a venerable prelate, born November 1, 1730, at Otham, near Maidstone, where his father was rector. After being educated by his father, he was two years at Maidstone school, and at the age of fifteen he was elected to a scholarship of University college, Oxford. On taking his bachelor's degree he removed to Magdalen college, where he was elected Kentish fellow. Here he devoted himself with unusual attention to Hebrew and sacred literature, and while he warmly embraced the principles of Hutchinson, and the philosophy of nature, as he regarded them deducible from the truths of Scripture, he laid the foundation for controversy and metaphysical disputations. In 1753 he took orders, and soon distinguished himself as an able and eloquent preacher. In 1768 he was elected president of his college, and soon after took the degree of D.D. and was made chaplain to the king, and in 1770 he was made vice-chancellor, and for four years supported that office with great dignity. In 1781 he was made dean of Canterbury by lord North, and in 1789 succeeded Bagot in the see of Norwich. His elevation, unhappily for the church and for posterity, was of short duration. His health had gradually been declining, and a paralytic stroke on his journey to Bath gave such a shock to his constitution, that he never recovered, and died soon after, 17th January, 1792, aged 62. He was buried at Eltham, in Kent. Though censured by some writers for his philosophical sentiments as the friend of Hutchinson and the opponent of Newton, bishop Horne must rank very high as a sincere and exemplary Christian, as a good scholar, an able divine, and a most benevolent and amiable man. By his wife, daughter of Mr. Burton, of Eltham, he had five daughters. His works, which are very valuable, and display the man of information, judgment, and erudition, were the Theology and Philosophy of Cicero's Somnium Scipionis, explained, &c. 8vo.—a fair and impartial State of the Case between Sir Isaac Newton and Mr. Hutchinson, 8vo.—Spicilegium Shuckfordianum, or a Nosegay for the critics, 12mo.—Christ and the Holy Ghost, Supporters of the Spiritual Life—and two sermons before the university, an Apology for certain Gentlemen in Oxford, aspersed in a late pamphlet, 8vo.—a View of Mr. Kennicott's Method of Correcting the Hebrew Text, 8vo.—Considerations on the Projected Reformation of the Church of England, to lord North—Considerations of the life and death of St. John the Baptist, 8vo. in sermons preached annually at Magdalen college, 8vo.—Commentary on the Book of Psalms, &c. 4to. 2 vols.—Letter to Adam Smith, LL.D. on the life, death, and Philosophy of David Hume, 12mo.—Discourses on several subjects and occasions, 2 vols. 8vo.—Letters on Infidelity, 12mo.—Letters to Dr. Priestley, 8vo.—Observations on the Case of Protestant dissenters, 8vo.—some volumes of sermons—Charge intended to be delivered to the Norwich Clergy at the Primary Visitation, 4to. 1791—Papers signed Z in the Ollapodrida, by Mr. Munro, &c. His life has been written with pleasing minuteness by his early friend Mr. Jones.

HORNECK, Anthony, a divine born at Baccharack, in the lower Palatinate, 1641, and educated in divinity at Heidelberg, under Spanheim. At the age of nineteen he came over to England, and entered at Queen's college, 1663, where the same year he was incorporated M.A. from the university of Wittemberg. He was made chaplain of his college and vicar of All Saints, Oxford, and two years after he went as tutor to the eldest son of the duke of Albermarle, by whom he was made rector of Doulton, in Devonshire, and prebendary of Exeter. After a visit of two years in Germany he was in 1671 made preacher of the Savoy, and afterwards he was very disinterestedly recommended by Russel, lord Orford, to the queen, and had the promise of a Westminster prebend, which he obtained 1693. He took the degree of D.D. 1681, at Cambridge, and became afterwards chaplain to William and Mary, and in 1694 obtained a prebend in the church of Wells. He died of the stone, January, 1696, in his 56th year, and was buried in Westminster abbey. Bishop Kidder, who wrote his life, describes him as a man of very extensive learning, well skilled in the learned languages, especially Hebrew, and in his duties of pastor unusually exemplary, so that he knew him sacrifice his hopes of preferment to the conscientious discharge of his duty. He published some sermons, and various other works, chiefly on theological subjects, much admired.

HORNER, Francis, barrister-at-law, was born at Edinburgh in 1778, and educated first at the High-school, and next at the university of his native city, where he contracted an intimacy with lord Henry Petty, now marquis of Lansdown. After studying the law and becoming an advocate, Mr. Horner repaired to London, and in 1806 was returned to parliament, though he did not distinguish himself as a senator till 1810, when he became chairman of the "Bullion Committee," to which subject he paid uncommon attention, and illustrated it in a very luminous report. His application to business, however, proved too much for his constitution, and he was obliged to seek the climate of Italy, where he died at Pisa, Feb. 8, 1817. He was one of the first writers in the Edinburgh Review.—W. B.

HORNIVS, George, historical professor at Leyden, where he died 1670, was born in the Palatinate. The loss of some property, it is said, in his old age, disordered his senses. He wrote Historia Ecclesiastica ad ann. 1666—de Originibus Americanis—Geographia vetus et nova—Orbis Politicus, Historia Philosophia, 4to.

HORREBOW, Peter, professor of astronomy, mathematics, and philosophy at Copenhagen, and particularly known as the first who discovered the aberration of the light of the fixed stars. He published Copernicus Triumphant, and died 1764, aged 85.

HORROX, Jeremiah, an English astronomer, born at Toxteth, Lancashire, about 1619. He finished his education at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and devoted himself most assiduously to the study of astronomy. He settled at Hoole, near Liverpool, and had the good fortune of being the first person who observed a transit of Venus over the sun's disc, 24th Nov. 1639. He was assisted in his astronomical observations and inquiries by his friend Crabtree, of Broughton, near Manchester, and he derived much information from the writings of Tycho Brahe, Kepler, and others. This able and ingenious man was cut off by a sudden death, in the midst of his observations, 3d Jan. 1640-1, and the value of the few things which he wrote, proves the irreparable loss which science suffered in his death. His "Venus in Sole visa," was preserved in MS. and published by Hevelius at Dantzic, 1662. He had undertaken some other works which he left incomplete. His "Opera Posthuma," appeared under the care of Dr. Wallis, 1673, but several of his papers were destroyed while in the hands of private persons, at the great fire of London, and from others Shakerly formed his "British Tables."

HORSLEY, John, author of Britannia Romana, was a native of Northumberland. He was educated at Newcastle, and then passed to Scotland, where he took the degree of M.A. and then settled at Morpeth, as teacher of a dissenting congregation. He died 12th Dec. 1731, a short time before the publication of the book on which his literary fame depends. His Britannia, divided into three books, is a most valuable composition, and gives a very accurate account of the different stations of the Roman legions and governments in the island, of the inscriptions and sculptures still preserved, and of the geographical divisions and names, with other particulars of the country. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, and some of his letters to R. Gale are preserved in Hutchinson. His accuracy and learning are as much admired as the excellence of the plan of his great work.

HORSLEY, Samuel, a learned prelate, born in St. Martin's in the fields, where his father was clerk in orders, and educated at Trinity hall, Cambridge. He took his degree of LL.B. in 1758, and 10 years after attended lord Aylesford at Christchurch, Oxford, where he proceeded to the degree of LL.D. In 1778 he succeeded on the death of his father to the living of Thorley, Herts, in the gift of the bishop of London, to whom he was chaplain, and he held also the rectory of St. Mary, Newington, which he exchanged for that of South Weald, Essex, in 1782. He was for some years an active member of the Royal Society, and also their secretary, but after contributing much to their transactions, he retired in consequence of the dissensions which prevailed in that learned body, and in which he took a zealous part. When archdeacon of St. Alban's, he directed his attention to the tenets of Dr. Priestley, and in his charge, and in some pamphlets, he displayed so much ability, and refuted in so dexterous a manner, and with such unanswerable arguments, this bold champion of materialism and philosophical necessity, as to gain the respect and the admiration of every friend of true Christianity. He was afterwards presented to Aldbury rectory, in Surrey, by lord Aylesford, and Thurlow, the chancellor, was so pleased with his zeal and conduct in his late controversy, that he gave him a prebend of Gloucester, and in 1788 procured his elevation to the see of St. David's. In his diocese the new prelate gained deserved popularity by increasing the stipend of curates, and promoting their comforts; and in 1793 he was translated to Rochester with the deanery of Westminster, and in 1802 passed to the see of St. Asaph. He died after a few days' illness, 4th October, 1806, at Brighton, where he had gone to pay a visit to his venerable patron Thurlow, whom on his arrival he found dead. His remains were interred in Newington church. He was twice married, and had one son by his first wife, and a daughter who died young, and by his second he had no family. Besides single sermons preached on public occasions, and controversial tracts in defence of the church establishment, and of the true principles of Christianity, the bishop published editions of the Inclinations of Apollonius—of sir Isaac Newton's works, 5 vols. 4to.—treatises on Virgil's two Seasons of Honey—on the Properties of the Greek and Latin Languages—critical Disquisition on the 18th Chapter of Isaiah, &c. As a speaker in the senate the bishop was eloquent, clear, and argumentative, and on all important national discussions, and especially when the hierarchical establishment of the country was mentioned, he generally delivered his sentiments, and was listened to with deference and admiration. Against the French revolution he pointed all the vehemence of his oratorical powers, and he foresaw the calamities to which this country would be exposed if it did not resist the attempt of innovators and of anarchists. As a preacher Dr. Horsley was impressive, and though he was in his manner rather dictatorial, yet his delivery was pleasing and his enunciation distinct. His mind, it may be said, grasped all the learning of the ancient and the modern world, his heart was warm and generous, his feelings noble and patriotic, and his head capable and willing to serve the cause of virtue, morality, and religion. Though ridiculed by some for the zeal with which he opposed the revolutionary principles of France, he indignantly spurned at popularity which was to be purchased by bending to the vitiated politics of the time, and in supporting the cause of order and decency with consistency and spirit, he ably defended the measures of government, and gained the approbation of every man of sound sense and true piety in the kingdom. In his private character he was highly respectable, though irascible he was benevolent and humane, and his deeds of charity have often proved burdensome to his income, and distressed him in his pecuniary affairs. With his intimate friends he was a pleasant, entertaining, and agreeable companion, and in upholding the character of the Christian he showed that he was not insensible to the innocent pleasures, and the recreations of the man.

HORSTIUS, James, a physician, born at Torgau, 1537, created M.D. in the university of Frankfort on the Oder 1582. After practising at Sagan Sudinitz, and Iglaw, he was elected medical professor of the university of Helmstadt in 1584. He long supported the character of a popular and able physician, and died 1600. By his first wife, whom he married 1562, he had 10 children. She died 1585, and two years after he married another. He was a man of piety, and called down the blessings of heaven upon his various prescriptions, a religious custom which he recommended to his medical brethren with little effect. With all his learning, he was imposed upon by the golden tooth of a child in Silesia, about which he wrote a dissertation before the deception was divulged. He wrote besides Compendium Medicarum Institutionum,—Herbarium,—De Noctambulis,—Epistolæ Philosophicæ et Medicinales,—Commentary on Hippocrates's Book on the Heart,—Disputationes Catholicæ, &c.

HORSTIUS, Gregory, nephew of the preceding, was born at Torgau, 1578, and was made M.A. at Wittemberg, and M.D. at Basil. He was professor of physic in several places, but lastly at Ulm in Germany, where he died of the gout, Aug. 1636. His abilities were such that he obtained the title of the Æsculapius of Germany. He wrote de Tuendâ Sanitate—de Causis Similitudinis et Dissimilitudinis in Fœtu, &c.—de Naturâ Amoris, &c. By his first wife, who died 1634, after a union of 19 years, he left two daughters and four sons, three of whom were physicians, and two, John Daniel and Gregory, authors of Medical Tracts, &c. His second wife he married only 13 months before his death.

HORTE, John, an English divine. He was educated for the ministry among the dissenters under Thomas Rowe, where he had Dr. Watts among his fellow-students; but after officiating for some time at Marshfield in Gloucestershire, he conformed to the church and was regularly ordained. He preached a visitation sermon at Aylesbury, in 1708, and was made by the lord lieutenant of Ireland, to whom he was chaplain, bishop of Leighlin and Fernes. He was afterwards translated to Kilmore, and in 1742 to Tuam, where he died 1751. Besides a charge to the clergy of Tuam in 1742, he wrote a volume of sermons of great merit, 1738, Dublin, Svo. and London, 1757.

HORTENSIVS, Quintus, a Roman orator of great abilities and equal celebrity. He died very rich B.C. 49, and his daughter Hortensia it is said inherited all his oratorical powers.

HORTENSIVS, Lambert, a philologer, poet, and historian, who it is said assumed that name because his father was a gardener. He was born at Montfort, Utrecht, and studied at Louvain, and was for many years rector of the grammar school of Naarden, where he died 1577, aged 76. He wrote, besides satires and other poems, seven books, De Bello Germanico, under Charles V.—de Tumultu Anabaptist.—Commentaries on the six first-books of the Æneid—Notes on four Comedies of Aristophanes.

HORTENSIVS, Martin, an astronomer, born at Delft. He died 1639, aged 34. He wrote de Mercurio sub sole viso, et Venere Invisâ.—de Utilitate et Dignitate Mathematicis.—de Oculo, ejusque Præstantiâ.

HOSEA, the first of the minor prophets, flourished from A.M. 3194 to 3219, under the reign of the second Jeroboam, and of Uzziah.

HOSIUS, Stanislaus, a cardinal, born of poor parents at Cracow in Poland. By his abilities he gradually rose to distinction and became secretary to the king of Poland, bishop of Culm, of Warmia, and at last a cardinal. He was employed by Pius IV. to procure the continuance of the council of Trent, in which he presided with great eloquence and dignity. He died 1579, aged 76. He left by his will a library to Cracow. His works in 2 vols. folio, were popular, and in them he showed himself an able and zealous advocate of the see of Rome.

HOSKINS, John, an English portrait painter, who died 1664. He was eminent in his profession and took the portraits of the second Charles, his queen and family. He had the Coopers, Alexander, and Samuel, for his pupils.

HOSPINIUS, Rodolphus, a Swiss writer, born at Altdorf near Zurich 1547. He studied at Zurich, and after visiting the universities of Marburg, and Heidelberg, he was admitted into the ministry 1568, and the next year married. In 1571 he was made provisor of the abbey school of Zurich, and in consequence of his services as a writer he was made in 1588, archdeacon of the Caroline church, and in 1594 minister of the abbey church. After being blind in consequence of a cataract for about a year, he recovered his sight by couching, 1613. For the last three years of his life he grew childish. He died 1626, aged 79. His abilities were so universally acknowledged that he was considered as the only scholar capable of refuting Baronius's Annals. He undertook a very celebrated and important work, "a History of the Errors of Popery," which he published at various times in different portions, and with universal applause. These and other works were republished together at Geneva, 1681, in seven thin vols. folio. By his first wife, who died 1612, he had 14 children. He afterwards took a second wife.

HOSPITAL, Michael de P, chancellor of France, son of a physician, was born at Aigueperse, Auvergne, 1505. After studying at the most celebrated universities of France and Italy, he was raised to distinction for his abilities, and successively became auditor of the Rota at Rome, counsellor of the parliament at Paris, ambassador to the council of Trent, and superintendent of the French provinces. In this last and difficult office he laboured earnestly to restore the ruined finances of his country, but while he raised again the national affairs to prosperity, he paid no regard to his own domestic concerns, so that after continuing six years at the head of a department where he might have appropriated millions to his use, he was found incapable of portioning out his daughter, and was therefore indebted on that occasion to the king's liberality. On the death of Henry II. he was introduced into the council of state, and in the midst of turbulence and faction he was raised to the high office of chancellor of the kingdom, to which his firmness, his integrity, and his virtues entitled him. He proved himself a determined friend in the cause of toleration, and in consequence of the mildness of his conduct he was suspected of favouring the cause of the protestants, so that the seals were taken from him by the influence of Catharine de Medicis, and on the fatal night of St. Bartholomew he was marked for the general slaughter. A party of horse advanced against him, but while with unconcern he would not even shut his castle gates, or fly for safety, an order was sent, at the moment, from the king to spare his life. This great man and upright magistrate died 1573, aged 68. His features are said to have resembled those of Aristotle.

He wrote Latin poems, published Amsterdam, 1732, 8vo.—Specches, &c.—Memoirs containing treaties of peace, &c. He left only one daughter.

HOSPITAL, William Francis Antony, Marquis de P, an eminent French mathematician, born 1661. He was for some time in the army, but he left the military profession in consequence of his being very short sighted, and then applied himself with redoubled ardour to his favourite mathematical pursuits. At the age of 32 he gave a public solution of some difficult problems, proposed to mathematicians in the city of Leipsic. In 1693 he was made honorary member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and distinguished himself by his work on Newton's Calculations, called "L'Analyse des Infiniments Petits." He wrote also Les Sections Coniques—les Lieux Geometriques—la Construction des Equations—une Theorie des Courbes Mechaniques, &c. This amiable man died of a fever, 2d Feb. 1704, aged 49.

HOSSEN, Sidronius, a Flemish Jesuit, who died 1653, aged 57. He wrote some elegant Latin poems, published together, Antwerp, 1656.

HOSTE, Paul P, a French Jesuit, professor of mathematics at Toulon, where he died 1700, aged 48. He was author of Traité des Evolutions Navales, fol. 1727,—Traité des Mathematiques les plus necessaires à un Officier, 3 vols. 12mo. translated into English by W. Webster. Another mathematician of that name was author of treatises on the Artificial Sphere,—Practical Geometry,—Description and Use of Geometrical Instruments, &c. and died 1634.

HOSTRUS, Matthew, a German antiquary, who died 1587, aged 78. He was author of treatises de Numeratione Emendatâ, Græcis et Latin. Usitatâ,—de Re Numerariâ, Gr. Rom. Hebr. &c.—Monomachia Davidis et Golia,—de Multiplici Assis Usu,—de Sex Hydriarum Capacitate,—Inquisitio in Fabricationem Arcæ Noæ, &c.

HOTMAN, Francis, a French civilian, born at Paris, 1524. He studied the civil law at Orleans, and at the age of 18 he became a doctor in that faculty, but the chicanery of the law disgusted him, and he applied himself to polite literature, and began to read lectures in the public school at Paris. By embracing the precepts of Luther, he obliged his father and retired to Geneva, and afterwards was made professor of belles lettres at Bern. He afterwards was invited to Strasburg to fill the chair of civil law, and so high was his reputation that he received very liberal offers from Prussia, Hesse, Saxony, and the queen of England, to settle in their dominions. He next was professor at Bourges, by the invitation of Margaret of France; but after escaping with difficulty from the massacre of 1572, he left France, determined never to return, and went to Geneva, and Basil, where he read lectures on civil law. He died at Basil of the dropsy, 1590. During the six years of illness which preceded his death he revised his works which were edited, 3 vols. folio, 1599. His writings were chiefly on civil law, on the government of France, on Roman Antiquities, besides a treatise de Consolatione. He has been admired for his piety and firmness, though some have accused him of avarice. He, like the rest of his learned contemporaries, lost much of his time and money in searching for the philosopher's stone.

HOTTINGER, John Henry, a learned Orientalist born at Zurich, 1620. He displayed such abilities in his younger years that his education was considered as a general concern, and therefore he was sent at the public expense to visit foreign countries, for the improvement of his mind. He studied at Geneva under Spanheim, at Groningen under Gomarus and Alting, and at Leyden under Golius, and after visiting England he returned to Zurich, where he was honourably appointed in 1643 to the chair of divinity, and of the oriental languages. In 1655 he took the degree of D.D. at Basil, and by the permission of the magistrates of Zurich, he answered the invitation of the elector Palatine, to assist him for three years in restoring to its ancient fame the university of Heidelberg. Thus honoured with the friendship and confidence of the elector, he engaged in the important work, and afterwards accompanied his patron to Frankfort, where he had a conference with Job Ludoff the celebrated Orientalist, and concerted with him measures for sending missionaries to explore the state of Ethiopia, and the progress of Christianity in those remote countries. In 1661 he was recalled back to Zurich, and he obeyed the summons of his fellow-citizens, honoured with the title of ecclesiastical counsellor to the elector. The breaking out of a war in 1664, called his abilities into action, and he was sent as a negotiator to Holland; but while many universities solicited the honour of granting him a professor's chair, his countrymen refused to permit him to quit Switzerland. The entreaties of the Dutch at last, however, prevailed, but while Hottinger was preparing for this honourable appointment, he unfortunately was drowned in the river which passes through Zurich, 5th June, 1667. He had indeed escaped to land, with two friends who were in the boat when it sunk under him, but seeing his wife and three children and servant in danger, he attempted their rescue, but perished in the stream. His wife, one of his friends, and the servant were saved, but the children perished with him. Four sons and two daughters survived him. It has been properly a matter of surprise that among his many avocations as public professor in various situations, and as the active correspondent of the learned of Europe, he could possibly find time to write so much. His works best known are Exercitationes Anti-morianæ de Pentateucho Samaritano, 1644, 4to. against Morin a contemporary critic—Thesaurus Philologicus, seu Clavis Scripturæ, 1649, 4to.—Historia Orientalis quæ ex variis Orientalium Monumentis collecta agit, &c. 1651, 4to.—Promptuarium, sive Bibliotheca Orientalis, &c. 1658, 4to.—Etymologicum Orientale sive Lexicon Harmonicum Heptaglotton, &c. 1661, 4to. the seven languages were Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Samaritan, Ethiopic and Rabbinical, with which the author was most perfectly acquainted. Other works less important were published by Hottinger, mentioned in Bibliotheca Tigurina, and in Heidegger's life of him 1667. One of his sons, John James, was divinity professor at Zurich, and died 1735, aged 83, author of some theological works.

HOTZE, an Austrian general, born in Zurich. He served with great credit under Wurmser at the taking of the Weissenburg lines, and distinguished himself at the battles of Neumarck, and of Wurtzburg, for which he was made knight of the order of Maria Theresa. He commanded in 1799 the left wing of the Archduke Charles's army, and was killed some time after near Kaltenbrunn.

HOUARD DE LA MOTHE, Anthony, a native of Dieppe, who died at Abbeville 1803, aged 78. He was well skilled in law antiquity, and was member of the academy of inscriptions, and of the national institute, and wrote Anciennes Loix des Francois, conservées dans les Coutumes Angloises, 2 vols. 4to.—Traité sur les Coutumes Anglo-Normandes, &c. 4 vols. 4to.—He had 17 children by his wife, with whom he lived happy 54 years.

HOUBIGOUT, Charles Francis, a papist of the congregation of the Oratory, was born at Paris 1686. As he was deaf he had recourse for consolation to study, and so great was his progress and his fame, that he was honoured with the most flattering marks of approbation not only by his countrymen, but by Pope Benedict XIV. This worthy man, who added to his extensive learning the most amiable character of private life, died 1783, aged 98. His works best known are an edition of the Hebrew Bible with a Latin version and notes, Paris 1753, 4 vols. folio, a most valuable work—a Latin Translation of the Psalter from the Hebrew, 1746, 12mo.—another of the Old Testament, 8 vols. 8vo.—Racines Hebraïques, 8vo.—Examen du Psautier des Capuchins, 12mo.—Sherlock's Sermons translated.—Leslie's Work against the Deists and Jews translated, &c.

HOUBRAKEN, Arnold, a Dutch painter, born 1660 at Dordt. He studied literature as well as painting, and wrote the lives of the Flemish painters, printed 3 vols. folio, 1754. His son Jacob was eminent as an engraver.

HOUCHARD, John Nicholas, a French general, born at Forbach. He raised himself to the highest ranks of the army, and after serving under Custines with credit, he accused him of losing Mayence by his misconduct. The accusation was believed, Custines was disgraced, and Houchard placed at the head of the army, displayed his abilities in the victories of Dunkirk, of Hondscoot, of Furnes, Menin, &c. His services, however, did not protect him, as he was treated by Hoche as he had treated Custines, and being arrested at Lisle on a charge of treason, he was hurried to Paris and guillotined 15th Nov. 1793.

HOUDARD DE LA MOTTE, Anthony, a French writer. Vid. MOTTE.

HOUDRY, Vincent, a Jesuit, born at Tours, 22d Jan. 1631. He was eloquent as a preacher, and possessed some merit as a writer. He published la Bibliothèque des Predicateurs, 22 vols. 4to.—la Morale, 8 vols. &c. He died at Paris, 29th March, 1730, expressing sorrow in his last moments that he was not permitted to reach his 100th year.

HOVEDEN, Roger de, an English historian in the age of Henry II. born at York. Like the clergy of his times he united the professions of divine and lawyer, and was, as it is supposed engaged, in the family of the king; but the time of neither his birth nor his death can be ascertained. He wrote annals which began 731, where Bede left off, and continued to the third year of king John. These annals were first published 1595, and reprinted at Frankfort, folio, 1601. He is deservedly praised by Leland, and by Saville his editor, for fidelity. According to Vossius he wrote a History of Northumbrian kings, and a Life of Becket.

HOUGH, John, bishop of Worcester, is celebrated for his opposition when president of Magdalen college, Oxford, to the arbitrary proceedings of James II. He was born in Middlesex, 1650, and after receiving his education at Birmingham, entered at Magdalen college, 1669, where he became fellow. At the breaking of the popish plot he was improperly suspected, and his papers were examined, but he did not lose his popularity, and he attended his patron, the duke of Ormond, to Ireland, and at his return in 1685 he obtained a prebend at Worcester. In 1687 he was elected president of his college by the fellows, who thus rejected the arbitrary mandamus of James in favour of Anthony Farmer, but he was soon after expelled by the king's commissioners, and Parker, bishop of Oxford, placed in his room. During this struggle with the court and with a popish party, Hough behaved with great spirit, but becoming moderation and dignity, and at the approach of William of Orange the college was restored to its rights, and the president to his office. In 1690 William nominated this faithful champion of protestantism to the see of Oxford, and in 1699 he was translated to Lichfield. On Tenison's death he through modesty declined the primacy, but two years after, 1717, accepted the see of Worcester, where he continued upwards of 26 years. He was a liberal benefactor, and repaired with becoming magnificence the palaces of the sees to which he was promoted, at the expense, it is said, of not less than 7000*l*. This worthy and venerable prelate died 8th March, 1743, in his 93d year, and the 53d of his episcopate.

HOU LIERES, Antoniette de la Garde des, widow of William de Lason, was born at Paris, 1638. She was the pupil of Henault, and she imitated him not only as a writer of poetry but as a skeptic and atheist. She was member of the academy of Ricovrati of Padua, and of Arles, and died at Paris, 1694. She was flattered for the versatility of her muse at the court of Lewis XIV. and her odes, epigrams, tragedies, but especially her pastorals, possess great spirit and equal beauty. Her daughter, who bore her name, was also a poetess, and was not devoid of abilities, since she obtained the prize of the French academy, against Fontenelle as her competitor. She died at Paris, 1718. The works of these two poetical ladies were published 1747, 2 vols. 12mo.

HOUSEMAN, Cornelius, a painter of Antwerp, born 1648. He settled at Mechlin, and died 1727. His landscapes, exhibiting animals and trees in rich variety, are much admired.

HOUSEMAN, James, a painter of Antwerp, born 1656. His portraits and historical pieces were in high repute. He was in England where he completed that beautiful work, the altar piece of St. James's Chapel. He died 1696.

HOUSSAYE. Vid. AMELOT.

HOUSTON, William, an English physician. He was a surgeon in the West Indies, and took the degree of M.D. at Leyden, under Boerhaave. He was assisted at Leyden by Van Swieten in making some curious experiments on brutes, which were published in the philosophical transactions, vol. 39. He was fellow of the Royal Society, and died 1733, in the West Indies. His MS. catalogue of plants was published by Sir J. Banks. Another tract of his is inserted in the philosophical transactions, 37th vol.

HOUSTON, John, governor of Georgia, was early distinguished among the friends of the revolution in that state, and was one of the four individuals who called the first meeting of the friends of liberty at Savannah, in 1774, which approved and resolved to support the measures adopted in Massachusetts. In 1775 he was elected one of the delegates of Georgia in Congress. In 1777 he was elected a member of the council, and in January, 1778, governor of the state. He was afterwards several years a member of Congress, and was one of the convention which framed the national constitution. He was also first judge of the supreme court of Georgia, and died at Savannah, August, 1796.  L.

HOUEVILLE, Claude Francis, member of the congregation of the Oratory, was born at Paris, and died there 1742, aged 54. He was secretary to the French academy, and also to cardinal Dubois, who greatly esteemed his character and abilities. His chief work is, the Truth of the Christian Religion proved by Facts, 3 vols. 4to. and 4 vols. 12mo.

How, William, a physician and botanist. He was born in London, and after being at Merchant-tailors' school, he was elected to St. John's college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts. He was captain of a troop of horse in the royal army, but when the king's affairs were ruined, he came to London, where he practised physic, and died 1656, aged 37. He wrote Phytologia Britannica Natales exhibens Indigenarum stirpium sponte emergentium, 12mo. and he edited also Lobel's Illustrations of Plants.

HOWARD, Thomas, earl of Surrey, and duke of Norfolk, distinguished himself by his bravery in the service of his country. He assisted his brother Sir Edward in his attack against Sir Andrew Barton, a Scotch pirate, who in 1511 spread terror and devastation on the English coast, and after killing the leader, and capturing the ships, he embarked for Guienne with the marquis of Dorset, and ably contributed in the conquest of Navarre by the arms of Ferdinand. Raised to the honour of high admiral after his brother's death, he next displayed his valour in the field, and ensured the defeat of the Scotch in the battle of Floddenfield, which proved fatal to James IV. He afterwards went to Ireland as viceroy, and after an absence of two years, during which he suppressed a rebellion, he returned to lead a fleet against the French. These high services were rewarded by the king, who created him earl of Surrey, and restored his father to the dukedom of Norfolk, but popularity was transitory under a capricious government, and the English admiral was accused of treason. He saw his son beheaded upon the false accusation, and escaped the same fatal blow only by the previous death of the king. He died 1554, aged 66.

HOWARD, Edward, a brave English admiral, younger brother to the preceding. He was knighted about 1494 for his services, and afterwards was placed at the head of a fleet to attack and destroy the French ships which infested the English coast. He had the good fortune to defeat the enemy's fleet off Brest, but the following year 1514, he was killed in boarding the Pregant the French admiral's ship, and his body was immediately committed to the deep.

HOWARD, Henry, earl of Surrey, son of Thomas Duke of Norfolk above mentioned, was born about 1520. He celebrated with all the powers of poetry, the personal charms of his mistress the celebrated Geraldine supposed by lord Orford, to be the lady Elizabeth Fitzgerald, second daughter of lord Kildare, who afterwards married Clinton, earl of Lincoln, and with such devotion did he profess his attachment, that he travelled over Europe in the true spirit of chivalry, and challenged every knight, who might be inclined to dispute her superior beauty. His valour was also displayed and with the greatest effect at the famous battle of Floddenfield, but all his virtues and services were of no avail against the gloomy suspicions of Henry VIII. The capricious monarch, either jealous of Howard's prowess and popularity, or pretending that he aspired to the crown, by soliciting the hand of the princess Mary, arraigned him as guilty of treason, and caused him to be beheaded on Tower-hill 1547. As a poet this unfortunate nobleman is very respectable, the harmony of his numbers, and the purity of his language have been deservedly commended by Pope, Warton, and others; and he had the singular merit of being the first of the English nobility who courted the muses. His sonnets, &c. have been published in Anderson's collection.

HOWARD, Sir Robert, youngest son of Thomas, earl of Berkshire, was eminent for his learning. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, and after the restoration, was elected member for Stockbridge, and afterwards for Castle Rising, and was made auditor of the Exchequer. Though the favourite of the second Charles, he showed himself a violent enemy to James II. and a firm supporter of the revolution. He died about 1700. He was author of the History of the reigns of Edward, and Richard II. &c. Svo.—a letter to Johnson, —Virgil's fourth Æneid translated—History of Religion, Svo.—Statius' Achilleis translated,—various poems and plays, &c.

HOWARD, Charles, earl of Nottingham, son of lord William Howard, was born 1536. He early devoted himself to a military life, and served under his father, and afterwards became general of horse, and distinguished himself against the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland and their rebel forces. In 1569 he escorted in an English fleet Anne of Austria, daughter of Maximilian, from Zealand to Spain where she was married to king Philip. He succeeded his father in the title of Effingham in 1572, and soon after commanded the English fleet, which with such persevering bravery attacked and completely defeated the Spanish armada. For these services he was raised to the earldom of Nottingham by the queen; but in the next reign, though for a while ambassador at the court of Spain, he was dismissed from his offices, and succeeded by the greater favourite Villiers duke of Buckingham. He died 1624.

HOWARD, John, a celebrated philanthropist, born at Hackney 1726. When very young he lost his father who was a carpet warehouse keeper in Long lane, Smithfield, in consequence of which his guardians bound him apprentice to a grocer; but as his constitution was delicate, and his property above mediocrity, he purchased his indentures, and travelled over France and Italy. On his return to London he lodged for some time at the house of Mrs. Lardeau, a widow, at Stoke Newington, and so great was the attention of this lady to him during a severe illness that gratitude produced affection, so that he married her though much older than himself. Three years after, 1755, he had the misfortune to lose her, and this melancholy event he deplored with all the sincerity of fondness and undiminished affection. The next year he set out for Lisbon to view the dreadful consequences of the earthquake, but the frigate in which he had set out was captured by a French privateer, and the severities of confinement which he endured in France exerted that sympathy for suffering captives which have rendered his name so illustrious. After his release he visited Italy, and on his return he settled near Lymington, where in 1758, he married, but in 1765, he lost his wife in child-bed. Afterwards he purchased an estate at Cardington near Bedford, and there employed himself in acts of benevolence among the poor and industrious cottagers who surrounded him. In 1773 he served the office of sheriff, and this as he says brought the distress of prisoners more immediately under his notice, and led him to the humane design of visiting the jails of England to administer relief and to suggest improvement. In 1774, he stood candidate to represent Bedford, but notwithstanding his very numerous, amounting to nearly 50. They are chiefly on temporary and political subjects. The best known of these are his letters, which, as they contain an interesting account of the public affairs of the time, have gone through eleven editions.

HOWEL, Richard, governor of New-Jersey, was a native of Delaware. He entered at an early age in the practice of law, but in 1776 was appointed to the colonelcy of a Jersey regiment, which he held till 1779, when he returned to his profession. In 1788 he was appointed clerk of the supreme court, and remained in the office till elected governor of the state in 1793. After having held that station for eight years, and discharged its duties with reputation, he died April 28, 1802.  L.

HOZIER, Peter d', an eminent genealogist, born at Marscilles 1592. He was honoured with the confidence of Lewis XIII. and XIV. and for his abilities was rewarded with the appointment of judge of arms, certifier of titles, and counsellor of state. He died at Paris 1660. He was author of a history of Britany, folio, and of some valuable genealogical tables.

HUARTE, John, a native of French Navarre in the 17th century. He is the author of a curious and interesting book in Spanish, called, an Examination of such Geniuses as are fit for acquiring the Sciences, &c. with directions to discover the properties of each genius, &c. The work has been translated into Latin, Italian, French, and other languages, and also, into English, under the title of Trial of Wits. Though commended, however, by many, Bayle censures him, and among other things, for publishing as genuine, the pretended Letter of Lentulus, from Jerusalem to the Roman senate, in which he describes the Saviour, his very hair, beard shape, and stature, &c.

HUBBARD, William, historian of New-England, was born in 1621, and was graduated with the first class at Harvard college in 1642. He settled in the ministry at Ipswich, Massachusetts, and remained there greatly beloved for his amiableness, and respected for his learning, till his death in 1704. He wrote a history of New-England, for which he received the thanks of the general court of Massachusetts, and the gift of fifty pounds. It is preserved in manuscript, and was not long since printed.  L.

HUBER, Samuel, a native of Berne, divinity professor at Wittemberg 1592. He opposed predestination, and wrote an able explanation of the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters of the Romans.

HUBER, Ulric, a Dutch lawyer and philologist, born at Dorkum 1635. He was professor of law and history at Franeker, and afterwards at Lewarde, and died 1694. His publications are seven Dissertations, De genuina Ætate Assyriorum et Medorum—Treatises de Jure Civitatis—Specimen Philosophiæ—Institutiones Historiæ Civilis, &c.—He was succeeded in his professorship by his son Zacharias, who died 1732, aged 33. After publishing a dissertation, De vero sensu atque Interpretatione Legis IX. D. De Lege Pompeia, &c.

HUBER, Mary, a female writer. She was born at Geneva, and died at Lyons 1753, aged 43. She wrote an Abridgment of the Spectator—Letters on religion essential to Man—The System of Ancient and Modern Theologians, on the State of the Soul after Death.—She was a protestant, and some of her works were violently attacked by the catholic divines.

HUBER, John Rudolph, a painter of Basil, who died 1743, aged 80. He painted 3065 portraits, besides historical pieces, and transfused the graces of the Italian school into his works.

HUBERT, Matthew, a priest of the oratory of Paris. He was distinguished as an eloquent preacher, and inferior only to Bourdaloue. He died 22d March, 1717, aged 77. His sermons, which had pleased the congregations of the capital and of the provinces, were published 1725 in 6 vols. 12mo. and are highly esteemed.

HUBNER, John, a native of Lusatia or Torgau, in Saxony, who wrote some popular works in history and geography, in the form of question and answer. He was professor of geography at Leipsic, and rector of the school of Hamburg, where he died 1731, aged 63. The chief of his works which have been translated into various languages, are Genealogical Tables—Bibliotheca Historica Hamburgensis—Museum Geographicum—and a Genealogical Lexicon.

HUDDE, John, an able mathematician, burgomaster of Amsterdam, and known also as a politician. He died 1704, and left some mathematical works of great merit.

HUDSON, Henry, an English navigator who was for some time employed to find a north passage to China and Japan. The first voyage was in 1607, another was undertaken the next year, and a third in 1609, at the expense of the Dutch East India company. In these voyages little was discovered besides fields of ice, though the navigator entertains his readers with an account of a mermaid seen by his men. In 1610 a fourth voyage was undertaken, and the bold adventurer penetrated towards the north of America, and entered those straits which lead into the bay now bearing his name. After sailing above 100 leagues in expectation of having discovered the long sought passage, he found that he was at the bottom only of a deep bay, and after enduring great hardships from shortness of provisions, and from the rigour of the climate, he sailed back on his return. Some of his men, however, were dissatisfied at his conduct, and rising against him, they fastened his arms behind him, and put him, his son, and seven men, the most infirm of the crew, into his small shallop, and turned them adrift. The shallop was never afterwards heard of, but the inhuman mutineers reached Plymouth, Sept. 1611. A company now exists which bears his name, and trades to that part of America which he discovered.

HUDSON, Dr. John, an English critic, born at Wide-hope near Cocker-mouth in Cumberland 1662, and entered at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. In 1636 he was chosen fellow of University college, and became a most able and active tutor, and in 1701 he was elected keeper of the Bodleian library, when he took the degree of D.D. In 1712 he was appointed principal of St. Mary-hall, through the interest of Dr. Radcliffe; and to his influence with that celebrated physician, Oxford, it is said, is indebted for the many noble benefactions which she received. A sedentary life brought on at last a dropsy, of which Dr. Hudson died Nov. 27, 1719, leaving one daughter by the daughter of Sir Richard Harrison, an alderman and mercer of Oxford. The labours of Dr. Hudson were employed in the publication of Velleius Paterculus—Thucydides—Geographiæ Veteris Scriptores Græci Minores—Dionysius of Halicarnassus—Longinus—Æsop, &c. with short and valuable notes. His beautiful edition of Josephus, left unfinished, was completed and published 1720, in 2 vols. folio, by his friend Antony Hall, who also married his widow. It was his intention to publish a catalogue of the Bodleian library, which he had already transcribed in 6 vols. fol. He was the frequent and respected correspondent of the most learned men of Europe.

HUDSON, Thomas, an English painter, son-in-law of Richardson. He for many years painted portraits in London, but he is better known as being the preceptor of Sir Joshua Reynolds. He died 1779, aged 78.

HUET, Peter Daniel, a learned French prelate, born at Caen in Normandy, Feb. 8, 1630. The early death of his parents left him at the mercy of guardians who neglected him, but the vigour of his mind prevailed over all opposition. By the direction of his tutor, Mambrun, a Jesuit, he became well acquainted with literature, and particularly geometry, and by the assistance of Bochart, who was a protestant minister of Caen, he made himself a perfect master of the Greek and Latin classics. When of age he visited Paris to purchase books, and there became known to the politest scholars of France; and in 1652 he accompanied his friend Bochart, to the court of Christina, queen of Sweden. The queen wished Huet to settle at Stockholm, but after three months' stay, he took his leave of the fickle princess, and returned to Paris. In 1661 he published his well-known book, De Interpretatione Libri duo, which drew upon him the applauses, and the thanks of the learned. His Originis Commentaria, of which he had obtained a copy from a MS. while at Stockholm, appeared in 1688 at Rouen, with a Latin translation and notes. In 1659 he was invited by Christina to Rome, where she had, after her abdication, retired, but he declined her liberal offers. He was afterwards appointed, with Bossuet, sub-preceptor to the Dauphin, an honourable situation to which his literary fame entitled him. In 1678 he was nominated by the king to the abbey of Aunay in Normandy, and in 1685 he was raised to the see of Soissons, which soon after he exchanged for that of Avranches. In 1699 he resigned his bishopric, and received in its stead the abbey of Fontenay, near his native place, Caen, but afterwards removed to them aison professée of the Jesuits at Paris, where he spent the last 20 years of his life in devotion and in literary pursuits. He died 26th Jan. 1721, in his 91st year. The other works of this learned and amiable bishop were Demonstratio Evangelica 1679, folio, often reprinted—Censura Philosophiæ Cartesianæ, 1689, a book in which he ably attacked the doctrines of Des Cartes, which in his younger and more inexperienced years he had warmly embraced—Questiones Alnetanæ de Concordiâ Rationis et Fidei 1690, an excellent and elegantly written work. He also wrote notes on the vulgate translation of the Bible, for which purpose he read over the Hebrew text 24 times with great attention, and in 1718 he published an account of his life, the title page of which drew down the censures of critics, as he used the words, Ad eum pertinentibus, for ad se. Besides these, he wrote several other things less known, but equally admired for elegance of style and vivacity of expression. He was, says his biographer Olivet, the most learned man that any age has produced. It is to be mentioned that the publication of the classics, Ad Usum Delphini, originated in him, and the plan was enriched by some notes written by him, and printed at the end of Manilius. Some of his books have been translated into English—on the Origin of Romances—on the Situation of the Terrestrial Paradise—and the History of the Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients—and the Weakness of the Human Understanding.

HUFNAGEL, George, a native of Antwerp, whose abilities were noticed and rewarded by some of the German princes, and by the emperor Rodolphus. Besides some poetical works in Latin and German, he wrote four books for the use of the emperor, containing an accurate description and elegant representation of quadrupeds, insects, birds, and fishes. He died 1600, aged 55.

HUGH CAPET, Count of Paris and Orleans, was raised by his merits and courage at Noyon to the throne of France, 987, and thus became the head of the third race of the French monarchy. He died 996, aged 57.

HUGHES, John, an English poet, born at Marlborough, Wilts, 29th Jan. 1677. He was educated in private schools in London, but the delicate state of his health prevented his engaging in any laborious employment, and the milder avocations of poetry, music, and drawing became, by choice as well as necessity, his pursuit. He obtained, afterwards, a place in the ordnance, and was secretary to the commissioners for the purchasing of lands for the royal dockyards. His first poem was on the peace of Ryswick, which was well received, 1697, and two years after "the Court of Neptune," on William's return, met with equal applause. He afterwards published a Pindaric ode "of the House of Nassau," and another in praise of music, and by his poetical merits, he gained the acquaintance and friendship of men of letters, of Pope, Congreve, Addison, Southerne, Rowe, and others. He was also honourably noticed by lord Wharton, and, in 1717, lord Cowper, the chancellor, appointed him secretary to the commissions of the peace. His last work, written under the flattering hope of long enjoying his affluent independence, was the Siege of Damascus; but such is the uncertainty of human affairs, he died the very night the play was presented to the public on the stage, 17th Feb. 1720. Before he expired, he heard that his performance was well received, but the intelligence did not disturb or divert his thoughts, now fixed on another world. His memory was regretted by the pen of Steele, in the "Theatre." His poems were collected and published in 2 vols. 12mo. 1735. Besides these he translated Fontenelle's Dialogues of the Dead—Vertot's Revolutions of Portugal, and he contributed some papers to the Tattler, Spectator, and Guardian, and published an edition of Spenser's Works, in 6 vols. 12mo. 1715. Swift, in a letter to Pope, described him as a mediocrist in prose and in verse, and Pope in answer observed that "what he wanted in genius he made up as an honest man."

HUGHES, Jabez, younger brother to the preceding, was an excellent scholar, and published a translation of Claudian's Rape of Proserpine—the Story of Sextus and Erietho, from Lucan's Pharsalia—Suetonius' Lives of the 12 Cæsars—Novels from the Spanish of Cervantes, &c. He died 17th Jan. 1731, aged 46. His posthumous miscellanies, in prose and verse, were published 1737.

HUGHES, Jabez, fellow of Jesus college, Cambridge, was not related to the preceding. He made himself known as the editor of Chrysostom's treatise "on the Priesthood," a second edition of which appeared at Cambridge, 1712.

HUGO, of Cluni, a saint of the Romish calendar, born in Burgundy 1023. At the age of 15 he abandoned the world for the abbey of Cluni, of which he was chosen abbot, 1048. He was pious and exemplary, and introduced great reformation among the monks, 10,000 of whom he is said to have had under his direction, at Cluni and other places. He died 1608 or 9. Some of his epistles are preserved in Dacherius' Spicilegium.

HUGO, Herman, a Jesuit, born at Brussels. He died of the plague, at Rhimberg, 1629, aged 41. He wrote de Prima Scribendi Origine, 8vo.—Universæ Rei Literariæ Antiquitates, republished by Trotzius, 1738—Obsidio Bredana, Antwerp, 1629, folio—Militia equestris antiqua et nova—Pia Desideria, a poem of which the versification, though good, wants simplicity and sublimity.

HUGO, Charles Lewis, a French and Latin writer, abbe of Etival, and titular bishop of Ptolemais, died at an advanced age, 1735. He wrote Annales Præmonstratensium, 2 vols. folio, a curious work on his own order—Vie de Norbert Fondateur des Prémontrés, 4to. 1704—Sacra Antiquitates Monumenta historica, dogmatica, &c. 2 vols. fol. 1725—Traité historique et critique de la Maison de Lorraine, 8vo. 1711—a bold work, censured by the parliament of Paris, in defence of which he wrote Reflections sur les deux Ouvrages concernant la maison de Lorraine.

HUGTENBURGH, John Van, a Dutch painter, who died 1733, aged 77. As he was particularly eminent in the delineation of battles, his pencil was engaged, with great success, in representing the battles of Marlborough and Eugene. His brother James was eminent as a painter of animals and of landscapes. He died 1696.

HULDRIC, John James, a native of Zurich, law professor there. He died at Zurich, 1731, aged 48, deservedly esteemed as an able divine, and a benevolent man. He wrote a commentary on Puffendorf's Duty of Man—Miscellanea Figurina, 3 vols. and published an edition of Sefhor Toledot Jeschu, 1705.

HULL, Thomas, a dramatic writer and actor, was born in Westminster in 1728. He had his education at the Charter-house, after which he became apprentice to his father who was an apothecary, in the Strand. This profession he relinquished, and went on the stage, though he never attained any eminence in this line. He died in Westminster, with the character of an ingenious and good man, in 1808. His publications are—1. Henry the Second and Rosamond, a tragedy. 2. The History of Sir William Harrington, a novel, 4 vols. 3. Genuine Letters from a Gentleman to a Young Lady, 2 vols. 4. Richard Plantagenet, a Legendary Tale, 4to. 5. Select Letters between the Dutchess of Somerset, Lady Luxborough, Mr. Shenstone, and others, 2 vols. 6. Moral Tales, in verse, 2 vols. 8vo.—W. B.

HULME, Nathaniel, a physician, was born at Holme Thorp, in Yorkshire, in 1732. He studied under his brother, Dr. Joseph Hulme, a physician, at Halifax, after which he became a pupil at Guy's hospital. He next went as surgeon in the navy; and, in 1765, took his doctor's degree at Edinburgh. After this he settled in London, and became physician to the General Dispensary, and to the City of London Lying-in Hospital. About 1774 he was appointed physician to the Charter-house, where he died in 1807. He was the author of—1. Dissertatio Medica Inauguralis de Scorbuto. 2. A Treatise on Puerperal Fever. 3. An Oration "De Re Medica cognoscenda et promovenda." 4. A Safe and Easy Remedy for the Relief of the Stone and Gravel, Scurvy, Gout, &c. He has also some papers in the Transactions of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, of both of which bodies he was a member. In 1787 he obtained a gold medal from the Royal Medical Society at Paris, for an answer to a prize question, concerning the cellular skin of new-born infants.—W. B.

HULSEMANN, John, a Lutheran divine, born at Esens, East Friesland. He died 1661, aged 59. He travelled through several countries, and was at last professor of divinity at Leipzig, and wrote several books on theological subjects, much esteemed in his age.

HULSIUS, Anthony, a native of Hida, who studied at Wesel, and Deventer, and afterwards visited the various universities of Europe, to improve himself in oriental knowledge. He was, for 25 years, settled as minister at Breda, and then removed to fill the divinity chair at Leyden, where he died, 1685, aged 70. He wrote Theologia Judaica—Opus Catecheticum Didacticopolemicum—Non ens Præadamaticum, &c.

HULSIUS, Henry, author of Summa Theologiae—De Principio Credendi—De Vallibus Prophetarum Sacris, &c. died 1723, at Douisburgh, where he was theological professor.

HULST, Peter Van der, a native of Dort, admired as an excellent painter. The introduction of insects, serpents, lizards, frogs, &c. among his flowers, had a striking effect. He died 1708, aged 56.

HUME, David, a celebrated English writer, born at Edinburgh, 26th April, 1711. He was intended, by his family, for the profession of the law, but he had greater regard for Virgil and Cicero, than for Voet and Vinnius. At last, however, he was forced, from the narrowness of his fortune, to embark in a mercantile concern, at Bristol, 1734; but in a few months he quitted the place in disgust, and retired to France, determined with the most rigid economy to guide his expenditure by his income, while he devoted himself to literary pursuits. Here, at Rheims, and at La Fleche, in Anjou, he wrote his treatise of Human Nature, which he published in London, 1739; but the work met with no success. In 1742 the first part of his Essays appeared, with a little more success, but to support himself he was obliged to enter into the service of the marquis of Annandale, as an attendant, during the weak intervals of his lordship's intellects. He afterwards attended general St. Clair, as his secretary, on the coast of France, and in his embassy at Vienna and Turin, and after the lapse of two years he congratulated himself on being master of independence, and of 1000*l.* and retired to pursue his literary labours in Scotland. His Political Discourses, and his Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals, appeared in 1752, but though he considered these works as highly finished compositions, they met with little notice from the public. In 1754 he published his portion of English history from the accession of James I. to the revolution, and, though the work was disregarded by the nation, he continued his labours, and, in 1756, published another volume, which attracted some public attention, and served, as he said, to buoy up its unfortunate brother. His Natural History of Religion about this time had appeared, and though it met with few readers, yet it was attacked by Warburton, under the name of Hurd, as he sarcastically says, with all the petulance, arrogance, and scurrility of the Warburtonian school. In 1759 the history of the house of Tudor was published, and, in 1761, the more early part of English history, and thus the plan was completed, and the author, though he found cavillers and opponents in consequence of the partiality of his opinions and the licentious tendency of his principles, had the satisfaction to see his work grow popular, and thus ensure him a handsome reward from the booksellers. While forming the plan of a literary seclusion from the busy world, in 1763, he was invited by lord Hertford to accompany him as secretary to his embassy at Paris, and the offer was too flattering not to be accepted. In the summer, 1765, he was left there as charge d'affaires, and soon after, on his return to Scotland, he was persuaded to become under secretary of state to general Conway. In 1769 he returned to Edinburgh, very opulent, as he observes, possessing a revenue of 1000*l.* a year, healthy, and, though somewhat stricken in years, with the prospect of enjoying long his ease. In 1775 he was attacked with a disorder in his bowels, which, though at first disregarded, proved incurable, and at last fatal. He died 25th August, 1776. He has written an account of his life to the 18th April, 1776, prefixed to his works. His Dialogues concerning Natural Religion appeared after his death, in 8vo. His works were corrected by himself, and were printed in 4to. and in 8vo. and they are now become universally popular. Though Hume possesses the deep research of the historian, the patience of the philosopher, and the subtleties of the metaphysician, he is to be read with caution, as his principles on religion and morality are insidiously clothed in fallacious language, and would tend to undermine the salutary doctrines which teach mankind to reverence the divinity as a beneficent creator, an omniscient governor, and a just and impartial judge.

HUMPHREY, Lawrence, an English writer, born at Newport Pagnell, Bucks, about 1527. He was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards went to Oxford, where he was elected fellow of Magdalen college. He took his master's degree, 1552, and was then made Greek lecturer of his college, and soon after took orders, and, in 1555, left England, to travel into foreign countries. On Elizabeth's accession he returned to Oxford, and was restored to his fellowship, from which he had been expelled for being absent more than the limited time of one year, and, in 1560, he was made queen's professor of divinity, and the next year elected president of his college. In 1570 he was made dean of Gloucester, and 10 years after, removed to the deanery of Winchester, and he might have been raised to a bishopric, had he not been too much attached to the Calvinists, and therefore inimical to the doctrines of the English church. He died Feb. 1590, leaving a wife, by whom he had 12 children. He wrote Epistola de Græcis Literis, and Homeri Lectione et Imitatione, Basil, 1558—De Religione Conservatione et Reformatione deque Primatu Regum—de Ratione

HUMPHREYS, David, LL.D. minister of the United States to the court of Spain, was the son of the reverend Daniel Humphreys, of Derby, Connecticut, and born in 1753. He was educated at Yale college, and graduated in 1771, with a distinguished reputation for talents, energy of character, and scientific and literary acquirements. Soon after the commencement of the revolutionary war he entered the American army, and was successively an aid to generals Parsons, Putnam, and Greene. In 1779 he was appointed one of the aids of Washington, and remained in his family till the close of the war, enjoying his high confidence, friendship, and patronage. He left the army with the rank of colonel. When Franklin, Adams, and Jefferson were, in 1784, appointed commissioners for negotiating treaties with foreign powers, he was chosen secretary of the legation, and attended them in that capacity to Paris and London. In 1791 he was sent ambassador to the court of Lisbon, and, in 1797, appointed minister plenipotentiary to that of Madrid. He concluded treaties of peace with the bey of Tripoli and the dey of Algiers. On his return from Spain he transported to New-England 100 sheep, of the merino race, which proved a valuable acquisition to the agricultural and manufacturing interests. He was equally distinguished in the literary and political world. While in the military service he published a patriotic poem, addressed to the American armies, and after the war another, on the happiness and future glory of America, each of which enjoyed a very extensive circulation, in Europe as well as America, and gave him a high reputation as a poet and patriot. In 1789 he gave to the public the life of General Putnam, and during his residence in Europe, published several poems on subjects connected with the American revolution. After his return to the United States he resided chiefly in Connecticut, and, in 1812, was appointed to the command of the veteran volunteers of that state, with the rank of general. He died at New-Haven, February 21st, 1818, aged 65 years.  L.

HUNNERIC, king of the African Vandals after his father Genseric, is known for his severe persecution of the Christians. He was an Arian in principle, and died 484, after a reign of seven years.

HUNNADES, John Corvinus, waivode of Transylvania, and general of the armies of Ladislaus, king of Hungary, is famous for his defeat of the Turks under Amurath, 1442 and 3. He obliged his enemies to raise the siege of Belgrade, but though unusually brave and fortunate, he was yet defeated by the Turks, 1448. He afterwards recovered his victorious fame, and again raised the siege of Belgrade against Mahomet II. but unfortunately died the same year, 10th Sept. 1456. His loss was universally lamented, not only by the Christians and by the pope, who is said to have shed tears at the intelligence, but the infidels and Mahomet himself, to whom he was become so dreadful a scourge.

HUNNIUS, Giles, a Lutheran divine, born at Winende, in Wirtemberg, 1550. He took his degrees at Tubingen, and, in 1576, was, in consequence of his great abilities, made divinity professor at Marburg. He wrote with such force against the Calvinists that he was invited to reform the electorate of Saxony, and was made professor at Wirtemberg. He was also engaged in a controversy with Huberus, on predestination and election. He died of an inflammation caused by the stone, April, 1603. His works are collected into 5 vols. and contain orations, colloquies, &c. His son Nicholas was also a man of merit, and died 1643, professor of divinity at Wirtemberg and Lubec.

HUNT, Walter, an English Carmelite at the council of Florence, where he warmly opposed, in his speeches and in his writings, the meditated union between the Greek and Latin churches. He died 1470.

HUNT, Jeremiah, a native of London, educated for the ministry among the dissenters, under Thomas Rowe. He was afterwards at Edinburgh, and also at Leyden, where he studied Hebrew and Jewish antiquities, and he first officiated before the English congregation at Amsterdam. On his return to England he settled at Tunstead, in Norfolk, and, in 1700, came to London, to become the minister of Pinner's-hall congregation. He was made D.D. by the Edinburgh university, in 1729, and died 1744, aged 66. He wrote, besides sermons, an essay to explain the History and Revelations of Scripture, &c.—with a Dissertation on the Fall of Man, Svo. 1738, &c.

HUNTER, Robert, an English gentleman, author of the famous "Letter on Enthusiasm," attributed by some to Swift, and by others to Shaftesbury. He was made governor of Virginia 1708, but taken by the French on his voyage, and, in 1710, he was sent as governor to New-York and the Jerseys, at the head of a colony of Palatines. He was, in 1728, appointed governor of Jamaica, and died there 31st March, 1734. His epitaph, in elegant Latin, was written by the Rev. Mr. Flemming. Hunter wrote also a farce, called Androboros, according to Coxeter.

HUNTER, Henry, a native of Culross, Perthshire, educated at Edinburgh, and made minister of Dumfermline, 1764. Two years after he removed to South Leith, and, in 1771, was invited to the care of the Scotch church, London wall. In this new appointment he continued till his death, and was respected for his learning, his piety, his eloquence, the mildness of his manners, and the liberality of his principles. A consumptive habit obliged him to retire to Bristol for the benefit of the air and the waters, and he died there November, 1802, aged 61. He published Sacred Biography, or the Characters of Scripture, six vols. 8vo.—Miscellaneous Sermons, two vols. 8vo.—and translated, besides, various authors from the French, Lavater's Physiognomy—Saurin's Sermons—St. Pierre's Studies of Nature, &c.

HUNTER, William, M.D. a famous physician and anatomist, born 23d May, 1718, at Kilbride, Lanerksire. As he was the 7th of ten children, he was intended, by his father, who was a farmer, for an active situation in the church. He was for five years at Glasgow, but, while he hesitated to subscribe to the articles of faith, he became acquainted with Dr. Cullen, and thus his future pursuits were diverted from their original intention. After remaining three years in the house of his friend, he came, in 1740, to Edinburgh, and the next year visited London, where he was recommended to the notice of his countryman, Dr. James Douglas. The zeal and knowledge which he showed in anatomical studies, soon endeared him to this new friend, who took him into his house, made him tutor to his son, and enabled him to improve himself by attending various lectures on philosophy and medicine. The death of Dr. Douglas, in 1742, left him his own master in his anatomical pursuits; and the next year he presented to the Royal Society his essay on the Structure and Diseases of Articulating Cartilages, and now acquired such reputation that he succeeded Mr. Sharpe as lecturer to a society of surgeons in Covent-garden, in 1746. The next year he was admitted member of the corporation of surgeons, and by degrees acquired high reputation in midwifery. In 1750 he obtained his doctor's degree from Glasgow, and, in 1764, in consequence of his high celebrity, he was appointed physician extraordinary to the queen. His practice was now so extensive that he took Mr. Hewson as his assistant lecturer and partner, but, in 1770, this connexion was dissolved, and Hewson gave way to Mr. Cruikshank, a man of great acknowledged abilities. In 1767 he was elected fellow of the Royal Society, and the next year he was admitted into the Antiquarian Society, and appointed, by the king, anatomical professor. In 1781 he succeeded Dr. J. Fothergill as president of the London college of physicians, and was complimented with the honour of being elected member of several foreign societies. Thus distinguished, and thus respected as a medical man, he soon acquired an ample fortune, but with a commendable ambition he wished to apply it to the noblest and most beneficial purposes, the establishment of an anatomical school in London. Though in some degree thwarted, in his application to government for a piece of ground in the Mews, he purchased some ground in Windmill-street, and there erected a spacious house, where he removed, in 1770, from Jermyn-street. Here not merely private conveniences were the object of his wishes, but a spacious amphitheatre was built for the delivering of lectures, and a magnificent room was set apart for a museum. This museum was soon enriched not only with his own valuable preparations, but the presents of his friends and pupils, and all other curiosities in the animal and fossil kingdoms, which either favour or money could procure. Besides a cabinet of ancient medals, and a curious collection of shells, corals, &c. he placed there the most magnificent treasure of Greek and Latin books accumulated by any living person since the days of Dr. Mead. Of this most valuable museum, which it is said cost above 20,000*l.* the use was permitted for 30 years to his nephew Matthew Baillie and Mr. Cruikshank, and afterwards to become the property of the university of Glasgow. Dr. Hunter, besides the labours which he bestowed in the collection and arrangement of his museum, and in his lectures, and extensive practice, devoted much of his time in making observations, which he communicated to those learned societies of which he was a member. His great and immortal work, the Anatomy of the Gravid Uterus, however, must remain a striking monument of his labour and application. It was begun 1751, but was not made public till 1775, that accuracy and truth might be displayed in every page. It is dedicated to the king, and is adorned by thirty-four beautiful plates, exhibiting those various delicate dissections in which he acknowledges that he had been assisted by his brother. Rich in fame and in fortune, Dr. Hunter formed the plan of retiring to Scotland, about ten years before his death; but his wish to purchase an estate in his native country was retarded, and finally prevented, by the defective titles of the proprietor, and he determined never to remove from London. In the last part of his life he was afflicted with the gout, but a paralytic stroke came at last to shorten his days. His friends wished to persuade themselves that his apprehensions were frivolous, but the description which he gave of his feelings proved too true, and he expired 30th March, 1783, exhibiting to his friend Dr. Combe the greatest resignation. If I had strength enough, said he, to hold a pen, I would write how easy and pleasant it is to die. His remains were buried in the rector's vault of St. James's church, Westminster. The bulk of his fortune was bequeathed to his nephew Dr. Baillie. His life has been written by Dr. Simmons.

HUNTER, John, younger brother of Dr. Hunter, was born at Long Calderwood, 14th July, 1728. When ten years old, he lost his father, and this tended greatly to retard his advancement in knowledge, so that he was twenty years old before he became sensible of the propriety of applying himself to the study of some profession. The reputation of his brother excited him to surgical pursuits, and he joined him in London, 1758, and the next year he attended Mr. Cheselden at Chelsea hospital. After becoming a pupil at St. Bartholomew's, and visiting Scotland, he entered as gentleman commoner at St. Mary-hall, Oxford, but without losing sight of his medical studies. In 1756 he was appointed house surgeon to St. George's hospital, and about that time was admitted by his brother as an assistant in his lectures. With the most zealous application he devoted himself to anatomical studies for ten long years, and was thus enabled not only to understand, but to explain and improve the art of comparative anatomy. The ramification of the olfactory nerves in the nose, the arteries of the gravid uterus, and the lymphatic vessels of birds were, among other important subjects, accurately ascertained and satisfactorily described. The excessive attention which he bestowed on his anatomical studies had such an effect on his health that, to re-establish it, he went abroad, and was surgeon on the staff with the army, at Belleisle. At the end of the war, in 1763, he returned to London, and devoted himself with increased activity to his favourite pursuits. In 1767 he was elected fellow of the Royal Society, and the next year he went to reside in Jermyn-street, in the house which his brother quitted to remove to Windmill-street. In 1776 he was appointed surgeon extraordinary to the king, and began to find that, from his experience and knowledge he derived not only reputation, but honour and opulence. In 1783 he removed to Leicester-square, where he had prepared a house for the reception of his valuable museum. Besides the appointment of surgeon to St. George's hospital, he was, in 1786, nominated deputy surgeon-general to the army, and, in 1790, he succeeded Mr. Adair as inspector-general of hospitals, and as surgeon-general to the army, in which year he resigned to his brother-in-law, Everard Home, his surgical lectures, which he found too laborious and inconvenient for the great avocations of his respectable and extensive practice. He was unfortunately subject to strong spasmodic affections in the heart, since 1786, and, as irritation generally produced those dangerous symptoms, he unfortunately met, in his visit at St. George's hospital, 16th October, 1793, some vexatious circumstance, and eager to check the feelings of his mind, he walked into another room, and while turning round to speak to a physician, he fell down and expired instantly without a groan. As an able experimentalist John Hunter will long be remembered with respect and gratitude: the dexterity of his operations was equalled only by his patience and perseverance; and while he considered surgery only in its infaney, he directed all the powers of his mind to the investigation, and to the elucidation of truth in this most important science. His contributions to the transactions of the Royal Society were numerous and valuable. His works are a treatise on the Natural History of the Human Teeth, 4to. 1771, with a second part 1778—a Treatise on the Venereal Disease, 4to.—Observations on certain Parts of the Animal Economy, 4to.—a Treatise on the Blood, Inflammation, and Gunshot Wounds, 4to. published after his death. His collection of comparative anatomy, arranged in a clear order to exhibit the corresponding parts of animals, is most valuable, and reflects the highest praise on his labour, his assiduity, his judgment, and his ardent zeal in the service of science. He married, in 1771, the daughter of Mr. Home, surgeon to Burgoyne's regiment of light horse, by whom he had two sons and two daughters, of whom only one son and one daughter lived to years of maturity. The history of his life, and of his useful labours in the cause of humanity, has been published by his brother-in-law, and professional successor Mr. Everard Home.

HUNTER, Anne, the widow of the eminent anatomist, Mr. John Hunter, died, at the age of seventy-nine, in Holles-street, Cavendish-square, Jan. 7, 1821. She was the intimate friend of the learned Mrs. Elizabeth Carter, and wrote several beautiful poems, chiefly of the lyric kind, some of which were composed by Haydn. A volume of her productions was printed in 1802.—W. B.

HUNTINGDON, Selina, countess of, second daughter of Washington, earl Ferrers, was born 1707, and married lord Huntingdon, by whom she had four sons and three daughters. From habits of gayety and scenes of dissipation, she became all at once, after a serious illness, grave, reserved, and melancholy. Her thoughts were wholly absorbed by religion, and she employed the ample resources which she possessed, in disseminating her principles by the popular arts of Whitefield, Romaine, and other enthusiastic methodists. Not only her house in Park-street was thrown open for the frequent assembling of these pious reformers, but chapels were built in various parts of the kingdom, and a college erected in Wales for the education of young persons in the future labours of the ministry. After many acts of extensive charity, and with the best intentions, this enthusiastic lady died in 1791.

HUNTINGTON, Robert, an English divine, born at Deorhyrst, Gloucestershire, 1636. He was educated at Bristol, and then entered at Merton college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He left England 1670, as chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo, and during 11 years' residence, he assiduously employed himself in the procuring of MSS. and in exploring the neighbouring countries. He visited Galilee, Jerusalem, Samaria, Cyprus, Palmyra, and Egypt. In 1682 he returned to England, and the following year took the degree of D.D. By the recommendation of bishop Fell, he was appointed to the mastership of Trinity college, Dublin; but the troubles of the revolution drove him back to England, and in 1691 he resigned his office. In 1692 he married, and was made rector of Great Hallingbury, Essex, and refused the bishopric of Kilmore in Ireland. In 1701 he however accepted that of Raphoe, and was consecrated the 20th of August; but he survived his honours but few days, as he died 2d Sept. 1701, and was buried in Trinity college chapel. He sold his fine collection of MSS. to the Bodleian for 700*l.* He published in the Philosophical Transactions, an Account of the porphyry pillars in Egypt, and it is his only work, besides some Observations in a Collection of Travels by Ray. His life was written by Dr. T. Smith, and 39 of his letters are there preserved.

HUNTINGTON, Samuel, governor of Connecticut, and a native of Windham in that state, settled in early life at Norwich as a lawyer; and though without a collegial education, soon rose by the superiority of his talents, to popularity in the profession. After having held the appointment of king's attorney, a seat in the assembly and council of the state, and on the bench of the superior court, he was in 1775 elected a delegate to congress, and in 1779 chosen president of that venerable body. The next year he resumed his seat as judge, but was again a member of congress in 1783. In 1784 he was chosen lieutenant-governor, and advanced to the seat of chief judge. He was appointed chief magistrate in 1786, and held the office till his death on the 5th of January, 1796, greatly respected for his talents, integrity, prudence, and piety.

HUNTINGTON, Samuel, governor of Ohio, was the son of the Rev. Dr. Huntington of Coventry, Connecticut, and born in 1765. He was graduated at Yale college in 1785, and became a lawyer. He removed to Ohio in 1801, and there held successively the offices of judge of the supreme court, chief justice, and governor. He died at Painesville in June, 1817.

HUNTINGTON, Jedidiah, general in the American army of the revolution, was born at Norwich, Connecticut, August 4th, 1743, and educated at Harvard university, where he was graduated in 1763. He settled in his native town as a merchant. At the commencement of the revolution, in 1775, he entered the army as a colonel of a regiment, and continued in the service till the peace in 1783, with the reputation of a brave and able officer, and enjoying in a very high degree the esteem and confidence of the commander-in-chief. In 1788 he was appointed treasurer of Connecticut, and was a member of the convention of that state, which ratified the federal constitution. On the organization of the general government, he was appointed collector of the port of New-London, where he afterwards resided and discharged the duties of that office for a long period with distinguished fidelity and uprightness. His death took place September 25th, 1818, in his 76th year. He possessed a vigorous mind, and a superior judgment, and was pre-eminently distinguished for the excellence of his character. He became a professor of religion when young, and by his enlightened conscientiousness, eminent rectitude, and uncommon munificence, peculiarly adorned it through life. He was one of the first members of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and held the office till his death.

HUNTORST, Gerard, a Dutch painter, born at Utrecht 1592. He painted for some time in the service of Charles I. in England, but resided chiefly in Holland. His night pieces are much admired. The time of his death is unknown.

HURD, Richard, was the son of a farmer at Congreve, in the parish of Penkrich, in Staffordshire, and born there, Jan. 13, 1720. He was educated at the school of Brewood, and next at Emanuel-college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, and was elected to a fellowship in 1742. In 1749 he took his degree of B.D., and the same year published his Commentary on Horace's Art of Poetry, in which he paid a compliment to Warburton. This laid the foundation of a friendship between these two learned persons, which lasted through life. In 1750 he published "A Commentary on the Epistle to Augustus;" and, in 1755, a satire against Dr. Jortin, entitled "The Delicacy of Friendship." In 1757 he was presented to the living of Thurecaston, in Leicestershire; and, in 1759, published his "Dialogues on Sincerity, Retirement, the Age of Elizabeth, and the Constitution of the English Government;" which work was followed by "Letters on Chivalry and Romance;" and "Dialogues on Foreign Travel." The whole were republished together in 3 vols. in 1765, and the same year the author printed his "Letter to Dr. Thomas Leland, in which his Dissertation on the Principles of Human Eloquence is criticised." At this time he was chosen preacher of Lincoln's Inn, and, in 1767, he was preferred to the archdeaconry of Gloucester. In 1768 he took his doctor's degree, and the same year began the course of lectures on the prophecies, founded in Lincoln's Inn by bishop Warburton. In 1775 he was made bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, and shortly after was appointed preceptor to the prince of Wales, and prince Frederick, now duke of York. On the translation of Dr. North to Winchester, in 1781, the king offered the see of Worcester, with the clerkship of the closet, to bishop Hurd, which he accepted; but, when his majesty tendered him the chair of Canterbury in 1783, he modestly declined it, saying, "That several greater men than himself had been content to die bishops of Worcester, and that he wished for no higher preferment." In 1788 the king gave the bishop a gold medal, and the same year paid him a visit at Hartlebury-castle. Bishop Hurd now published a complete edition of the works of his early friend Warburton, to which, in 1795, he added a biographical discourse, by way of preface. He died in his sleep, May 28, 1808, and was buried in Hartlebury churchyard. Besides the works already mentioned, and some single tracts and sermons, he published two volumes of sermons, preached at the Warburtonian Lecture; two volumes of Selections from Cowley; and three volumes of sermons preached at Lincoln's Inn. He also left for publication an edition of Addison's Works, with notes; and a volume of Warburton's Correspondence. He repaired his episcopal palace, and left thereto his valuable library and pictures.—W. B.

HURDIS, James, was born at Bishopstone, in Sussex, in 1763. He became a commoner of St. Mary-hall, Oxford, in 1780, but removed from thence to Magdalen-college, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1791 he was presented to the living of Bishopstone; and in 1793 he was elected professor of poetry at Oxford; where, the year following, he took his degree of B.D., and in 1797 that of D.D. He died Dec. 23, 1801. He published—1. The Village Curate, a poem. 2. Adriano, or the First of June. 3. A Disquisition on Gen. i. 21; and Select Remarks on the first ten Chapters of Genesis, 8vo. 4. Sir Thomas More, a tragedy. 5. Cursory Remarks on the Arrangement of the Plays of Shakspeare. 6. A Vindication of the University of Oxford, and Magdalen-college in particular, from the aspersions of Gibbon, 4to. This was privately printed at his own press. 7. The Favourite Village, a poem. 8. Twelve Dissertations on the Nature and Occasion of Psalm and Prophecy, 8vo. After his death his poems were published by subscription, in 3 vols., at the university press, with his life prefixed by his sister.—W. B.

HURE, Charles, a French divine, born 1639, at Champigny-sur-Yonne, son of a labourer. He applied himself sedulously to letters, and to the Oriental languages, and was member of the Port-royal society, professor of languages in the university of Paris, and at last principal of the college of Bencourt. In his religious opinions he was considered a Jansenist. He died 1717. He wrote a Dictionary of the Bible, 2 vols. folio, inferior to that of Calmet—an edition of the Latin Testament—a French translation of the Testament, with notes—and a Sacred Grammar.

HUSS, John, a famous divine and martyr, born in Bohemia, 1376, and educated at Prague, where he took his degrees, and entered into the ministry. The writings of Wickliff converted him from the superstitions of Rome, and with eloquent zeal he began to preach against the power and influence of the pope. His efforts proved successful, the papal authority began to be slighted in Bohemia, but the archbishop of Prague issued two mandates against the heresies of Wickliff, and the labours of Huss and his followers; and this exertion of power was soon seconded by a bull from Rome, for the suppression of all tenets offensive to the holy see. Huss exclaimed against these proceedings, and though summoned to Rome to answer for his conduct, he, supported by the favour of Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia, disregarded the pope's authority, and was excommunicated, and soon after his friends and adherents were included in the same interdict. After causing by his opposition to the papal decrees, various tumults in Prague and Bohemia, Huss was prevailed upon to appear at the council of Constance, to give an account of his doctrines. The emperor Sigismund granted him his protection, and ensured security to his person; but when soon after he reached Constance 1414, he was seized as a heretic and imprisoned, and after a confinement of severe hardships, for six months, he was condemned without a hearing, and when he refused to recant his errors, he was tumultuously sentenced to be burned. The emperor indeed complained of the contempt shown to his authority, and of the perfidy used towards the delinquent, but all in vain. Huss was inhumanly dragged to execution, he was stripped of his sacerdotal habit, deprived of his degrees, and with a paper crown on his head, with pictures of devils round, and the inscription of Heresiarch, he was burned alive, July, 1415. He endured his torments with uncommon fortitude, and truly Christian resignation. His ashes were collected and then sprinkled in the Rhine. His writings, which were numerous but violent, were afterwards, when printing was invented, published at Nuremberg 1558, and read with avidity.

HUTCHESON, Francis, an ingenious writer, born 8th Aug. 1694, in Ireland, son of a dissenting minister. After an excellent education, he removed in 1710 to Glasgow, where for some years he earnestly applied to philosophy, the learned languages, and divinity. On his return to Ireland, he took care of a small dissenting congregation in Dublin, and intended to remove into the north, when he was invited to settle in the capital, and to open an academy. He met here with great success, and the publication of his Inquiry into the Ideas of Beauty and Virtue, in which he was assisted by lord Molesworth, and bishop Syngé, soon recommended him to the notice of the great and learned of lord Granville, the viceroy, of archbishop King, the primate Boulter, and others. In 1729 he left Ireland for Glasgow, where he became professor of philosophy. He died there highly respected in private life, as well as a public teacher, 1747, though his constitution seemed to promise a more extended life than 53 years. His System of Moral Philosophy, in three books, was published by his only son Francis, M.D. 1755, 2 vols. 4to. with an Account of his Life by Dr. Leecham. He wrote also a treatise on the Passions, and some philosophical papers, printed in Hibernicus' Letters.

HUTCHINS, John, author of the history and antiquities of Dorsetshire, was born 1698 at Bradford Peverell in that county. He was of Baliol college, Oxford, and was in 1729 presented to the living of Swyre, to Melcomb Horsey 1733, and to Holy Trinity, Wareham, 1743. He began in 1737 to collect materials for his history, which after much labour and many difficulties, was put to the press, but received not the author's last correcting hand. It was liberally patronised by the gentlemen of the county, and particularly by Dr. Cumming and Mr. Gough, and made its appearance in 1774, 2 vols. folio, for the benefit of the author's widow and daughter. He died 21st June, 1773, and was buried in St. Mary's church, Wareham.

HUTCHINS, Thomas, geographer general of the United States, and a native of New-Jersey, entered the army in the western states at an early age as an ensign. He afterwards became paymaster, and served at fort Pitt, and in Florida against the Indians. He was in London in 1779, and was imprisoned some time on account of suspicions that he held a correspondence with Franklin in France. On being liberated he returned to America, and joined the army under general Greene. Not long after he was appointed geographer general of the United States, and in 1789 died at Pittsburgh. He was a man of exemplary piety. He published several maps and topographical descriptions of the middle states, Louisiana and Florida.

HUTCHINSON, John, the well-known founder of a philosophical sect, was born at Spennythorne, Yorkshire, 1674. He received in the village school a plain education, which was improved by the friendly communication of a gentleman who lodged in the house of his father, and at the age of 19 he became steward to Mr. Bathurst a Yorkshire gentleman. He afterwards held the same situation in the family of lord Scarborough, and in 1700 he undertook the same office under the duke of Somerset. While in the employment of his noble patron he travelled over various parts of England, and made a valuable collection of fossils, which it is said was afterwards presented to the University of Cambridge under the name of Dr. Woodward, who had been confidentially intrusted with the arrangement and description of them. Displeased with the harshness and treachery of his former friend, Hutchinson determined to commence author; but in relinquishing the service of the duke, he was liberally presented by him as master of the horse to the king, with the sinecure of purveyor to the royal stables, with a good house and a salary of 200*l.* per annum, and he was rewarded by his noble patron besides with the presentation of the living of Sutton, Sussex, which he bestowed on his friend Julius Bate. Thus in possession of independence he began to devote himself laboriously to studious pursuits, and in 1724 he published his first part of Moses' Principia, in which he severely ridiculed Woodward's Natural History of the Earth, and by attacking the doctrine of gravitation he thus attempted to undermine the great fabric on which Newton's fame is built. In 1727 the second part of Moses' Principia appeared, in which he asserted against Newton's doctrines that a plenum and the air are the principles of the Scripture philosophy. With a fanciful hypothesis he supported that the mysteries of the trinity may be drawn from the three grand agents in the system of nature, spirit, fire, and light; and so fascinating were his arguments, that among others Dr. Samuel Clarke, declared himself a warm admirer of his doctrines. Hutchinson died 28th Aug. 1737, aged 63. In his temper he is described as violent; the mental powers which he derived from nature were great, and had they been early and properly cultivated, he might have enriched his works with more judicious observations, and to learning have added the graces of elegant language. In his opinions Hutchinson was singular. He imagined that all knowledge is contained in the Hebrew Scriptures, and therefore rejecting the points, he regarded every Hebrew root as containing some important meaning, and conveying the signification of some mental or spiritual thing. Though this fanciful and mysterious system was for a time defended with violence by the author, and supported zealously by his adherents, by the learned bishop Horne, by Jones, Spearman, and other pious divines, it gradually fell into disrepute, and is now no longer dreaded as the source of innovation and skepticism in the theological opinions long accepted and deservedly revered by the general bulk of mankind. All his works were collected in 12 vols. 8vo. 1748. Though distinguished as a writer, he was also eminent as a mechanic, and his time-piece for the discovery of the longitude at sea, was seen and approved by Newton, Whiston, and other learned men.

HUTCHINSON, John Hely, an Irishman, born 1715. By perseverance, and the exertion of moderate abilities, he rose to the offices of prime serjeant, of secretary of state, of provost of Trinity college, Dublin, with other lucrative employments. His avidity, however, was too great to escape the observation of political rivals, and lord North exclaimed, in speaking of him, If this man had England and Ireland given him, he would still solicit the Isle of Man for a potato-garden. He died 1794.

HUTCHINSON, Thomas, LL.D., governor of Massachusetts, was born in Boston, and graduated at Harvard college in 1727. He employed himself for a time in merchandise, but soon turned his attention to politics, and gained popularity as an agent to Great Britain, and a member of the legislature. In 1758 he was elected lieutenant-governor, and three years after, against the wishes of the people, was appointed chief judge. Ambitious, hypocritical, and at heart an enemy of the colonial rights, he began, at this time, to lose the confidence of the public. In 1765, a mob assaulted and plundered his house, for which, however, the general court indemnified him not long afterwards. In 1769 he was appointed governor, and soon became obnoxious to the people by his subserviency to the British ministry. In 1772 Doctor Franklin procured a number of his letters addressed to the British ministers, demonstrating his hostility to the colony, in consequence of which the general court took measures to procure his removal. He, however, remained till 1774, when he was superseded by governor Gage. He went to England, and though vindicated by the privy council from the charges brought against him by the colony, soon fell into neglect, and died at Brampton in 1780. He published a history of Massachusetts from its settlement to 1750, in two volumes, 8vo. which is highly valued.  L.

HUTCHINSON, Ann, a religious enthusiast, who occasioned dissensions in the churches of New England, came from Lincolnshire to Boston in 1636. She instituted meetings for women, in which pretending to enjoy immediate revelations, she taught many antinomian and other erroneous sentiments that soon occasioned great controversy in the colony, and in 1637 drew together an ecclesiastical synod, which condemned her errors. Not long after she was banished from the colony, and removed to a Dutch settlement in New-York, where, in 1643, she, with her family, consisting of fifteen persons, were captured by the Indians, and all, except a daughter, killed.  L.

HUTTEN, Ulric de, a singular character, born 1488, of a respectable family at Steckenburg in Franconia. He studied at the abbey of Fulda, and took his master's degree at Frankfort on the Oder; but as his necessities grew upon him he entered the army of the emperor Maximilian, and was at the siege of Padua. His inclination led him to literary pursuits, but his father considered such employment as beneath the character of a gentleman, and therefore to please him he went in 1511 to Pavia to study the law. The siege and plunder of that city by the Swiss disturbed his plans, and he returned to Germany, and contrary to his father's wishes applied again to literature. He travelled through Bohemia and Moravia, often without money or resources except what charity bestowed; but on his introduction to the emperor, 1516, he was received with kindness, and in consequence of the popularity of his compositions he received from his hand the poetical crown. He afterwards entered again into the army, where his intrepidity and courage became proverbial; but in 1519 he sighed again for the peaceful retreats of the muses, and after the disorders of a dissipated life, wished for a wife to take care of him, and in whose company he might unbend himself. He was a warm advocate for Luther's doctrines, and he published the pope's bull against that reformer with such sarcastic remarks and well directed railery, that the sovereign pontiff commanded the elector of Mentz to send him the satirist bound hand and foot. He escaped however from the storm to the castle of Ebernberg, and implored the protection of the emperor and of the electors of Saxony and Mentz; but though persecuted he did not manifest less zeal against the see of Rome. He was afterwards at Basil, where he was refused an asylum in the house of Erasmus, an affront which he satirically resented. He died at last in an island of the lake of Zurich, where he had taken refuge, Aug. 1523, but though he was such an advocate for the reformed religion, and inveighed so bitterly against the corruptions and irregularities of the Romish church, he exhibited in his own life the most profligate manners, and fell a victim to a foul disease which his debauchery had brought upon him, and which he in vain attempted to remove. Though admired for his genius and learning, Hutten was violent and passionate in his temper, and what was said of Demosthenes was applied to him by Camerarius, that he would have turned the world upside down, had his power been equal to his will. His works are numerous, but chiefly satirical, so that he has been compared by Thuanus to Lucian. His Latin poems were published 1538, 12mo. and have been since reprinted. He had also a share in the "Epistolæ Virorum Obscurorum," and printed editions of Pliny, Quintilian and Marcellinus, and of Livy, a manuscript copy of which he discovered 1518.

HUTTEN, Jacob, a Silesian in the 16th century; founder of an Anabaptist sect, called the Bohemian or Moravian brethren. His tenets recommended equality among men, and therefore he exposed himself to the persecution of magistrates and constituted authorities. The time of his death is not mentioned, though it is said, perhaps falsely, that he was burnt as a heretic at Inspruck. His followers dispersed after his death, though the Moravians who adhered to Zinzendorff considered themselves as the true disciples of his doctrines.

HUTTER, Elias, a protestant divine, born at Ulric, 1553. He was an able orientalist, and published a "Hebrew Bible," with the 117th psalm in 17 languages, two Polyglotts, one in four languages 1596, and the other in six, 1599. He died in Nuremberg after 1602.

HUTTER, Leonard, a learned divine, born at Ulm, 1563. He studied at Strasburg, Leipsic, Jena, &c. and was theological professor at Wittemberg, and lastly rector of the university. He died of a fever 1616. He wrote Compendium Theologiæ—Libri Christianæ Concordiæ—Collegium Theologicum—and other theological works. He was a strenuous adherent to Luther's principles.

HUTTON, Matthew, an English bishop. He was born of poor parents in Lancashire, but he had the advantage of a tolerable education, and was sent to Cambridge, where he became fellow of Trinity college, and lady Margaret's professor of divinity. He afterwards obtained a prebend of St. Paul's, was made master of Pembroke hall, and in 1567 preferred to the deanery of York. In 1589 he was made bishop of Durham, and five years after translated to York. He died 1605, aged 59.

HUTTON, William, an ingenious writer, was born at Derby, in 1723. From the age of seven to fourteen he worked at the silk-mill; on leaving which he was apprenticed to a stocking weaver. On the expiration of his time he laboured as a journeyman, and employed his leisure hours in book-binding, by which he earned a little money. In 1750 he opened a shop for the sale of old books, to which he added a circulating library, at Birmingham, where he succeeded so well as to embark in the paper business. Thus, by frugality and industry he arrived at opulence; but in 1791 his house at Birmingham, and seat near the town, were destroyed by the rioters; for which he obtained an inadequate compensation from the county. He died at the extraordinary age of ninety-two, Sept. 20, 1815. Mr. Hutton was the architect of his own fortune, as well as the cultivator of his own mind. His works are—1. The History of Birmingham, 8vo. 2. Journey to London. 3. History of the Court of Requests, and of the Hundred Court at Birmingham. 4. History of Blackpool. 5. History of the Battle of Bosworth Field. 6. History of Derby. 7. Description of the Roman Wall. 8. Remarks upon North Wales. 9. Tour to Scarborough. 10. Poems. 11. Trip to Coatham.—W. B.

HUYGENS, Constantine, author of 14 books of Latin poems and miscellanies, called Monumenta Desultoria, was born at the Hague, and became secretary to the prince of Orange, and president of his council. He died 1687, aged 91.

HUYGENS, Christian, a celebrated mathematician, son of the preceding, was born at the Hague, 14th April, 1629. From his very youth he discovered a strong genius for mathematics, and paid also great attention to music, arithmetic, geography, and mechanics. He for some time studied law at Leyden and Breda, but without relinquishing his favourite sciences, so that in 1631 he gave the world a specimen of his mathematical abilities, by the publication of his Theoremata de Quadraturâ Hyperbolæ Ellipsis et Circuli ex dato Portionum Gravitatis Centro. In 1649 he went to Halstein, and in 1655 to France, where he took the degree of doctor of laws at Angiers. In 1658 he published at the Hague his Horologium, with a model of a newly invented pendulum, and the following year appeared his system of Saturn, in which he discovered a satellite attending that planet, and ascertained the existence of its permanent ring. In 1660 he again went to France, and the next year came to England, where he was made fellow of the Royal Society. His improvements in polishing glasses, and in the air-pump lately invented, increased his fame; but he had a dispute with Wren and Wallis about the priority of discovering the laws of the collision of elastic bodies. In 1666 he went to reside at Paris in consequence of the flattering invitations of Colbert, and the honourable grant of a handsome pension. Here, constantly devoted to mathematical and scientific pursuits, he found his health gradually decline from excessive application, and in 1681 he left France for his native country, where he spent the remainder of life. He died at the Hague, 8th June, 1695, in his 67th year, while his Cosmotheoros, a Latin treatise on the plurality of worlds, was printing. This work appeared 1698, his Opuscula Posthuma, 1703, 4to.—and the next year his Opera Varia, in 4 vols. 4to. under the care of Gravesande. The same editor, in 1728, published his Opera Reliqua, in 2 vols. 4to.—the first of which contains his treatises on Light and Gravity, and the second the Opuscula Posthuma. His works have been collected in 6 vols. 4to. Huygens was a great as well as a learned character, in virtue, in cheerfulness, and private worth equalled by few. He was never married.

HUYSUM, Justus Van, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam. He died 1716, aged 57. He was the pupil of N. Berchem and excelled in painting battles, landscapes, and flowers.

HUYSUM, John Van, son of the preceding, was born at Amsterdam 1682. He became so celebrated as a painter that his pieces sold for a very high price. He was so jealous of his fame that he never admitted any person to see him paint, and therefore his mode of mixing the tints and preserving the lustre of colours remained an impenetrable secret. He died 1749. His brothers Justus and Jacob were also excellent painters. Justus died at the age of 22, and Jacob 1740, aged 60.

HYDE, Edward, earl of Clarendon, and lord chancellor of England, was descended from an ancient Cheshire family, and born at Dinton, Wilts, 16th Feb. 1608. In 1622 he entered at Magdalen hall, Oxford, and on being disappointed in a fellowship at Exeter college, he removed to the Middle Temple, where he ardently devoted himself to the study of the law. In the parliament of 1640 he sat for Wootton Bassett, and distinguished himself as a speaker. He was elected for Saltash in the long parliament, and so well established was his reputation as an orator, and a man of influence, that when the commons presented articles of impeachment against the judges Davenport, Weston, and Trevor, he was commissioned to carry them to the lords, and he introduced them in a most excellent and energetic speech. He was not, however, so fully devoted to party as to forget his duties, the respect he had for the integrity of the church, and the honour of the crown, would not permit him to assent to the measures which banished the bishops from parliament, and though one of the committee against the persecuted Strafford, he soon abandoned the office, and opposed the attainder when he perceived the violence and vindictive animosity of his accusers. With an equal spirit of virtue and patriotism, he inveighed against the ordinance for raising the militia against the king, and when he saw his moderation suspected, he left the parliament, and in 1642 withdrew to the king at York. His abilities were well known to the unfortunate monarch, who soon after knighted him, and appointed him chancellor of the exchequer, and a privy counsellor. In 1643 he attended the parliament at Oxford, and the next year he was one of the commissioners at the treaty of Uxbridge, and afterwards went as secretary and assistant counsellor to the prince of Wales in his excursion into Wales. On the ruin of the royal cause, he passed into the Scilly islands, and in 1645 to Jersey, where he began to write his history of the rebellion. In 1648, on the king's death, he went to join his new master at Paris, and the next year he was sent with lord Cottington as ambassador extraordinary to Spain. He afterwards was made secretary of state, and in 1657 raised to the office of lord chancellor, which he continued to hold at the restoration. On his return to England with the king in 1660, he was made chancellor of Oxford, and created a peer, and the following year raised to the dignity of an earl. These high honours were due to his services, his prudence, and his moderation, and while he wished to restore the prerogatives of the crown, he was zealously employed in establishing the liberties of the people on a solid and permanent basis. Envy, however, is the attendant on greatness and virtue, and the elevation of his daughter, to be the wife of the duke of York, contributed perhaps more to his downfall than the firmness and courage with which he watched over the rights of the church, and the true interests of the kingdom against the intrigues of the catholics, and the machinations of the dissenters. He was first attacked in 1663, by lord Bristol, who exhibited against him sixteen charges of high treason, but though the malice of the accusation, and the inconsistency of his adversary were too glaring not to be rejected with indignation, the public odium still was directed against him. His building of a magnificent house was converted in 1664 as an engine of accusation against him, and while his enemies charged him with thus lavishing the sums of money which they pretended he had received for selling Dunkirk, his conduct, though virtuous in the extreme, became so suspected, that the king in 1667 dismissed him from the office of chancellor. His dismissal was immediately followed by his impeachment, but he avoided the impending storm by flying into France, and consequently an act of banishment was passed against him. From Rouen he retired to Evreux in 1668, where one night he was attacked by a body of English seamen, who dragged him from his bed into the yard, and were going to despatch him, had not, in the violent scuffle, their lieutenant opportunely come to disarm them and save his life. He afterwards went to Montpellier, and then returned to Moulins 1672, and the next year settled at Rouen, where he died 9th Dec. His body was brought to England and interred in Henry the Seventh's chapel in Westminster abbey. He was twice married: by his first wife he had no children, and by the second, he had four sons and two daughters, of which Anne, the eldest, married the duke of York, and became mother of Mary and Anne, successively queens of England. Besides his most valuable history of the rebellion, which was completed about 1673, and which was best edited at Oxford, both in folio and 8vo. lord Clarendon wrote animadversions on Mr. Cressy's book, called Fanaticism, fanatically imputed to the catholic church by Dr. Stillingfleet, 8vo. 1672—A Survey of Hobbes' Leviathan, 4to. —Miscellaneous Tracts, collected and printed in one vol. fol.—an Account of his own Life to his Banishment, printed 1759 —The disgrace and the dismissal of Clarendon from the service of the king are attributed by some to the ridicule of Buckingham and other dissipated favourites, who amused their licentious monarch with other in six, 1599. He died in Nuremberg after 1602.

In 1666 he went to reside at Paris in consequence of the flattering invitations of Colbert, and the honourable grant of a handsome pension. Here, constantly devoted to mathematical and scientific pursuits, he found his health gradually decline from excessive application, and in 1681 he left France for his native country, where he spent the remainder of life. He died at the Hague, 8th June, 1695, in his 67th year, while his Cosmotheoros, a Latin treatise on the plurality of worlds, was printing. This work appeared 1698, his Opuscula Posthuma, 1703, 4to.—and the next year his Opera Varia, in 4 vols. 4to. under the care of Gravesande. The same editor, in 1728, published his Opera Reliqua, in 2 vols. 4to.—the first of which contains his treatises on Light and Gravity, and the second the Opuscula Posthuma. His works have been collected in 6 vols. 4to. Huygens was a great as well as a learned character, in virtue, in cheerfulness, and private worth equalled by few. He was never married.

HUYSUM, Justus Van, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam. He died 1716, aged 57. He was the pupil of N. Berchem and excelled in painting battles, landscapes, and flowers.

HUYSUM, John Van, son of the preceding, was born at Amsterdam 1682. He became so celebrated as a painter that his pieces sold for a very high price. He was so jealous of his fame that he never admitted any person to see him paint, and therefore his mode of mixing the tints and preserving the lustre of colours remained an impenetrable secret. He died 1749. His brothers Justus and Jacob were also excellent painters. Justus died at the age of 22, and Jacob 1740, aged 60.

HYDE, Edward, earl of Clarendon, and lord chancellor of England, was descended from an ancient Cheshire family, and born at Dinton, Wilts, 16th Feb. 1608. In 1622 he entered at Magdalen hall, Oxford, and on being disappointed in a fellowship at Exeter college, he removed to the Middle Temple, where he ardently devoted himself to the study of the law. In the parliament of 1640 he sat for Wootton Bassett, and distinguished himself as a speaker. He was elected for Saltash in the long parliament, and so well established was his reputation as an orator, and a man of influence, that when the commons presented articles of impeachment against the judges Davenport, Weston, and Trevor, he was commissioned to carry them to the lords, and he introduced them in a most excellent and energetic speech. He was not, however, so fully devoted to party as to forget his duties, the respect he had for the integrity of the church, and the honour of the crown, would not permit him to assent to the measures which banished the bishops from parliament, and though one of the committee against the persecuted Strafford, he soon abandoned the office, and opposed the attainder when he perceived the violence and vindictive animosity of his accusers. With an equal spirit of virtue and patriotism, he inveighed against the ordinance for raising the militia against the king, and when he saw his moderation suspected, he left the parliament, and in 1642 withdrew to the king at York. His abilities were well known to the unfortunate monarch, who soon after knighted him, and appointed him chancellor of the exchequer, and a privy counsellor. In 1643 he attended the parliament at Oxford, and the next year he was one of the commissioners at the treaty of Uxbridge, and afterwards went as secretary and assistant counsellor to the prince of Wales in his excursion into Wales. On the ruin of the royal cause, he passed into the Scilly islands, and in 1645 to Jersey, where he began to write his history of the rebellion. In 1648, on the king's death, he went to join his new master at Paris, and the next year he was sent with lord Cottington as ambassador extraordinary to Spain. He afterwards was made secretary of state, and in 1657 raised to the office of lord chancellor, which he continued to hold at the restoration. On his return to England with the king in 1660, he was made chancellor of Oxford, and created a peer, and the following year raised to the dignity of an earl. These high honours were due to his services, his prudence, and his moderation, and while he wished to restore the prerogatives of the crown, he was zealously employed in establishing the liberties of the people on a solid and permanent basis. Envy, however, is the attendant on greatness and virtue, and the elevation of his daughter, to be the wife of the duke of York, contributed perhaps more to his downfall than the firmness and courage with which he watched over the rights of the church, and the true interests of the kingdom against the intrigues of the catholics, and the machinations of the dissenters. He was first attacked in 1663, by lord Bristol, who exhibited against him sixteen charges of high treason, but though the malice of the accusation, and the inconsistency of his adversary were too glaring not to be rejected with indignation, the public odium still was directed against him. His building of a magnificent house was converted in 1664 as an engine of accusation against him, and while his enemies charged him with thus lavishing the sums of money which they pretended he had received for selling Dunkirk, his conduct, though virtuous in the extreme, became so suspected, that the king in 1667 dismissed him from the office of chancellor. His dismissal was immediately followed by his impeachment, but he avoided the impending storm by flying into France, and consequently an act of banishment was passed against him. From Rouen he retired to Evreux in 1668, where one night he was attacked by a body of English seamen, who dragged him from his bed into the yard, and were going to despatch him, had not, in the violent scuffle, their lieutenant opportunely come to disarm them and save his life. He afterwards went to Montpellier, and then returned to Moulins 1672, and the next year settled at Rouen, where he died 9th Dec. His body was brought to England and interred in Henry the Seventh's chapel in Westminster abbey. He was twice married: by his first wife he had no children, and by the second, he had four sons and two daughters, of which Anne, the eldest, married the duke of York, and became mother of Mary and Anne, successively queens of England. Besides his most valuable history of the rebellion, which was completed about 1673, and which was best edited at Oxford, both in folio and 8vo. lord Clarendon wrote animadversions on Mr. Cressy's book, called Fanaticism, fanatically imputed to the catholic church by Dr. Stillingfleet, 8vo. 1672—A Survey of Hobbes' Leviathan, 4to. —Miscellaneous Tracts, collected and printed in one vol. fol.—An Account of his own Life to his Banishment, printed 1759 —The disgrace and the dismissal of Clarendon from the service of the king are attributed by some to the ridicule of Buckingham and other dissipated favourites, who amused their licentious monarch with mimicking the personal consequence of the chancellor. While with a pair of bellows before him, to represent the purse, and a fire-shovel for the mace, Buckingham thus insulted the dignity of Clarendon, Charles unfortunately forgot in the jest the services of his faithful and loyal servant, and listened with greater pleasure to the vile insinuations of his concubines, than he respected the integrity, the wisdom, and the virtues of the friend of his father, and the supporter of his throne.

HYDE, Henry, earl of Clarendon, son of the chancellor, was born 1638. He was early employed in the correspondence carried on by his father, as secrecy was very requisite in the management of the king's affairs. At the restoration he was made M.A. at Oxford, and afterwards appointed chamberlain to the queen. He was so much dissatisfied with the illiberal treatment which his father had met with from the court, that he opposed the measures of ministers in parliament, and distinguished himself among the most eloquent speakers. On his father's death he took his seat in the house of lords, still in the ranks of opposition; but his zealous exertions against the bill of exclusion restored him to favour, and in 1680 he was made a privy counsellor, and on James's accession sent as viceroy to Ireland. His attachment to the protestants, however, was displeasing to a popish ministry; he was removed from Ireland, to make room for Tyrconnel, but on the abdication of the king, he refused to take the oaths of allegiance to William, and was therefore sent to the tower. After some months' confinement he retired into the country, and spent the remainder of his days in peace and privacy. He died 1709, aged 71. His State Letters, and his Diary for 1687, 1688, and 1690, were published 2 vols. 4to. 1763, at Oxford.

HYDE, Lawrence, second son of the chancellor, was, from the consequence of his family, early engaged about the court. He was made in 1661 master of the robes to the king, and in 1676 he was sent as ambassador to Poland, and was present as plenipotentiary at the congress of Nimwegen. He was made first lord of the treasury in 1679, and warmly opposed the bill which was brought into parliament to exclude the duke of York from the succession, and for his services he was raised to the peerage in 1681, by the title of viscount Hyde, and afterwards earl of Rochester. He was in 1684 appointed president of the council, lord treasurer, and in 1685 made knight of the garter, but though thus favoured by the court, he refused to change his religion at the pressing solicitations of his new sovereign, the second James, and thus sacrificed his place to his principles.

At the revolution he was one of the ecclesiastical commissioners, and was sent in 1700 to Ireland as lord lieutenant. His abilities recommended him equally to the next reign, as under Anne he was made president of the council. He died 1711, deservedly respected as an able statesman. The dedication of lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion was by him.

HYDE, Thomas, a learned writer, born 29th June, 1636, at Billingsley, near Bridgenorth, Salop, where his father was minister. After studying the oriental languages under his father, he went to King's college, Cambridge, and was soon after recommended by Wheelock, an able linguist, to Walton, afterwards bishop of Chester, whom he assisted in the completion of his polyglott Bible. His services were such in the transcribing of the characters, in the correction, and also in the setting forth of the Persian Pentateuch, that the learned editor acknowledged in the handsomest terms his abilities, and his meritorious assistance. In 1658 he entered at Queen's college, Oxford, and the year after by the direction of Richard Cromwell, the chancellor of the university, he was with every mark of respect, admitted M.A. He was afterwards elected under-librarian, and then head-librarian to the Bodleian, and in 1665 he published a Latin translation of Uleigh Beig's Observations on the Longitude and Latitude of the Stars. In 1666 he was made prebendary of Sarum, in 1678 archdeacon of Gloucester, in 1682 he took the degree of D.D. and in 1691 he was elected Arabic professor on Dr. Pocock's death. In 1697 he was made regius professor of Hebrew, and canon of Christ-church, and in 1701 resigned the Bodleian. He died 18th Feb. 1703, at Christ-church. He was interpreter and secretary for oriental languages to Charles II. and his two successors, and for learning, judgment, and extensive information he was deservedly esteemed. The best known and most valuable of his works is, Historia Religionis Veterum Persarum, eorumque Magorum, &c. published 1700, in 4to. dedicated to lord Somers, and abounding in most interesting and curious particulars concerning the theology, history, and learning of Eastern nations.

HYDE, Edward, was appointed deputy-governor of North-Carolina, in the place of Cary, and arrived in the colony August, 1710. In 1712 he received a new commission, constituting him governor. His short administration was conducted with prudence. It was remarkable for the rebellion instigated by Cary, and the commencement of the Indian war. The former was quelled by the assistance of the governor of Virginia. Both events were greatly prejudicial to the colony. Governor Hyde died Sept. 8th, 1812, and was succeeded by Eden.

HYDER-ALI-KHAN, an Asiatic prince, born at Dinavelli, in the Mysore. He served under his father, and after his death 1751, he joined his brother, who was in alliance with France. His intrepidity in the field, and a series of successful enterprises against the Mahrattas, and against the English power in the East, raised him not only to the rank of generalissimo of the king of Mysore's forces, but to the independent power of Suba of Servia. The sovereignty which his valour had acquired, he maintained by wisdom and sound policy, and only regarding the Europeans as intruders in the country, he formed the most artful and formidable plans for the complete expulsion of the English from Asia. The treaty which he had made in 1769, was violated in 1780; but the forces of Hyder were unable, though very numerous, to withstand the bravery of the English troops, and the military skill of Sir Eyre Coote. Hyder died in 1782, and was succeeded in his possessions by his son Tippoo Saib, who possessed equal valour, and was animated with the same hatred against the English name.

HYGINUS, Caius Julius, a Spaniard, the freedman of Augustus, was author of Poeticum Astronomicum, and other Latin works.

HYGINUS, a philosopher of Athens, who succeeded Telesphorus as pope of Rome, 153, and suffered martyrdom three years after. He was canonized. Two decretals are falsely imputed to him.

HYLL, Albayn, a physician in the 16th century, who studied at Oxford, and afterwards took a doctor's degree abroad. He wrote on Galen, and died in London, 1559. Some call him a native of Wales, others of Scotland.

HYPATIA, daughter of Theon, of Alexandria, succeeded her father in his school of philosophy, and maintained a high character for learning, and for female virtues. She was murdered in a tumult by the monks of Alexandria, A.D. 415. Her works are lost.

HYPERIDES, a disciple of Plato, who by accusing Demosthenes of bribery, procured his banishment from Athens. He was put to death by Antipater, 322 B.C.

HYPERIUS, Andrew Gerard, a divine, born at Ypres. He studied in France, which he left upon embracing the reformation. He came to England, and was afterwards divinity professor at Marburg, where he died 1564, having published 7 vols. folio, on divinity subjects, &c.

HYPSICLES, a mathematician of Alexandria under M. Aurelius, and Verus.

HYRCANUS, John, prince and high-priest of the Jews, after his father Simon. He by his firmness restored his countrymen to their independence from the power of Antiochus, king of Syria. He died 106 B.C. and was succeeded by his son, the second Hyrcanus, who died B.C. 30.

HYWELL, ap Owain, a prince of North Wales, who in vain endeavoured to succeed his father on the throne in preference to his brothers. When defeated he retired to Ireland, where he died 1171.

HYWELL, ap Morgan, a prince of Glamorgan, who died 1043, aged 130. Longevity seems to have been hereditary in his family, as three of his relations lived to nearly the same age.

HYWELL Dda, or Good, a legislator of Wales, who died 948.

IBA

IAMBLICUS, an Arabian king, deprived by Augustus of his dominions for supporting Antony at the battle of Actium. His son was restored to the throne, B.C. 22.

IAMBLICUS, a Greek author in the age of Marcus Aurelius.

IAMBLICUS, a native of Apamea in the reign of Julian. He wrote the Life of Pythagoras, &c. and was poisoned under Valens, A.D. 363.

IAMBLICUS, a Platonic philosopher, who studied under Porphyry, and was eminent for his eloquence, and the respectability of his pupils. He died under Constantine.

IARCHAS, a learned Indian philosopher, who is reported, according to Jerome, to have given Apollonius Tyannæus several magical rings of very great power, bearing the name of the seven planets.

IARCHI, Solomon Ben Isaac, a Jewish rabbi, born at Troyes, in Champagne, 1104. At the age of thirty he travelled abroad, and not only visited Italy and Greece, but penetrated to Egypt, Palestine, Persia, Tartary, and Muscovy, and returned through Germany. He died at Troyes, 1180, and his body was carried to be buried at Prague. His learning was very extensive, and consequently he is considered as one of the most illustrious rabbies. Among other valuable works he wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, &c. which have been translated by Fred. Breithaupt, at Gotha, 1710, 4to. His authority and his interpretations of Scripture, are much respected by the Jews. He had three daughters, who married learned rabbies.

IBARRA, Joachim, a native of Saragossa, eminent as a printer to the king of Spain.

His Bible—the Mozarabic Missal—Mariana's History of Spain—Don Quixote—Gabriel's translation of Sallust—and other works, are excellent specimens of his correctness and the elegance of his printing. He invented a valuable sort of printing-ink, and died 1785, aged 60.

IBAS, bishop of Edessa, was deposed and banished by the council of Ephesus, 449, for being a Nestorian, but he was restored by the council of Chalcedon, 451.

IBBOT, Benjamin, a learned divine, born 1680, at Beachamwell, Norfolk, where his father was rector. He was of Clare-hall Cambridge, and in 1700 removed to Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he became a fellow, 1706. He soon after resigned on obtaining the patronage of Tenison, the primate, who made him treasurer of Wells cathedral, and rector of St. Vedast and St. Michael le Querne, in London. In 1716 he was made chaplain to the king, and the next year, when his majesty visited Cambridge, he was by royal mandamus honoured with the degree of D.D. In 1713 and 15 he preached Boyle's lectures, and some time after was appointed assistant preacher to Dr. Samuel Clarke, and in 1724 was installed prebendary of Westminster. He died the next year, 5th April, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His friend Clarke published, in 2 vols. 8vo. 36 of his sermons, after his death, for the benefit of his widow, and it was liberally patronised and supported by the great and opulent, who had often admired the eloquence and animation of his preaching.

IBEK, Cotheddin, a slave, who usurped the throne of India after the death of his master, Schehabeddin. The history of his conquests, &c. has been published, called Tage al Mather.

IBEK, Azzeddin, an officer in the Egyptian court of Malek al Saleh, the sultan, who married his master's widow, and ascended the throne. He was assassinated by his wife six years after, A.D. 1257.

IBEK, an Arabian author of a book which describes the duties and qualifications of a secretary. He died 1348.

IBRAHIM IMAM, a Mahometan chief-priest, of noble birth and great influence. He was murdered by the caliph Marvan, who suffocated him in a bag of lime, A.D. 748.

IBRAHIM, son of Massoud, eighth caliph of the race of the Gaznevides, acquired the title of conqueror by the extent of his victories. He was a liberal monarch, and not only patronised learning, but erected mosques, &c. and died 1098, after a reign of 42 years.

IBRAHIM, brother of Haroun Raschid, was made caliph of Bagdad 817, but abdicated soon after, and died at Samara, 839.

IBRAHIM, a learned mussulman, doctor of Shiraz, author of several useful works on jurisprudence.

IBRAHIM, son of Achmet, succeeded his brother, Achmet IV. as emperor of the Turks, 1640. He took Candia, but was at last assassinated for his debaucheries and repeated cruelties, 1649.

IBRAHIM, Effendi, a Pole, who established a printing-press in Turkey, and published a treatise on the Military Art—a Turkish Grammar—a History of Turkey, &c.

IBYCUS, a Greek lyric poet, B.C. 540, murdered by robbers, whose crime was discovered by their mentioning his name at the sight of some cranes which they saw flying in the air.

IDACIUS, a Spanish prelate, author of a chronicle from the beginning of the reign of Theodosius to the 11th of Leo. His works were published by Sirmond, Paris, 1619, 8vo. He lived in the fifth century.

IDRIS, Gawr, a Welsh astronomer of such merit that one of the highest mountains of Wales still bears his name. He ranked as one of the three greatest astronomers of Britain. His age is unknown.

IGNATIUS, St. a father of the church, made bishop of Antioch by St. John the Evangelist. After exhibiting many virtues in his province, he was seized by Adrian, and exposed to the fury of wild beasts in the Roman amphitheatre. Seven of his epistles are preserved.

IGNATIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, was son of the emperor Michal Curopalata, by Procopia, and when his father was deposed by Leo, he retired to a monastery, and took the ecclesiastical habit. He was made patriarch 847, but his severe reprimand of Bardas, an incestuous courtier, procured his disgrace, and Photius was, after some time, placed in his room. He was restored under Basil, and presided at the eighth general council held at Constantinople. He died 878.

IGNATIUS. Vid. LOYOLA.

IGOR, sovereign prince of Russia, after his father Rurick, invaded the east, and spread desolation over Pontus and Asia Minor. He died 945, and his widow Alga, who succeeded him, was converted to Christianity.

ILDEFONSE, St. the pupil of Isidore of Seville, was abbot of a monastery at Toledo, and after the death of Eugenius, bishop of that see. He died nine years after, 667, aged 82, author of an Account of Ecclesiastical writers, and other works.

LIVE, Jacob, an English printer, who in 1751 published a pretended translation of the "book of Jasher," a work full of absurdities. He also printed an oration, in which he maintained that this earth is hell, that the souls of men are apostate angels, and that the fire which will punish those consumed in this world will be immaterial. He also wrote other curious and eccentric pieces, which originated in a disordered imagination. He died 1768.

ILLESCAS, Gonsalvo, a Spanish ecclesiastic, author of a history of the Catholic Pontifical, with the Lives of the Popes, 2 vols. fol. 1570, continued by Lewis de Babia, to 1605, and afterwards by Mark de Gaudalaxara. He died 1580.

ILLTYD VARCHOG, or ILLTUS, the knight, a saint, who is said to have come to Britain with Garmon, and to have presided over an ecclesiastical establishment made by Theodosius. He is also said to have taught the Welch an improved method of ploughing. He died 480.

ILLYRIUS, Matthias Flaccus, or Franco-witz, a learned divine, born 1520, at Albona, in Istria. He studied at Venice, and after acquiring a very extensive knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, he came to Wittenberg to complete his education under Luther and Melancthon, whose principles he warmly embraced. He was one of the writers of the "Centuriæ Magdeburgenses," but the learning, the application, zeal, and abilities which he possessed were far overbalanced by a restless, passionate, and unyielding temper, which created much dissension among the protestants. He wrote several learned works, and died 1575, little lamented.

IMBERT, Bartholomew, a poet of Nismes, member of the academy of that city. He fell a sacrifice to a violent fever, 1790, aged 43. He wrote a poem on the judgment of Paris, a work of merit—a volume of fables, inferior to those of La Fontaine—Les Egaremens de l'Amour, a novel, and other compositions of considerable eminence.

IMBERT, John, an advocate of Rochelle, lieutenant criminal of Fontenay-le-comte, who died at the end of the sixteenth century. He was author of Enchiridion juris et Scripti Galliaë, 4to. 1559; Institutiones forenses, 8vo. 1541, works once in high esteem.

IMBERT, Joseph Gabriel, a painter of Marseilles, the pupil of Vander-Meulen and Le Brun. Disgusted with the world, he, at the age of 34, embraced the austere order of St. Bruns, yet, in the midst of his fervent devotions, he employed some portion of his time in painting. He died at Avignon, 1749, aged 83. His best piece is a view of Calvary, at the high altar of the Chartreux, Marseilles.

IMHOFF, James William, a famous genealogist, lawyer, and senator of Nuremberg, where he died 1728, aged 77. He was deeply versed in the history of states. He published "Historia Genealogica Regum Magnæ Britanniaë," and other works, containing the genealogies of princes, and of illustrious houses in Spain, Italy, France, and Portugal, much esteemed.

IMPERIALI, John Baptist, a physician, born 1568, at Vicenza, and one of the twenty-four nobles of Genoa. He studied at Verona and Bologna, and taught philosophy at Padua. He practised afterwards with great success at Vicenza, where he died May, 1623. He wrote verses in the elegant style of Catullus. He published a 4to. vol. "Exercitationum Exoticarum," Venice, 1603.

IMPERIALI, John, son of the preceding, became eminent as a writer and as a physician. He died 1653, aged 51. He published "Musæum Historicum," 1640—and "Musæum Physicum, seu de Humano Iugenio."

IMPERIALI, Giuseppe Renato, a cardinal, born at Genoa, 1651. He is known for a magnificent and valuable library, which still adorns the city of Rome, and of which the catalogue was published, 1711, folio, by Fontanini. In 1730 he was proposed to the conclave to fill the vacant chair of St. Peter, and lost it by a single voice. He died 1737, aged 86.

INA, a king of the West Saxons, who went to Rome in 726, and there founded an English college, which was supported by an annual tax drawn from the English nation, called Peter-pence.

INACHUS, founded the kingdom of Argos, about 1858 B.C. Some authors place his age in the time of Moses, and others 346 before the departure of Israel from Egypt.

INCHOFER, Melchior, a German Jesuit, born at Vienna, 1584. He studied the law with great success, but at the age of twenty-eight he went to Rome, and entered among the Jesuits. He taught mathematics and divinity for some time at Messina, and published in 1630, in Latin, the blessed Virgin's Letter to the People of Messina, folio, which for a while gave offence; but upon his explanation, was deemed satisfactory to his fraternity. He was afterwards so displeased with the Jesuits, that he wrote against them a severe satire, which appeared after his death, in Holland. He died at Milan 1648. He wrote an Ecclesiastical History of Hungary, and several other works, which prove him to have been a very learned but credulous man.

INDULPHUS, a Scotch king, said to be the 77th since the foundation of that monarchy. When his kingdom was invaded by the Danes, he marched at the head of his forces to repel them, but unfortunately was shot by an arrow as he pressed them too closely in their flight to their ships.

INGHEN, William Van, a native of Utrecht, who studied painting under Anthony Grebber, and afterwards in Italy. He settled at Amsterdam, where he died at the beginning of the 17th century. His pieces are held in great esteem.

INGENHOUS, John, a native of Breda, who became eminent as a chymist, and a physician. He learned in England the Suttonian method of inoculation, and then went by Sir John Pringle's recommendation, to Vienna, where he inoculated the daughter of Joseph II. He was fellow of the Royal Society, and died 1799, aged 69. He is author of Experiments on Vegetables, 8vo.—Hulme's Treatise on the Gout, Scurvy, and Stone, translated into Latin,—Chymical Treatises on impregnating Waters, &c. with fixed Air,—besides papers in the philosophical transactions.

INGOLDSBY, Richard, governor of New-York, succeeded Slaughter by appointment of the council in 1691. The following year governor Fletcher assumed the administration. The chief command again devolved on him on the death of Lovelace, in 1709. His short administration is remarkable for a second fruitless attempt against Canada. He was succeeded by Beekman in 1710.

INGOULT, Nicholas Lewis, a native of Gisors, eloquent as a preacher among the Jesuits, and author of some sermons, and of the 8th vol. of the memoirs of the Jesuit missionaries in the Levant. He died 1753, aged 64.

INGRAM, Robert, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Beverley school, and Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He obtained the perpetual curacy of Bridhurst, Kent, and afterwards Orston vicarage, Notts, and then Wormington and Boxted in Essex. He wrote a View of the Great Events of the Seventh Plague, &c. concluding the Explanation of the Seven last Plagues, &c. 1785,—Account of the ten Tribes of Israel being in America, by Manassch Ben Israel, with Observations, 1792—Explanation of the Prophecy of the seven Phials of Wrath, &c. 1804. He died 1804.

INGRASSIA, John Philip, a physician of Palermo, celebrated for the skill with which he freed his country from the plague. He wrote, Veterinaria Medicina, Venice, 1568, and other works, and died 1581, aged about 70.

INGUIMBERTI, Dominic Joseph Marie d', a learned divine, born at Carpentras, of which city he became bishop. He was originally a Dominican, but afterwards devoted himself to the more austere order of the Cistercians, and by his learning and virtues recommended himself to the notice of Clement XII. by whom he was made bishop 1733. He died of an apoplexy, 1757, aged 75. He was a munificent as well as a pious prelate. His large revenues were applied to relieve the necessities of the poor, to the building of a hospital, the erecting of a large library, and other public and charitable uses. He published some treatises on Monastic Life,—on Theological Subjects,—besides the Lives of some Catholic Divines.

INGULPHUS, abbot of Croyland, was born in London, 1030, and educated at Westminster and Oxford. He was secretary to William of Normandy, before he invaded England, and in 1064, went to the Holy Land. He was made abbot by William, and died 1109. He was a great benefactor to his monastery which he rebuilt, and for which he obtained some important privileges. He wrote a History of the Abbey from 664 to 1091, published among the "quinque Scriptores," by H. Saville, London, 1596, folio, Frankfurt 1601, and Oxford 1684.

INNOCENT I. a native of Albano, elected pope after Anastasius the first, 402. He defended Chrysostom, and condemned the Novatians and Pelagians. He died at Ravenna, 14th Feb. 417. Some of his letters have been published by Constant.

INNOCENT II. was elected pope after Honorius II. though part of the cardinals protested against his elevation to the papal chair, by appointing the son of a Jew, of the name of Peter de Leo, who assumed the appellation of Anacletus II. Innocent, though supported by the princes of Europe, except the kings of Scotland and Sicily, who acknowledged the authority of his rival, was at last driven from Rome by the tumults of Arnald de Bresse, and retired to France, where he held several councils at Clermont, Rheims, Puy, &c. After the death of Anacletus, and the abdication of his successor, Victor IV. he returned to Rome, where he held the second Lateran council in 1139, attended by a 1000 bishops, and crowned Lothaire as emperor. He afterwards made war against Roger, king of Sicily, and died at Rome, 24th Sept. 1143.

INNOCENT III. Lothaire Conti, a native of Anagni, raised to the popedom, 1198, after Celestinus III. though only thirty-seven years old. To unite the Christian princes in the recovery of the Holy Land, he preached a crusade against the Albigenses of Languedoc, and afterwards put Philip Augustus of France under an interdict, and excommunicated John, king of England, and Raymond, count of Toulouse. He raised the papal authority to such a height, that the Roman republic in its brightest days, was never more powerful, so that the pope was no longer the vassal of the neighbouring princes, but the temporal master of all sovereigns, whom he could depose or restore agreeably to his absolute will. Under Innocent, the Dominicans, Franciscans, Trinitarians, and other orders arose, which were still to spread farther, and to confirm the power of Rome. This pope, thus distinguished by political sagacity and courtly intrigue, died at Perouse. 20th July, 1216. His works were published at Cologne, 1515.

INNOCENT IV. Sinibaldi de Fiesque, chancellor of the Roman church, and cardinal, was elected pope, 1243, after the death of Celestinus IV. He was early engaged in a quarrel with Frederic, emperor of Germany, who wished to invade the rights of the church, and he held a council at Lyons, in which he excommunicated and deposed the Imperial delinquent. This severe measure was displeasing to several princes; but Louis king of France, interfered in vain with the inexorable pontiff, and the dispute was terminated only by the death of the emperor. Innocent died soon after his return from France, at Naples, 13th December, 1254. He wrote Apparatus super Decretales, folio, and was the first who invested the cardinals with a red hat, as a mark of their dignity.

INNOCENT V. Peter de Tarantaise, a Dominican, archbishop of Lyons, and a cardinal, made pope 21st February, 1276. He died the 26th June following. He wrote Notes on the Epistles of St. Paul,—Commentaries, &c.

INNOCENT VI. Stephen Albert, a native of Pompadour in Limoges, was bishop of Ostia, and a cardinal, and in 1352 elected pope after Clement VI. He was of a peaceful disposition, and laboured earnestly to reconcile the kings of England and France. He is blamed for bestowing too many honours on his family, though their good conduct deserved the highest dignities. He died 12th September, 1362. Some of his letters are extant.

INNOCENT VII. Come de Meliorati, a native of Sulmone in Abruzzo, was elected pope 1404, but opposed by the arms of Ladislaus, king of Naples, who drove him from Rome. He died 6th Nov. 1406.

INNOCENT VIII. John Baptist Cibo, a noble Genoese of Greek extraction, bishop of Melfi, elected pope 1484. He laboured much to re-establish union among Christian princes, and showed himself particularly attentive to the interests of his family, and of his children, whom he had had before he was admitted into the church. He was a benevolent pontiff, and died of an apoplectic fit, 28th July, 1492, aged 60.

INNOCENT IX. John Anthony Facchinetti, a native of Bologna, made a cardinal by Gregory XIII. for his services at the council of Trent. He was elected pope 29th October, 1591, and died two months after. He had formed the plan of clearing the port of Ancona, and other magnificent improvements.

INNOCENT X. John Baptist Pamphili, a native of Rome, who succeeded Urban VIII. 1644, at the age of 72. He persecuted the Barberinis, to whom he was indebted for his elevation; and he published his bull against the five propositions of the Jansenists. He died 6th January, 1655, respected for many excellent qualities, though censured for some foibles.

INNOCENT XI. Benedict Odescalchi, a native of Como, in the Milanese, was made a bishop and a cardinal by pope Innocent X. and elected pope 1676. He reformed several abuses in the ecclesiastical states, and opposed with great firmness Lewis XIV. by refusing to admit to bishoprics those persons who were recommended to him by the monarch, so that at his death not less than thirty dioceses were vacant. He condemned the errors of the Molinists and the Quietists, and effected a strong coalition between Germany, Poland, and Venice, against the Turks. He died 12th Aug. 1689, aged 78.

INNOCENT XII. Anthony Pignatelli, a noble Neapolitan, raised to the papal chair 1691, after Alexander VIII. He issued a bull against the system adopted by his predecessors, of paying particular honours to the relations of popes, and condemned the Maxims of the Saints, written by Fenelon, archbishop of Cambray. He died 27th Sept. 1700, universally regretted by the Romans, who mourned him as a beneficent father.

INNOCENT XIII. Michael Angelo Conti, a native of Rome, the eighth pope of his family. He was elected 1721, and died 7th March, 1724, aged 69. His infirmities prevented the execution of several plans of improvement which he had formed, and it is said that he died of grief for having bestowed a cardinal's hat on Dubois.

INSTITOR, Henry, a Dominican, inquisitor general of Mayence, Treves, and Cologne, and author, with James Springer, of Malleus Maleficorum, Lyons, 1484, often reprinted. He wrote besides, a treatise against Errors in the Sacrament,—a book on Monarchy, &c.

INTAPHERNES, one of the seven nobles of Persia, who conspired against the usurper Smerdis, 521 B.C. He was afterwards put to death by Darius, for making attempts on the crown.

INTERIAN DE AYALA, John, a Spaniard of the order of Mercy, who died at Madrid, 1770, aged 74. He wrote some poems, besides Pictor Christianus Eruditus, folio, 1720, in which he censures the errors of painters in the representation of religious subjects.

INVEGES, Augustino, a Sicilian historian, and antiquary, of the society of the Jesuits. He died 1677, aged 84. He wrote, besides a History of Palermo, in Italian, 3 vols. fol. 1649—Historia Paradisi Terrestris, 4to. 1641,—la Cartagine Siciliana, 4to. 1651.

IRELAND, Samuel, an ingenious mechanic in Spitalfields. His skill in drawing and engraving became to him the source of distinction and comfortable independence. He published a picturesque tour through Holland, France, and Brabant, 1790.—Picturesque Views of the Thames, 8vo. 1792.—Picturesque Views of the Medway, 1793.—Graphic Illustrations of Hogarth, 1794.—Picturesque Views and Account of the Inns of Court. He died 1800. He has been deservedly censured for his attempt to impose upon the world a folio volume which he called a Collection of Letters, papers, &c. written by Shakspeare. The forgery for some time excited much of the public attention, and afterwards his son published a declaration in which he acknowledged himself alone guilty of this attempt to impose upon the good sense of the public.

IRELAND, John, was born near Wem in Shropshire, of a family related to the Rev. Philip Henry. He was brought up to the business of watch-making, which he carried on some years in Maiden-lane, Covent-garden. He also dealt in pictures and prints, for which he had a good taste. He died near Birmingham in 1808. He published the "Memoirs of John Henderson," the player, 8vo.; and "Illustrations of Hogarth," 3 vols. 8vo.—W. B.

IRETON, Henry, a republican general in the civil wars. He possessed great abilities, and uncommon valour, and deserved the friendship of Cromwell, whose eldest daughter, Bridget, he married. He was sent to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, and died at the siege of Limerick, 26th Nov. 1651, much lamented. His body was buried with great pomp in Westminster abbey, but at the restoration it was dug up and exposed on Tyburn gibbet, with those of Cromwell and Bradshaw. His daughter Bridget married Thomas Bendish.

IREVISA, John, vicar of Berkeley, Gloucestershire, was born in Cornwall. At the request of his patron, Thomas lord Berkeley, he translated the "Polychronicon," 1387.

IRNERIUS, called also Wernerus or Guarnerus, a German lawyer of the 12th century. He studied at Constantinople and Ravenna, and taught at Bologna. He was properly the restorer of the Roman law, and therefore deserved from his numerous pupils the name of "Lucerna Juris." He was the father of the Glossators, and prevailed upon the Emperor Lotharius, whose chancellor he was, to introduce the creation of doctors in the universities, an honour which spread from Bologna, where it first had its rise, to the other learned bodies of Europe. He died 1150, and was buried at Bologna.

IRONSIDE, Gilbert, a native of Hawkesbury, educated at Trinity college, Oxford, and made rector of Winterbourn, Dorsetshire. He was author of a Sermon, 1660, and of seven questions of the Sabbath, 4to. and at the restoration he was made bishop of Bristol, where he died 1671, aged 83.

IRVINE, William, an officer in the army of the American revolution, was a native of Ireland, and educated a physician. He held an office in the army, which marched against Canada in 1775, and distinguished himself by his courage and talents. He served in the army in the middle states during the remainder of the war, as a major-general, and enjoyed the high respect of the commander-in-chief. At the battle of Trenton he had the command of a division, detached to prevent the enemy's retreat. After the war he was elected a member of congress from Pennsylvania, and was for some time military intendant, and president of the Cincinnati of Pennsylvania. He died at Philadelphia, July 30, 1804. L.

IRWIN, Eyles, was born at Calcutta, of Irish parents, in 1748. He received his education under Dr. Rose at Chiswick; and in 1767 returned to the east in a civil capacity; but was suspended in 1777, for his attachment to lord Pigot; on which he came to Europe over land to seek redress; which he obtained, and he was restored to his former station at Madras, whither he repaired again by the same route. In 1785 he returned again to England; but in 1792 he went to China to superintend the company's affairs; after which he revisited England, where he died in 1817. His works are—1. St. Thomas's Mount, a poem.—2. Bedakah, an Indian pastoral.—3. Adventures during a Voyage up the Red Sea, and a Journey across the Desert, 8vo.—4. Eastern Eclogues, 4to.—5. Epistle to Mr. Hayley.—6. Ode on the death of Hyder Ali.—7. Triumph of Innocence, an ode on the acquittal of Mr. Hastings.—8. Inquiry into the feasibility of Buonaparte's Expedition to the East, 8vo.—9. Buonaparte in Egypt.—10. Nilus, an Elegy on the Victory of Admiral Nelson.—11. The Failure of the French Crusade.—12. The Bedouins, 12mo.—13. Ode to Iberia.—14. Elegy on the Fall of Saragossa.—15. Napoleon, or the Vanity of Human Wishes, 2 parts, 4to.—W. B.

ISAAC, son of Abraham and Sarah, was born 1896 B.C. His father's faith was tried by an order from heaven to offer his favourite son as a sacrifice on the mountains of Moriah. Isaac was father of Esau the progenitor of the Edomites, and of Jacob the ancestor of the Israelites. He died 1716 B.C.

ISAAC COMNENUS, Greek emperor in the room of Michael Stratioticus, 1057. After a prudent but turbulent reign, he retired to the solitude of a monastery, leaving the crown to Ducas Constantine, and died two years after, 1061.

ISAAC, Angelus, Greek emperor after Andronicus Comnenus, 1185. He was imprisoned and deprived of his sight by his brother Alexius, after whose death he was restored to the throne. He died in 1204.

ISAAC, Caro, a rabbi, who left Spain in consequence of the edict of Ferdinand, which in 1492 banished the Jews from his dominions, within four months, except they became Christians. He went first to Portugal, and then retired to Jerusalem, where he devoted himself to study and solitude. He wrote "the Generations of Isaac," which is a commentary on the Pentateuch of Moses. The book is esteemed, and has passed through several editions, the last of which is at Amsterdam, 1708.

ISAACSON, Henry, a native of London, secretary to bishop Andrews. He compiled a valuable work on Chronology, fol. and died 1654, aged 73.

ISABELLA, daughter of Philip the Fair, king of France, was born 1292. She married 1308, Edward, afterwards the second of England, but her licentiousness disgraced her character, and embittered the latter part of her life; and her partiality to her favourite, Mortimer, proved so offensive to her son Edward III. that he ordered her to be confined to the castle of Rising, where she languished 28 years of captivity, and died at the age of 75.

ISABELLA, of Bavaria, married Charles VI. king of France, 1385. She was a woman of licentious manners, of an intriguing disposition, and of a most vindictive temper. She dishonourably sacrificed her only son to her partiality for the English, and wished for the triumph of Henry V. of England, who had married her sixth daughter Catharine, rather than the prosperity of her country under the government of their natural sovereign. She died little lamented, at Paris, 30th Sept. 1435, aged 64.

ISABELLA, daughter of John II. of Castile, was born 1451, and married, 1469, Ferdinand V. king of Arragon. She succeeded to the kingdom of Castile, 1474, and though opposed by the pretensions of her niece, she crushed all opposition, and, by the union of Castile and Arragon, she was, with her husband, proclaimed sovereign of Spain. She possessed great powers of mind, and was distinguished by her integrity, her justice, and her public and private virtues. Her reign is remarkable for the conquest of Grenada from the Moors, and the discovery of America, by the bold genius of Columbus, but it was disgraced by the introduction of the sanguinary tribunal of the inquisition. Isabella died of a dropsy, 1504, aged 54, leaving only one daughter, Jane, who married Philip of Austria, and became mother of Charles V.

ISABELLA, daughter of Alphonso, duke of Calabria, married by proxy, in 1489, John Galeazzo Sforza, a minor. The union of these lovers was put off by the intrigues of Lewis Sforza, the uncle and the guardian of the bridegroom, who had himself fallen in love with Isabella; but when his guilty addresses were received with the contempt which they merited, he determined on revenge. By marrying Alphonsina, the daughter of the duke of Ferrara, he gained an active accomplice in his criminal intentions; the unfortunate Galeazzo was poisoned, and the disconsolate Isabella fled to Naples, and after seeing the destruction of all her family, she retired to a small town in the neighbourhood, where she died, 1524. Her daughter married Sigismund, king of Poland.

ISABELLA, sister of Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland, married, in 1539, John Zopolita, waivode of Transylvania, afterwards king of Hungary. The birth of a son so pleased the father, who was engaged in the siege of Fogarra, that he communicated his joy to his army, and, in a feast which he gave to his soldiers, he unfortunately fell a victim to his great intemperance, 1540. Thus left unprotected, and unable to resist the arms of Ferdinand of Austria, against whom her husband had made war, she, in an evil hour, called to her aid Solyman, the Turkish sultan, who, instead of protecting her, seized her capital, and obliged her to fly to Transylvania, of which she was soon after stripped by the great successes of her enemies. She recovered Transylvania in 1556, and died, two years after, respected for her magnanimity and courage.

ISÆUS, a Greek orator, born at Chalcis, in Eubœa. He had numerous pupils, among whom was Demosthenes. Ten of his orations are extant. Another Greek orator, who flourished at Rome, A.D. 97.

ISAAH, the greatest of the prophets, was son of Anno, and of the lineage of David. He is called the evangelical prophet, from the clear and consistent manner in which, in language of grace, fire, and sublimity, he describes the coming and the attributes of Messiah. He prophesied from 735 to 681, B.C. and is said to have been cut into two with a wooden saw, by the cruel orders of king Manassch.

ISDEGERDES, king of Persia after Sapor, was valiant, but debauched and cruel. He defeated the younger Theodosius, and persecuted the Christians. He died by the kick of a horse, A.D. 420.

ISELIN, James Christopher, a learned German, born at Basil, 1681. He was professor of history and eloquence at Marburg, 1704, and was advanced to the chair of divinity, at Basil, 1711. He died at Basil, 1737. Of his numerous writings the chief are, De Gallis Rhenum transeuntibus, Carmen Heroicum—de Historicis Latinis Melioris Ævi Dissertatio—Dissertations and Orations on various subjects.

ISHMAEL, son of Abraham, by Agar, was born 1910 B.C. He was driven away with his mother, by his father, and settled at Paran, where he became the progenitor of the Arabians.

ISHMAEL I. sophy of Persia, was descended from Ali, the son-in-law of Mahomet, and distinguished himself by his valour, prudence, and wisdom on the throne. He died 1523, in the 18th year of his reign.

ISHMAEL II. sophy of Persia after Thomas, 1575, was the murderer of his eight brothers, and at last was poisoned, 1579, by his own sister, who resented his embracing the tenets of a different sect of Mahometans.

ISIDORE, St. a disciple of St. Chrysostom, who became a hermit, near Pelusium, where he died about 440. Some of his letters, &c. are extant, edited Paris, fol. 1383, in Greek and Latin.

ISIDORE, of Alexandria, an Egyptian placed over a monastery by Athanasius, and called the Hospitaler. He defended his patron against the Arians, for which he was expelled by Theophilus the patriarch. He died at Constantinople, 403.

ISIDORE of Cordova, author of commentaries on the books of kings, dedicated to Paul Orosius, the disciple of Augustine, was bishop of Cordova, in the age of Honorius, and of Theodosius the younger.

ISIDORE of Seville, a bishop of Seville, called the doctor of his age, and the ornament of his church, from his learning and humanity, died 636, after presiding 40 years over his see. He was author of Commentaries on the Scripture—a Chronicle from Adam to 626—a treatise of Ecclesiastical Writers, and other works.

ISIDORUS of Charax, a Greek author, 300 B.C. His description of Parthia has been edited by Heschelius, and also at Oxford, 1703.

ISINGRINIUS, Michael, an eminent printer of Basil, who printed in Greek the works of Aristotle, in a style and manner much superior to those of former editors, even of Aldus Manutius. His edition of the history of plants by Fuchs was equally admired. He lived in the 16th century.

ISMENIAS, a Theban general who refused to kneel before the Persian king, but by dropping and taking up his ring performed, in the opinion of the courtiers, the homage due to their sovereign.—A musician of that name. When taken prisoner by the king of Scythia, the monarch observed that the neighing of his horse was more pleasing than the music of Ismenias.

ISOCRATES, a Greek orator, born at Athens, 436. He devoted himself to the public instruction of youth. His 21 orations are best edited by Beattie, 2 vols. 8vo. 1749.

ISRAEL, Manasseh Ben, a learned rabbi in the Low Countries, who offered to Cromwell 200,000*l.* for permission to his countrymen, the Jews, to settle in England, and to have the use of St. Paul's cathedral. This was opposed with spirit by the clergy, but it is said by Heath that the protector "gulled the Jews of their earnest money." He wrote several works, mentioned by Wolfius, and in the Bodleian catalogue, and died 1657.

ITTIGIUS, Thomas, a German divine, born at Leipsic, 1644. He was educated at Leipsic, Rostock, and Strasburg, and rose by his merit to the professorship of divinity at Leipsic, in 1691. He died April, 1710. He wrote, besides dissertations in the Leipsic acts—Dissertatio de Hæreshiar-chis Ævi Apostolici eique Proximi—Prolegomena ad Josephi Opera—Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ primi et secundi Seculi Selecta Capita—Exhortationes Theologicæ—Historia Synodorum, &c.

IVES, or YVES, bishop of Chartres, 1093, was born at Beauvais, 1035. He died, after a life of great piety, 1115, and was canonized. There are extant of his compiling "a Collection of Decrees"—Exceptiones Ecclesiasticarum Regularum—Sermons—a Chronicon, &c.

IVES, John, an eminent antiquarian, born at Yarmouth, and educated at Caius college, Cambridge. He was raised to the revived office of Suffolk Herald, but without any emolument, and he was also fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies. He died of a deep consumption 9th June, 1776, aged 25 years. His library and collection of coins, medals, paintings, &c. were sold by auction. He published "three select papers" from his own collection, besides remarks upon the Garianonum of the Romans, the scite and remains fixed and described, 12mo. 1774.

IVETEAUX, Nicholas Vauquelin seigneur de, a French poet, born at Fresnaye. He was made preceptor to the duke of Vendome, the son of Gabrielle d'Estrées, and afterwards to Lewis XIII. when dauphin. The licentiousness of his manners rendered him incapable of holding the benefices which the court intended for him, and when reproached by Richelieu for his dissolute conduct he retired to his house in St. Germain, where he spent the rest of his life in epicurean ease and voluptuous indulgence. As he considered the pastoral life the most agreeable, he dressed himself in the habit of a shepherd, and, attended by his mistress, disguised as a nymph playing on the harp, he wasted away his time in the gross-est sensuality, regardless of the opinions of the world or the calls of religion. He died 1649, aged 90, at a country seat near Germigny. He wrote Institution d'un Prince, a poem of merit—Sonnets, Songs, &c. in the Delices de la Poesie Francoise, 1620, 8vo.

IWAN V. John Alexiowitz, second son of Michaelowitz, succeeded his brother Feodor Alexiowitz, 1682, on the throne of Russia. As his powers of mind, however, were very weak, he was declared incapable of reigning, and sent to a monastery, and the sceptre was placed in the hands of his brother Peter. This change displeased his sister Sophia, who wished to obtain the supreme power, and by her intrigues, Iwan was drawn from his confinement, and seated on the throne with her and with Peter. This divided sovereignty continued for six years; but the design of Sophia to sacrifice her brother Peter to her ambition, proved abortive, and the proscribed prince confined his guilty sister in a convent, and seized the reins of government alone. Iwan died 1696, aged 35, leaving five daughters.

IWAN VI. of Brunswick Bevern, succeeded, when three months old, his great aunt, Anne Iwanova, as emperor of Russia, 1740. The guardianship of his minority was intrusted, by the dying empress, to her favourite, Ernest, duke of Biren; but soon after the regent was removed, and the emperor's mother, Anne of Mecklenburg, was placed at the head of the government as guardian. The next year the unfortunate child was dethroned, and confined in a fortress, from which a monk had the art to remove him, and to carry him to Germany. The attempt did not, however, succeed, and Iwan was again immured in a monastery, where he was at last put to death, 16th July, 1764, by order of Catherine, the wife of Peter III. who ascended the throne, 1762.

IZAACKE, Richard, a native of Exeter, educated at Exeter college, Oxford. He was afterwards chamberlain and town clerk of his native town, of which he wrote the history, published 1677, 8vo. and again improved by his son, 1724.

JAB

JAAPIHAN, Ebn Tophail, an Arabian philosopher at the end of the twelfth century, author of a romance, called the History of Hai Ebn Yokdhan, in which he asserts that by the light of nature a man may acquire a knowledge of things, and of God. It was published with a Latin translation, 1671, by E. Pocolcke, and in 1708 appeared in English by Simon Ockley.

JABLONSKI, Daniel Ernest, a popish divine, born 20th Nov. 1660, at Dantzig. He studied in Germany, and afterwards visited Holland and England. He was afterwards minister of Magdeburg, Lessa, Koningsberg, and Berlin, and he zealously opposed infidelity, and endeavoured in his ecclesiastical capacity, but in vain, to reconcile the Lutherans and Calvinists. He translated into Latin Bentley's Sermons and Boyle's Lectures, and wrote some Dissertations on the Land of Gessen, and other works highly esteemed. He died May, 1741.

JABLONSKI, Theodore, counsellor of the court of Prussia, and secretary to the royal society of sciences at Berlin, was a man of extensive erudition, and highly esteemed for his private virtues. He was so modest that he did not prefix his name to his works. He wrote Dictionnaire Francois et Allemand, et Allemand Francois, 1711—a Course of Morality in German, 1713—Dictionnaire Universel des Arts et des Sci- ences, 1721—and a Translation of Tacitus de Mor. Germ. 1724.

JAC

JABLONSKI, Paul Ernest, son of Daniel Ernest, was born 1693, at Berlin, and became theology professor at Frankfort on the Oder. He wrote Disquisitio de Lingua Lycaonica de Memnone Græcorum—Institutiones Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ, 2 vols. 8vo.—and Pantheon Ægyptiorum, a learned work, 3 vols. 8vo. He died 1757.

JABLONSKI, Charles Gustavus, author of a natural history of insects, was member of the society of Halle, and died 1787.

JACETIUS, Francis de Cataneis, an Italian writer, born at Florence, 1466. He was the disciple and successor of Marsilius Ficinus, as professor of Platonic philosophy at Florence, and died 1552. He wrote a treatise of beauty, and another of love, according to Plato, and other works, printed together at Basil, 1563.

JACHAIA, Ben Joseph, a Portuguese rabbi, born at Lisbon, where he died 1539. He wrote among other things, a paraphrase on Daniel, in which he promised a speedy restoration to his nation.

JACKSON, Thomas, an English divine, born 1579 at Willowing, county of Durham. He entered at Queen's college, Oxford, 1595, and the year after removed to Corpus Christi, of which he was elected fellow in 1606. He became D.D. 1622, and two years after took a living, and also the vicarage of Newcastle, which he resigned in 1630, when elected president of his college. In 1635 he was made prebend of Winchester by the friendship of Neil, bishop of Durham and of Laud, and in 1638 he was raised to the deanery of Peterborough. He died 1640, and was buried in the chapel of his college. He was a man of great learning, singular piety, and of an exemplary character. He was well acquainted with the fathers, and his works, which are numerous, display great knowledge of Scripture. They were published in 3 vols. folio, consisting of sermons, besides commentaries on the apostles' creed. They were much admired by bishop Horne, as well as by Mr. Merrick, of Trinity college, Oxford.

JACKSON, John, an English divine, born 4th April, 1686, at Lenscy, Yorkshire, where his father was minister. He was educated at Doncaster school, and afterwards entered at Jesus's, Cambridge, where he studied Hebrew under Ockley. In 1710 he was presented to the living of Rossington by the corporation of Doncaster, and married 1712. He was refused the degree of M.A. at Cambridge, in consequence, it is said, of his heretical opinions; and by embracing tenets opposite to the church, he embroiled himself greatly at Leicester, where he went to reside as confrator of Wigston hospital. As he refused to subscribe to the articles, he lost in 1724 a prebend in Salisbury church, though on the death of his friend Dr. Clarke, in 1729, he succeeded to the mastership of Wigston hospital by the presentation of the duke of Rutland. As he was fond of controversy, his works are numerous on theological subjects, and display labour, judgment, and learning. It is to be lamented, that he showed such virulence in his conduct, which drew upon him the resentment of the clergy, so that he was at Bath refused the sacrament, and in Leicester forcibly denied the use of the pulpit. He opposed the doctrine of the trinity, and attacked Warburton and others, even some of his friends, in his pamphlets. His last, and by far his best work, is "Chronological Antiquities," 3 vols. 4to. 1752. He prepared materials for an edition of the Greek Testament, of which, however, his infirmities prevented the publication. He died 12th May, 1763, leaving four children only, out of the twelve whom his wife bore him. Memoirs of him were published by Dr. Sutton, of Leicester, 1764.

JACKSON, Arthur, a divine, ejected from his living of St. Faith, in London, 1662, for nonconformity. He was afterwards imprisoned, and fined 500*l.* for refusing to give evidence against Christopher Love. He was chosen at the restoration to present, in the name of the assembly of divines, a Bible to Charles II. and was also one of the ministers who attended the Savoy conference. He wrote a commentary on the Bible, 3 vols. 4to. and died 1666.

JACKSON, William, a native of Exeter, eminent as a musical composer, and as a writer. He first studied music at Exeter, and afterwards removed to London, under the care of Mr. Travers, and in 1777 was chosen organist of St. Peter's church in his native town, where he died 1803, aged 73. Besides books of songs, hymns, sonatas, canzonets, &c. of merit, he wrote thirty letters on various subjects, lately edited a third time—the four Ages, 8vo.—Treatise on the present State of Music, 12mo.—Papers in the essays of the Exeter Society, &c. One of his sons was ambassador at the court of Sardinia, afterwards in France, and at Berlin, and another accompanied lord Macartney, as his secretary, to China.

JACKSON, Dr. Cyril, an eminent divine, was born in 1746 at Stamford, where his father was a medical practitioner. He received his education at Westminster-school, from whence he removed to a studentship at Christ-church, Oxford, where he proceeded to his master's degree in 1771, to that of B.D. in 1777, and that of D.D. in 1781. He became sub-preceptor to his present majesty, for which he was made canon of Christ-church, and on the elevation of Dr. Bagot to a bishopric, he succeeded him in the deanery, which he resigned in 1809. Dr. Jackson was an excellent governor of his college and an elegant scholar, but he as studiously avoided the press as he did the mitre, though the primacy of Ireland was offered to him, as well as an English bishopric. He died at Felpham, in Sussex, in 1819. His brother, Dr. William Jackson, born at Stamford, in 1750, became prebendary of York, regius professor of Greek at Oxford, preacher to the society of Lincoln's-inn, canon of Christ-church, and in 1811 bishop of Oxford. He died in 1815. The bishop was a sound mathematician, and a learned divine. He translated a tract on the Sieve of Eratosthenes into Latin, and published some sermons.—W. B.

JACOB, son of Isaac and Rebecca, obtained from his elder brother, Esau, his birthright, and also by the advice of his mother, his father's blessing. This conduct drew upon him the vengeance of Esau, which he avoided by flying to Padan-aran, where he served his uncle Laban for fourteen years, and obtained his two daughters, Leah and Rachael, for wives. He was afterwards reconciled to his brother, and went to Egypt with all his family, in consequence of the elevation of his son Joseph to the supreme power of the country, under Pharaoh. He died in Egypt, B.C. 1689, aged 147. The name of Israel, given to him by an angel, descended to his posterity called Israelites.

JACOB, Henry, a native of Kent, educated at Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He afterwards retired to his living, and died 1621, aged 60. He is author of some treatises against the Brownists, and of a work on our Saviour's sufferings.

JACOB, Henry, son of the preceding, became an able Orientalist under Erpenius. He was fellow of Merton college, Oxford, but was ejected during the civil wars, and died at Canterbury, 1652, aged 44. He wrote, according to Wood, Delphi Phœnicizantes, edited by Dickenson—and other works, still in MS.

JACOB, Giles, an able lawyer, author of a Law Dictionary—the Lives and Characters of English poets—and other valuable works, died 1744, aged 54.

JACOB, a Cistercian monk in Hungary, who assembled a number of peasants in France and Germany, on pretence of going with this fanatical multitude to deliver the Holy Land from the infidels. He pretended also to be commissioned by the Virgin to set Lewis king of France at liberty, who had been made prisoner by the Saracens, and for this purpose he preached a crusade, but the government at last refused to countenance the measure, and therefore the enthusiastic zealots were dispersed, and Jacob soon after murdered by a butcher, in the beginning of the 13th century.

JACOB AL BARDAI, a disciple of Severus, and an able leader of the Eutychians, who from him were called Jacobites.

JACOB, Ben Naphthali, a rabbi of the fifth century, of the sect of the Masorites, educated at Tiberias, in Palestine. The invention of points in the Hebrew letters instead of vowels, is attributed to him, and to his friend Ben Asser, in the year 476.

JACOB, Ben Hajim, a rabbi of the 16th century, known as the editor of the Masora and Hebrew Bible, with the Chaldee paraphrase, &c. Venice, 4 vols. folio, 1525, much esteemed by the Jews.

JACOBÆUS, Oliger, professor of philosophy and physic at Copenhagen, was born July, 1650, at Arhusen, Jutland, where his father was bishop. After studying at Copenhagen, he travelled over France, Italy, Germany, Hungary, England, and the Netherlands, and on his return was honourably received by his university, who appointed him professor, and by the Danish king, who gave him the management of his cabinet of curiosities, and made him counsellor of his court of justice. The loss of his wife in 1698 robbed him of all his happiness, and though he attempted to avert his grief by a second marriage, he fell a sacrifice to his melancholy, 1701. He left six sons by his first wife. He wrote de Ranis et Lacertis Dissertatio—Oratio in Obitum T. Bartholini, his father-in-law—Gaudia Arctoi Orbis, &c. besides some elegant Latin poems.

JACOBS, Julian, a painter of Switzerland, the disciple of Francis Snyders. The animals which he introduced in his historical pieces, were finished in a very animated style. He died 1664, aged 54.

JACOMB, Thomas, D.D. a native of Leicestershire, educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, from which he removed to Cambridge, to become fellow of Trinity college. In 1647 he obtained the living of St. Martin, Ludgate, from which he was ejected for nonconformity in 1662. He died 1687, in the family of lady Exeter, where he had found protection and maintenance. He wrote a treatise of Holy Dedication—Sermons—a Commentary on the eighth of Romans—and contributed also to the continuation of Pool's Annotations.

JACOPONE, da Todi, an Italian poet, contemporary with Dante. On becoming a widower he distributed his property to the poor, and entered into the order of Minors, and acquired the surname of the Happy, in consequence of his character of sanctity. He wrote several canticles, full of fire and zeal, besides Stabat Mater, a Latin poem. He died very old, 1306. The best edition of his Canticles is that of Venice, 1617, 4to. with notes.

JACQUELOT, Isaac, a protestant minister of Vassy, born in 1647. He retired to Heidelberg and the Hague at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and then became chaplain to the king of Prussia, who had accidentally heard him preach. He died at Berlin, 1708. He wrote Dissertations on the Messiah—2 vols. of Sermons—letters to the French Bishops—and some controversial tracts.

JACQUET, Lewis, a native of Lyons, who died 1793, aged 61. It is said that he resembled in his manners the famous J. J. Rousseau, and therefore he was his warm admirer and imitator. His parallel between Greek and French tragic poets possessed great merit, and some of his essays were honoured with the laurel by the Besancon academy.

JACQUIER, Francis, a native of Vitry, who died at Rome 1788, aged 77. He was eminent as a divine and mathematician, and wrote, assisted by Le Sueur, Newton's Philos. Natur. Principia Mathem. 4 vols. 4to.—Institutiones Philos. ad Studia Theol. accomm. 5 vols. 12mo.—He published besides a treatise of Algebra, and other works in Italian.

JADDUS, was high-priest of Judæa when Alexander approached Jerusalem, determined to destroy it, and by meeting the monarch in his pontifical robes, he converted his resentment into reverence, and to the offering of sacrifices to the God of Israel.

JADELOT, Nicholas, a native of Nancy, who died there, 26th June, 1793, aged 57. He was eminent as a physician, and was author of the Pictures of Animal Economy, 8vo.—A Complete Course of Anatomy, fol.—Physica Hominis Sani, 2 vols. 12mo.—Pharmacopœia for the Poor, 8vo. &c.

JAEGER, John Wolfgang, a Lutheran divine, born at Stutgard, where the duke of Wirtemberg, whose son he had educated, made him his counsellor, and also preacher of the cathedral, and abbot of the monastery of Adclberg. In 1702 he was made divinity professor, chancellor of the university, and provost of Tubingen, and died 1720. He wrote, Ecclesiastical History compared with profane—A Compendium of Divinity—Observations on Puffendorf and Grotius—a treatise of Laws—Spinoza's Life and Doctrines examined, and other Latin works.

JAGO, Richard, an English poet, born 11th Oct. 1715, at Beaudesert, Henley, Warkwickshire, where his father was rector. From Solihul school, where he had among his fellow-pupils, Shenstone, he went in 1732 as servitor to University college. In 1737 he took orders, and in 1744 married a clergyman's daughter by whom he had several children, and who left him a widower in 1751. He obtained the livings of Harbury and Chesterton, 1746, and in 1754 lord Clare obtained for him the vicarage of Snitterfield, and in 1771 his patron, Lord Willoughby de Broke gave him, instead of Harbury, Kilmcote in Leicestershire, worth 300*l.* a year. His elegy on the Blackbirds appeared in 1752, in Hawkesworth's Adventurer, and as it was anonymous, it was attributed to various authors, and especially to Gilbert West. He died after a short illness, 8th May, 1781, aged 66, and was buried in a vault at Snitterfield. Three of his daughters survived him. By his second wife, married 1759, he had no children. His most admired performance is Edgehill, a descriptive poem, in blank verse, 1767. His life has been written by his friend Hylton.

JAÏLOT, Alexis Hubert, a French sculptor, who, by marrying the daughter of a map colourer, adopted his father-in-law's profession, and soon excelled in the execution of maps. He engraved in a very neat manner the designs of Sansons, and laboured till his death in 1721, in geographical studies. His maps of France are valuable, but that of Lorraine is the best. One of his daughters married Renou who assumed the name of Jaïlot, and became geographer to the king. He died 5th April, 1780. His Recherches Critiques, Historiques, &c. sur Paris, &c. 5 vols. 8vo. 1772.

is a correct, interesting, and much admired work.

JAMES, St. the great, son of Zebedee and Salome, was a fisherman, and was called with his brother John, while mending their nets, to become apostles, by our Saviour. He was present with his brother and Peter at the transfiguration of his blessed master; and after the crucifixion, he preached the gospel to the Jews who were dispersed in the neighbouring towns of Syria. On his return to Judea, he was seized by Herod Agrippa, and cruelly put to death with the sword A.D. 44.

JAMES, St. the less, brother of Simon and Jude, was also one of the apostles, and received the surname of Just, on account of the great virtues of his character. He was the first appointed bishop of Jerusalem, and for his firmness he was called by St. Paul, one of the pillars of the church. He was put to death with the blow of a fuller's club, under Annanias the high-priest, A.D. 62, who in vain wished to persuade him to renounce the name and the religion of his Saviour. His epistles to the dispersed Hebrew converts, is preserved among the canonical books of the New Testament.

JAMES, St. a bishop of Nisibis, distinguished by his patriotism, his zeal, and unbounded benevolence, when his country was besieged by the Persians. He died about 350. His works were printed, Rome, 1736, folio.

JAMES I. king of Scotland, after his father Robert III. was taken by the English as he was crossing over to France. After a severe imprisonment of 18 years, he was set at liberty on condition of marrying Jane, daughter of the earl of Somerset, 1424. He severely punished those who had governed his kingdom in his absence; and in consequence of these harsh measures he was assassinated in his bed by their relations, and died pierced with thirty-six wounds, 1437.

JAMES II. king of Scotland, succeeded at the age of seven to his father, James I. and ably supported Charles VII. of France, in his war against the English. He punished some of his barons, who had revolted against him, and he was killed at the siege of Roxburgh, 3d Aug. 1460, aged 29, by a cannon shot, and after his death, his queen, Mary of Guelders, continued the attack, and took the town.

JAMES III. succeeded his father James II. on the throne of Scotland, and rendered himself odious by his cruelties. He put to death his brother John, but Alexander his other brother escaped the last fatal blow aimed against him, and levied war against the tyrant. James, defeated in a battle by his rebellious subjects, fell from his horse, and was at last put to death in a mill by the pursuing enemy, 11th June, 1488.

JAMES IV. succeeded his father James III. at the age of 16, and showed himself religious, active, and patriotic. He defeated some of his rebellious barons, and assisted Lewis XII. of France against the English, but was unfortunately slain in the fatal battle of Floddenfield, 1513. He instituted the order of the Thistle, or of St. Andrew.

JAMES V. of Scotland, succeeded at the death of his father, James IV. though only 18 months old. His minority was governed by his mother, Margaret of England, but at the age of 17 he assumed the reins of government, and assisted Francis I. against Charles V. and in consequence of his services, he received, 1535, Magdalen, the French king's daughter, who died two years after. He afterwards married Mary of Lorraine, the widow of Lewis of Orleans, and died 13th Dec. 1542, leaving his dominions to his only child, Mary Stuart, who was born only eight days before his death. He was a prince admired for his virtues, and the firmness with which he supported the religious establishment of his country.

JAMES VI. of Scotland, and the first of England, was son of Henry earl of Darnley, and Mary the daughter of James V. and was born 1566. The conduct of his mother had so irritated the nobles that she was obliged by her rebellious subjects to resign the crown to her son in 1566, and James, who had displayed great moderation and prudence in Scotland, was called, on the death of Elizabeth to fill the English throne 1603. His accession was attended with dissatisfaction on the part of some of the English nobles, and lords Cobham, and Grey, and Sir Walter Raleigh were arrested on pretence of a conspiracy to destroy the king and his son prince Henry. A more dreadful catastrophe awaited him from the catholics whom he had rendered his enemies, by the severity of his treatment toward them; but when the parliament house was doomed to be blown up by gunpowder with the king, the lords and commons, the plot was happily discovered by the sagacity of the monarch, and the ringleaders were seized and executed. James was naturally fond of peace, and during 20 years of his reign, his subjects enjoyed perfect tranquillity. The interests and the dignity of the nation perhaps might have required more vigorous measures, especially in supporting the rights of the protestants and of the elector Palatine who had married the king's daughter; but the cultivation of commerce, and a friendly intercourse with the rest of the world, were more congenial to the sentiments of the monarch. In the extension of his prerogative James rendered himself not only oppressive, but often ridiculous, and while he argued with his parliament, and enlarged on the divine and absolute rights of kings, he taught the factious to dispute his authority, and to prepare that opposition which proved so fatal to his successor. Though learned and intelligent he chose for his favourites the most ignorant and worthless, and the partiality which he showed to Carr, earl of Somerset, and to Villiers, duke of Buckingham, reflect little honour on his judgment or his heart. In his fondness for controversial learning he founded Chelsea college for the support of a number of polemical divines, whose abilities and labours might be directed to oppose and refute the Roman catholics. James died at Theobalds, 8th April, 1625, aged 59, after a reign of 22 years, and he was buried in Westminster abbey. By his wife Anne of Denmark, whom he married 1590, he had Henry and Robert who died young, Charles his successor, and Elizabeth who married Frederic V. elector Palatine. His works, which consisted of a Commentary on the Revelations, in which he terms the Pope Antichrist—Basilicon Doron, or Advice to his Son—Daemonology, or Discourse on Witchcraft—a Counterblast against Tobacco, &c. were published in 1 vol. folio, 1619. Though James deserved to be commended for his love of peace, and for his moderation, yet his character must descend to posterity with every mark of detestation for his cruel conduct towards the virtuous and patriotic Raleigh, whom he wantonly caused to be beheaded 15 years after his sentence, and after he had granted him his protection, and employed him in the service of his country.

JAMES II. of England, succeeded his brother the second Charles 1684. He was born at London 14th Oct. 1683, and at his birth proclaimed duke of York. On the death of his father he escaped to France, and distinguished himself in the French service by his courage and military skill. At the restoration he was declared admiral of England, and obtained in 1665, a celebrated victory over Opdam, the Dutch admiral; but in 1672, he was defeated by Ruyter, though supported by the French fleet. His valour had endeared him to the English, and though his principles, which were strongly attached to the popish religion, were censured by the parliament, he ascended the throne on the death of his brother; but the virtues of the private man unfortunately disappeared in the king. James became arbitrary, cruel, and oppressive, and in his wish to establish the Roman catholic religion in the kingdom, he rudely invaded the rights and privileges of his subjects, and paid no regard to the opinions and prejudices of a people, who had a few years before conducted his father to the scaffold. The murmurs of the English were not uttered in vain. William, prince of Orange, who had married the king's daughter, was persuaded to invade the kingdom, and James, terrified at the success of his enemy, and the ingratitude of his courtiers, fled to France, 1688. He afterwards attacked Ireland, but this effort for the recovery of his lost dominions, and the intrigues of his catholic adherents, were unable to shake the popularity of William. James died at St. Germain's, a pensioner on the bounty of the French king, 16th Sept. 1701, aged 68. By his first wife, Anne, daughter of lord Clarendon, he had two daughters, Mary and Anne, who were successively queens of England; and by his second wife the princess of Modena, he had a son, called the Pretender, acknowledged by the Roman catholic princes, under the name of James III. This son died at Rome, 2d Jan. 1766, and his son, Charles Edward, the pretender so well known by his invasion of Scotland in 1745, died at Florence, 31st Jan. 1788, aged 68. Henry Benedict, cardinal of York, brother to Charles Edward, died lately at Rome, and thus that branch of the Stuart family is become extinct.

JAMES I. king of Arragon, surnamed the warrior, succeeded his father, Peter the catholic, 1213. He defeated some of his nobles, who had raised an insurrection against him, and afterwards he conquered the kingdoms of Majorca, Minorca, Valentia, and other places from the Moors. He also supported himself against the encroachments of the papal power, and died at Xativa, 27th July, 1276, aged 70. Before he expired, he resigned the crown into the hands of his successor, and put on the habit of a Cistercian monk, with the superstitious hope of thus reconciling heaven, and obtaining forgiveness for the irregularities and the licentiousness of his life.

JAMES II. king of Arragon, son of Peter III. succeeded his brother, Alphonso III. 1291. He conquered Sicily, and waged a long war against the Moors, and the people of Navarre. He had the good fortune to unite Valentia and Catalonia to his crown, and he died at Barcelona, 3d Nov. 1327, aged 66, deservedly respected for his moderation, his courage, benevolence, and magnanimity.

JAMES of Voragine, provincial of the Dominicans, compiled the Golden Legend, a work of fabulous stories, often edited. He died 1298. The best edition of the Golden Legend is that of 1470.

JAMES, Thomas, an English divine, born at Newport, Isle of Wight, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, 1593. He distinguished himself as a collector of curious MSS. and published a catalogue of such as were in the colleges of the university, and was the first librarian appointed by Sir Thomas Bodley, in his newly established library. He was made by the bishop sub-dean of Wells, and took his degree of D.D. 1614, and was afterwards presented by the archbishop to Mongeham, in Kent. These and other pieces of preferment, were not undeserved. He showed himself a most active divine against the papists, and proposed various plans for the collating of the MSS. of the fathers, which might not only advance the cause of science, but defeat the forgeries and the views of the catholics, which, however, failed for want of encouragement. He died at Oxford, 1632, aged about 51. His works are all respectable, the best known of which, is a treatise of the Corruption of Scriptures, Councils, and Fathers, published 1611, 4to. and reprinted 1688, 8vo. He was the correspondent, among others, of Usher.

JAMES, Richard, nephew of the preceding, was of Exeter college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Corpus Christi, of which he was made fellow, 1615. In 1619 he travelled through Wales and Scotland, and then passed into Russia, on which he published some observations. He was well skilled in the learned languages, as well as in Italian, French, and Spanish, and so extensive was his information, that he was of great assistance to Selden in the drawing up of his Marmora Arundeliana, and to Sir Robert Cotton and his son, in the arrangement of their noble library. His abilities as a scholar and a critic, were said to be superior to those of his uncle. He died 1638. When confined through suspicion, by the House of Lords, 1629, he wrote a copy of English verses, prefixed to his works, afterwards presented to the Bodleian library.

JAMES, Robert, M.D. an English physician, best known by his preparation of a very useful fever-powder, was born at Kinverston, Staffordshire, 1703. He took his first degree in arts at St. John's college, Oxford, and afterwards practised as a physician at Sheffield, Lichfield, and Birmingham. He then removed to London, and published there, in 1743, his valuable Medicinal Dictionary, 3 vols. fol. in the composition of which he was assisted by his friend Dr. Johnson. He wrote also the Practice of Physic, 1746, 2 vols. 8vo.—on Canine Madness, &c.—and 1778, a Dissertation on Fevers, &c. He died 23d March, 1776. His powder, of which the invention is attributed by some to a German physician of the name of Schwau-berg, has acquired great and deserved celebrity, and though at first opposed by some of the faculty, who either through prejudice or rivalry, considered it as a worthless nostrum, it has procured to his family an inexhaustible source of opulence. Dr. James was coarse in his manners as well as a person, but he was intelligent, and as a companion, agreeable and cheerful. He left sons and daughters. His eldest son was educated at Merchant-tailors' and St. John's college, Oxford, and took his degree in physic.

JAMES, Thomas, D.D. a native of St. Neot's, Huntingdonshire, educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, which he left in 1776, for the headship of Rugby school. He resigned in 1793, and in reward for his honourable services at the head of the school, he obtained a Worcester prebend, and Harrington rectory, Worcester-shire. He wrote a Compendium of Geography for Rugby school—two sermons—the fifth book of Euclid explained by Algebra. He died at Harrington, 1804.

JAMET, Peter Charles, a French writer, born 1701, in the diocess of Sens. He wrote Metaphysical Essays—Letters on Taste, and the Doctrine of Bayle—Dissertation on the Creation—the Mogul Philosopher, Daneche Menkan, &c.—and also contributed some notes to the dictionary of Trevoux.

JAMEN, Amadis, a French poet, the friend and rival of Ronsard. He travelled in the early part of life in Greece and Asia Minor, and afterwards became secretary and chamber reader to Charles IX. He died 1585. Besides his poetical works in 2 vols. he published seven academical discourses in prose, and finished Homer's Iliad in verse, began by Hugh Salel, to which he added the three first books of the Odyssey.

JANEWAY, James, a native of Hertfordshire educated at Christ-church, Oxford, and ejected for nonconformity, 1662. He afterwards opened a meeting-house at Rotherhithe, and died there, 1674. He is author of Heaven on Earth, 8vo.—a Token for Children, 12mo.—often edited—the Saint's Encouragement to Diligence, 8vo.—a Legacy to his Friends, 8vo. a posthumous work.

JANICON, Francis Michael, a French writer, born at Paris, and educated in Holland. He was at first in the army, but became a writer in the gazettes of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and Utrecht, where his political sagacity, and the elegance of his style were much admired. He died of an apoplexy 1730, aged 56. Besides his "gazettes" he wrote Steel's Ladies' Library translated—Gavin's Satire against Monks, 4 vols. 12mo.—the Present State of the Republic of the United Provinces and Dependencies, 2 vols. 1729, a valuable work.

JANSENIUS, Cornelius, a divine who distinguished himself as the envoy of Philip II. of Spain, at the council of Trent, and was rewarded on his return by the bishopric of Ghent, where he died, 1576, aged 66. He was a native of Hulst, in Flanders. He published, among other works, a Harmony of the Gospel.

JANSENIUS or JANSEN, Cornelius, a celebrated Roman catholic bishop, the author of Jansenism. He was born at Acooy, near Leerdam, in Holland 1585, and after studying at Utrecht, he, in 1604, went to Paris, where he became acquainted with St. Cyran. He returned to Louvain in 1617, and two years after, took his doctor's degree, and soon after was placed at the head of St. Pulcheria college, with a theological professorship. His abilities were so universally popular that he was twice sent by the university of Louvain as a deputy to the Spanish king, to whom he rendered himself acceptable by writing a severe book against the French, called Mars Gallicus, for their alliance with the protestant princes. Though this work possessed little merit, it procured him the bishopric of Ypres, and with it the hatred and persecution of Richelieu. He died of the plague, 8th May, 1638, aged 53. He wrote commentaries on the Gospels, Proverbs, &c. some controversial books, &c. But his most celebrated composition, the labour of 20 years, is his Augustinus, published after his death. In this book he explained and illustrated the doctrine of Augustine concerning man's natural corruption, and the nature and efficacy of the divine grace; but as this directly militated against the opinions of the Jesuits, it drew upon his memory the severest opposition. The pope at last was prevailed upon to exert his authority, and accordingly the use of the book was forbidden in 1641, and the next year, Urban VIII. issued his bull for its final suppression.—These measures excited violent animosities, but to give greater solemnity to the condemnation, the French bishops drew up five propositions from the doctrine of Jansen, which were submitted to pope Innocent X. and pronounced heretical. These propositions asserted, 1st. That there are divine precepts which good men, though desirous, are unable to obey. 2d. That no man can resist the influence of divine grace operating on his mind. 3d. That to render human actions meritorious, it is not necessary that they be exempt from necessity, but only that they be free from constraint. 4th. That the Semipelagians err in maintaining that the human will is endowed with the power of either receiving or resisting the influences of preventing grace. 5th. That whoever affirms that Jesus Christ made expiation by his death for the sins of all mankind, is a Semipelagian. These measures of the holy see were productive of great dissension in the French church, and when the next pope, Alexander VII. declared that none should be admitted into the church without subscribing to a renunciation of the doctrines of Jansen, the Jansenists ventured to dispute the infallibility of the pontiff, and to regard him as of inferior power to a general council. Opposition in this as in all controversies produced irritation and not conviction, and instead of suppressing the Jansenists, the efforts of the Jesuits and of the see of Rome tended to render them more numerous and more violent, not only in France, but in the Low Countries and in Germany.

JANSON or JANSONIUS, James, a native of Amsterdam, doctor of Louvain and professor of theology, and dean of St. Peter's college, was author of Commentaries on the Psalms—Song of Solomon—Job—St. John's Gospel, &c. He died 1625, aged 78.

JANSENS, Abraham, a painter, born at Antwerp, 1569. His descent from the Cross in Ghent cathedral is so much admired, that some attribute it to the pencil of Rubens, who was his rival in the public favour.

JANSENS, Cornelius, a Dutch painter, whose portraits were much admired, and considered as equal to those of Vandyke. He resided for some time in England, and died 1665.

JANSENS, Victor Honorius, a painter of Brussels, who died 1739, aged 75. He studied at Rome under the patronage of the duke of Holstein, and on his return employed his pencil in adorning the sacred buildings of his native city.

JANUARIUS, St., bishop of Benevento, beheaded at Puzzuoli in the persecution of Dioclesian. His body was buried at Naples, where a noble chapel in the cathedral is dedicated to his memory. His blood is supposed to be preserved in a phial, and annually, on particular occasions, and when Vesuvius threatens an eruption, the holy vessel is produced, when, at the presence of the saint's head, which is then exhibited, the blood, which before was congealed, immediately liquifies. The mountain, as the superstitious Neapolitans believe, respects the solemnity, and earthquakes are very frequently thus prevented.

JAPHET, son of Noah, is the progenitor of the nations of Asia and Europe. He was born B.C. 2448.

JARDINS, Mary Catherine des, a French lady, born 1640, at Alencon, in Normandy, where her father was provost. She left home early in consequence of an intrigue, and retired to Paris, where she determined to subsist by her pen. While engaged in the publication of novels, she gave a loose rein to her passions, and assumed the name of Villedieu, one of her favourites, with whom however she soon quarrelled. A fit of devotion on the death of a female friend, restored her for a while to her senses, in the seclusion of her convent, but when returned to the world, she again became dissipated, and, after the death of Villedieu, who died in battle, she married the marquis de la Chasse, who was only separated from his wife, by whom she had a son. After his death she attached herself to one of her cousins, and died at Clinchemare, on the Maine, 1683. Her works, consisting of dramas, poems, romances, and fables, were published in 10 vols. 12mo. 1702, to which two more were added in 1721. Her style is animated, though her stories and catastrophes are not always interesting; her verses however are feeble.

JARDYN, Karel du, a painter, born at Amsterdam, 1640. He studied in Italy and resided at Venice, where he died 1678, and, though a protestant, was buried in consecrated ground. His animals and landscapes are admired.

JAROSLAW, grand duke of Russia, in the 10th century, is celebrated for the liberal patronage which he extended to learned men. He framed a code of laws for the benefit of his subjects, and, to encourage learning, he founded a school, and caused various useful books to be translated from the Greek into the Russian language.

JARRIGE, Peter, a Jesuit who became a protestant, and exposed his society in a work called the Jesuits on a scaffold. He afterwards returned to the Society at Antwerp, and employed himself in refuting his former publication. He died at Tullis, in France, 1670.

JARRY, Laurence Juillard du, a French poet and divine, born at Jarry, near Xantes, 1658. He came young to Paris, and was patronised by Bossuet, Bourdaloue, and others, and obtained the poetical prize of the French academy, 1679, and also in 1714, when Voltaire was his competitor. He was made prior of Notre dame du Jarry, in Xantes, where he died, 1730. He excelled as a preacher, and published le Ministère Evangelique, Sermons, Ouvrages de Pieté, des Poesies Chretiennes, &c.

JARS, Gabriel, a native of Lyons, who, with Duhamel, visited the mines of Bohemia, Saxony, Hungary, Austria, Carinthia, England, and other countries, and, with the skill and genius of a true mineralogist, prepared his observations, which death, however, prevented him from publishing. He was, in 1768, made a member of the academy of sciences, at Paris, and died the next year, aged 37. His Voyages Metallurgiques were published by his brother, 3 vols. 4to.

JARVIS, Abraham, D.D. bishop of the episcopal church of Connecticut, was born at Norwalk, in that state, May 5th, 1739, and graduated at Yale college in 1761. Having obtained ordination in London, he was settled at Middletown in 1764. He was consecrated bishop in 1797, and his death took place in 1813, at New-Haven, where he had resided for several years previous.  L.

JAUCOURT, Lewis de, a Frenchman, who disregarded the advantages of his birth and rank for the pleasures of study. His knowledge was very extensive, and, in antiquities, morals, medicine, and general literature, his assistance was very valuable to the French encyclopedie. He conducted the Bibliothèque Raisonné from its commencement in 1740, and assisted Gaubius and others in the publication of the Museum Sebæanum, in 1734. He wrote also, Lexicon Medicum Universale, in 6 vols. folio, but the MS. was lost in the vessel which conveyed it to Holland. He was member of the Royal Society of London, and of the academies of Berlin and Stockholm, but refused the liberal invitations of the Stadtholder, to settle in Holland, observing that he had no necessities nor ambition, but only wished for studious obscurity. He died Feb. 1730.

JAULT, Augustus Francis, professor of Syriac, in the Royal college at Paris, translated into French Sharp's Surgery, Ockley's History of the Saracens, Floyer on the Asthma, a treatise on the venereal disease, and other works. He ranked high as a physician, and died at Paris, 1757, aged 50.

JAY, Guy Michel le, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, who ruined himself by printing at his own expense a polyglott Bible. This beautiful work, in 10 vols. folio, containing the Syriac and Arabic versions, which are not inserted in the polyglott of Ximenes, was begun 1628, and was completed 1645. In his honourable poverty he became an ecclesiastic, and was made dean of Vezelai, and counsellor of state. He died 1675.

JEACOCKE, Caleb, author of the Vindication of the moral character of the apostle Paul, against the charges of hypocrisy and insincerity, brought by lord Bolingbroke, Dr. Middleton, and others, 1765, 8vo. was a baker of the High-street, St. Giles, who, by his great application and merit, was distinguished in the world, and became director of the Hand-in-hand fire office. He was a frequent attendant of the Robin Hood speaking society, Butcher-row, Temple-bar, where it is said his oratory proved often more powerful and convincing than that of Edmund Burke and other members who afterwards acquired celebrity in the House of Commons. He died 1786, much respected.

JEANES, Henry, a native of Albersey, Somersetshire, educated at Hart-hall, Oxford. He afterwards obtained the rectory of Beer-crocomb and Capland, Somersetshire, and also Chedzoy, after Dr. Walter Raleigh's expulsion. He favoured the presbyterians, but died before his adherence to the tenets of the church was called in question, 1662. He wrote a treatise on Abstinence from Evil, 8vo.—On the Indifference of Human Actions, 4to.—On Original Righteousness, &c. 4to.—Polemical Tracts against Dr. Hammond, Jer. Taylor, John Goodwin, &c.—Want of Church Government, &c.

JEANNIN, Peter, a Burgundian, advocate in the parliament of Dijon. He rose to consequence by his merit, and when the orders for the murder of St. Bartholomew were issued at Dijon, he opposed it with all his authority, and for his services was made president of the parliament there. After the destruction of the league he became a favourite with Henry IV. who employed him in negotiations with the Spaniards and Dutch, and, after the king's death, he continued a faithful servant in the court of the queen mother. He died 1622, aged 82, after seeing seven successive kings on the throne of France. He published a collection of negotiations and memoirs in folio, 1659, and 4 vols. 12mo. 1695, much esteemed.

JEURAT, Sebastian, a native of Paris, member of the academy of sciences, and afterwards of the National Institute, was distinguished as an able mathematician. He founded an observatory in the military school, and wrote new tables of Jupiter, 4to.—a Treatise on Perspective, 4to.—Observations on the Comet of 1759—Observations on the Solar Eclipse of 1793—Graphical method of Dissecting the Angle—Memoires sur les Lunettes Diplantidennes, &c.—He died 1803, aged 99.

JEBB, Samuel, M.D. a physician, born at Nottingham, and educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge. He favoured the non-jurors, and was for some time librarian to Jeremy Collier; but upon his marrying a relation of Dillingham, the eminent apothecary of Red-lion square, he applied himself to pharmacy, and soon began to practise as physician at Stratford le Bow, where he continued the best part of his life. He afterwards retired with a moderate income to Derbyshire, where he died 9th March, 1772, leaving several children, one of whom was sir Richard Jebb, one of the physicians extraordinary to the king. He published a translation of Martin's Answers to Emlyn, 1718, 8vo.—Justini Martyris cum Tryphone Dialogus, 1719—de Vita et Rebus gestis Mariæ Scotorum Reginae, 1725—an edition of Aristides, with notes, 1728, 2 vols. 4to.—J. C. Britanni de Canibus Bri- (annicis, &c.—Bacon's Opus Majus.—H. Hodii de Græcis illust. &c.

JEBB, John, son of the dean of Cashel, was born in London, 1736. Part of his education was received in Ireland, and afterwards he entered at Peter-house, Cambridge, and took orders, and obtained some preferment. He for some years delivered theological lectures in Cambridge, but he was prohibited in 1770, as he professedly embraced the tenets of the Socinians. In 1775, he resigned his gown, and applied himself to the study of physic, and obtained a degree at St. Andrew's; and became a licentiate in London. He died March, 1786, of a decline. He was a very warm controversialist. He had when at the university been a very strenuous advocate for yearly examinations; and in his political life, he showed himself a zealous friend of annual parliaments, of universal suffrage, of the abolition of subscription, and of the cause of America against the mother country. Besides physic and classical literature he was well skilled in Hebrew, Arabic, and Saxon. He joined two friends in publishing a 4to. called Excerpta quædam e Newtonii Principiis, &c. His works were published in 1787, in 3 vols. 8vo. by his friend Dr. Disney, with an account of his life.

JECHONIAS, king of Judah, was carried prisoner to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, and after several years of captivity was made, B.C. 562, one of the officers of the king's court.

JEFFERY, Thomas, a native of Exeter, educated among the dissenters. He became assistant to Mr. Hallet, and in 1726 settled at Little Baddow, Essex, where he had a congregation, but two years after returned to Exeter, where he died soon after, aged about 30. He was author of True Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, against Collins the deist, 8vo.—the Divinity of Christianity proved from Scripture,—Christianity the Perfection of all Religion, 8vo.—a Review of his Controversy with Collins, &c.

JEFFERY, John, a divine, born 1647, at Ipswich, where he was educated, and at Catherine-hall, Cambridge. On taking orders he returned to the curacy of Dennington, Suffolk, and in 1678 he was elected minister of a church at Norwich, where his eloquence as a preacher, his learning, and his exemplary manners, rendered him a popular and esteemed character. He was introduced by Sir E. Atkins the chief baron, to Tillotson, who, when raised to the primacy, made him archdeacon of Norwich. He died 1720, aged 72. He was twice married. He published Sir T. Brown's Christian Morals—Whichcote's Moral and Religious Aphorisms. He wrote also some sermons, &c. which appeared, 2 vols. 8vo. 1751. Dr. Jeffery was an enemy to controversy, and observed that it produced more heat than light.

JEFFERY, of Monmouth, ap Arthur, a British historian in the reign of Henry I. born and educated at Monmouth. He was made archdeacon of Monmouth and bishop of St. Asaph, 1152. He is known for a history of Britain, in which he gives a long and fabulous account of the first settlements in that country under Brutus the grandson of Ascanius. The work is written in a plain simple style, but the puerile stories and trifling incidents which it contains, render its authority very dubious, though Usher, Leland, Sheringham, Sir John Rice, and others defend its authenticity against Polydore Virgil, Buchanan, and others, who regard it as fiction and forgery. The work was published in Latin at Paris, 1517, 4to. and at Heidelberg, in folio, 1587. A translation of it into English by Aaron Thompson of Queen's college, appeared 1718, 8vo.

JEFFREYS, George lord, better known as judge Jeffreys, was born at Acton, Denbighshire. He was educated at Westminster school, and then removed to the Inner-temple. When called to the bar, he recommended himself by his application and zeal, and when introduced to the city of London by his relative, alderman Jeffreys, he was elected recorder of the city. He afterwards became a favourite of the court, was made solicitor to the duke of York, and in 1680 knighted, and appointed chief justice of Chester. His next appointment was the place of chief justice of the king's bench, and on James the second's accession, he was raised to the office of lord chancellor. He was a violent promoter of all the oppressive measures of that short reign, and his cruelty on the circuit, after Monmouth's rebellion, upon the deluded adherents of this unfortunate nobleman, will always be remembered to his disgrace and ignominy. Though abusive in his language, he had at times a becoming sense of his dignity when on the bench; and it is said that, in the name of common humanity, he threatened his severest vengeance against the mayor and corporation of Bristol, who had been long in the habit of selling culprits in their town for exportation to the American plantations. At the revolution the chancellor dreaded the public indignation, and in the habit of a sailor endeavoured to escape to the continent. He was in this disguise at Wapping, drinking in a cellar, when a scrivener, whom when in authority he had severely chastised, recognised his once dreaded features. The chancellor in vain attempted to elude the discovery by coughing and turning to the wall, with the pot in his hand; the alarm was given, he was seized by the mob, and conveyed to the lord mayor, and thence sent to the tower. He died there 18th April, 1689, and was privately buried the Sunday night following.

JEFFREYS, George, an English writer, born at Weldron, Northamptonshire. He was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow, 1701. He refused to take orders, and applied himself to the law, and was called to the bar, but did not practise. He passed the latter part of his life in the family of the dukes of Chandos, his relations, and died 1755, aged 77. In 1754, he published by subscription a 4to. volume of Miscellanies in prose and verse, among which are two tragedies, Edwin and Merope, both acted at the theatre Lincoln's-Inn-fields, and the Triumph of Truth, an oratorio.

JEFFRIES, Sir Herbert, was appointed lieutenant-governor of Virginia, and one of the commissioners for inquiring into the state of the colony in 1676, and assumed the administration on the return of Sir William Berkeley to England. He died in 1678, when the government devolved on Sir H. Chichester.  L.

JEHU, son of Jehosaphat, was the 10th king of Israel, B.C. 885. Though he destroyed Joram and all the family of Ahab, and cut off all the idolatrous priests of Baal, yet he afterwards disregarded the worship of the true God, for which he was deprived of his kingdom by Hazael king of Syria, and died 856 B.C.

JEKYL, Sir Joseph, son of a clergyman in Northamptonshire, became known as an able lawyer, and an eloquent statesman. As the friend of the whigs, he was one of the managers of Sacheverel's trial, and after maintaining his principles and popularity undiminished, he was made in the reign of George I. Master of the Rolls, privy counsellor, and was also knighted. In his pamphlet, called the Judicial Authority of the Master of the Rolls stated and vindicated, he ably supported the power and independence of his office against the chancellor King. This great man died 1738, aged 75.

JEKYL, Thomas, D.D. brother of the preceding was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and obtained the vicarage of Rowd, Wilts, the lectureship of Newland, Gloucestershire, and the office of St. Margaret's minister, Westminster. He was author of Love and Peace recommended, in two sermons at Bristol, 1674, 4to.—Popery, a great Mystery of Iniquity, 1680, 4to.—True Religion the best Loyalty, 1682—Exposition of the Church Catechism, and some other sermons.

JELLINGER, Christopher, a German, who studied at Basil, and Leyden, and after being some time a private soldier, came from Geneva to England. He found patrons, and obtained the living of Brent in Devonshire, from which he was ejected for nonconformity, 1662. He wrote Disputatio Theologica de Sacra Coena—a New and Living Way of Dying—The Spiritual Merchant—15 Conferences with Christ, &c. He died at Knightsbridge, aged 83.

JENCKES, Joseph, governor of Rhode-Island, succeeded Cranston, in 1727, and continued in office five years. He had been previously deputy governor. His father was the honourable Joseph Jenckes, a native of Buckinghamshire, who came to America, and settled at Pawtucket, where he built the first house which was erected there. Governor Jenckes was born at Pawtucket, in 1656. He died June 15th, 1740, aged 84. William Jenckes, a brother of the governor, was a judge of the county-court of Providence, and died in 1765, aged 91.  L.

JENISCHUS, Paul, a learned native of Antwerp, banished for writing Theatrum Animarum. He died at Sutgard, 1647, aged 89.

JENKIN, Robert, a divine, born at Minster, isle of Thanet, Jan. 1656. He was educated at the King's school, Canterbury, and St. John's college, Cambridge, where he became fellow, 1680. In 1710, he was elected master of his college, and also held the Margaret professorship of divinity. He refused to take the oaths at the revolution, but as the bishop of Ely could not visit the college without the invitation of the fellows, he remained with many others undisturbed, though at the accession of George I. a compulsory act was made, which obliged all those who held preferment worth 5*l.* a year to swear allegiance. Dr. Jenkin, in compliance with the law, saw several of his fellows expelled, but the uneasiness which he suffered, joined to the infirmities of age, hastened his dissolution. He retired to his brother's house, Norfolk, and died there, 7th April, 1727, and was buried in Holme chapel, where his brother was rector. His theological tracts were much esteemed, and among them an Examination of the Authority of General Councils,—a Defence of bishop Leek's Profession—Remarks on four Books, Basnage's History of the Jews, &c.—the Reasonableness and Certainty of the Christian Religion, of which the fifth edition appeared 1721.

JENKIN, William, a puritan, born at Sudbury, Suffolk, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He was, in 1641, made minister of Christ church, Newgate, but was deprived for nonconformity, 1662. He was concerned in Love's Plot, and therefore was sent to the tower, but procured his liberty by petitioning Cromwell. He was, in 1684, sent to Newgate on the conventicle act, and died there four months after. He is author of Exposition on the Epistle of Jude, fol.—Celeugma or Clamor ad Theologos Hierarchiæ Anglicanæ—some Sermons, &c.

JENKINS, Henry, a native of Yorkshire, who lived to the extraordinary age of 169 years. His faculties remained strong to the last, and at an assize he appeared to give evidence of what had passed within his knowledge 140 years before. He remembered the battle of Flodden-field. As he was born before registers were kept, no place would acknowledge him as a native, so much to the disgrace of his opulent neighbours, he was compelled to beg his bread in the last part of his life. He died 1670, and there is erected to his memory a monument in Bolton church, Yorkshire, where he was buried.

JENKINS, Sir Leoline, an English statesman and civilian, born at Lantrisant, Glamorganshire, 1623. He was educated at Cowbridge school, and in 1641 removed to Jesus college, Oxford, but soon after with many other students, he took up arms in the royal cause. He, however, remained in Oxford till the king's death, and then retired to Wales to the seat of Sir John Aubrey, the education of whose eldest son he undertook. He was afterwards tutor to other young men of family and consequence, but became obnoxious to the government, from whose resentment, however, he was saved by the interference of his friend Dr. Wilkins, warden of Wadham college. For some time he resided at Oxford, but being still considered as a dangerous man, he fled to the continent in company with some of his pupils, and travelled with them over France, Holland, and Germany. He returned home about 1658, and at the restoration was chosen one of the fellows of Jesus college. In 1661 he took his degree of LL.D. and was the same year, on the resignation of his friend Dr. Mansell, elected principal of his college. He was in 1663 appointed commissary of Canterbury by his patron Sheldon, the primate; and then removed to Doctors' Commons as advocate of that court. In 1664, he was engaged with other civilians in reviewing the maritime laws, and the same year was made judge assistant, and soon after principal of the Admiralty court; and in 1668, judge of the prerogative court of Canterbury. In 1669–70, he was knighted for his services in recovering the property of the deceased queen mother, against the claims of her nephew Louis XIV. and afterwards became one of the commissioners to negotiate the union with Scotland. In 1671, he was elected member for Hythe in Kent, and in 1673, after resigning his office of principal of Jesus, he went to Cologne as plenipotentiary to settle a treaty of peace with the Dutch, which did not succeed.

The next year he was again deputed as a mediator of the treaty of Nimeguen, with Sir William Temple, the chief burden of which rested upon him. His labours, however, were unsuccessful, and on leaving the place 1679, he was nominated ambassador to the Hague in the room of his associate Temple, but soon after was again invited to renew his application for the treaty, which at last was that same year concluded. He returned home Aug. 1679, and was soon after elected representative of the university of Oxford. He ably opposed, in parliament, the bill for the exclusion of the duke of York, and his services were rewarded by admission into the privy council, and the appointment of secretary for the northern provinces in 1680, and next year for the southern. He was again elected for Oxford university and still opposed the exclusion of the duke of York; but the firmness with which he attacked and reprobated the violent measures of the court, exposed him to obloquy, so that at last he retired from office, 1684, to the privacy and literary solitude of his house at Hammersmith. On James's accession he was sworn one of the privy council, and elected again for the university, but his infirmities increased, and he found himself unable to attend his duty in parliament. He died, Sept. 1, 1685, and was buried in Jesus college chapel. As he was never married, he left his property to charitable uses, and was particularly a benefactor to his college. His letters and papers were printed, two vols. folio, 1724, by W. Wynne, with an account of his life.

JENKINSON, Charles, earl of Liverpool, was the eldest son of colonel Jenkinson, the younger brother of Sir Robert Jenkinson, baronet. He was born May 16th, 1727, and had his education at the Charter-house; from whence he removed to University college, Oxford, where he took the degree of master of arts in 1752. In 1761, he obtained a seat in parliament, and was appointed under-secretary of state. In 1766, he was nominated a lord of the admiralty; from which board he removed to the treasury. In 1772, he was made joint vice-treasurer of Ireland, which he exchanged for the clerkship of the pells. In 1778 he became secretary at war, and in 1784 president of the board of trade. In 1786 he was raised to the peerage by the title of baron Hawkesbury, and in 1796 to the earldom of Liverpool. He died Dec. 17th, 1808. His lordship published—1. A Discourse on the Establishment of a National and Constitutional Force in England. 2. A Discourse on the Conduct of Great Britain in respect to Neutral Nations during War. 3. A Collection of Treatises, 3 vols. 8vo. 4. A Treatise on the Coins of the Realm, 4to. 1805.—W. B.

JENKS, Benjamin, a native of Shropshire, who took orders and obtained the living of Harley in his native county, where he was minister 56 years, and died 1724, aged 78. He was also chaplain to lord Bradford, and wrote Submission to the Righteousness of God, 12mo.—Meditations, 2 vols.—Devotions, 12mo.—and other works of devotion, of great simplicity and merit.

JENKYNs, David, a native of Pendoylen, Glamorganshire, educated at Edmund-hall, Oxford, from which he removed to Gray's Inn to study the law. His abilities recommended him to Charles I. who made him a Welch judge, but his exertions were so great in the royal cause that he was arrested at Hereford 1645 by the parliament and sent to the tower. The severity did not terrify him; when brought before the commons he boldly refused to kneel, and would not acknowledge their authority, for which he was fined 1000*l.* and sent back to prison. The republicans were so violent against him that they passed an act to try him, in 1650, but that was prevented it is said by a singular speech of Harry Martin. At last Jenkyns, who expected daily to be led to execution, and who meant to die with the Bible under one arm, and the Magna Charta under the other, was set at liberty 1656, and died seven years after, aged 66. His legal and political tracts appeared together 1681, 12mo.

JENNENS, Charles, a gentleman of dissenting principles, who in his youth displayed with such splendour the riches acquired by the industry of his family at Birmingham, that he was called Solyman the magnificent. He composed the words of some of Handel's Oratorios, and published the Lear, Hamlet, Othello, and Macbeth of Shakspeare, as the specimen of an intended edition of the poet, of which death prevented the completion. He died 20th Nov. 1773, and was buried at Gopsal, Leicestershire.

JENNINGS, David, D.D. in Scotland, was minister of Old Gravel-lane Meeting-house, Wapping, 44 years, and also presided over Coward's dissenting school. He wrote Introduction to the Use of the Globes and the Orrery, 8vo.—Introduction to the Knowledge of Medals, 12mo.—Jewish Antiquities, 2 vols. 8vo.—Sermons, &c. and died 1762, aged 71.

JENSON, Nicolas, or Jansonius, an eminent printer and letter founder of Venice, by birth a Frenchman. He was commissioned, it is said, by the French king, to gain information with respect to the art of printing, lately invented at Mentz, and upon the death of his patron he retired to Venice, where he soon distinguished himself. His types are still admired for their neatness and beauty. He was the first who determined the form and proportion of the present Roman characters. The first books which issued from his press were, "Decor Puellarum," 1471, and the same year in Italian, "Gloria Mulierum," and afterwards various Classics. He died as is supposed about 1481, as none of his editions appear after that period.

JENYNS, Soame, an eminent English writer, born in London 1704. He was privately educated, and then entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he devoted himself to laborious study, but took no degree. In 1728, he published his "Art of Dancing," and in 1741, was elected member for Cambridge, which place, with the exception of two others he represented till 1780. He assisted Moore in the publication of the "World," in 1753, and in 1755 he was made one of the lords of Trade, and continued so till the abolition of the board 1780. He died Dec. 18th, 1787, aged 83, leaving no issue, though twice married. He was buried at Bottingham, Cambridgeshire. As a writer he distinguished himself by the purity of his language, and the elegance of his diction, by critical knowledge, and a delicate and lively humour. It is remarkable that from a serious believer in revelation he became a deist, and again, after wandering in the labyrinth of skepticism, he returned a devout convert to Christianity, and on his death-bed, gloried in the reflection that his "View of the Internal Evidences of the Christian Religion," had proved useful. His publications were poems, collected in a third edition 1778—a Free Inquiry into the Origin of Evil—a View of the Internal Evidence, &c.—Political Tracts, &c.—all republished together in 4 vols. 8vo. by Nelson Cole, Esq. 1790. He has been deservedly blamed for his violent attack on Dr. Johnson. In every respect his character was respectable and exemplary.

JEPHSON, Richard, an Irishman, for some time master of horse to the lord lieutenant of Ireland, but best known as a dramatic writer. He wrote Braganza, printed 1775—the Law of Lombardy, a tragedy, acted 1779,—the Count of Narbonne, &c. He wrote besides the Campaign, an Opera—Julia, a tragedy—Two Strings to your Bow, a farce—the Conspiracy—the Confessions of J. Baptist Couteau, a satire on the atrocities of the French revolution, 2 vols. 12mo. 1794—Roman Portraits, with Illustrations and Remarks, in 4to, a heroic poem of merit, &c. He died near Dublin, 1803.

JEPHTHAH, judge of Israel, is known in sacred history for his remarkably rash vow which he made when going to war against the Amorites, promising if successful to sacrifice to God the first living thing which met him. This was his own daughter, who was accordingly offered in sacrifice.

though most commentators explain the history by saying that no human sacrifices were permitted by the Mosaic law, and that the daughter of Jephthah, was only devoted to a life of perpetual celibacy, and not innolated.

JEREMIAH, second of the great prophets, was born of the tribe of Benjamin, B.C. 629. He was imprisoned for prophesying the calamities which awaited his country, and when Jerusalem was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, he was carried to Babylon, where he died 586, B.C. or according to some he was slain there by his vindictive countrymen. In a pathetic and sublime style the prophet foretold the captivity of his nation and their future return, and in another age the birth and the atonement of the Messiah.

JERNINGHAM, Edward, an English poet, was descended from an ancient Roman Catholic family, and born in Norfolk in 1727. He was educated at Douay and Paris; but on his return to England he joined in communion with the established church. One of his first publications was a poem in favour of the Magdalen charity; after which appeared a number of others, written in a pleasing style, and collected, with his plays in 4 vols. 8vo., 1806. He also wrote—1. "An Essay on the mild Tenour of Christianity." 2. The Dignity of Human Nature, an Essay. 3. The Alexandrian School, or a Narrative of the first Christian Professors in Alexandria. 4. An Essay on the Eloquence of the Pulpit. 5. The Old Bard's Farewell. He died Nov. 17th, 1812.—W. B.

JEROBOAM I. king of Israel, after the separation of the ten tribes from Rehoboam, son of Solomon, reigned 22 years, and died 954 B.C.

JEROBOAM II. son of Joash, was king of Israel, B.C. 826, but on account of his idolatry, the destruction of his race was foretold by Hosea and Amos, the prophets. He was defeated at Jezreel, by the Assyrians, and died 784 B.C.

JEROME, St. a father of the church, who died 420, aged 80. He is famous for his eloquence, his virtues, and his extensive learning. His works, which are all on theological subjects, were edited by Erasmus, 1526, and at Paris, 1693.

JEROME of Prague, so called from the place of his birth, was a martyr to protestantism. He studied at the universities of Paris, Heidelberg, Cologne, and it is said, Oxford, and in 1396 became D.D. He warmly embraced the doctrines of his friend and master Huss, and with him, was summoned to answer for his opinions before the council of Constance. He seemed inclined to answer the citation, but seeing Huss thrown into prison, he privately withdrew to Ueberlingen, and in vain applied to the emperor for protection. Though he promised to confront his persecutors, if guarded against violence, his fair claims were disregarded, he was seized as he attempted to return home, and dragged in chains to Constance. After being exposed to various insults, and artfully tempted to make a recantation of his opinions, he boldly declared himself the supporter of the tenets of Wickliffe and Huss, and thus triumphant in constancy over his enemies, he was condemned to the flames. On May 30th, 1416, he suffered at the stake: he endured his torments with great fortitude and resignation, and thus obtained the crown of martyrdom.

JEROME of St. Faith, or Joshua Larchi, a Spanish Jew, physician to Peter de Luna, afterwards pope Benedict XIII. He disputed in the presence of his pope and of several cardinals at Tortosa, with the Jewish rabbies 1414, and by becoming a convert to Christianity, he had such influence over his countrymen, and also by his treatise on the Errors of the Talmud, that 5000 Jews followed his example. His book appeared at Frankfort, 1602.

JERVAS, Charles, a painter, born in Ireland. He studied under Sir Godfrey Kneller, and by the patronage of Dr. G. Clark, of Oxford, he visited France and Italy, for the improvement of his abilities. On his return to England, he acquired some celebrity, more from the praises and friendship of Pope, than from his own merit. It has been observed, that the lines which the poet wrote in his praise, are more languid and less happy than any other of his verses. Horace Walpole, whose judgment should be decisive, says of him, that he was defective in drawing, colouring, and composition, and in likeness. In general, his pictures are a light, flimsy kind of fan-painting, as large as life. He was, however, vain of his art, and after censuring the ear as the only faulty part of the beautiful face of lady Bridgewater, with whom he pretended to be in love, he produced his own as a perfect model. He published a translation of Don Quixote, without understanding Spanish, says Pope, and the work was honoured with a supplement on the origin of romances of chivalry, by Warburton. He died about 1740.

JESSEY, Henry, a native of West Rowton, Yorkshire, educated at Cambridge. He favoured the independents, for which he was imprisoned in 1641, but afterwards set at liberty by the parliament. He was afterwards minister of St. George's, Southwark, but was ejected 1662, and died the next year.

JESTYN, ap Gwrgant, prince of Glamorgan, was deprived of his right to the sovereignty on his father's death, 1030, in consequence of his violent and ungovernable temper, but succeeded the next king, his uncle Howell, 1043. By his dissension with the neighbouring princes, the English were invited to support the weaker party, and thus the country became the property of the artful invaders.

JESUA, Levita, a Spanish rabbi of the 15th century, author of a book called "Halichot Olam," the ways of eternity, of which Bashiuisen printed an edition in Hebrew and Latin at Hanover, 1714, in 4to.

JESUS, a Jew, who foretold the calamities which were to fall on his nation, before the siege of Jerusalem by Titus. During the siege he cried out, on seeing his prophecy fulfilled, Wo to the temple, to the nation, and to me! and at that moment, says Josephus, he was killed with a dart.

JESUS, son of Sirach, a native of Jerusalem, was author of Ecclesiasticus, B.C. 200. His grandson, of the same name, translated the book into Greek, which is preserved in the Apocrypha.

JESUS CHRIST, the blessed Saviour of the world, was born at Bethlehem, A.M. 4004, and was, after a life of the most exemplary sanctity, and of celestial benevolence, cruelly crucified by the Jews on Mount Calvary, Friday, 3d April, A. D. 36. His history is well known as recorded in the page of the four holy evangelists.

JETHRO, father-in-law of Moses, was priest and king of the Midianites. After the deliverance of Israel from Egypt, Jethro brought his daughter Zipporah and her children to her husband Moses, and gave him much good advice about the government of his nation.

JEUNE, Jean le, a French divine, of such piety and humility that he refused a canonry to enter the rigid society of the Oratory. He was highly esteemed as a preacher and as a man. He lost his sight at 35, and was twice cut for the stone, but he endured all these sufferings with great resignation. He died 1672, aged 80. His sermons, published in 10 vols. 8vo. were much esteemed by Massillon, and have been translated into Latin.

JEWEL, John, an English bishop, born at Buden, in Devonshire, 1522. He was educated at Barnstaple school, and at the age of 13 entered at Merton college, Oxford, and in 1530 was chosen scholar of Corpus Christi. By great application he acquired extensive knowledge, and became a respectable tutor in his college, and an able and popular preacher in the university, and in his parish of Sunningwell, near Oxford, of which he was rector. He was in his principles, a zealous protestant, and he proved it upon the accession of Edward VI. but after that king's death, he was expelled from his college by the fellows, upon which he retired to Broadgate-hall, now Fembroke college, where many of his pupils followed him. The abettors of popery did not long suffer him in the enjoyment of retirement and security; he was compelled to subscribe to the popish doctrines, but his sincerity was doubted, and he escaped with difficulty from the emissaries of Bonner, and passed to the continent. He resided for some time at Strasburg, in the house of his old friend, Peter Martyr, once divinity professor at Oxford. On Mary's death he returned to England, and was selected as one of the sixteen protestants who were to dispute with the same number of catholics in the presence of Elizabeth. In 1559, he was one of the commissioners for the extirpation of popery in the west of England, and a few months after was raised to the see of Salisbury. His merit and learning were further rewarded by the honourable grant of the degree of D.D. from the university of Oxford, 1565. In his episcopal character he displayed that activity and vigilance so necessary in the establishment of order and regularity, after emancipation from catholic tyranny, and he personally inspected the conduct of all his officers, and completed the triumph of reformation in his diocese, by the impartial and exemplary conduct, which, emanating from himself, pervaded his courts and his clergy. His indefatigable application, however, undermined his constitution, and the regular habit of rising at four in the morning, and continuing engaged in prayer, in study, and in business, till near twelve at night, proved at last unhappily injurious to his health. He contracted a disorder which carried him off at Monkton Farley, in September, 1571, in his 50th year. This worthy man, so eminent for integrity, for liberality, for meekness, modesty, and every amiable virtue, was blessed with a most happy memory, and was well skilled in the learned languages, and also in German and Italian. His works were numerous and respectable, the best known of which, are his "Apologia Ecclesie Anglicanae," several times printed in England and abroad, and translated into Greek at Oxford, 1614, and into English, 1562, by lady Bacon. This valuable work, which merited and obtained the approbation of the queen and her two successors, and was recommended from the bench of bishops to be placed in all parish churches in England and Wales, was attacked by Hardyng, and defended by the author in the most masterly and unanswerable manner. His life has been written by Dr. Lawrence Humphrey and by Featley.

JEZED I. fifth caliph, or successor of Mahomet, began his reign 650. He assassinated Hussein, son of Ali, whom the Arabs had raised to the throne in opposition to him, and he showed himself cruel and revengeful against his rivals and enemies. He had a taste for literature, and died 685.

JOAB, a general under David, who slew Abner, and afterwards stabbed Absalom, his master's son. Though his cruelties were forgiven, on account of his great services, by David, yet he was put to death by Solomon for espousing the cause of his rival, Adonijah, B. C. 1014.

JOACHIM, abbot of Corazzo, and afterwards of Flora in Calabria, was born at Celico near Cosenza, 1130. He was of the Cistercian order, and travelled on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. It is said that he founded several monasteries, which he governed with great prudence, wisdom, and moderation. He pretended also to be a prophet, and his prophecies have appeared in a book called, "the Everlasting Gospel," which, however, is supposed by Mosheim, to have been written by some other missionary. Joachim died 1202, leaving a numerous sect behind, called Joachimites. The pope refused to canonize him, because some of his tenets were erroneous and profane. His works were published folio, Venice, 1516. His life has been written by Gervaise, a Dominican, 1745, 2 vols. 12mo.

JOACHIM, George, a native of the Grison's country, appointed mathematical professor at Wittemberg, where he ably defended the Copernican system. He wrote Ephemerides—de Doctrina Triangulorum—Orationes de Astronomia, &c. and died 1576, aged 62.

JOAN, Pope, a woman placed by Platina among the successors of St. Peter, by the name of John VIII. or according to others of John VII. Though some affirm this to be a fictitious story, propagated for the discredit of the catholics, according to the report, a woman, born at Mentz, and supposed to be of English extraction, acquired so much celebrity at Athens and Rome, where she studied in man's clothes, that for her probity, learning, and virtues, she was honoured with the degree of doctor, and was deemed worthy to succeed to the popedom on the death of Leo IV. Thus raised to eminence, Joan indulged the most indelicate amours with her favourite tutor, and being in a pregnant state, she improperly ventured, when near her time, to attend a procession through the streets of Rome. Thus circumstanced, she was delivered of a child between the Colosseum and the Church of St. Catharine, and died upon the spot, either through pain or shame, after enjoying two years the pontifical seat. In remembrance of this catastrophe it is said, the holy father turns his head aside when he passes by the fatal spot, and to prevent the recurrence of such immorality, it is asserted, that the elected pontiff, before he is installed, submits to an examination of his manhood, when seated on a pierced chair. This story, believed for some centuries, and excused or palliated by some of the catholic writers, and denied by others, is now considered as fabulous, as it never was mentioned for 200 years after the time when it is asserted it actually took place. Pius II. was the first who ventured, in the 15th century, to question the authority of the tradition, and after being agitated with great warmth by catholics and protestants for some time, it is now laid aside by both parties as ridiculous and puerile.

JOAN of Arc, or the maid of Orleans, a celebrated French heroine, born at Domremy in Lorraine, 1412, of obscure parents. When she was servant at an inn, she pretended that she saw in a vision St. Michael, the tutelary saint of France, who ordered her to raise the siege of Orleans, which the English were then besieging, and to preside at the coronation of Charles VII. at Rheims. This was no sooner noised abroad than she was introduced by Baudricourt, the governor of the neighbouring town of Vaucouleurs to the king, whom she found out in the midst of his courtiers, though dressed in the plainest apparel. Charles, whose affairs were reduced to the greatest extremity, determined to employ this extraordinary woman, though her professions were ridiculed by the parliament; and Joan appearing among the soldiers, arrayed in the arms and the dress of a man, inspired them with such enthusiastic ardour that the siege of Orleans was raised, the English were defeated, and the monarch advanced to Rheims, where his coronation took place in the presence of the victorious heroine. For these services Joan was ennobled by the king, she assumed the name of Lys, and received a large grant of lands; but while she promised herself fresh victories, she was wounded at the siege of Paris, and she was taken prisoner at Compiegne. This event was regarded by the English as a great victory, but instead of receiving her with the humanity which a captive and a female required, they treated her not only with harshness, but accused her of witchcraft, and condemned her by the sentence of the university of Paris to be burnt. She suffered 30th May, 1431, at Rouen, and as she walked to the fatal stake, she displayed the same courage and intrepidity which she had evinced under the walls of Orleans. By her death, Joan gained perhaps more friends to her master than her services and her triumphs had procured; and in thus cruelly putting to death a person whom the fortune of war had placed in their hands, not as a rebellious subject, but as a captive, whom the superstition of the times had exalted to extraordinary consequence, the English fixed an indelible stigma upon their character, and rendered their cause odious in the eyes even of their adherents in conquered France.

JOAN, queen of Naples, daughter of Charles, king of Sicily, murdered her first husband, Andrew of Hungary, and married another. The death of the murdered prince was avenged by his brether Lewis; but though Joan fled to Provence for a while, she recovered her kingdom, and destroyed her husband to marry a third, after whose death she took a fourth. As she had no issue, she adopted her relation, Charles de Duras, who, however, revolted against her by the intrigues of the king of Hungary, in consequence of which she named for her successor Lewis of France, duke of Anjou. This was productive of a dreadful civil war, but Charles obtaining Naples, seized the queen, and put her to death 1381, in her 55th year.

JOAN II. queen of Naples after her brother, Ladislaus, 1414, disgraced herself by her debaucheries. Her second husband, John, count of March, offended with her conduct, destroyed her favourite, Pandolfus, and imprisoned her; but an insurrection restored her to liberty, and thrust her husband into a dungeon, from which he escaped to France, to lead a monastic life. Joan adopted for her heir, Alphonsus, king of Arragon, and died 1434.

JOASH, son of Ahaziah, was proclaimed king of Israel, at the age of seven, by Jehoiada the high-priest, by whose advice he governed well, and put to death his grandmother Athaliah, who had destroyed all his family, and even attempted his life. On the death of his virtuous preceptor he became idolatrous and was slain by two of his servants, B. C. 483.

JOASH, king of Israel after his father, Jehoahaz, though he paid respect to the admonitions of Elisha the prophet, followed the idolatries of Jeroboam. He defeated the Syrians in three battles, took Amaziah king of Judah prisoner, and reduced Jerusalem, and died B. C. 826, after a reign of sixteen years.

JOB, patriarch of Uz near Idumea, is celebrated in sacred history for his sufferings and patience, his respect for the decrees of heaven, and his resignation in calamity. He was restored to honours and happiness after enduring the greatest misfortunes, and died about 1500 years B. C. His history is a most beautiful and sublime poem, which some attribute to Isaiah, and others to Moses.

JOBERT, Lewis, a Jesuit of Paris, distinguished as a preacher and a medallist. He died at Paris 1719, aged 72. He wrote theological tracts, and "la Science des Mcdailes," a valuable work, best edited, 1739, 2 vols. 12mo.

JODELLE, Stephen, lord of Limodin, was born at Paris, 1532. He was one of the Pleiades, or seven French poets mentioned by Ronsard. He was the first Frenchman who wrote plays in his own language, and with choruses in imitation of the Greek. His Cleopatra was acted with great applause before the king, but in general his plays were long and tedious. He was also an orator, and well skilled in architecture, sculpture and painting. He at one time embraced the opinions of the protestants, but after ridiculing the mass in a Latin satirical poem of 100 lines, he returned to the profession of that religion, and probably thus escaped the murder of St. Bartholomew. He died 1573, aged 41, very poor, though he might have been independent in fortune, if he had cultivated his interest at court. A volume of his works was published 1574, containing besides Cleopatra and Dido, tragedies, Eugene, a Comedy, and Songs, Sonnets, Elegies, and Odes.

JOEL, the second of the minor prophets, foretold in an animated style the desolation of Judea by the Chaldeans, and in a passage quoted by Peter, announces the pouring out of the Holy Ghost on the believing Christians. He flourished about 790 years B. C.

JOHN, Baptist, the forerunner of Christ, was son of Zacharias and Elizabeth. He was born about six months before our Saviour, and after living a life of austerity in the deserts, where his food was locusts and wild honey, and his clothing camel's hair, he began to preach repentance of sins, and to baptize in the Jordan those who confessed their sins. Jesus was himself baptized by him, and the Baptist bore testimony to his sacred office and supernatural appointment. At last John, who had reproved Herod for marrying Herodias his brother Philip's widow was cast into prison, and at the instigation of the vindictive queen he was beheaded A. D. 29.

JOHN, the Evangelist, brother of James the great, was son of Zebedee and Salome. He was about 26 when the Messiah called him from his profession of fisherman to become a disciple, and he ever afterwards continued, from his respect and attention, the favourite of his master. At the last supper he leaned upon the breast of Jesus, and inquired who should be the traitor, and before the ascension the Redeemer said of him to the question of Peter, "if I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee," an answer which some of the Christian converts improperly regarded as an assurance that he should not die before the end of the world. He afterwards preached the gospel in Asia, and penetrated as far as Parthia, and then fixed his residence at Ephesus. During the persecutions of Domitian he was dragged to Rome and thrown into a caldron of boiling oil, from which he received no injury, and then was banished to Patmos where he saw his visions and wrote his Apocalypse. Under Nero, he returned to Ephesus, and at the request of the Asiatic churches he wrote his gospel to refute the errors of Cerinthus and Ebion, who maintained that our Saviour was a mere man. He wrote besides three Epistles. He died at Ephesus, A. D. 100, at the age of 94, in Trajan's reign.

JOHN, surnamed Mark, was the disciple of the apostles, and attended Paul and Barnabas in their peregrinations to preach the gospel. When the two apostles afterwards disputed about the services and the merits of their attendants, John followed Barnabas to Cyprus, and some years afterwards he was at Rome to minister to the necessities of Paul in prison. Some suppose that he died at Ephesus.

JOHN, a native of Nicomedia, who was roasted to death in defence of the faith in the persecution of Diocletian, 303.

JOHN St. a native of Cyprus, raised to the see of Alexandria 610. He was remarkable for his benevolence and charity.

JOHN, secretary to Honorius, seized the throne of Constantinople on his master's death and was beheaded two years after at Ravenna, 425.

JOHN I. surnamed Zimisceus, was of an illustrious family, and he seized on the throne of Constantinople by the assassination of Nicephoras Phocas, at the instigation of the empress Theophanon 969. Though he thus owed his elevation to murder, he governed with great moderation and displayed unusual valour against the Russians, Bulgarians and Saracens, whom he repeatedly defeated. He banished the empress Theophanon at the command of the patriarch, and he was poisoned by a cup-bearer at the instigation of the eunuch Basil, and he died 10th Jan. 976.

JOHN II. Comnenus, succeeded his father Alexis Comnenus on the throne of Constantinople, 1118. He married Irene princess of Hungary, and was successful in his wars against the Mahometans, Servians, and other barbarians. He was a virtuous prince and banished luxury and effeminacy from his court. He died 3d April, 1143, aged 55, in consequence of a wound received from a poisoned arrow in the chase.

JOHN III. Ducas, was emperor of Nice, whilst the Latins were masters of Constantinople. Though successful against the neighbouring princes, whose dominions he conquered, he failed in his attempts to take Constantinople, and was obliged to make a treaty of peace with Baldwin the usurper.

He afterwards waged war against the Bulgarians and died 1255, aged 62.

JOHN IV. Lascaris, succeeded, at the age of six, his father Theodore the younger on the throne of Constantinople, 1259. His youth exposed him to dangers, and his sceptre was seized by Michael Palæologus, who put out his eyes, and confined him for the rest of life in a prison. He died under Andronicus II.

JOHN V. Cantacuzenus, emperor of Constantinople. Vid. CANTACUZENUS.

JOHN VI. Palæologus, succeeded his father Andronicus the younger on the throne of Constantinople, 1341, and had the good fortune to free himself from the power of John Cantacuzenus his father-in-law, who had usurped his sceptre. He afterwards defended himself against the Turks, but bought their peace with money. A more formidable opposition awaited him in the rebellion of his son Andronicus, who imprisoned him and his sons, and during these civil commotions the Turks renewed their attacks against Constantinople and imposed upon the emperor very disgraceful terms. This weak and unfortunate monarch died of chagrin, 1390, aged 60.

JOHN VII. Palæologus, emperor of Constantinople after his father Emanuel, 1425, was unfortunate in his opposition against his Turkish invaders, and solicited in his defence the assistance of the Latins. More effectually to secure the support of the princes of the West, he meditated a union between the two churches, and the pope, Eugenius IV. favouring the plan, called a council at Ferrara, where the emperor attended in person, and where a reconciliation took place, 1439, but not to continue long. John died 31st Oct. 1448, after a reign of 29 years.

JOHN I. pope, a Tuscan, who succeeded Hormisdas in the chair of St. Peter, 523. He was thrown into prison by Theodoric, who persecuted the Arians, and he died in confinement at Ravenna, 526.

JOHN II. a native of Rome, pope after Boniface II. 533. He opposed the Nestorians and Eutychians, and died May, 535.

JOHN III. a Roman, pope after Pelagius I. 560, was zealous in the decoration of churches, and died 13th July, 573.

JOHN IV. a native of Salona, made pope 640, and died two years after.

JOHN V. a Syrian of benevolent character, raised to the papal chair 685. He died two years after.

JOHN VI. a Greek, made pope after Sergius, 701. He died 9th Jan. 705.

JOHN VII. a Greek, who succeeded John VI. on the papal throne, and died 17th Oct. 707. He was a weak pontiff, and too compliant with the improper requests of Justinian.

JOHN VIII. a Roman, pope after Adrian

II. 872, crowned Charles the Bald emperor, 875. He held a council at Troyes, 878, but was called back to Italy by the invasion of the Saracens, who proved so successful that they obliged him to pay an annual tribute. He was prevailed upon by Basil, emperor of the East, to acknowledge as patriarch Photius, who had artfully banished the legal possessor, Ignatius, but he afterwards saw the impropriety of his concessions, and therefore excommunicated the usurper. He died 15th Dec. 882. About 300 of his letters are preserved.

JOHN IX. a native of Tivoli, elected pope after Theodore II. 898. He died Nov. 900.

JOHN X. bishop of Bologna, and archbishop of Ravenna, was elected pope 914, by the intrigues of Theodora his mistress. He was more capable of leading an army than of governing the church, and he defeated the Saracens, who ravaged Italy, but was afterwards driven from Rome by Guy duke of Tuscany. He was put in prison by Marosia, daughter of Theodore, and suffocated 2d July, 928.

JOHN XI. son of Alberic duke of Spolitto, and Marosia the wife of Guy of Tuscany, was made pope at the age of 25, by the intrigues of his mother, 931. He was confined in the castle of St. Angelo with his licentious mother, by his brother Alberic, and he died there 936.

JOHN XII. a Roman noble, son of Alberic, was elected pope 956, at the age of 18, and was the first who changed his name of Octavian by assuming that of John. He solicited the assistance of the emperor Otho, against the tyranny of Berenger, who had established his power over Italy, and when he had succeeded in driving away his enemy, he crowned his illustrious ally, and swore to him inviolable fidelity, over the body of St. Peter. This alliance was of short duration, the pope became the friend of the son of Berenger, and united himself against his ancient ally and benefactor, in consequence of which Otho invaded Italy, and, in a general council in 963, accused the pope of various crimes. John, convicted of adultery, violence, and oppression, was deposed, and Leo VIII. placed in his room; but no sooner was the emperor returned to his dominions than the exiled pontiff entered Rome, and with the most barbarous cruelty mutilated his enemies. He was, in 964, killed by an insulted husband whose bed he had defiled.

JOHN XIII. a Roman, elected pope 965, by the power of the emperor, against the wishes of the Roman people. This violent step was productive of dissension, and the new pontiff was banished the next year by Peter, prefect of Rome; but the emperor reinstated him, and sent into exile his opponent in disgrace. John died 6th Sept. 972.

JOHN XIV. bishop of Pavia, and chancellor of Otho II. succeeded VII. as pope, 983. He was imprisoned in the castle of St. Angelo, by the anti-pope Boniface VIII. and died there either of poison or of grief, 20th Aug. 994.

JOHN XV. pope after John XIV. died soon after his elevation, and even before his consecration, according to some.

JOHN XVI. a Roman, made pope 985. He was the first who rewarded the meritorious deeds of life by canonization. He died 30th April, 996.

JOHN XVII. a Roman, elected after Sylvester II. 1003. He died six months after. There was an anti-pope of that name who was seized by the soldiers of Otho III. who in derision cut off his hands and ears, and tore out his tongue, 998. His name was Philagathus.

JOHN XVIII. a Roman, elected after John XVII. From this time the right of election passed from the Roman people to the clergy. John afterwards resigned his dignity for the obscurity of a monastery, and died 18th July, 1009.

JOHN XIX. son of the count of Tusculum, succeeded his brother Benedict VIII. 1024. He crowned the emperor Conrad II. and died May, 1033.

JOHN XX. the name given by some historians to the anti-pope Philagathus, or to John, son of Robert, or to the woman who is said to have filled the papal chair under the name of pope Joan.

JOHN XXI. a Portuguese, son of a physician, was made pope 1276, but died eight months after by the fall of a building upon him at Viterbo, 16th May, 1277. He left works of philosophy, medicine, and theology.

JOHN XXII. James d'Euse, a native of Cahors, who, by the patronage of Charles II. of Naples, to whose son he was preceptor, rose to high ecclesiastical dignities, and, in 1316, was elected to the popedom. He was an active pontiff, and founded several abbies, and established some bishoprics in central towns. His pontificate, however, was disturbed by various quarrels, especially with the cordeliers, whose order he intended to suppress. He died 4th Dec. 1334, respected for his frugality, prudence, and sanctity. He was well skilled in medicine, and wrote the Thesaurus Pauperum—treatise on the Disorders of the Eyes—on the Gout—on the Formation of the Fœtus—Advice for preserving Health, printed at Lyons, &c.

JOHN XXIII. Balthasar Cossa, a Neapolitan, who was legate at Bologna, and chamberlain to Boniface IX. and on the death of Alexander V. was raised to the popedom, 1410. His elevation was not without opposition ; but to pacify faction he promised to resign the tiara if Gregory XII. and Peter de Lune, or Benedict XIII. would also abandon their pretensions. Though these conditions were accepted and ratified with due formality in the council of Constance, he had the art to withdraw himself, and to re-assume the office and insignia of sovereign pontiff ; but he was soon after deposed and imprisoned. Three years after, 1418, he was restored to liberty and compelled to acknowledge the election of Martin V. by whom he was treated with great kindness. He died soon after at Florence, 22d Nov. 1419. He was in his character a most worthless and immoral man.

JOHN, king of England, surnamed Lackland, was the fourth son of Henry II. He unjustly deprived his nephew Arthur of his possessions in Brittany, and confined him in the tower of Rouen, where he was cruelly put to death, and having thus cut off the right heir of the English crown he was declared king. The states of Brittany and Constance, the mother of the murdered Arthur, complained of the cruelties of the usurper before Augustus Philip of France, and the tyrant was condemned for the murder, and his dominions in France confiscated. He retired to England, derided and despised by his subjects, and to complete his disgrace he quarrelled with the pope and the barons. The pope excommunicated him, but he reconciled himself to him by acknowledging himself the vassal of Rome, and when he found the barons opposing force to his measures, and threatening his deposition, he consented to their request, and signed the Magna Charta, the glorious basis of British freedom. As this was extorted from him, John showed little inclination to observe it ; and the barons, to punish and dethrone him, called over Lewis the son of the French king, and swore allegiance to him. Deserted by his subjects and harassed by an army of foreigners, John at last found relief in death. His misfortunes pressed so heavily upon his spirits that he fell a victim to a fever at Newark, 19th Oct. 1216. He was buried in Worcester cathedral. His son Henry III. succeeded him.

JOHN, king of France, surnamed the Good, succeeded his father Philip Valois, 1350. The beginning of his reign was marked by measures of severity, and in consequence of this, dissatisfaction and insurrection prevailed over the kingdom and favoured the invasion of the country by the English. John opposed his enemies, but was defeated in a dreadful battle near Poitiers by the black prince Edward, and taken prisoner, 1356. The imprisonment of John in England was the signal for civil dissension. France was torn to pieces by her rebellious chiefs, and the king, unable to procure his liberty by the payment of 300 millions of golden crowns, and by the cession of eight provinces for his ransom, according to the treaty of Bretigni, returned from France, which he had visited on his parole, and died soon after in the Savoy, London, 8th April, 1364, aged 54. Though impolitic, violent, and imprudent in his character, John possessed bravery and generosity.

JOHN III. king of Sweden, son of Gustavus Vasa, succeeded in 1568 his brother Eric XIV. who had been deposed for his ill-conduct. He restored tranquillity among his subjects, and made a peace with Denmark ; but his attempts to re-establish the popish religion in the kingdom were opposed by the nobles, and Lutheranism therefore prevailed. He died 1592.

JOHN II. son of Henry III. was at the age of two proclaimed king of Castile. Though educated in indolence and effeminacy by his mother, he showed himself brave in war, against the attacks of the kings of Navarre and Arragon, whom he obliged to sue for peace. He afterwards turned his arms against the Moors of Grenada, and defeated them with great slaughter. He died 1454 aged 50.

JOHN II. king of Navarre, succeeded his brother Alphonsus on the throne of Arragon, 1458. He made war for a long time against Henry IV. of Castile, and died at Barcelona 1479, aged 82. He left his kingdoms of Arragon and Sicily to his son Ferdinand, and Navarre to his daughter Donna Leonora.

JOHN, son of the emperor Henry VII. was, at the age of 14, elected to the kingdom of Bohemia 1309, against the intrigues of the duke of Carinthia. He displayed great valour, and after conquering Silesia he was declared king of Poland. In his expedition against the Lithuanians he had the misfortune to lose one of his eyes, and a Jew doctor to whom he applied at Montpellier for a cure, deprived him of the other. This misfortune did not, however, disarm him of his courage, he assisted Philip of Valois against the English, and in the battle of Crecy with his horse led by the bridle by two brave knights, he displayed singular acts of valour and was mortally wounded 26th Aug. 1346. He was buried at Luxemburg.

JOHN I. king of Portugal, was raised to the throne, 1334, though but the natural son of Peter the Severe, against the rights of Beatrix, daughter of his brother Ferdinand I. His elevation was opposed by John, king of Castile, who had married Beatrix ; but the usurper established himself in his power by the defeat of his opponents at the battle of Alimbarota ; afterwards John turned his arms against the Moors of Africa, and took Ceuta and other places, and died 14th Aug. 1433, aged 76. Under his reign the Portuguese began their famous discoveries.

JOHN II. king of Portugal, was surnamed the Great, and succeeded his father Alphonsus V. 1481. He was successful in his suppression of some insurrections, the leaders of which he punished with death, and afterwards he carried his arms into Africa, and was at the taking of Arzile and Tangiers. He afterwards defeated the Castilians at the battle of Toro, 1476, and with wise policy encouraged the maritime excursions of his subjects, and favoured their settlements on the coasts of Africa, and in the Indies.—He died of a dropsy, 22d Oct. 1495, aged 41.

JOHN III. king of Portugal, succeeded his father Emanuel, 1521. The beginning of his reign was marked by dreadful earthquakes which destroyed his cities and swallowed up the inhabitants; but John with benevolence and wisdom relieved the miseries of his subjects, and encouraged commerce and navigation. His fleets penetrated far into the east, and discovered Japan, and to ensure the tranquillity of his Indian settlements he sent among them the celebrated Francis Xavier. He died of an apoplexy 1557, aged 55, deservedly respected as a humane and enlightened monarch.

JOHN IV. surnamed the Fortunate, was son of Theodore duke of Braganza, and was born 1604. He employed all the powers of his mind and of his situation, to the emancipation of his country, which the Spaniards after the death of Sebastian, had conquered, and since held as a tributary province, and by the assistance of his brave countrymen he shook off the odious yoke, and was proclaimed king 1630. He died at Lisbon, 6th Nov. 1636, aged 32.

JOHN V. succeeded Peter II. on the throne of Portugal, 1707. He espoused the cause of the allies in the wars of the Spanish succession, and when the peace of Utrecht, in 1713, restored tranquillity to Europe, he devoted himself to the encouragement of commerce, of literature, and of industry among his subjects. He died 1750, aged 61, universally regretted.

JOHN, of Gaunt or Ghent, duke of Lancaster, was the third son of Edward III. He was born at Ghent, 1340, and distinguished himself by his valour in the field. In consequence of his marriage with Constance, the natural daughter of Peter the Cruel, king of Castile and Leon, he laid claim to the throne on the death of his father-in-law, but was opposed by Henry of Transtamare, and enjoyed nothing but the empty title of king. In the wars of the black prince his brother in France, he supported him by his intrepidity, and after his death succeeded to the management of affairs. On the accession of Richard II. he was dragged from the retirement which he loved, to clear himself against the accusations of the courtiers, who charged him with attempts to seize the crown because he countenanced the doctrines of Wickliffe, against the overbearing power of the pope. He afterwards resigned his claims to the throne of Castile to his only daughter by Constance, who in 1386 married the heir apparent to that kingdom, and he received in return an honourable pension. John had for his third wife, Catherine Swinford, the governess of his children, and the sister of Chaucer's wife, and from his patronage of that poet he received pleasure, honour, and fame. John died 1399, highly respected for his valour and prudence. His son Henry succeeded to the English throne after the deposition of the second Richard.

JOHN SOBIESKI, king of Poland. Vid. SOBIESKI.

JOHN of Austria, Don, was the natural son of Charles V. of Germany. He was unacquainted with his birth, till his father on his death-bed revealed the secret to his son Philip II. who honourably called him to court, and in 1570 placed him at the head of his army against the Moors of Grenada, whom he defeated. In 1571, he commanded the naval armament against the Turks, and gained the celebrated battle of Lepanto, and two years after took Tunis. He was made governor of the Netherlands in 1576, and after taking Namur, Charlemont, and other towns, he completed his triumphs over the prince of Orange and the archduke Mathias, by the famous battle of Gemblours 1478. This celebrated warrior died 1578, at the early age of 32 in consequence of poison as it is supposed, administered by his enemies.

JOHN, Fearless, count of Nevers and duke of Burgundy, distinguished himself at Nicopolis against Bajazet, who sold him his liberty for an exorbitant ransom. Restored to France he employed his influence in promoting sedition and civil war in the kingdom against the dauphin, afterwards Charles VII. and the partisans of the duke of Orleans. He murdered the duke of Orleans, and afterwards being reconciled to the dauphin, he was assassinated in his presence by one of his courtiers, 10th Sept. 1419, aged 48.

JOHN, of France, duke of Berry, was son of king John, and distinguished himself at the battle of Poitiers. He died at Paris 15th June, 1416, respected for his many virtues.

JOHN V. duke of Brittany, was surnamed the Conqueror, for the brave defence which he made against the emperor and against the king of France, who wished to strip him of his dominions. He died 1st Nov. 1399.

JOHN VI. duke of Brittany, was a prince of great valour and equal benevolence. He was in the service of Charles VII. of France, and fought bravely against the English. He died 1446 much lamented by his subjects.

JOHN V. count of Armagnac was son of John IV. of Navarre. He disgraced himself by an incestuous commerce with his sister Isabella, which neither the representations of his friends, nor the threats of the pope, could persuade him to abandon. At last he was banished from his dominions by the French king, but afterwards was reconciled to his persecutors and was killed in his palace at Lectoure in a siege 1473.

JOHN, of Salisbury, a learned Englishman who in his youth was in the service of the abbot of Rheims, and then studied at Paris, where he took his degrees. He visited Rome, and at his return to Paris, opened a school there. He afterwards was in England and lived with Theobald, the primate, and with Thomas-a-Becket, and in 1177 was chosen bishop of Chartres by the clergy of that diocese, at the recommendation of Lewis the young king of France. He was an able prelate, and distinguished himself at the council of Lateran, and died 1181. His writings are lost, except Becket's Life—a Collection of Letters—and "Polyeraticon."

JOHN of Leyden. Vid. BOCCOLD.

JOHN of Paris, a celebrated Dominican, theological professor at Paris. He supported the cause of Philip the Fair, against Boniface VIII. in his treatise de Regia Potestate et Papali; but the doctrines which he asserted with respect to transubstantiation proved highly offensive to the Roman see, and he was suspended from his ecclesiastical offices by the archbishop of Paris. He appealed to Rome, but died in that city before his cause was heard 1304. He wrote besides Determinatio de Modo existendi Corporis Christi in Sacramento Altaris, 8vo.—Correctorium Doctrinæ S. Thomæ, &c.

JOHN, of Udino, a celebrated painter, who studied under Giorgion at Venice, and Raphael at Rome. His fruits, animals, flowers, &c. exhibited great powers of execution. He died at Rome 1564, aged 70.

JOHNES, Thomas, an ingenious gentleman, was born at Ludlow, in Shropshire, in 1748. From Shrewsbury-school he went to Eton, and afterwards to Jesus college, Oxford, where he took his degree of master of arts, in 1783. Previous to this he had made the tour of Europe, and was elected into parliament for the borough of Cardigan. He was also appointed auditor for the principality of Wales, and colonel of the Caermarthenshire militia. In 1795 he was returned knight of the shire for the county of Radnor. He devoted much attention to the improvement of his estates at Hafod, in Cardiganshire, where he planted an immense number of trees, and built an elegant house, which was enriched by a most valuable library; and he had also a printing-press, from whence issued several elegant productions. In 1807 this mansion was destroyed by fire, while the owner was in London. In 1811 Mr. Johnes experienced a more severe loss in the death of his favourite daughter, from the effects of which shock he never recovered. He died April 24, 1816. His publications are—1. A Cardiganshire Landlord's Advice to his Tenants. 2. Palaye's Memoirs of Froissart translated from the French, 4 vols. 4to. 3. The Chronicles of Sir John Froissart, 4 vols. 4to. and 10 vols. 8vo. 4. Translation of De Joinville's Memoirs of St. Louis, 2 vols. 4to. 5. Travels of Bertraudon de la Brocquiere in Palestine, 8vo. 6. The Chronicles of Monstrelet, with notes, 4 vols. 4to.—W. B.

JOHNSON, Samuel, an English divine, born 1649, in Warwickshire, and educated at St. Paul's school, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He early obtained the living of Corringham in Essex, which on account of its unhealthy situation, he abandoned to the care of a curate, and came to settle in London. Here he plunged into the vortex of politics, and soon distinguished himself, and became the friend of lord Essex, and of lord William Russell, who made him his chaplain. He inveighed severely in his discourses from the pulpit, against the horrors of popery, and spoke with warmth against the succession of the duke of York to the throne. While his political friends wielded the weapons of eloquence in parliament, he himself attacked Dr. Hickee, the bold champion of passive obedience, in a pamphlet called, "Julian the Apostate." The work was quickly answered by Dr. Hickee, in a pamphlet called, "Jovian," and Johnson had already prepared a severe reply, which the seizure and imprisonment of his patron, lord William Russell, prevented him from publishing. His abilities, however, and his zeal were too conspicuous to be disregarded: after Russell's death, he was summoned before the privy council, and questioned about the answer he had written to Dr. Hickee, called, "Julian's Arts and Methods to undermine and extirpate Christianity:" but when he declared that he had suppressed it, and when his persecutors could procure no copy of it, though it was entered at Stationers'-hall, he was dismissed. But soon after he was prosecuted for the publication of Julian the Apostate, and though ably defended by counsellor Wallop, he was condemned before Jeffries, and sentenced to pay 500 marks, and to be imprisoned till it was paid. Though thus confined his spirit was not subdued: he still wrote against popery; and when the army was drawn up on Hounslow heath in 1686, he drew up "an Address to the Protestants of the Army," which, after the dispersion of 1000 copies, was seized, and exposed the author to fresh persecution. He was in consequence of this condemned to stand in the Pillory, in Palace-yard, at Charing cross, and the Exchange, to pay a fine of 500 marks, and to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn, after being degraded from the priesthood. The degradation took place by the hands of bishops Crew, Sprat, and White; and on December 1, 1686, the sentence was executed. The stripes which he received were 317, from a whip of nine cords knotted, which he endured with great firmness and even alacrity. The king appointed a successor to his living, but as in the divesting him of his sacerdotal habit, either by accident or design, he had been permitted to retain his cassock, his degradation was considered as incomplete, and the bishop refused to admit the new incumbent without indemnity, and when he presented himself to the parish, the people refused to receive him in the room of Johnson, who thus retained his living. At the revolution, the parliament, 1689, resolved that the proceedings in the King's Bench against Johnson, were cruel and illegal; and therefore they recommended him to the king for some ecclesiastical preferment suitable to his services and sufferings. The deanery of Durham, in consequence of this, was offered to him, which he refused as a reward inadequate to his merits; but at the solicitation of lady Russell, and the influence of Tillotson, a pension of 300*l.* a-year was obtained from the king, for his own and his son's life, besides a gratuity of 1000*l.* In 1692 his house was forcibly entered in the night by seven assassins, who seemed to have been actuated to vengeance and murder by the publication of his book called "Argument to prove the Abrogation of King James, &c." Though his life was thus threatened with instant death, the cries of his wife prevailed upon the ruffians, who left him, after inflicting some severe bruises on his body, and two wounds on his head. His constitution was weakened by this dreadful catastrophe, and by the persevering spirit of his persecutors, though his zeal against popery remained unshaken. He died May, 1703. All his treatises were published in 1 vol. folio, 1710; a second edition of which appeared 1713. Johnson in his character was firm, undaunted, and enthusiastic; but his temper was violent, overbearing, and unsubmitive; and probably to the furious zeal with which he attacked those who differed from him, and to the abusive language which he indiscriminately used against his opponents, he might attribute the virulence and persevering spirit of his persecutors. His works appeared 1710, in 1 vol. folio.

JOHNSON, John, a nonjuror divine, born at Frindsbury, near Rochester, 1662, and educated at Canterbury school, and Magdalen college, Cambridge. He afterwards entered at Corpus Christi, of which he became fellow, 1685. He was in 1686 presented to the vicarages of Baston and Heron hill, near Canterbury, by Sancroft, the primate; and in 1697 he was further promoted by Tenison to the living of Margate, and afterwards to Apuldre. His abilities as a scholar and divine were very great, and therefore he was twice chosen proctor in convocation for Canterbury. But though protected by government, he manifested some opposition to the establishment, and not only expressed a mean opinion of the articles and liturgy of the church, but even refused to take the oaths of allegiance to George I. This threatened dangers, which, however, he prudently avoided by timely submission, though he afterwards continued restless, dissatisfied, and disloyal. He died 15th Dec. 1725. He wrote the "Clergyman's Vade-mecum," an excellent book, 2 vols. 12mo.—collection of Ecclesiastical Laws, Canons, &c. 2 vols. 8vo.—the Unbloody Sacrifice and Altar Unveiled and Supported, 8vo.—a Paraphrase on the Psalms, &c.

JOHNSON, or JANSEN, Cornelius, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a painter. He came to England in the reign of James I. and drew that monarch, as well as the nobility of his court. He was soon after eclipsed by the superior fame of Vandyke; though his pictures possessed great merit in their high finishing, and the correctness of their drapery. He died in London.

JOHNSON, Martin, a seal engraver, better known as a painter. His landscapes are particularly excellent, and give a most correct and perfect delineation of the delightful prospects of England. His pieces are very scarce, and preserved in the cabinets of the curious with great care. He died in the beginning of James II.'s reign.

JOHNSON, Charles, a member of the Middle Temple, who left the profession of the law for the muses. He wrote some plays which, by the friendship of Wilks, were acted on the stage, and received some applause. He married a young widow, with a moderate fortune, and opened a tavern in Bow-street, Covent-garden, which he relinquished at the death of his wife, having acquired a decent competence.

He died about 1744. Though he is not ranked among the greatest of dramatic writers, yet he possessed merit, and deserved popularity. His dramatic pieces are nineteen in number. He is immortalized in Pope's Dunciad, because, says the note, he was famous for writing a play every year, and for being at Button's coffee-house every day, and for falling a martyr to obesity, and the rotundity of his parts.

JOHNSON, Maurice, an eminent antiquary, born of an ancient and respectable family at Spalding, where he established a gentleman's literary society. He was of the Middle Temple, and was bred to the bar. By his wife, daughter of Mr. Ambler, he had twenty-six children, sixteen of whom sat down together at his table. He was one of the last founders of the Antiquarian Society; and by his benevolence, and the liberality of his various communications, he fully deserved the handsome eulogium written on him by Dr. Stukeley, and inserted in the minutes of the society, to whose memoirs he contributed so much. He made a curious collection for the history of Carausius. He died, after suffering much from a vertiginous disorder, 6th Feb. 1755.

JOHNSON, Thomas, a native of Selby, Yorkshire, brought up to the business of an apothecary in London. He became, according to Wood, the best heraldist of his time; and wrote, Iter in agrum Cantuarium, 1629—Ericetum Hamstedianum, 1632, the first catalogue of plants published in England—Gerard's Herbal improved, a valuable work—Essay on the Bath waters, &c. He was an officer in the royal army, and was made M.D. by the university of Oxford for his services. He died in consequence of a wound which he had received in the shoulder at the siege of Basinghouse, 1644.

JOHNSON, Samuel, a celebrated English writer, born at Lichfield, 7th Sept. 1709. He was the son of a bookseller, and was educated at Lichfield school, where he had among his school-fellows Dr. James and Dr. Taylor; and after being one year at Stourbridge school, and passing two years in unsettled studies at home, he entered October, 1728, at Pembroke college, Oxford. His exercises in the university displayed, as they had done at school, superior powers; and his translation of Pope's Messiah into Latin verse, appeared so highly finished, that the poet spoke with the highest respect of his translator, and declared that posterity would doubt which poem was the original. Unhappily Johnson had to struggle with poverty at college, and in consequence of the insolvency of his father, he left the university in 1731, without a degree. Returned to Lichfield, he found his prospects in life dreary and unpromising. After his father's death, his whole property amounted to only 20*l.*; and thus destitute, he willingly accepted the offer of an ushership at Bosworth school. The situation proved disagreeable, and in a few months he removed to Birmingham, where, under the patronage of a bookseller, he published his first literary labour, a translation of Lobo. In 1734 he returned to Lichfield; and the next year he married Mrs. Porter, a widow of Birmingham, a lady much older than himself, and not possessed of the most engaging manners, or the most fascinating person. As she brought him 800*l.* he began to fit up a house at Edial, near Lichfield, for the reception of pupils; but as he had only three scholars, among whom was David Garrick, the plan was dropped as utterly impracticable and ruinous. About this time, under the patronage of Mr. Walmesley, his earliest friend, he began his Irene; and in March, 1737, he first visited London, in company with his pupil, Garrick, like himself, in quest of employment, and equally doomed to rise to celebrity in his profession. In London he formed an acquaintance with Cave, the printer of the Gentleman's Magazine; and his first performance in that work was a Latin Alcaic ode, inserted in March, 1738. Thus encouraged, he returned to Lichfield to fetch his wife; and from 1740 to 1743, he was laboriously employed in the service of this periodical work, and during that period wrote the parliamentary debates, valuable not as the effusions of orators, but as the bold composition of a man of genius on such subjects as were supposed to engage the legislators of the age. In 1738 he published his London, a poem, in imitation of Juvenal's third satire, which was well received, and honoured with the commendation of Pope, and passed to a second edition in one week. Though distinguished as an author, Johnson still felt the pressure of poverty, and therefore he applied for a school in Leicestershire; but though recommended by lord Gower, he was disappointed, as he had not the requisite degree of M.A. His attempts to be admitted at Doctors' Commons, without academic honours, proved equally unsuccessful; and therefore he determined to depend on the efforts of his pen for subsistence. Besides his valuable contributions to the Gentleman's Magazine, he in 1744 published the life of Savage, a work of great merit, which in the elegant language of pathetic narration, exhibited the sufferings and the poverty of a friend, whose calamities he himself had shared and bewailed. He began in 1747 his edition of Shakspeare, and published the plan of his English dictionary. This gigantic work was undertaken under the patronage of the booksellers; and the lexicographer engaged a house in Gough-square, where, with the assistance of six amanuenses, he proceeded rapidly in the execution of his plan. This great work so valuable to the nation, and so honourable to the talents of the author, appeared, May, 1755, in 2 vols. without a patron. Lord Chesterfield, who had at first favoured the undertaking, but had afterwards neglected the author, endeavoured, by a flattering recommendation of the work in "the World," to reconcile himself to his good opinion; but Johnson, with noble indignation, spurned at the mean artifice of his courtly patron; and his celebrated letter reflected, with independent spirit and in severe language, against his selfish and ambitious views. The dictionary produced 1755. but as the money had been advanced during the composition of the work, there was no solid advantage to be procured on the publication, and fame could ill satisfy the demands of creditors, and supply bread to the indigent author. In 1749 the Irene had been brought forward on the stage, by the friendship of Garrick, but with no success. The Rambler was undertaken 20th March, 1750, and till the 17th March, 1752, when it ceased, a paper had regularly appeared every Tuesday and Saturday; and it is remarkable that, during the whole of that time, only five numbers were contributed by other authors. But these publications, popular as they were, still left Johnson in distressed circumstances; and in 1756, the year after the publishing of his dictionary, he was arrested for a debt of five guineas, from which the kindness of Richardson relieved him. In 1758, he began the Idler, and continued it for two years with little assistance; and on the death of his mother in 1759, that he might pay some decent respect to her funeral, and discharge her debts, he wrote his Rasselas, and obtained for it, from the booksellers, the sum of 100*l.* Happily, however, these high services to literature were not to pass unrewarded: in 1762, he was honourably presented by the king, on the representation of Mr. Wedderburne, with a pension of 300*l.* per annum, without a stipulation of future exertions, but merely, as the grant expressed it, for the moral tendency of his writings, a character to which his Rambler was most fully entitled. From public motives, and not from obsequious flattery, Johnson afterwards became a political writer, and his "False Alarm," and his "Thoughts on the Falkland Islands," displayed, in a very striking degree, the great powers of his mind in the defence of the measures of the court. These services first suggested the idea of introducing him into the house of commons; but lord North did not attend with sufficient respect to the recommendations of Mr. Strahan, and of other gentlemen, who wished to see the gigantic powers, and the commanding elocution of this literary hero, exerted in parliament, and the proposal was dropped. In 1775, Johnson was complimented by the university of Oxford with the degree of LL.D. by diploma, as he had before received from them the degree of A.M. and the same honours from Trinity college, Dublin; and the circumstance reflected equal credit on those who bestowed, and on him who accepted the high distinction. In 1777, he began his Lives of the Poets, which he finished in 1781, a work of great merit, and which exhibits, in the most pleasing manner, the soundness of the critic, the information of the biographer, and the benevolent views of the man. In 1781, the loss of his friend, Mr. Thrale, in whose hospitable house and society he had passed 15 of the happiest years of his life, affected him much; he found his health gradually declining, from the united attacks of the dropsy, and of an asthma; and while he expressed a wish to remove to the milder climates of France and Italy, it is to be lamented that the applications of his friends for the increase of his pension proved abortive. During the progressive increase of his complaints, he divided his time in acts of devotion, and in classical recreations; and during his sleepless nights, he translated several of the Greek epigrams of the Anthologia into Latin verse. It is remarkable, that Johnson, whose pen was ever employed in recommending piety, and all the offices of the purest morality; and whose conduct and example in life exhibited the most perfect pattern of the Christian virtues; should, in the close of life, betray dreadful apprehensions of death. By degrees, indeed, the terrors which his imagination had painted to itself, disappeared; but still his example teaches us, that if the most virtuous and devout view the approach of death with trembling and alarm, the unrepented sins of life have much to apprehend from the all-searching eye of God. Johnson expired on the 13th Dec. 1784, full of resignation, strong in faith, and joyful in hope of a happy resurrection. His remains were deposited in Westminster abbey, near the grave of his friend Garrick; and the nation has paid an honourable tribute to his memory, by erecting to him a monument in St. Paul's, with an elegant and nervous epitaph from the pen of Dr. Parr. By his wife, who died March, 1752, and was deeply lamented by him, Johnson had no issue. His works are very numerous, and all respectable. Some of his smaller pieces were published by Sir J. Hawkins in 1787, with his life in 11 vols. 8vo. and of these an edition, by Murphy, appeared in 1792, in 12 vols. 8vo. His letters, and every particular respecting his character, conduct, opinion, connexions, &c. have engaged the attention of the public, in the various publications of Mr. G. Strahan, Mrs. Piozzi, and others, and particularly in the interesting and valuable account of his life by Boswell, with whom he travelled to the Hebrides, of which he gave an account in 1773. In his person, Johnson was large, corpulent, and unwieldy, with little of the graces of polished life, occasionally offensive by involuntary or convulsive motions, and in his dress, singular and slovenly. His conversation, however, made atonement for the deficiencies of his personal appearance, and though from the superior powers of his mind, the great independence of his character, and the gigantic vigour of his genius, he was positive, and very impatient of contradiction, he was ever interesting and instructive, and exhibited at all times great goodness of heart, unshaken steadiness of principle, and commanding benignity. Humane, charitable, generous, and affectionate, with all his little defects of temper, it may truly be said, that there was scarce a virtue in principle which he did not possess. His goodness flowed from the heart, and his religion was the pure stream from the soul, humble, devout, contrite, and pious. As a literary character, his name stands on very high ground; correctness, elegance, and variety every where clothed under a strong and nervous style, captivate, enliven, and edify. The powers of a sound and matured judgment, of a vigorous imagination, and a most retentive memory, were happily united to illustrate what was obscure, to render pleasing what was harsh and unseemly, to explain what was difficult, and to embellish what was devoid of grace, of beauty, or of attraction. Besides the instructive account of his life by Boswell, much information may be collected from the labours of Hawkins, Murphy, Anderson, &c.

JOHNSON, Samuel, LL.D. governor of North Carolina, from 1787 to 1789, was president of the convention of that state which ratified the federal constitution, and had been a member of congress previous to 1789, when he was appointed a senator from North Carolina, and afterwards a judge of the supreme court of law and equity. He was a native of Edenton, and died at Shewarky, August 18th, 1816, aged 83.  L.

JOHNSON, Sir Nathaniel, governor of South Carolina, succeeded James Moore in 1703, and continued in office till 1709. He was a military man, and when the colony was invaded by the French and Spaniards in 1706, displayed great judgment and skill in the measures which he adopted for its defence. Its enemies were defeated and driven from its shores with the loss of their commander and three hundred men, while that of the provincials was exceeding small. The proprietors rewarded his fidelity by the grant of an extensive tract of land. To him the merit is ascribed of having first introduced the cultivation of silk in South Carolina, in 1703. It was chiefly owing to his influence that the first establishment of the episcopal church was carried there, when the majority of the inhabitants were dissenters. He died in 1713. Before his arrival in Carolina, he had been for some time a member of the house of commons, and from 1686, to 1689, governor of Nevis, St. Christophers, Montserrat, and Antigua.  L.

JOHNSON, Robert, governor of South Carolina, succeeded Daniel in 1717, and continued in office till 1719, when the government passed from the hands of the proprietors. Such was his popularity that the people solicited him then to receive the office from them, but he declined from a feeling of obligation to the proprietors. After the territory was purchased by the crown, he was again appointed governor in 1731, and held the place till his death, May 3d, 1735.  L.

JOHNSON, Sir William, a major general of the militia of New-York, was a native of Ireland, and born about the year 1714. He came to America in early life, and settled on the Mohawk, where he carried on an extensive traffic with the Indians, and by learning their language, and accommodating himself to their manners, gained great influence over them. In 1755, he commanded the provincial troops of New-York, marched against Crown Point, and gained a victory over the French under baron Dieskau, for which he received from the house of commons the gift of 5000 pounds, and the title of baronet from the king. He was also appointed superintendent of Indian affairs in that colony, and in 1759, commanded the provincial troops in the expedition against Niagara, and soon by the death of his superior officer became commander-in-chief. By his courage and skill, he succeeded in capturing that fort. He died at his seat on the Mohawk, in 1774. He was brave, shrewd, and insinuating in his address, and obtained a greater influence over the Indians, than any other white person had ever acquired.  L.

JOHNSON, Samuel, D.D. first president of King's college, New-York, was born at Guilford, Connecticut, and graduated at Yale college, in 1714. After spending some time in that seminary as a tutor, he was, in 1720, ordained pastor of the church at West Haven; but in 1722, embracing Episcopalianism, he went to England to obtain ordination, and returning the following year, was settled at Stratford, where he remained till 1754, and rendered himself conspicuous by a controversy respecting episcopacy. He was then appointed president of King's college in New-York, and employed himself in that station till 1763, when he resigned, and returned to his charge at Stratford, where he continued greatly beloved for his benevolence, and urbanity, and respected for his learning, in which he was equalled by few of his cotemporaries till his death in 1772.

☞ L.

JOHNSON, William Samuel, LL.D. F.R.S. president of Columbia college, New-York, was the eldest son of the reverend Dr. Samuel Johnson, and born at Stratford, Connecticut, October 7th, 1727. He was graduated at Yale college, in 1744. He studied law, and on his first appearance at the bar distinguished himself, and soon rose to the highest eminence. He was gifted in an unusual degree with the graces of the orator. He possessed a voice of the richest tones, a copious and flowing elocution, a fertile and brilliant fancy, an understanding uncommonly energetic, quick of apprehension, capable of disentangling the most complicated subjects, highly original in its views, and trained to laborious and profound research; and he had richly stored his mind with elegant literature, and legal science. In 1765, he was elected a delegate to the congress which met that year at New-York, and was its last surviving member. He was also chosen to a seat in the council of the colony, and was in October, 1766, appointed its agent in England, to defend its interests in the discussion of the claims against it by Mason. While there, he enjoyed an opportunity of forming many interesting connexions with the learned and illustrious men of that country, the most distinguished of whom were among his friends and associates. With Dr. Johnson he maintained a correspondence for many years. After his return to America in 1771, he resumed his professional employments, and was appointed in 1772, a judge of the supreme court of Connecticut. This office he held until 1774, and, during the same period, was one of the commissioners for adjusting the controversy between the proprietors of Pennsylvania and the Susquehanna company. In 1785, he was elected a delegate to the congress of the United States, and in 1787, to the convention which framed the federal constitution. In this august assembly he acted a conspicuous part. His influence was not the less effective for the mildness and the modesty with which it was exerted, and to him the credit of having first proposed the organization of the senate as a distinct branch of the national legislature, has been ascribed. Under this constitution he was appointed one of the first senators of Connecticut, and in conjunction with his colleague, Mr. Ellsworth, drew up the bill for establishing the judiciary system of the United States. It was from engagements thus honourable and important that he was called in 1792, to assume the presidency of Columbia college. This institution which had suffered a severe depression during the political contests of past years, was now reorganized, and under the superintendence of Mr. Johnson assumed and maintained an elevated rank among the literary institutions of the country. This station his age and infirmities induced him to relinquish in 1800, when he retired to his native village, and spent the remainder of his life in the enjoyments of literature, the gratifications of a beneficent disposition, and the distinguished exemplification of the excellence of the Christian character. He died at Stratford, November 14th, 1819, aged 93.

JOHNSON, Thomas, the first governor of Maryland after the revolution, was a native of Calvert county, and educated a lawyer. He had obtained great distinction at the bar previously to the commencement of the revolution. At this period he stood high in the estimation of his fellow-citizens, who manifested their confidence in his patriotism by appointments to the most responsible public stations. In 1774, he was a member of the committee of correspondence for Maryland, and was the same year elected a delegate to congress, and was several years a member of that body. Colonel Howard succeeded him as governor in 1789. On the establishment of the government under the new constitution, he was appointed district judge of Maryland. This office he declined but accepted that of associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, to which he was appointed in 1791, and which he resigned on account of ill health in 1793. In 1801, he was nominated for the office of chief justice of the district of Columbia, which he also declined. He died at Rose Hill, near Fredericktown, October 26th, 1819, aged 87.

JOHNSTON, Arthur, a physician, born at Caskieben, near Aberdeen. After studying at Aberdeen, he went to Rome, and to Padua, where he took the degree of M.D. 1610. He next travelled through Italy, Germany, Denmark, England, and Holland, and at last settled in France, where he had, by two wives, 13 children. After distinguishing himself as a Latin poet at Paris, he returned after 24 years' absence, to Scotland, in 1632, and was then introduced to Laud, who at that time was in the north with Charles I. He dedicated his poetical paraphrase of David's Psalms, to his patron, by whose interest he was made physician to the king. He visited in 1641, one of his daughters, who was married, at Oxford, and being seized with a violent diarrhœa, died there in the course of a few days, aged 54. He wrote besides Epigrams—Musæ Alicæ, &c.

JOHNSTON, Charles, a novel writer, was born in Ireland, and bred to the bar; but being excessively deaf he was compelled to relinquish that profession. In 1760, he published "Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea;" a political romance, in which all the characters and scenes were drawn from real life. This was followed by some others of a similar description, as "The Reverie, or a Flight to the Paradise of Fools," 2 vols.; "The History of Arbaces, Prince of Betlis," 2 vols.; the Pilgrim, or a Picture of Life, 2 vols.; and the "History of John Juniper, Esq. alias Juniper Jack," 3 vols. In 1782, the author went to India, and died there about 1800.—W. B.

JOHNSTON, Gabriel, governor of North Carolina, entered on his administration in November, 1734, and continued in the office till his death, in 1752. He was in most respects an excellent magistrate. He did much to establish order, and encourage learning and religion, and the colony advanced greatly in numbers and wealth during his government.

JOHNSTONE, James, a physician, was born at Annan, in 1730. He studied at Edinburgh; and in 1750, took his doctor's degree, after which he settled at Kidderminster, where he became known by his treatment of a malignant fever that raged there some years, and of which he published an account. In this he first made known the power of mineral acid vapour to destroy febrile contagion. From Kidderminster he removed to Worcester, where he died in 1802. Dr. Johnstone, in some papers communicated to the Royal Society, stated a peculiar doctrine concerning the ganglions of the nerves.—W. B.

JOHNSTONE, George, known as one of the commissioners, sent with lord Carlisle, and Mr. Eden, to treat with the Americans during the war, was the son of a Scotch baronet. He was brought up to the sea service, and was made master and commander, 1760, and two years after, post-captain, and in 1763, appointed governor of West Florida. He, after his return to England, sat in parliament for Cocker-mouth and Appleby, and fought a duel with lord George Germaine, in consequence of some reflections which he had made in parliament on his conduct. He also distinguished himself for his zeal in the affairs of the East India company, and for his violent attacks on the conduct of lord Clive. He was author of Thoughts on our Acquisitions in the East Indies, particularly in Bengal, 8vo. 1771, and he died 1787.

JOINVILLE, John Sire de, a French statesman, born of a noble family in Champagne. He became one of the favourite lords in the court of Lewis IX. and was consulted on all occasions with confidence by the monarch. He wrote the History of St. Louis, an interesting work, best edited by Ducange, 1668, folio, and also in 1761, by Melot. He died about 1318, aged nearly 50 years.

JOLY, Claude, a French writer, born at Paris, 1607. He was canon of the cathedral, and also precentor. He died in consequence of a fall into a trench, made for the foundation of a high altar in his church, 1700, at the great age of 93. He published a collection of maxims for the Education of a Prince, against the false Politics of Mazarine, burnt by the hands of the hangman, 1665—Codicil d'Or, on the same subject, &c.

JOLY, Guy, the secretary, and faithful friend of Cardinal de Retz, was author of "Memoirs of his Times," from 1641, to 1665.

JONAH, the fifth of the minor prophets, flourished under Joash and Jeroboam, kings of Israel. When he refused to go to Nineveh, and fled in a ship to Tarshish, he was during a dreadful storm, thrown, at his own request, into the sea, and after being three days swallowed by a large fish, he was cast out on dry land. His preaching to the Ninevites was attended by their conversion. The gourd, the sudden decay of which he bitterly lamented, while he disregarded the fate of the thousands of Nineveh, is supposed by some to be the plant called Palma Christi. He died about 761 B.C.

JONAS, Anagrimus, a learned Icelandic, the astronomical coadjutor of Gundeband, bishop of Holum, in Iceland, the pupil of Tycho Brahe. On the death of his friend, he refused to succeed him in his diocess, but remained in the humble but peaceful situation of minister of Melstadt. In his 86th year he took for his second wife, a young girl, and died about nine years after, 1640. His works were Idea Veri Magistratus, 1589, 8vo.—Brevis Commentarius de Islandiæ, 1593, 8vo.—Anatome Bleskeniana, &c. 1612—Epistola pro Patria Defensoria, 1618—Vita Gundebandi, 1630, 4to.—Crymogæa, &c. 1630, 4to.—Specimen Islandiæ, &c. 1634, 4to.

JONAS, Justus, a learned divine, born at Northausen, in Thuringia. He was the friend, and the able defender of Luther and of his doctrines. He was principal of the college of Wittemberg, for some time, and died 1555, aged 62.

JONATHAN, son of Saul, and the faithful friend of David, was slain in battle with his father by the Philistines, B.C. 1055.

JONATHAN, a general of the Jews, son of Matthias, and brother to Judas Maccabeus, after defeating Bacchides, the Syrian chief, and Demetrius Soter, and his general Apollonius, was at last treacherously seized by Tryphon, and cruelly put to death, though a large ransom had been paid for his liberation, B.C. 144.

JONES, Thomas, an eminent divine, was born in Montgomeryshire, in 1756. He was educated at Shrewsbury-school, and next at St. John's college, Cambridge, from which he removed to Trinity college, where he obtained a fellowship, and became a distinguished tutor, especially in mathematics. He died in 1807. The only things he published were, "A Sermon on Duelling;" and "An Address to the Volunteers of Montgomeryshire."—W. B.

JONES, Inigo, a celebrated architect, born 1572, in the vicinity of St. Paul's, London, where his father was a cloth-worker. He was apprenticed to a joiner, and his attention to his business, and his improvement in the art of designing, gradually recommended him, and the earl of Pembroke, sensible of his great natural genius, generously enabled him to travel over Italy, and the best part of Europe. While on his travels he was noticed at Venice by Christian IV. king of Denmark, and he returned to England in the train of that monarch. He soon gained the protection of the English court, he was made architect to the queen, and to prince Henry, but when he succeeded to the reversion of surveyor-general of the king's works, he, with unusual generosity, refused to accept any salary, till the heavy debts contracted under his predecessor had been totally liquidated. In 1620, he was directed by the king, when at lord Pembroke's at Wilton, to examine the group of stones, called Stone Henge, and after deep research, and exact measurement, he concluded, that this venerable pile is nothing but a Roman temple, dedicated to Cælus, and erected between the times of Agricola and Constantine. He was also that same year appointed one of the commissioners for repairing St. Paul's cathedral, and he continued in the same honourable appointments under Charles I. He was also made manager of the masques and interludes in fashion in those times of pomp and pageantry, and it was in this office, that he unfortunately quarrelled with Ben Jonson, who with all the virulence of an enraged poet, ridiculed his friend in the character of Lantern Leather-head, in the comedy of Bartholomew fair, and in other pieces. Notwithstanding these attacks of private malevolence, which were disgusting not only to the friends of both parties, but even to the king, Jones increased in fame, in popularity, and in opulence. The troubles of the nation, however, affected him deeply, he was not only grieved for the misfortunes of a kind master, but his property was plundered on account of his loyalty, and after the king's death, he was obliged to pay 400*l.* as a composition to Cromwell. Worn out with years, and with grief at the public calamities, he died 1652, and was buried in St. Bennet's church, St. Paul's wharf, where the monument erected to his memory, was greatly defaced by the fatal fire of 1666. Though sprung from a low origin, Jones so improved the native powers of his mind, that he became an excellent mathematician, a tolerable scholar in Greek and Latin, a decent poet, and to the highest celebrity in architecture, added an extensive knowledge of all human sciences. Besides the repairing of St. Paul's in a style of commanding grandeur, and national dignity, he displayed his abilities in the design of the palace of Whitehall, in the erection of the banqueting house, of Catherine's chapel in St. James's palace, the church and piazza of Covent-garden, and other private buildings. His "Stone Henge restored," was published 1655, in folio, by Mr. Webb, his friend and heir, and in 1665, appeared "a Vindication" of the work, reprinted in 1725. Several designs of his buildings are preserved in Campbell's Vitruvius Britannicus. The principal part of his designs were published by Kent, 1727, folio, and other inferior designs in 1744. He left in MS. some valuable notes on Palladio's architecture, published 1714, by Leoni.

JONES, William, a learned mathematician, born 1675, in the isle of Anglesey. He taught mathematics in London, and had in the number of his pupils, lords Hardwicke and Macclesfield. By the friendship and influence of lord Hardwicke, he obtained a sinecure of 200*l.* a year, and afterwards succeeded to the more lucrative office of deputy teller in the exchequer. His abilities mean time recommended him to the notice of the learned. He was the friend of Newton, and the correspondent of the greatest mathematicians of Europe. He died in easy circumstances, in 1749, but it is to be lamented, that the work which he had completed with great and intense labour, as an introduction to the mathematical and philosophical compositions of Newton, has been lost. The author had just completed it when attacked by illness, and he had just time before he expired, to send it fairly written, by an amanuensis, to his friend, lord Macclesfield, recommending the publication for the benefit of his family. The work, however, was forgotten, and at lord Maccles-field's death, the manuscript could nowhere be found. The works of Mr. Jones were a compendium of the Art of Navigation, 8vo. 1702—Synopsis Palmariorum Matheseos, 8vo. 1706, several papers in the philosophical transactions, and other works to support the doctrines of his friend Newton, against the attacks of Leibnitz, and other philosophers.

JONES, Sir William, a learned judge, son of the preceding, was born in London, 1748. The early loss of his father was supplied by the attentive care of his mother, a woman of high character for sensibility and understanding, and he was placed at Harrow school, where he acquired such perfect knowledge of classical learning, that Dr. Summer the master, declared that he knew Greek better than himself. He entered at University college, Oxford, in 1764, and devoted himself laboriously to the study of the oriental languages. He became at the age of 19, tutor to lord Althorpe, and though he paid due attention to his pupil, he yet found time to read the best part of the Old Testament in the original, while resident at Wimbledon. He visited the continent in 1769, with his pupil, and in 1770, entered at the temple to study the law. Deservedly distinguished as an able scholar, he now proved to the world, how usefully he had devoted himself to literature, and he published in 1774, his Commentaries on Asiatic Poetry, dedicated to the university of Oxford. His translation of Isæus, with learned notes, appeared in 1779, and the next year he felt for the safety of the empire, and in consequence of the London riots, published an inquiry into the legal mode of suppressing riots. In 1793 his legal knowledge, and his acquaintance with the literature of the East, recommended him to the ministry, as a fit person to preside in the supreme court of Calcutta, and on that occasion, he received the honour of knighthood, and soon after, married Anna Maria Shipley, the bishop of St. Asaph's daughter. He left England in April 1793, and on his arrival in India, he was enabled to establish an Asiatic society, for the purpose of illustrating the history, learning, and antiquities of the east. To the memoirs of this learned body, the formation of which his active mind had planned, in his voyage from Europe, he made most valuable contributions. When disengaged from the occupations of his judicial office, he unbent all the powers of his comprehensive mind, to the literature of the east, and he acquired such an acquaintance with the Sanscrit language, and the code of the Bramins, that he was courted and admired by the most learned and intelligent of the native Indians. To enlarge our knowledge of Asiatic history, and Eastern literature, was not, however, the sole object of his active mind, he was a pious and a sincere Christian, and his researches were equally directed to investigate and to prove from oriental books, and from the various traditions of the heathen natives, the great historical facts, and important details contained in the Holy Scriptures. In one of his discourses to the Asiatic society, he has evinced his attachment to the religion of his country, and his belief in her sacred tenets, by supporting the validity of the Mosaic history of the creation, in a manner more satisfactory and more convincing than any other writer. This great and good man, from whom so much was expected still, in the paths of oriental science and literature, who deserved so well of his country, and of her Asiatic colonies, by his firmness, his legal knowledge, and his unshaken integrity, was snatched away after a short illness at Calcutta, 27th April, 1794, aged 48. His remains were interred in the burial ground at Calcutta, where an English inscription by himself, and a Latin one by his brother judge, Sir William Dunkin, mark the spot. An elegant monument has lately been erected in St. Paul's cathedral, which does no less honour to his merits than to the munificence and liberal sentiments of the East India directors, by whom it was raised. The works of Sir William have been published in 6 vols. 4to. 1799, and proved him not only an elegant scholar, but a good poet, an able critic, and an indefatigable historian, whose name must be revered wherever virtue and literature are cultivated. His life has been written by his friend, lord Teignmouth, 4to. 1804.

JONES, William, an English divine, born at Lowick, Northamptonshire, 1726, and educated at the charter-house and university college, Oxford, where he obtained an exhibition. After entering into orders he took the curacy of Finedon, Northamptonshire, where he wrote his answer to bishop Clayton's Essay on Spirit. In 1754, he married the daughter of the Rev. Brook Bridges, and became curate to his brother-in-law, at Wadenhoe, where he wrote his catholic Doctrine of the Trinity, a work of merit. In 1764, he was presented by Secker to Bethersden vicarage, Kent, and afterwards he went to reside at Nayland, Suffolk, till on the elevation of Dr. Horne, to the see of Norwich, he became domestic chaplain to his old and venerable friend. He afterwards was invited by lord Kenyon to undertake the tuition of his two sons, and in 1798 he was presented by the archbishop to the living of Hollingbourne, in Kent. As a divine, Mr. Jones was a pious and exemplary character. He espoused the tenets of the Hutchinsonian system, as he evinced in his Essay on the first principles of Natural Philosophy, published in 1762, and completed in his Physiological disquisitions, or Discourses on the Natural philosophy of the Elements, 1781. During the French revolution, he ably supported the government of the country, by some reasonable and well written pamphlets, particularly an excellent collection of tracts, called the Scholar Armed, 2 vols. Svo. He also published 2 vols. of sermons in 1790. This worthy man died 6th Jan. 1801. His works have been collected together and published in 12 vols. Svo. with a full account of his life. For some time he held Pluckley rectory, in Kent, which he exchanged for Paston, in Northamptonshire. His memoirs of his pious friend bishop Horne, is an interesting performance, and does honour to his head and heart.

JONES, Henry, a poet, born at Drogheda, in Ireland. He was bred a bricklayer, but nature formed him for a poet, and after he had distinguished himself by his productions, in the midst of his humble mechanical employment; he was introduced to lord Chesterfield, when lord lieutenant, in 1745. That nobleman pleased with his poetical effusions, brought him over to London on his return from Ireland, and by his influence, procured a liberal subscription to the poems of his humble friend. He also recommended him strongly to Colley Cibber, he prevailed upon the managers of Covent garden to introduce his plays on the stage, and nearly secured the reversion of the laurel for his brow; but while the patron was kind and generous, the poet was fickle, violent, prodigal, and capricious. After various vicissitudes of fortune, the consequence of imprudence and folly, he died in great want April 1770, in a garret of the Bedford coffee-house. Though not a poet of superior reputation, he possessed merit. His "Earl of Essex," by no means a contemptible performance, appeared in 1753.

JONES, Jeremiah, a dissenting divine, educated under his uncle, Sam. Jones, of Tewkesbury, who had among his pupils, bishops Butler, Chandler, and Secker. He kept a school at Nailsworth, and presided over a dissenting congregation at Avening, Gloucestershire, and in his manners was an amiable, easy, and affable man. He wrote a Vindication of the former part of St. Matthew's Gospel, against Whiston's charge of dislocations, &c. 1719—a new method of settling the canonical authority of the Old Testament, 3 vols. Svo. 1726, lately reprinted, Oxford. He died 1724, aged 31.

JONES, John Paul, captain in the American navy, was a native of Scotland, and the son of John Paul, a gardener of the earl of Selkirk. He was born in 1747, and educated by the earl in the same manner as his own sons. He commenced a seafaring life at the age of fifteen, and at length became commander of a merchant vessel, and employed himself a number of years in the West India trade. During a voyage to Tobago, his crew mutinied, and in a contest with them he killed their leader, for which on his arrival at Tobago he was tried and acquitted. But on his return to England, being threatened with imprisonment and a new trial, he came to America, and to disguise himself added to his paternal name, that of Jones. The colonies had at that time just commenced the conflict of the revolution, and Jones immediately entered their service as a lieutenant in the navy, and went in the expedition against New-Providence. Soon after he was appointed to command a sloop of twelve guns, with which he captured several vessels. In the beginning of 1778 he sailed from Portsmouth, New-Hampshire, in the Ranger, a privateer of eighteen guns, and cruised some time on the British coast. He soon after challenged the Drake, a British vessel of superior force to his own, lying in the harbour of Waterford, and on meeting captured her, after a desperate conflict. In 1779, he obtained the command of the Bonne Homme Richard of 40 guns, in which he raised a commodore's flag, and with a fleet of five inferior vessels, sailed from L'Orient to cruise on the British coast, and intercept the British Baltic fleet; after having captured a large number of merchant vessels, and made several descents on the coast, he on the 22d of September fell in with that fleet, convoyed by a frigate and sloop of war. By the disobedience of one of his captains he was left to fight the frigate alone, and after a conflict of the most desperate nature, succeeded in making her a prize. His own vessel was totally disabled and soon after sunk. Another of his vessels having captured the sloop also, he sailed with his prizes to the Texel. Not long after he returned to France, and in 1780, obtaining another vessel, sailed for the United States. On passing near Bermuda he fell in with a British frigate of superior force, and putting the captain off his guard by professing himself to be in the British service, attacked him unexpectedly in the night and sunk his vessel. After the peace Jones returned to Europe, and engaged in the service of the empress of Russia, who gave him a commission in the fleet in the Black Sea, where he was instrumental, by the plans he proposed, in capturing the Turkish fleet. He at length returned to France, where he continued till his death, which took place at Paris in 1792. He was buried at the expense of the national convention.

JONES, John, M.D. first professor of surgery in King's college, New-York, was one of the most distinguished physicians in that province. He entered on the duties of his professorship in 1767. He died in 1791. He published several surgical works, which were highly respectable. ¶ L.

JONES, William, governor of Rhode-Island, was born at Newport, and learned the business of a carpenter. On arriving at the age of manhood he engaged in the public service, and had the command of a marine corps on board one of the national frigates. After the war he was a merchant in Providence until his death. He was an exemplary and highly respected citizen, and was several years a representative from Providence, and speaker of the assembly. In 1811 he was elected governor of the state, and continued six years in office. He died April 9th, 1822, aged 67. ¶ L.

JONES, John, a Benedictine monk, born in London, and educated at Merchant-tailors', and St. John's college, Oxford. As he was inclined to the Roman catholic faith, he went to Spain, and took the name of Leander de Santo Martino, with the degree of D.D. He was afterwards made Hebrew and divinity professor, and vicar-general of his order, and died in London, 1636. He wrote Sacra Ars Memoriae ad Scripturas divinas in promptu habendas, &c. accomodata, Svo.—Conciliatio Locorum Communium totius Scripturæ—the Bible, with a glossary, 6 vols. fol. &c.

JONES, David, a native of Caernarvonshire, who died about 1780. He wrote some poetical pieces of merit, and edited two collections of Welch poetry, and made, besides, a collection of ancient Welch MSS.

JONES, John, a Welch antiquary, known for his collecting, and his transcribing of old Welch MSS. on which he bestowed the labour of above 40 years. Fifty large volumes are still preserved, bearing the date of 1590 to 1630.

JONES, Rice, a Welch poet, born in Merionethshire. He published Welch Anthology, 4to. 1770, containing selections from the poets of various ages. He died 1801, aged 86.

JONES, Griffith, an English writer, editor of the London Chronicle, and connected with Johnson in the literary magazine, and with Smollet and Goldsmith in the British magazine. He was a very amiable character, and projected with his brother those various and entertaining books which are now become so fashionable as well as valuable for the improvement of young minds. He died 1786, aged 65.

JONES, John, a dramatic writer in the reign of Charles I. He wrote a play called Adrasta, or the Woman's Spleen.

JONES, John, a medical writer, born, says Dr. Aiken, in Wales. He took his medical degree at Cambridge, and practised with reputation in Bath, Nottinghamshire, and Derbyshire. He wrote the Dial of Agues, 1556—the Benefit of ancient Baths, 1572—a brief discourse of the natural beginning of all growing and living things, &c. 1574—Galen's Elements translated. He died about 1580.

JONES, Sir William, judge of the king's bench, in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. was author of Reports in his court, and in that of common pleas.

JONES, Sir Thomas, a judge of the king's bench, under Charles II. and James II. author of some reports. When James wished to assert the dispensing power, and said he could soon have 12 judges of his opinion; True, answered, Sir Thomas, you may have 12 judges, but not 12 lawyers.

JONES, Richard, a Welchman, the ingenious author of "Gemma Cambrium," in Welch, which contained in clear brevity, all the books and chapters of the Bible, published 1652. He was admitted at Jesus college, Oxford, 1621, and died in Ireland, but when is unknown.

JONGE, Ludolph de, a Dutch painter, who died 1697, aged 78. His portraits were finished in a superior style, and by his genius and industry, he amassed a large fortune.

JONGHE, Baldwin, or Junius, a Franciscan monk, born at Dort, in Holland. He was author of Tuba Concionatorum—Seruum Catholicum fidei, and other works on divinity, and died at Brussels, 1634.

JONIN, Gilbert, a Jesuit, known also as an eminent poet. He died at Tournon, 1638, aged 42. He wrote Greek and Latin odes, elegies, &c. with great elegance. He also translated Anacreon into Latin. His works appeared at Lyons, 6 vols. Svo.

JONSIS, John, a native of Holstein, who distinguished himself as an elegant writer at Frankfort, on the Maine. He died young, 1659. His Latin treatise, De Scriptoribus Historiæ Philosophiæ, edited, Jena, 1716, in 4to. is much admired.

JONSON, Benjamin, a celebrated English poet, born at Westminster, 1574. His father, who was a clergyman, and had severely suffered in the reign of Mary, by imprisonment, and by the loss of his property, died about a month before the birth of the poet. He was placed at Westminster school, where Camden was then master, but the imprudent marriage of his mother with a bricklayer altered his plans of life. He was recalled home to work in his step-father's business, but this so disgusted him that he enlisted for a soldier, and passed with the army into the Netherlands, where he distinguished himself greatly by his personal valour. On his return to England he seemed determined to pursue his studies, and entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, but the narrowness of his circumstances cut short his residence in the university, and destitute of resources, he applied for support to the stage. His first appearance was at the Curtain, one of those mean and obscure theatres which then were built in the skirts of the town, but his efforts were ridiculed, and in the most common characters he was unable to perform with credit. His prospects, however, were soon clouded, he fought a duel with a brother actor, and despatched him, while he himself received a wound in the arm. He, however, escaped punishment, as he was discharged from prison, by some means now unknown, though during his confinement he was prevailed upon by the insinuation of a priest, to become a convert to the church of Rome, in which he continued for 12 years. Soon after this, since he could not shine as an actor, he attempted to write plays, but his efforts at first were unsuccessful, till Shakspeare, who, like himself, had felt the severities of fortune, extended his friendship to him, and not only interested himself in his behalf, but supported his claims to public applause by acting himself in some of his characters. His first play printed was, Every Man in his Humour, a comedy, which was generally followed by another every year; but when his enemies ridiculed the tardy efforts of his muse, he produced his "Volpone," in five weeks. By joining with Chapman and Marston in writing "Eastward-hoe," a comedy, he was accused of reflecting on the Scotch nation, and with his two poetical companions was thrown into prison, but upon making due submission they escaped the loss of their ears and noses, and obtained a pardon. As the exhibition of masques was then very popular, the genius and abilities of Jonson were employed for the diversion of the court; he composed in 1603 part of the device, which was to entertain James as he passed from the tower to Westminster abbey, on his coronation, and continued during that reign and the beginning of the next, to preside over all the amusements and the pageantry of the royal household. Thus favoured by the court, Jonson became a popular character, and by his merit deserved and obtained the friendship of men of taste and literature, of Shakspeare, Beaumont, Fletcher, Donne, Camden, Selden, Corbet, and others. He visited France in 1613, and in 1619 was honourably presented with the degree of M.D. by the university of Oxford. That year he succeeded on the death of Daniel to the place of poet laureate, of which the king two years before had granted him the reversion, and on his petition his salary of 100 marks was in 1630 augmented to as many pounds. About this time he visited his friend and correspondent Drummond, of Hawthornden in Scotland, and celebrated his adventures in a poem, which was afterwards unfortunately burnt. Yet though liberally patronised by the king, and handsomely rewarded for his plays and masques, Jonson through carelessness or extravagance was poor. From the solitude of an obscure lodging he solicited and obtained the king's favour, but the gratuity of 100*l.* from his royal patron averted but for a while the increasing horrors of indigence. He died of the palsy 6th Aug. 1637, in his 63d year, and was buried in Westminster abbey. Over his grave, on a rough pavement stone, the gift of Jack Young of Great Milton, Oxfordshire, are inscribed these quaint, but expressive words, "O rare Ben Jonson." The literary fame of Jonson drew against him a crowd of mean and obscure poetasters, who expected gain and reputation by attacking his superior merit; but his funeral obsequies were sung by "the friends of the muses," by lord Falkland, lord Buckhurst, Beaumont, Hawkins, Waller, Cartwright, Mayne, Waryng, and others. His works were edited in 1716, in 6 vols. 8vo. and more completely in 7 vols. 8vo. with notes by Mr. Whalley, 1756. Jonson was married, and had some children, but none survived him.

JONSTON, John, a Polish naturalist, born at Sambter, 1603. He travelled over Europe, and died on his estate at Lignitz, Silesia, 1675. He published a natural History of Birds, Fishes, Quadrupeds, Insects, Serpents, and Dragons, folio, 1653—a treatise on Hebrew and Greek Festivals, 1660—Thaumatrography, 1661, &c.

JORAM, king of Israel after his brother Ahaziah, B.C. 896. He was delivered from the power of Benhadad the Syrian, who besieged his city, but though he acknowledged the interference of God, and the prophetic fame of Elisha, he became an idolater. He was afterwards defeated by Hazael, king of Syria, and slain by his servant Jehu, as he fled from the battle, B.C. 884.

JORAM, king of Judah after his father Jehoshaphat, 889. B.C. was drawn into idolatry by the arts of Ahab, his father-in-law, whose daughter Athaliah he had married. He was engaged in war with the Edomites, who rebelled against him, and with the Philistines, who defeated him. He died 885. B.C.

JORDAN, Sir Joseph, an English admiral, to whose extraordinary valour his country was indebted for the naval victory of Solebay over the Dutch, 1672. The time of his death is unknown.

JORDAN, Charles Stephen, a Prussian writer, vice-president of the academy of sciences at Berlin. He died at Berlin, his native city, 1746, aged 46, and the king, Frederick the Great, not only erected a monument to him with this inscription, "here lies Jordan, the friend of the muses and of the king," but wrote a eulogy in his praise. Jordan wrote Literary Travels in France, England, and Holland, with Satirical Anecdotes, 8vo.—a Miscellany of Literature, Philosophy, History, &c.—the life of De la Croze; works which some critics do not esteem so highly as his royal friend did.

JORDAN, Thomas, a dramatic author in the reign of Charles I. Two of his comedies and a masque are mentioned with commendation by Langbaine and others.

JORDAN, John Christopher, privy counsellor to the king of Bohemia, was eminent as an antiquary. His notes on the Chronology of Dionysius Hal. Polybius, Diodorus Sic. and Livy are excellent. He died about 1740.

JORDANO, Luca, a celebrated painter, born at Naples, 1632. He early studied under his neighbour Joseph Ribera, and displayed such abilities that at the age of seven his pieces were highly respectable. He visited Rome and the other cities of Italy, where he studied and copied the works of the greatest masters, but especially those of Pietro da Cortona, Paul Veronese, L. da Vinci, M. Angelo, and A. del Sarto. He improved upon the beauties of other masters with such effect that he was called by Bellori the ingenious bee who extracted his honey from the flowers of the best artists. His reputation gradually spread not only over Italy but the rest of Europe, and Charles II. of Spain was so pleased with his productions, that he invited him in 1692 to adorn the Escorial and the churches and palaces of some of the Spanish cities. Jordano, by the excellence and the variety of his pieces, which exceeded in number those of every other painter, even Tintoret, acquired great opulence. He died at Naples, 1705, and a monument was erected to him in St. Bridget church before the chapel of St. Nicolas de Bari, which had been beautifully adorned by his pencil. In his private character he was very amiable, he was benevolent in his conduct, friendly to his pupils, and to great affability united a remarkable flow of wit and humour.

JORDANS, James, a painter, born at Antwerp, 1594. He was instructed in his art by Adam Van Oort and Rubens, and to the excellence of the best masters added a deep and correct study of nature. His early marriage with the daughter of Oort, his master, prevented his visiting Italy; but application and genius supplied every deficiency. In his pieces he displayed great judgment and correctness: his manner was bold, yet graceful; striking, yet natural. His works adorned the public buildings of some of the cities of Flanders, and he also laboured for the kings of Sweden and Denmark. He was a pleasant and agreeable companion, easy in his manners, and lively in his conversation. He died at Antwerp, 1678, aged 84.

JORDEN, Edward, an English physician.

born 1569, at High Halden, Kent, and educated at Hart hall, Oxford. He studied in foreign universities, and took his doctor's degree at Padua. On his return he practised in London, and was member of the college of physicians, but his attempts to manufacture allum proved injurious to his fortune. The latter part of his life was spent at Bath, where he died of the gout and stone, Jan. 1632. He wrote a discourse on the Disease called the Suffocation of the Mother, 4to.—Discourse on Natural Baths and Mineral Waters, 4to. 1631, reprinted by Guidott, with a treatise on the Bath waters, &c. 1649.

JORNANDES, author of a book de Rebus Gothicis, et de Origine Mundi, et de Rerum and Temporum Successione, 1617, 8vo. was a Goth in the reign of Justinian.

JORTIN, John, an English divine, born in London, 23d Oct. 1698. His father was of French origin, and came to England when toleration was not allowed to the protestants of France. Young Jortin was educated at the Charter-house, and in 1715 he entered at Jesus college, Cambridge. He was engaged two years after at the recommendation of his tutor, Dr. Thirlby, in making extracts from Eustathius for Pope's Homer, but though his services were approved, he never was introduced to the poet. In 1722 he published "Lusus Poetici," some Latin poems which were well received by his friends, and in 1726-7 as being fellow of his society he was presented to the college living of Swavesey, near Cambridge, which he resigned in 1728 upon marrying, and came to settle in London, where he resided for 25 years. He at first officiated at a chapel in Bloomsbury, and in 1737 obtained the living of Eastwell, Kent, which he soon resigned on account of the insalubrious air of the place. In 1746 he was made afternoon preacher to Oxendon chapel, and the next year he became assistant to Dr. Warburton at Lincolns'-Inn. In 1749 he was appointed to preach Boyle's lectures, and in 1751 he was made rector of St. Dunstan in the East by Herring the primate, who four years after conferred on him the degree of D.D. In 1762 he became chaplain to Osbaldiston, bishop of London, who gave him a prebend in St. Paul's, the living of Kensington, and in 1764 the arch-deaconry of London. He died after a short illness, Sept. 5, 1770, and was buried in Kensington new churchyard, leaving a widow and a son and a daughter. Dr. Jortin, respectable as a divine and as a man, was deservedly esteemed as a polite scholar and an able orator. His publications were numerous and highly valuable. He published in 1730 four sermons on the Truth of the Christian Religion, afterwards incorporated in his Discourses on the Truth of the Christian Religion, 8vo. 1746—Miscel- laneous Observations upon Authors, Ancient and modern, 2 vols. 8vo.—Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, 8vo. 1751, continued in four succeeding volumes down to 1517—the era of the reformation—Six Dissertations on Different Subjects, 8vo. 1755—Life of Erasmus, 4to. 1758—Remarks on the works of Erasmus, 4to. 1760, besides other inferior works. In 1771 four vols. of his sermons were published by his son, and inscribed to his parishioners of St. Dunstan's, republished with three volumes more, 1772, &c.

JOSEPH, son of Jacob by Rachel, was the favourite of his father, and consequently was exposed to the envy and hatred of his brothers, who at last sold him as a slave to some Midianitish merchants, by whom he was carried into Egypt. In Egypt, by his prudence and virtue, and under the protecting hand of providence, he rose to become the governor of the country, and he saw, during the famine which prevailed in the land and in Canaan, his brothers prostrate themselves before him according to the fulfilling of his dreams. He afterwards sent for his father and his family to settle in the land of Goshen, and after governing the nation with wisdom and success he died about 1636 B.C. His bones were brought out of Egypt by Moses, and buried in Canaan. Joseph had two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, who became heads of two tribes in Israel.

JOSEPH, husband of Mary, the mother of Jesus Christ, was of the tribe of Judah, and of the lineage of David. He was son of Jacob according to St. Matthew, or according to St. Luke of Heli, a difference which is explained by recollecting that Heli and Jacob were brothers, and that after the death of Heli, Jacob married agreeable to the law of Moses, his brother's widow, and became father of Joseph.

JOSEPH, of Arimathea, a man of opulence, and a counsellor, who became privately a disciple of our Saviour. After the crucifixion he buried the body of his master in a new tomb, and then joined himself to the apostles. He died at Jerusalem.

JOSEPH I. 15th emperor of the house of Austria, was born at Vienna, 28th July, 1678. He was crowned king of Hungary 1687, elected king of the Romans 1690, and in 1705 on the death of his father Leopold he succeeded to the empire of Germany. Pursuing the same political measures as his father, he engaged England, Savoy, and Holland in his war against France, to raise the archduke Charles to the throne of Spain, and then exerting his power as head of the Germanic empire he deprived the electors of Bavaria and of Cologne of their dominions for assisting his enemies, and in the most despotic manner he divided their possessions among his friends and relations.

Thus absolute in Germany, he turned his arms against Italy, and not only Mantua, Parma, Modena, Lucca, and Genoa, but even Etruria, Sicily, and Naples became obedient to his dictates. From Italy he marched against the Hungarian insurgents, headed by the brave prince Ragotzki, whom he defeated and obliged to fly into Turkey. His successes were stopped by the attack of the smallpox, which proved fatal 17th April, 1711, in his 33d year.

JOSEPH II. emperor of Germany, son of Leopold and Maria Theresa, was born 13th March, 1741, elected king of the Romans 1764, and crowned emperor the following year on the decease of his father. He was in his conduct actuated by the most benevolent motives to improve the prosperity of his country; and to be acquainted with the wants and situation of his subjects he travelled over the greatest part of his dominions. In Croatia he facilitated the commercial intercourse of his Hungarian subjects by the forming of a high road between Zing and Carlstadt; at Venice he settled in an amicable manner the boundaries of his kingdom and those of the republic, and in Bohemia he administered to the wants of his people and checked the ravages of the famine which the troubles of Poland had caused. He afterwards had two interviews with the king of Prussia, whose great military character he highly admired, but unfortunately these visits ended in a mutual plan for the violent seizure of part of the Polish provinces. In 1781 he passed into France, but he disregarded the pompous ceremonies with which the court wished to receive him, and found greater pleasure and more sincere satisfaction in examining the curiosities of Paris, the manufactures of Lyons, and the canals of Picardy. Anxious to listen to the complaints of the unfortunate, he often disguised himself to converse with obscure individuals and to relieve their distresses; and that every opportunity might be indulged of displaying his humanity he appointed one day in the week in which he would receive petitions even from the meanest beggar. In 1780 he succeeded by the death of the empress queen to the crowns of Hungary and Bohemia, and soon after published decrees in favour of the liberty of the press and of toleration. The respect and attachment to his person which the Flemings had displayed was repaid by his improvements in the harbour of Ostend at his own expense, and by his declaring the place a free port. His attempts, however, to render the navigation of the Scheldt free, though favoured by Lewis XVI. met with opposition from the Hollanders, who viewed with jealousy the rise of a rival in the commerce of Antwerp. With his usual humanity Joseph saw and pitied the state of the peasants through his states, and therefore slavery was abolished in Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia; and with equal boldness in favour of spiritual freedom, he published an edict to disclaim the secular submission of his subjects to the see of Rome, and to suppress some of the monasteries. This severe attack excited the alarm of the pope; but the journey of Pius VI. to Vienna could not reconcile the emperor, or abolish his decree, and soon after, in 1786, the ecclesiastical princes at Ratisbon determined to withdraw from the temporal jurisdiction of Rome. His visit to the empress of Russia at Cherson, in the meantime, did not only tend to ensure the partition of Poland, but aimed at the expulsion of the Turks from Europe. But though a humane prince, Joseph was not a warrior; he indeed reduced Schabatz in person, but his troops were defeated under prince Lichtenstein, and the dreadful battle of Rohadin, which lasted four days, proved fatal to his views, and the siege of Belgrade was abandoned. Laudohn indeed by his valour and great experience restored confidence among the imperialists, and by the taking of Darbicza, Novi, and Belgrade, contributed to the glory of his master's arms, which ill success hitherto had tarnished. The war, however, was unpopular, and a peace hastily concluded left the emperor the opportunity of attending to the discontents and tumults which had now been excited in the Netherlands. Before these could be checked, Joseph fell a sacrifice to a lingering disease, and died 20th February, 1790. He was succeeded by his brother Leopold. Though admired for his benevolence, Joseph has been blamed by some historians for his fondness of innovation, and for the formation of plans which he had not the wisdom to complete, or the firmness to execute.

JOSEPH, king of Portugal, of the family of Braganza, ascended the throne 1750, and died 24th Feb. 1777, aged 62 years and eight months. His reign was turbulent and unfortunate. Lisbon was swallowed in 1755 by an earthquake, and in 1758 a violent conspiracy was formed against the monarch whose life was saved by the personal courage of his coachman, and in consequence of this the Jesuits, who had meditated the assassination, were expelled from the kingdom, and their property confiscated. Afterwards the king quarrelled with the court of Rome, and in 1761 a war was kindled against Spain, in which he was assisted by the English. In the latter part of his reign he resigned the reins of government into the hands of his queen, Mary Ann of Spain.

JOSEPH MEIR, a learned rabbi, born at Avignon, 1496. He died near Genoa, 1554. He wrote a Hebrew book on the annals of the kings of France and the Ottoman sultans, &c.

JOSEPH, Ben Gorion, a Jewish historian, who abridged the history of Josephus, with whom he is often confounded by the rabbins. He flourished in the tenth century. His works appeared with a Latin version by Gagnier, Oxford, 1706, 8vo.—and in Hebrew and Latin, Gotha, 1707, 4to.

JOSEPH, of Paris, a capuchin, the friend and confidant of Richelieu. His services were such in the employment of emissaries that Lewis XIII. procured him a cardinal's hat, which he did not live to receive. He died of an apoplexy at Ruel, 1638. His life has been frequently written and contains curious particulars.

JOSEPH, Father, an apostate monk, who under the assumed name of Joshua and at the head of 6000 banditti attempted in 1678 to extirpate the catholic religion in Hungary. After committing the greatest enormities his followers were dispersed upon the sudden death of their leader.

JOSEPHUS, Flavius, a celebrated Jewish historian, who studied at Rome, and afterwards bravely defended a small town of Judæa against Vespasian for seven weeks. He was taken into the favour of the emperor, and was with him at the siege of Jerusalem, where he alleviated the misfortunes of his country, and obtained all the sacred books in the booty. He wrote the History of the Wars of the Jews in Greek—the Antiquities of the Jews—a Defence of the Jews—books of very great merit and best edited by Havercamp, Amsterdam, 2 vols. fol. 1725. He died A.D. 93, aged 56.

JOSHUA, son of Nun, and of the tribe of Benjamin, was appointed by Moses as his successor to conduct the people of Israel into the possession of the land of Canaan. He died B.C. 1424, aged 110.

JOSIAH, king of Judah after his father Ammon, 641 B.C. is celebrated for the zeal with which he restored the law of Moses, and destroyed idolatry. He died B.C. 610, aged 39, in consequence of the wounds which he received in a battle at Megiddo against Necho king of Egypt.

JOUBERT, Laurence, a physician, born at Valence in Dauphny 1530. He studied at Paris and at Rome, and afterwards settled at Montpellier, where he became, after Rondelet's death, Regius professor 1567. His reputation was so great that nothing was considered as too difficult for his art, so that Henry III. sent for him to consult him how he might render his marriage prolific, which, however, was unavailing. He died 1582. His writings are in French, and in Latin, and all on his profession; the best edition of which is 1645, 2 vols. folio.

JOUBERT, Francis, a priest of Montpellier, who was confined in the bastille for his attachment to the doctrines of the Jansenists. He died 1763, aged 74. He is author of a commentary on Revelation, and other works.

JOUBERT, Bartholomew Catharine, a native of Pont-de-Vaux, in the department of Ain, born 14th April, 1769, and bred up to the law. The revolution altered his pursuits, and panting for military glory, he entered into the army, and from a grenadier rose to the rank of general. He was second in command under Buonaparte in the conquest of Italy, and signalized himself at the battles of Millesimo, Ceva, Montebaldo, Rivoli, and in the Tyrol. His valour and presence of mind were such that Buonaparte going into Egypt emphatically told the directory, I leave you Joubert. He was afterwards opposed to the Russians under Suwarrow, at the battle of Novi, but was killed at the beginning of the engagement, 1799, leaving behind him the character not only of a great general, but of an amiable man.

JOURDAIN, Amable Brechillet, an oriental scholar, was born in 1788. He was placed with a notary, but being related to Anquetil Duperron, he quitted the law to study the eastern languages, in which he made such a progress that Langles obtained for him the place of assistant secretary in that department. He died in 1818. He enriched the Moniteur with curious dissertations, assisted Michaud in the "History of the Crusades," and obtained a prize from the academy of belles lettres for a dissertation on those works of Aristotle and the other Greek philosophers, for which we are indebted to the Arabs. At the time of his death he was engaged on a history of the rise and fall of the Barmecides.—W. B.

JOVIANUS, Flavius Claudius, a native of Pannonia, made emperor after Julian's death, an honour which he accepted upon the promise of the army to become Christians. He made a dishonourable peace with the Persians, and was accidentally suffocated by charcoal, which had been placed in his room, seven months after his elevation to the throne, 364 A.D.

JOVINIAN, a monk of Milan, who became the head of a sect, who maintained that our Saviour's body was not real flesh, but a phantom. He enlarged the number of his followers by offering violence to women, and by permitting the indulgence of every sensuality, till at last Honorius ordered him to be whipped and sent into banishment. He died in Dalmatia, in consequence of his debaucheries, 406 A.D. His works were attacked by Jerome.

Jovius, Paul, an eminent historian, born at Como, in Italy, 1483. After studying in his native place he went to Rome for the advantages of the Vatican library in his literary pursuits, and here he wrote his first piece, "de Piscibus Romanis," which he dedicated to cardinal de Bourbon. He also attached himself by the meanest flattery to Francis I. king of France, who granted him a pension, which however was discontinued in the reign of the next monarch, through the influence of Montmorency, constable of the kingdom, whom Jovius had offended. The favourable manner in which he had spoken of the house of Medici in his historical compositions, induced him to hope he might obtain a bishopric from Clement VII.: he made the request, and gained the see of Nocera, but under the next pontiff he attempted in vain to obtain the vacant bishopric of his native place, and upon the refusal he retired in discontent to Florence, where he employed himself in the completion of his history. He died 1552, and was buried in St. Laurence's church at Florence. His history, containing the events of his own times from 1494 to 1544, was printed 3 vols. folio, Florence, 1552, and at Strasburg, 1556; but though valuable and interesting, it is to be read with great caution. To great learning Jovius united wit and liveliness, his style was elegant and polished, and his judgment solid. In his private character he was dissolute and licentious, and to a reprehensible degree credulous. There was another Paul Jovius, who from a physician became bishop of Nocera, 1585, and distinguished himself as a poet, and a man of letters.

Jovius, Benedictus, brother to the historian, was known as a poet and historical writer.

JOUSSE, Daniel, a lawyer, born at Orleans. He died 1781, aged 77. He wrote some valuable works on his profession.

JOUVENCY, Joseph, a French Jesuit, professor of belles lettres at Caen and afterwards at Paris. He died at Rome, 1719, aged 76. He defended in his writings the Jesuit Guignard, whose works had inflamed Castal to attempt the life of Henry IV. and did not scruple to compare this assassin to our Saviour, and the judge who condemned him to Pontius Pilate. He continued the History of the Jesuits from the year 1591 to 1616, but the work was condemned by the parliament of Paris, 1713. He wrote besides "Latin Orations," an Appendix De Diis et Heroibus Poeticis, and valuable notes on Persius, Juvenal, Ovid, Martial, &c.

JOUVENET, John, a French painter, born at Rouen, 1641. His family, who were distinguished as painters, were of Italian origin. After studying under his father, he went to Paris, and improved himself under Le Brun, and gained the approbation of the academy of painting by presenting them his Esther fainting before Ahasuerus. After passing through all the offices of the academy he was made one of the four perpetual rectors on the death of Mignard. His paintings are numerous and very valuable, especially his sacred pieces. In his old age he was struck with the palsy in his right side, and then began to use his left hand, with astonishing dexterity and success in the completion of some of his pieces. He died at Paris, 1717, leaving no children but a nephew, of great merit in his profession.

JOYEUSE, Anne de, a duke and admiral of France, the favourite of Henry III. He was mild in private life, but as a commander extremely severe. He was killed in an expedition against the Huguenots, 1587.

JOYEUSE, Francis de, brother to the above, was a cardinal, and the able and political confidential minister of Henry III. and IV. and Lewis XIII. He founded some public edifices, and died dean of the college of cardinals at Avignon, 1615.

JOYNER, William, or Lyde, an English writer, born in St. Giles's parish, Oxford, April, 1622. He was educated in the schools of Thame and Coventry, and then entered as demy at Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. At the time of the rebellion he embraced the popish religion and went abroad, and afterwards returned to London. In 1678 he came to live at Horspath, near Oxford, but was arrested by the vice-chancellor as a Jesuit; but upon his appearance at the sessions he was discharged, and then retired to the obscurity of the village of Ickford, in Buckinghamshire. On James's accession he was restored to his fellowship, but was expelled the year after, and died at Ickford, 14th Sept. 1706. He wrote the Roman empress, a comedy, 1670, 4to.—Observations on Cardinal Pole's life, 1686, 8vo.—Latin and English poems.

JUAN, George, a Spaniard, knight of Malta, and known as an able mathematician. He went with Don Anthony de Ulloa, and the French mathematicians to Peru, to ascertain the figure of the earth. He published on his return Observations on the Voyage, in Spanish, translated with the remarks of Ulloa into French, and published 2 vols. 4to. Amsterdam. He wrote besides a treatise on the Construction and Management of Vessels. He died at Madrid, 1773.

JUBA, king of Mauritania, was driven from his kingdom by Cæsar for espousing the cause of Pompey. He destroyed himself B.C. 42.

JUBA, son of the preceding, was carried prisoner to Rome by Cæsar, but under Augustus he recovered his dominions, and married Cleopatra, Antony's daughter. He wrote the History of Arabia—the History of Rome—and other works in Greek, &c.

JUDA, Leo, son of a priest of Alsace, by a concubine, was well skilled in Hebrew, and died minister of Zurich, 1542, aged 60. Besides a translation of the Bible from the original, he wrote against Erasmus, who had reflected on him for changing his religion.

JUDA, Hakkadish, a learned rabbi, the friend of Antoninus. He collected, twenty-six years after the destruction of the Temple, "the Misna," or Constitutions and Traditions of the Jewish Magistrates, &c. This book is the text of the Talmud, which has been well edited by Surenhusius, 3 vols. folio.

JUDA-CHING, a rabbi of Fez, in the 11th century, called the prince of Jewish grammarians, author of an Arabic dictionary and other works.

JUDAH, fourth son of Jacob and Leah, was the head of a tribe, and to him his father in the spirit of prophecy declared, that the sceptre should not depart from him till the Messiah should come, which was fully accomplished. He died 1636 B.C. aged 119 years.

JUDAS ISCARIOT, so called from the place of his birth in the land of Ephraim, was the disciple and the betrayer of Jesus. When he found that his master was condemned, he threw back the 30 pieces of silver for which he had betrayed the innocent blood, and went and hanged himself.

JUDE, St. an apostle, and the author of an epistle, was brother of James the less, and he is called sometimes Thaddeus, Leb-beus, or the zealous. He preached the gospel in Libya, Mesopotama, Syria, Idu-meia, and Arabia, and suffered martyrdom at Berytus as it is supposed A. D. 80.

JUDEX, Matthew, a learned German, born at Tiposwald in Misnia, 1528. He studied at Dresden, Wittemberg, and Magdeburg, and afterwards became divinity professor at Jena, a place from which he was soon driven. His learning was great, and his private character highly respectable, yet he unfortunately had many enemies, and the persecution to which he was exposed shortened, it is said, his life. He died 1564, aged 36, leaving five children by his wife, whom he had ten years before married at Magdeburg. He was concerned in the composition of the two first Centuries of Magdeburg, and he had proposed to write an ecclesiastical history.

JUGLARIS, Aloysius, an Italian Jesuit, born at Nice. He taught rhetoric in his society, and was then preceptor to prince Charles Emanuel at the court of Savoy, and died at Messina, 15th Nov. 1653. He wrote 100 panegyrics on Jesus Christ, 40 in honour of Lewis XIII. some on several learned bishops, besides epitaphs, &c. His works were together published at Lucca, 1710.

JUGURTHA, natural son of Manastabal, and grandson of Masinissa king of Numidia, served with credit in the Roman armies in Spain, and afterwards instead of dividing the kingdom with Adherbal and Hiempsal, the two sons of his uncle Micipsa, he destroyed them and seized upon the whole sovereignty. The Romans interfered, but Jugurtha possessed courage, and opposed their armies. After various successes he was defeated by Metellus, and by Marius, and at last betrayed into the hands of the Romans by Bocchus. He died at Rome, 106 B.C. six days after his arrival.

JUIGNE BROISSINIERE, D. Seigneur de Moliere, author of Dictionnaire Theologique, Historique, Poetique, Cosmographique et Chronologique, Paris, 4to. 1644, and Rouen 1668, was an advocate of the French parliaments. His work is considered as incorrect by Moreri.

JULIA, a virgin and martyr of Carthage. When her country was ravaged by Genseric she was sold to a pagan, and put to death for refusing to join in a heathen sacrifice 440.

JULIA, daughter of Cæsar and Cornelia, was a Roman lady of great virtue. After the death of Cor. Cæpio, her husband, she married Pompey, and died in childbed, 53 B.C.

JULIA, daughter of Augustus, was the wife of Metellus, afterwards of Agrippa, and lastly of Tiberius. She disgraced herself by her debaucheries, for which she was banished, and died of want in the beginning of the reign of Tiberius. Her daughter, of the same name, was equally licentious.

JULIA, daughter of Titus, committed incest with her brother Domitian.

JULIA DOMNA, the wife of the emperor Severus, was well skilled in philosophy, and the sciences. Her son, Caracalla, killed his brother Geta in her arms. It is said, that she starved herself to death because Macrinus was elected emperor in her son Caracalla's room.

JULIAN, emperor of Rome, was son of Jul. Constantius, the brother of the great Constantine. Under Constantius, the son of Constantine, he displayed great bravery, and was proclaimed emperor by his soldiers, and became sole sovereign soon after by the death of Constantius. On his elevation to the throne, he declared himself a pagan, regardless of the Christian tenets which he had embraced; and on that account, he received the name of apostate. He was mortally wounded in a battle against Sapor, king of Persia, whose dominions he had invaded, and died soon after, A.D. 363, aged 32. In his private character he was respectable, and he possessed a great share of learning. The best of his works is his History of the Cæsars. His works were edited by Spanheim, Leipsic, 1696, folio.

JULIAN, St. archbishop of Toledo, author of a treatise against the Jews,—Historia Wamba,—and other works in divinity, died 690.

JULIANA, a singular character of Norwich, who in her zeal for mortification confined herself for several years between four walls. She wrote, "sixteen Revelations of Divine Love showed to a devout Servant of our Lord, called Mother Juliana, an Anchoret of Norwich, who lived in the days of king Edward III." published by F. R. S. Cressy, 1610.

JULIEN, Peter, a French sculptor, was born at Paulien in 1731. After gaining a prize at the academy of Lyons, he settled in Paris, where he studied under William Coustou, and obtained another prize for a bas relief, representing Sabinus offering his chariot to the vestals. In 1768 he went to Rome, where he executed several fine works. On his return to France he became assistant to Coustou, and, in 1779, gained a place in the academy, by his "Dying Gladiator." He died in 1804.—W. B.

JULIO, Romano, an Italian painter, the disciple and favourite of Raphael. He distinguished himself not only by his pencil, but also by his knowledge of architecture. He built a palace for his patron, Clement VII. and adorned the churches and public buildings of Rome, with his highly finished paintings. He afterwards went to Mantua, which his genius was employed to improve and to beautify. He died at Mantua, 1546, leaving two children behind him. De Piles, who has given a judicious critique of his works, says, that his genius took wing all at once, or like a torrent, broke over its banks. His compositions, therefore, were all expressive of beauty, fire, and dignity; sublime in the conception, grand and correct in the execution.

JULIUS I. pope and saint, succeeded Mark, 337, and died 352. He possessed learning, piety, and benevolence. He ably supported Athanasius against the Arians, and wrote various things. Some of his letters are still extant.

JULIUS II. Julian de le Rovere, born at Albizala, near Savona, was successively bishop of Carpentras, Albano, Ostia, Bologna, and Avignon, and was raised to the purple in 1471, by his uncle, Sixtus IV. and made commander-in-chief of the papal troops against the revolted Umbrians. On the death of Alexander VI. he had the art and influence to prevent the election of cardinal d' Amboise, and to place Pius III. in the vacant chair, which he himself was called to fill 22 days after, 1st Nov. 1503, by the sudden death of the new pontiff. Thus raised by bribery to the height of his ambition, he, after laying the foundation of St. Peter's church, 1506, meditated the temporal aggrandizement of his court. He wished to recover from the Venetians, Faenza and Rimini, and the other conquests made by Alexander VI. which, after his death, they had recovered; and by signing the league of Cambray with the emperor, and the kings of France and Arragon, and by laying the whole Venetian states under an interdict, he triumphed over his enemies. Thus victorious against the Venetians, he now intrigued against the French, whom he regarded with envy, for having opposed his elevation to the pontificate; and his artful insinuations procured for him the support of the Swiss republic, and of the kings of England and Arragon. At the head of his troops, Julius marched to meet the enemy, he besieged Mirandola, and soon entered its gates as a conqueror; but fortune soon changed, and Trivulce, the French general, seized Bologna, and made the papal troops and their allies of Venice, fly before him. Julius retired in disgrace to Rome, and soon saw the general council of Pisa pronounce his suspension for contumacy, a step which he opposed by laying the French kingdom under an interdict. The violence of his enemies, however, and the chagrin which corroded him from pique and disappointment, proved too powerful for his constitution. He was carried off by a fever, 21st Feb. 1513, aged 70. Great as a statesman and as a warrior, Julius had little claim to the meekness, benevolence, and humility, which should belong to the ecclesiastical character. To the aggrandizement of his temporal power, he scrupled not to sacrifice every principle of honour and of virtue. He was, however, a liberal patron of literature and of the arts. He was the first who introduced the custom of wearing the beard long, which was soon after imitated by Charles V. Francis I. and their courtiers.

JULIUS III. John Marie du Mont, a native of Arezzo, made archbishop of Sipontum, a cardinal, and in 1550, pope. He joined the emperor against Octavius Farnese, duke of Parma; but the expedition was attended with disgrace. He is blamed for dissolving the council of Trent, where he had presided in the name of Paul III. and for the treaty of Passau. He was a weak and narrow-minded pontiff, little calculated to uphold, with dignity, the power of the holy see. He died 23d March, 1556, aged 68.

JUNCKER, Christian, an able medallist, born at Dresden. He died 1714, aged 46. He translated some of the classics into German; but his works were often hurried on account of his pressing wants. Among his respectable publications are, Centuria Fæminarum eruditone et Scriptis Illustrium—Schediasma de Diariis Eruditorum—Vita Lutheri, &c.—Theatrum Latinitatis, &c.—Vita Ludolphi, &c.

JUNCTIN, or GUINTINO, Francis, a native of Florence, who though a Carmelite, quitted the catholic religion for the protestant when settled in France. He amassed a large fortune by being a corrector of the press, a manufacturer of paper, and a banker; and died 1580. He possessed merit as a mathematician, and published arithmetical works,—Commentaries on Sacrobosco's Sphere—a Discourse on the Age of the Love of Petrarch—a treatise on the reformation of the Calendar, &c.

JUNGERMAN, Godfrey, professor of law at Leipsic, died at Henau, 1610. He is known as the editor of Julius Pollux, and the translator of Longus.

JUNGERMAN, Lewis, brother to the preceding, distinguished himself by his works on botany, and natural history. He died at Altorf, 1653.

JUNGIUS, Joachim, a native of Lubeck, who studied at Glossen, where he became professor of mathematics. He afterwards applied to physic at Augsburg, and took his degree of M.D. at Padua. He died at Hamburg, 1657, aged 98. He wrote some Latin tragedies, besides treatises on metaphysics, &c.

JUNILIUS, a bishop of Asturia, in the sixth century, author of two books on the divine laws, &c.

JUNIUS, Adrian, a learned Dutchman, born 1511, at Hoorn, where his father was burgomaster. After studying at Haerlem and Louvaine, he went to Paris, and then to Bologna, where he applied himself to medical pursuits. He came to England about 1543, and was physician to the duke of Norfolk. He published, among other works, a Greek and Latin Lexicon, which he dedicated, 1548, to king Edward, for which he was severely censured by the pope, who had not acknowledged the accession of the young monarch. He afterwards returned to Holland; but on the accession of Mary, he again settled in England, and made himself known to the new queen by his epithalamium on her marriage with Philip of Spain. The difficulties of the times drove him again to the continent, and some years after he was invited to become physician to the king of Denmark; but as the air and climate proved insalubrious to his constitution, he declined the honourable appointment, and settled at Haerlem, as principal of the college there. The siege of this city by the Spaniards, 1573, and the loss of his library on that melancholy occasion, affected him greatly, so that his disorders increased, and he died at Middleburg, 1575. His works, which are numerous, prove him to have been an able scholar.

JUNIUS, or DU JON, Francis, professor of divinity at Leyden, was born at Bourges, 1545. He studied at Geneva, and afterwards taught a school there for his support; but at the age of 20 he was made minister of the Walloon church at Antwerp. The violent contests between the papists and protestants, however, proved disagreeable to him; he left Antwerp, and afterwards became chaplain to the prince of Orange, and attended him in various expeditions. Afterwards he read public lectures at Neustadt, and Heidelberg, and then visited France, and was kindly received by Henry IV. after which he settled at Leyden, 1592, and was cut off by the plague ten years after. He was four times married. His publications were 64 in number, the best known of which is his Latin version of the Hebrew Bible, in which he was assisted by Tremellius. He has been commended by Bayle and Scaliger, though Du Pin says he was no great divine.

JUNIUS, Francis, son of the preceding, was born at Heidelberg, 1539. He was first educated at Leyden, but at his father's death, he studied mathematics to follow a military life. The conclusion of the war, however, altered his plans; he devoted himself to literature, published some of his father's works, and then travelled to France and England. For thirty years he was in England in the family of the earl of Arundel; and taking advantage of frequent visits to Oxford, he laboriously applied himself to the acquisition of the ancient languages of the Cimbri, Goths, Franks, Frisons, and other northern nations, from whose obsolete idioms he deduced the derivation of many German and English words. Though thus engaged in insipid and perhaps unprofitable studies, he enjoyed a great flow of spirits and an excellent constitution, and attained a good old age, though fondly attached to the labours of a sedentary life. In 1677, he visited his nephew, Dr. Is. Vossius, at Windsor, and was there attacked by a fever, which carried him off, Nov. 19th that year. He was interred in St. George's chapel. He left by his will, all his MSS. and collections to the public library of his favourite Oxford. His chief works were, Glossarium Gothicum—de Picturâ Veterum, 4to. printed also in English, 1638—Observationes in Willelami Francicam Paraphrasin Cantici Canticorum, 1655, 8vo.—several letters in G. I. Vossius's collection.

JUNTA, two printers of celebrity, who had printing offices at Venice, Florence, and Geneva. Philip began to print at Geneva 1497. He died 1519. Bernard, his brother or cousin, was equally known. The Greek classics by Philip, are held in very high estimation.

JUNTA, Thomas, a physician of Venice, who published, 1554, a learned treatise on the battles of the ancients.

JURET, Francis, a native of Dijon, whose notes on Symmachus, and poetical pieces in the Delicia Poetarum Gallorum, were highly esteemed. He died 1626, aged 73.

JURIEU, Peter, called by the papists the Goliath of the protestants, was born 24th Dec. 1637, at Mer, in the diocese of Blois, where his father, Daniel J. was minister of the reformed religion. He was educated partly under Peter de Moulin, his mother's brother, who was in England, and when of age, he was ordained minister in that church; but after his return, to succeed his father at Mer, he was re-ordained according to the form of the foreign protestants. He afterwards officiated at Vitri, and then became professor of Hebrew and divinity in the university of Sedan. In 1681 he retired to Holland, and there was appointed divinity professor at Rotterdam, and minister of the Walloon Church. Already distinguished by his writings, he now applied himself to the study of the Revelation, and liberally explained the striking passages of that mysterious book, by application to the events then passing under his eye. The revolution in England enabled him to consider William III. as the instrument of God raised up against antichrist. While with enthusiastic zeal he attempted to convince the world of the truth of his explanations, and of the fulfilling of the prophecies, he excited, by his violence, a host of enemies against him. Bayle, who had long been his friend, took up the arms of controversy against him, and so unpopular were his principles, that in several of the churches of Holland, his opinions on baptism, justification, and other ecclesiastical topics, were publicly condemned, though his name was omitted in the censure. These troubles, and the popular discontent which his accusation of heterodoxy, against Saurin, pastor of Utrecht, excited, produced a dejection of spirits, which, after continuing some years, carried him off, 1713, at Rotterdam, in his 76th year. He was a man of great learning, and vast information; but unfortunately he was violent in his temper, intolerant in his principles, and unwilling to yield, or even to listen, to the candid representations of his opponents. His chief works are, Histoire du Calvinisme et du Papisme mise en Parallele, &c. 1683—Lettres Pastorales, 3 vols.—le Vrai Systeme de l'Eglise, &c.—l'Esprit de M. Arnauld, 1684—les Prejuges Legitimes contre le Papisme—le Janseniste Convaincu, &c.—Traité Historique contenant le Jugement d'un Protestant sur la Theologie Mystique, &c. 1700—Traité de la Nature et de la Grace—Apologie pour l'Accomplissement des Propheties, 1687, &c.—sermons, &c.

JURIN, Dr. James, secretary of the Royal Society, and president of the college of physicians, London, was eminent as a physician and as a writer. He contributed much to the philosophical transactions, and had a dispute with Michellotti on the momentum of running waters, with Keill and Senac on the action of the heart, with Robins on distinct vision, and with the followers of Leibnitz on moving bodies. His treatise on vision is printed with Smith's optics. He died 1750.

JUSSIEU, Anthony de, an eminent botanist, born at Lyons, 1686. He travelled over various parts of Europe to improve the science of botany, and natural history; and he was, for his great abilities, admitted into the academy of sciences at Paris, and made botany professor in the Royal garden, and professor to the king. Besides several valuable communications to the learned societies of Paris, he abridged Barrelier's work on the plants of France, Spain, and Italy—and made an appendix to Tournefort's—and wrote a discourse on the Progress of Botany. He died 1758.

JUSSIEU, Bernard de, brother to the preceding, was born at Lyons, 1699. He was equally eminent as a botanist and physician, and was member of the learned societies of Europe. He was a great favourite with the king, over whose plants he was appointed curator, and whose botanical garden at Trianon he adorned with great skill. He wrote, the Friend of Humanity, &c.—and edited Tournefort's plants near Paris, 2 vols. 12mo. He died 1777, universally esteemed, aged 79. His brother Joseph, was also an excellent naturalist, as well as engineer. He was with Condamine in Peru, 1735, and he published an account of his voyages, &c. He died 1779.

JUSTEL, Christopher, counsellor and secretary to the French king, was born at Paris, 1580. He wrote Code of Canons of the Church Universal—and the Councils of Africa, with notes—and the Genealogical History of the House of Auvergne—and Collections of Greek and Latin Canons. He died at Paris 1649.

JUSTEL, Henry, son and successor of the above in his offices about the king, was born in Paris, 1620. He was highly respected for his learning, and he was particularly attached to England, and to her literary characters, such as Locke, Dr. Hickes, &c. He gave to the university of Oxford the Greck MSS. of his father's Canones Ecclesiæ Universalis, for which he was in return complimented with the degree of LL.D. 1675. He had long foreseen the persecution of the protestants, and on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he migrated to London, and was made keeper of the king's library, St. James's, with a salary of 200*l.* per annum. This he held till his death, Sept. 1693, and was succeeded by Dr. R. Bentley. He wrote several learned works.

JUSTI, N. de, a German mineralogist, who studied at Jena, 1720, supported by the liberal contributions of those friends who foresaw his future celebrity. Under the direction of professor Zink, he acquired an extensive knowledge of mineralogy, and became known by his treatise on political economy. He examined, with philosophic eye, the various mines of Schemnitz, Hanneberg, Hungary, and Austria, and for his services was made a member of the council of mines; and some time after he was nominated professor of political economy and natural history at Gottingen university. He was meditating the plan of a German Encyclopedia, after the French, when he was carried off by a sudden disease. His works were, a treatise on Mineralogy, 1757—a treatise on Money, a work of great merit, for which, by the misinterpretation of some passages, he was for a little time imprisoned, with severe treatment, at Breslaw, by order of the king of Prussia, and the elector of Wirtemberg—Miscellanies on Chymistry and Mineralogy, 2 vols. 4to. &c.

JUSTIN I. from a swineherd and soldier, rose to the rank of general, and was proclaimed emperor of the east by his army, on the death of Anastasius, 518. He opposed the Arians, and with great munificence rebuilt Antioch, and other towns, which had been destroyed by an earthquake, and died A.D. 527, aged 77; respected for his piety, wisdom, and humanity.

JUSTIN II. was nephew and successor of Justinian, 565. He caused his relative, Justin, the last emperor's grand nephew, to be assassinated, and treated some of his subjects with cruelty on suspicion of treachery. His indolence and weakness gave way to the superior arts of his wife, Sophia, niece of the empress Theodora, who managed the empire with great ability, with the assistance of Tiberius. Justin made war against Chosroes, king of Persia, and obtained some advantage over his enemy. He died 5th Oct. 578.

JUSTIN, St. a native of Sichar in Samaria, who from a heathen philosopher, became a zealous supporter of Christianity. During the persecution of Antoninus, he appeared before the emperor, and pleaded the cause of the injured Christians with success. He suffered martyrdom, 166. He wrote two apologies for the Christians, besides a Dialogue with Trypho, best edited 1636, folio.

JUSTIN, a Latin historian, who abridged the universal history of Trogius Pompeius, in a very pleasing and interesting style.

JUSTINIAN I. emperor of Rome after his uncle, Justin I. 527, is celebrated more from the fame of his general Belisarius, than his own personal exertions. The Roman laws were under him reduced into a code, which was called the Digest or Pandects, and the more modern laws were likewise collected under the name of Novellæ. He firmly opposed the popes, Sylvester and Vigilius, and abolished the Roman consulate. He built St. Sophia's church at Constantinople, and died 565, aged 83.

JUSTINIAN II. succeeded his father Pogonatus Constantine, 685. He was successful against the Saracens; but his infamous intention of destroying all the inhabitants of Constantinople, procured his deposition and banishment, 694. He, 10 years after, regained his throne with the assistance of the Bulgarians; but he was at last assassinated, with his son Tiberius, by Philippicus Bardanes, who ascended the throne, 711.

JUSTINIANI, St. Lawrence, a noble of Venice, general of the monastery of St. George, in Alga. He was made the first patriarch of Venice, 1451, by pope Eugenius IV. He died four years after, aged 74, and was canonized by Alexander VIII. 1690. His works, consisting of Lignum Vitæ—de Casto Connubio—Fasciculis Amoris—and other pious treatises, were published at Lyons, 1568, folio, and Venice, 1755, with an account of his life.

JUSTINIANI, Bernard, nephew of the preceding, was born 1407-8, at Venice. He studied at Verona and Padua, and was employed by the pope. In 1461 he went as ambassador from Venice to Lewis XI. of France, who knighted him. After being 20 times raised to the office of Sage grand, he was, in 1474 made procurator of St. Mark, an honour inferior only to the doge. He died 1489. He left de Origine Urbis Venet. printed 1492, folio—the Life of his Uncle—and other historical works.

JUSTINIANI, Augustin, bishop of Nebo, in Corsica, was born at Genoa, 1470. Francis I. of France patronised him on account of his learning, and made him his almoner, with a liberal pension. After being professor of Hebrew for five years at Paris, he returned to Genoa, and passed over to his diocess, 1522. He perished, together with the vessel which conveyed him from Genoa to Nebo, 1536. He wrote Psalterium Hebræum, Græcum, Arabicum, et Chaldaicum, cum tribus Latinis Interpretationibus et Glossis—besides other works.

JUSTINIANI, Fabio, a native of Genoa, who became bishop of Ajaccio, and died there 1627, aged 59. He is author of

Index Universalis Materiæ Biblicarum—a Commentary on the Book of Tobit, &c.

JUVARA, Philip, a Sicilian architect, born at Messina. He was the pupil of Fontana, and distinguished himself by the beautiful edifices which he erected at Turin. He went to Spain on the invitation of Philip V. but the model which he proposed for the construction of a magnificent palace, on the ruins of that which had been destroyed by fire, though approved, was not carried into execution, through the intrigues of the queen; and Juvara, disappointed and chagrined, died of grief at Madrid, 1735, aged 50.

JUVENAL, de Carlenas Felix, a French writer, born at Pezenas, where he also died, 1760, aged 81, highly respected as an amiable private character. He wrote, Principles of History—Essays, on the History of the Sciences—Belles Lettres—the Arts.

JUVENALIS, Decius Junius, a Roman poet, celebrated for the spirit, boldness, and elegance of his satires, not unmixed, however, with licentious expressions and indecent remarks. He was sent in honourable exile as governor of Egypt, and died at Rome under Trajan, 128.

JUVENCUS, Cassius Vectius Aquilinus, a Spaniard, of noble birth, in the fourth century. He wrote a poem, in four books, on the life of our Saviour, a work of little merit.

JUXON, William, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Chichester, and educated at Merchant-tailors' and St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, 1598, and president 1621. His intimacy with Laud, who was of the same college, raised him to high stations: in 1627 he was made dean of Worcester, in 1633 clerk of the king's closet, the next year bishop of Hereford, and before consecration translated to London. He was, in 1635, made lord treasurer; but whilst these high appointments offended the puritans, and drew their indignation against the ministry, and particularly against Laud, Juxon was exemplary in his conduct, and irreproachable in the discharge of his duties. He suffered severely during the rebellion; and after attending his royal master to the scaffold, he was imprisoned by the suspicious parliament, who wished him to disclose the private conversation which he had held with the king, but without effect. At the restoration, Juxon was raised to the see of Canterbury. He died 4th June, 1663, aged 81, and was buried in St. John's chapel, Oxford.

KABBETE, John, a Dutch painter, who travelled over France and Italy to improve himself. He settled afterwards at Amsterdam, where he died, 1660. Some of his landscapes and ruins, which possess great merit, have been engraved by Perelles.

KAHTER, John, professor of poetry, mathematics, and theology at Rinletz, and member of the society of Gottingen, was born at Wolmar, Hesse Cassel, 1649. He died 1729, author of Dissertations on Theology, Philosophy, &c. in 2 vols. 12mo.

KAIN, Henry Lewis le, a celebrated actor, born at Paris, 14th April, 1728. He was originally engaged in the making of surgical instruments, and was introduced to Voltaire, who observed and cultivated his talents, and enabled him to appear on the French theatre, and to acquire the such celebrity as to be called the Garrick of France. Lewis XV. though prejudiced against him, acknowledged his merit, and all France followed the monarch's example. In the expression of grief, despair, sensibility, and all the strong emotions of the mind, Kain had no superior. His first appearance on the stage was in 1750, and he died at Paris of an inflammatory fever, 8th Feb. 1778. It is remarkable that Voltaire, who foresaw his greatness, was never present at his representations, as he left France for Prussia a few days before the appearance of his friend on the public theatre; and after an absence of 27 years, he heard, on his return to Paris, that Kain was no more. Kain left two children.

KALB, Baron de, a major-general in the American army, was a native of Germany, and born about the year 1717. He entered the French army in early life, and in a service of forty-two years, rose to the rank of brigadier-general. During the war of 1755 he visited the American colonies under an assumed character, for the purpose of collecting intelligence for the French cabinet, and was suspected to be a spy, and seized, but eluded detection. After the conquest of Canada he returned to France. In 1777 or 1778 he returned to the United States, and entered the American army as a volunteer, in which he was soon advanced to the rank of major-general, and intrusted with the command of a detachment sent from the main body in New-Jersey, to reinforce general Lincoln. After the capture of Lincoln, the command of the whole southern army devolved upon him till the arrival of general Gates. At the unfortunate battle near Camden, on the 15th August, he commanded the right wing of the army, and fell mortally wounded.

Congress voted a monument to his memory.

KALE, William, a Dutch painter, who died 1693, aged 63. His paintings on gold and silver, and crystal vases, on gems, and other precious stones, were highly admired.

KALGREEN, N. a dramatic writer of Sweden. Besides his Gustavus Vasa, an opera, &c. he wrote some lyric poems, and died 1798.

KALRAAT, Barent Van, a native of Dordt, eminent as a painter. His views of the Rhine possess great merit. He died 1721, aged 71.

KALUBRO, Vincent, a Polish historian, elected bishop of Cracow by the chapter. He retired to a monastery of the Cistercians, when his cathedral was burnt, 1218, by lightning, and there he died, 1223. He wrote Chronicon Regni Poloniae, in the form of a dialogue.

KAM-HI, emperor of China, succeeded to the throne 1661. He was the grandson of a Tartar prince, who had in 1644 invaded and conquered China, and he showed himself a liberal patron of the literature, and of the arts of Europe, and of the labours of Christian missionaries. Though well acquainted with geography, he never would suffer a map to appear before him, except China was placed in the midst of the earth. He died 1722, aged 71.

KAMPEN, Jacob Van, a native of Haerlem, born 1658, and eminent as a painter. The figures in his pieces are generally as large as life, and with a strong and happy colouring and effect.

KANDLER, John Joachim, an ingenious artist, employed in the porcelain manufactory of Meissen. His figures were much admired for execution and grace, especially his St. Paul, the scourging of Christ, the death of St. Xavier, the twelve apostles, &c. The group which he completed at the desire of Augustus of Poland, for Lewis XV. was deservedly commended, and procured a very handsome reward from the French monarch. Kandler was a native of Selingsstadt, in Saxony, and died 1776, aged 70.

KANOLD, John, author of some works on the plague—of Memoirs on Nature and Art, in German—a periodical work, and other things, was a German physician, and died at Breslaw, 1729, aged 50.

KANT, Immanuel, a native of Konigsberg, son of a saddler, descended from a Scotch family, of the name of Cant, settled in Prussia. From the charity school of his village, he removed to Fredericianum college, and then in 1740 to the university.

To maintain himself he now became a private tutor in a clergyman's family, afterwards in a nobleman's, and then returned to the university, where he took the degree of M.A. in 1755, and became a public tutor of celebrity. His knowledge was very extensive, and his publications were equally numerous, but he paid particular attention to metaphysics, and though his labours were sometimes obscure, his principles and opinions were popular, but while followed by numbers, he found himself attacked by some severe opponents. He died 12th Feb. 1804, aged 80. His works are on the theory of the winds—physical Geography—Principles of Motion and Rest—Volcanoes in the Moon—the Rotation of the Earth on its Axis, and what alterations had taken place, &c.

KASTNER, Abraham Gothelf, a mathematician, was born at Leipsic in 1719. He became professor of mathematics and moral philosophy at Gottingen; also secretary to the Royal Society at that place, and keeper of the observatory. He died in 1800. Among other works he wrote "A History of the Mathematics, 2 vols. 1797.—W. B.

KATEB, a Prussian poet, at the court of the Samanides. He wrote some moral poems of great merit.

KAUFFMAN, Mary Angelica, a female artist, was born in 1740, at Coire, in Switzerland. She was instructed in painting by her father, who next took her for farther improvement to Rome; from whence she removed to Venice, where she found a friend in lady Wentworth, and accompanied her to England. In this country she experienced the most liberal patronage, and became a member of the Royal Academy. She married Sir A. Zucchi, a Venetian artist, with whom she returned to Italy, and died at Rome in 1807. Bartolozzi engraved a number of prints from her designs.—W. B.

KAUNITZ RITBERG, prince of, a celebrated statesman, for 40 years chancellor and prime minister of Austria. He was first ambassador in France, and by negotiating the marriage of Antoinette, with Lewis XVI. he acquired great consequence. He served with fidelity, Maria Theresa, Joseph II. and Leopold, and by his abilities and intrigues, gained a great ascendancy in the European courts. He died at Vienna, 1794, aged 84.

KAT, William, a native of Breda, distinguished as a historical painter. He died 1568, aged 48, it is said, of grief, because the duke of Alva, while sitting to him for his picture, passed sentence of death on counts Egmont and Hoorn.

KEACH, Benjamin, author of Travels of True Godliness, in the style of Bunyan, and of Scripture Metaphors, in folio, reprinted 1777, works of great merit; was a baptist teacher, who died at the beginning of the 18th century.

KEATE, George, a native of Trowbridge, Wilts, educated at Kingston school. After visiting Geneva, and Voltaire, and making the tour of Europe, he entered at the Inner-Temple, and was called to the bar. Promotion and honours, however, followed not so rapidly as he expected, and he quitted the profession to become an author. Among other things, he wrote, Ancient and Modern Rome, a poem, 1760—an Account of the Pelew Islands, from captain Wilson's papers, and other works. He died 1797, aged 68.

KEATING, Jeffry, a clergyman of Tipperary, author of the history of the poets of his own country, printed in London, with the genealogies of some Irish families. He died 1650.

KEBLE, Joseph, an English lawyer, son of Richard Keble, sergeant at law under Cromwell's usurpation, was born in London, 1632. He was of Jesus-college, Oxford, and was made fellow of All-Souls, by the parliamentary visitors, 1648. He settled afterwards at Gray's-Inn, and when a barrister, was remarkable for his regular and constant attendance at the court of king's bench, though employed in no cause. He died suddenly, Aug. 1710. He published an explanation of the laws against recusants, 8vo. 1681—an Assistance to Justices of the peace, &c. folio,—Reports from the King's Bench, Westminster, 3 vols. folio—two Essays on Human Nature, or the Creation of Mankind, and on Human Actions. He left besides in MS. above 100 large folios, and 50 thick quartos.

KECKERMAN, Bartholomew, a native of Dantzic, who studied at Wittemberg, Leipsic, and Heidelberg. After being professor of Hebrew at Heidelberg, he was honourably invited by his fellow-citizens of Dantzic, to come and settle among them. He obeyed their summons, 1601, but he fell a sacrifice to his intense application in the education of youth, and in the pursuits of literature, and died 1609, aged only 38. His works, which are learned, though, says G. Vossius, full of plagiarism, were collected and published at Geneva, 1614, 2 vols. folio.

KEENE, Edmund, an English bishop, born at Lynn, Norfolk, where his father was an alderman. He was educated at Caius-college, Cambridge, and in 1740, by the interference of his brother, the English ambassador in Spain, with Walpole, he was made rector of Stanhope, Durham, in the room of bishop Butler. In 1748, he succeeded Dr. Whalley, at the head of St. Peter's college, and in 1750, he served the office of vice-chancellor, and showed himself a warm and judicious advocate for the improvement of university discipline. His efforts, however, were not without opposition and obloquy; he was ridiculed in the prose pamphlet, "Fragment," and in the poem called, "Capitale." In 1752, he was made bishop of Chester, and on the death of Dr. Mawson, 1770, he was translated to Ely. In this new appointment he obtained an act of parliament, to alienate the old palace of Holborn, belonging to his see, and for building a new one in Dover-street, and thus he not only got rid of a great incumbrance, but added an annual revenue of 5000*l.* to repair and maintain his palace. He died 1781, leaving a son, who was member for Cambridge, and a daughter.

KEILL, John, an eminent mathematician, born at Edinburgh, Dec. 1st, 1671. After studying, and taking the degree of M.A. in his native city, he followed his friend and tutor David Gregory, to Oxford, and in 1694, entered at Baliol as a Scotch exhibitor. Here he soon acquired celebrity, as being the first who taught Newton's principles by proper experiments, and soon became better known by his "Examination of Burnet's Theory of the Earth" to which were subjoined "Remarks on Whiston's new Theory." In 1700 he was appointed deputy professor of natural philosophy at Oxford, by Dr. Millington, and the next year he published his famous treatise, called "Introductio ad Veram Physicam," which has been considered as a most able introduction to Newton's Principia. He was next elected member of the Royal Society, to whose transactions he was a respectable contributor. In 1709 he was made treasurer to the Palatines going to settle in New-England, and after his return, the next year, he was appointed Savilian professor of astronomy, at Oxford. In 1711 he was engaged in a controversy with Leibnitz, and ably defended the claim of Sir Isaac Newton to the invention of fluxions, in which his efforts were seconded and approved by the Royal Society, against the violent attacks of the foreign philosopher. The same year he was made decipherer to the queen, and two years after was honoured with the degree of M.D. by the university of Oxford. His edition of Commandinus' Euclid, appeared 1715, and 1718 his Introductio ad Veram Astronomiam, translated by himself into English, at the request of the dutchess of Chandos. He was carried off by a fever, 1st Sept. 1721, in his 50th year, highly respected. He was married 1717.

KEILL, James, younger brother to the preceding, was born at Edinburgh, 27th March, 1673. He applied himself to medical studies, and particularly to anatomy, and had for his merit, the degree of M.D. conferred upon him by the university of Cambridge. He settled at Northampton, 1703, as a physician, and he died there from that painful disorder, a cancer in the roof of his mouth 16th July, 1719, and was buried in St. Giles's church, where a monument was erected by his brother. He published an account of Animal Secretion—the Quantity of Blood in the Human Heart, and Muscular Motion—Medicina Statica—Anatomy of the Human Body, 8vo.—an Account of the Dissection of John Bayles, aged 130—a Translation of Lemery's Chymistry, and papers in the philosophical transactions.

KEITH, James, field-marshal of Prussia, the younger son of William Keith, earl-marshal of Scotland, was born 1696. He was educated under Ruddiman, and intended for the law, but the breaking out of the rebellion showed the military bent of his genius. He joined the Pretender, and was wounded at the battle of Sheriffmuir, and then fled to France, where he applied himself to mathematics, and the studies of a military life. After travelling through Italy, he became in 1717, acquainted with the Czar Peter, but he refused to enter into the Russian service, and went to Madrid, where he obtained a commission in the Irish brigade. He afterwards accompanied his friend and patron, the duke of Lyria, in his embassy to Russia, and there he engaged in the service of the Czarina, was made lieutenant-general, and honoured with the black eagle. Here he distinguished himself in the wars against the Turks and the Swedes, as well as in negotiations; but dissatisfied with the politics of the court, and the servility which attended his situation, he left Russia, and came to Berlin, where the king of Prussia raised him to great honours, and made him governor of his capital, and field-marshal of his armies. He gained so strongly the confidence of that monarch, that he was his counsellor in the cabinet, and his companion in his relaxations, and he attended him in his travels through Germany, Poland, and Hungary. After distinguishing himself as a warrior and a politician in the service of his new master, he was unfortunately killed at the battle of Hohkerchen, 1758.

KEITH, Sir William, governor of Pennsylvania, entered on the office in 1717, and exercised an administration favourable to the colony till 1726, when he was displaced through the influence of James Logan. He had before held the office of surveyor-general of the customs in America. After his return to England, he published a History of Virginia. He died in 1749.

⚔ L.

KELLER, James, a learned Jesuit, born at Sekingen, 1568. He was counsellor to Albert of Bavaria, and the confidential friend of the emperor Maximilian. He died at Munich, 1631. He wrote various books under fictitious names; but his

Mysteria Politica, 1635, in 4to. from its contents, was exposed to the censures of the Sorbonne, and burnt publicly.

KELLEY, Edward, a famous necromancer, born at Worcester, 1555, and educated at Oxford, which he left without a degree. For some ill conduct in Lancashire, he lost both his ears at Lancaster, but afterwards became an active associate to Dr. Dee, and travelled with him abroad, and ably supported him in his pretended intercourse with familiar spirits. By his celebrity, and his art of commuting metals into gold, he recommended himself to the notice of the emperor Rodolphus II. who knighted him, but afterwards dissatisfied with his impostures, sent him a prisoner to Prague. Kelley endeavoured to extricate himself from confinement, but he fell from the window of his apartment, and broke both his legs, in consequence of which he died soon after, 1595. His works were a poem on Chymistry—on the Philosopher's Stone—a Relation of what passed between Dr. Dee, and certain Spirits.

KELLY, Hugh, an Irishman, who from a stay-maker, became a hackney writer to a lawyer in London, and then turned author. He possessed great application, and wrote with fluency and success. He died 1777. His works are Thespis, a poem, after Churchill's manner—False Delicacy—a Word to the Wise—School for Wives, comedies—Clementina, a tragedy—the Romance of an Hour, a comic entertainment—the Memoirs of a Magdalen, a novel, and some periodical works.

KELLY, John, a divine, was born in the Isle of Man, in 1750. Bishop Hildesley employed him in the translation of the Bible into the Manks tongue; after which he was ordained as minister of the episcopal congregation of Ayr, in Scotland, where he was engaged by the duke of Gordon to superintend the studies of the marquis of Huntley. Through this patronage he obtained the vicarage of Ardleigh, and next the rectory of Copford, in Essex; on which he entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he proceeded to the degree of doctor of laws in 1799. In 1803 he published a Grammar of the Manks Language; and he also had nearly completed a Dictionary of the Celtic Tongue, when the sheets were destroyed in the fire of Mr. Nichols, the printer. Dr. Kelly died in 1809.—W. B.

KEMP, John, LL.D. professor of mathematics in Columbia college, New-York, was born at Achlossan, North Britain, April 10th, 1763, and obtained the degree of Master of Arts at Aberdeen, in 1781, with great reputation for mathematical talents and knowledge. About the close of the war of the revolution he came to Virginia, and not long after, removed to New-York, where, in 1785 he was appointed teacher of mathematics in the college, and the next year professor of that department. He also instructed in Natural Philosophy. In 1795, he was appointed professor likewise of Geography, History, and Chronology; and discharged the duties of those appointments with distinguished talents and fidelity. He died November 15th, 1812, in his 51st year.

KEMPIS, Thomas, a famous theologian, born at Kempen, in the diocess of Cologne, 1380. He was educated at Deventer, and afterwards entered among the members of the monastery of Mount St. Agnes. He here displayed great piety, patience, and self-mortification, and besides transcribing books of devotion, as the rest of his brethren, he composed several works of divinity, much admired by the papists. He died 1471, in his 92d year. The largest edition of his works, consisting of sermons, pious treatises, &c. is in 3 vols. folio, Cologne, 1680. His famous book, De Imitatione Christi, which has been translated into all languages, has been by some writers ascribed to Gerson, a Benedictine monk. This has consequently occasioned not a little controversy.

KEN, Thomas, an English prelate, descended from an ancient Somersetshire family, was born at Berkhamstead, Herts, July, 1637. He was educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, 1657. He was patronised by bishop Morley, and afterwards went to Holland, as chaplain to the princess of Orange. In 1683 he went with lord Dartmouth, against Tangier, and on his return, was made chaplain to the king. In his character he displayed great firmness and consistency of conduct, and far from offending his royal master, by refusing admittance into his house, to Eleanor Gwyn, the favourite mistress, he received higher marks of esteem, and was nominated to the vacant see of Bath and Wells. Before he was, however, admitted, Charles was taken ill, and was attended by his faithful chaplain, whose devout services were much interrupted by the interference of popish priests. On James's accession, Ken was settled in his see, but though attempts were made to render him favourable to the projected alteration of the national religion, he remained steady to his principles, and was one of the seven bishops sent to the tower. At the revolution he was unwilling to take the oaths of allegiance to the new monarch, and therefore retired, and was deprived of his bishopric. He devoted the rest of his life to literary and pious pursuits, and was so much respected for his steady principles, that queen Anne granted him a pension of 200*l.* per annum. He died at Longleat, the seat of the Thynnes, in Wiltshire, of an ulcer in his kidneys, 19th March, 1710-11. He wished always to be impressed with such a sense of mortality that he continually carried his shroud in his portmanteau. His works were published 4 vols. 1721, and consist of hymns, pious manuals, an epic poem in 13 books, called Edmund, sermons, &c. His nephew, Hawkins, prefixed an account of his life. Though accused of popish principles, he died in the faith of the church of England.

KENDAL, George, a native of Dawlish, Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, and made by bishop Brownrigg, prebendary of Exeter, and in 1647, rector of Blissland, Cornwall. He afterwards removed to a benefice in London, and took his degree of D.D. 1654. Though he recovered his prebend at the restoration, he lost it and all his preferment in 1662 for nonconformity. He was author of a Vindication of the Doctrine of Grace and Special favour to the Elect, &c. fol.—the Doctrine of the Perseverance of the Saints, against John Goodwin, fol. &c.

KENNEDY, John, M.D. a Scotch physician, who resided for some years at Smyrna, and died 26th Jan. 1760. His valuable collections of Greek and Latin coins and pictures, were sold by auction, and afterwards came into the possession of Dr. Hunter. In his dissertation on the coins of Carausius, Dr. Kennedy asserted that Oriuna was the emperor's guardian goddess, an opinion which excited a violent controversy between him and Dr. Stukely, who supported that Oriuna was the wife of Carausius.

KENNEDY, John, rector of Bradley, Derbyshire, was author of Scripture Chronology, 8vo. 1751—Jackson's Chronological Antiquities Examined, 8vo. 1753, &c.

KENNEDY, James, second son of sir W. Kennedy by Margaret, daughter of Robert III. king of Scotland, was educated at Paris and Rome, and became Regent during the minority of James II. He was archbishop of St. Andrew's, and the founder of St. Mary's college there. He died chancellor of Scotland 1472, aged 68.

KENNET, White, an English prelate, born at Dover, 10th August, 1660. His father was vicar of Postling in Kent, and from his mother's father, a wealthy shipwright, he derived the name of White. He was educated at Westminster school, and entered at Edmund hall, Oxford, where he applied himself with unusual perseverance to study, and published his letter from a student concerning the approaching parliament, a political pamphlet which highly offended the whig party. He also published at this time his "Ballad," a political poem, and in 1684 appeared his translation of Erasmus' Moriæ Encomium. That year he took his degree of M.A. and was then presented to the living of Ambrosden, Oxfordshire. In 1689, whilst shooting, his gun burst, and wounded his skull so severely that he was trepanned, and was ever after obliged to wear a black patch on the injured part. He distinguished himself at Oxford as an eloquent and popular preacher, and as an active tutor in his hall, and in 1693 he was presented to the rectory of Shottesbrook, in Berkshire. In 1699, he took his degree of D.D. and the next year, unsolicited, was appointed minister of St. Botolph, Aldgate, London. In 1701 he became archdeacon of Huntingdon, and that year engaged with Dr. Atterbury in a controversy about the rights of convocation. In 1705 he preached Dr. Wake's consecration sermon, which was much applauded, particularly by judge Holt, and some time after was appointed chaplain to the queen. His sermon at the funeral of the duke of Devonshire in 1707, notwithstanding the censure of some wits, proved very agreeable to the next duke, who recommended him to the deanery of Peterborough. The opposition which he showed to Sacheverell for some time exposed him to obloquy, and when the ministry were changed he was represented as an enemy to the queen and her government. The imputation was industriously circulated, and with such malignity that in an altar piece painted for Dr. Welton, rector of Whitechapel, Judas was represented in the number of the 12 apostles at the last supper, with the countenance of Dr. Kennet, and more strongly to point the resemblance, the black patch appeared on his head. The picture was viewed and condemned by the sober spectator, and the bishop of London at last ordered the scandalous piece to be removed from the church. His popularity, however, was not diminished, he was some time after promoted to the see of Peterborough, which he enjoyed ten years. He died in St. James's street, London, 19th Dec. 1728. He had begun to make a large collection of maps, papers, &c. to write a full history of the propagation of Christianity in the English American colonies, which never was completed. He wrote the third volume of "a Complete History of England," published by the booksellers 1706, besides a Vindication of the Church—a Letter to the Editors of Somner's treatise of the Roman Posts, &c.—Sermons, &c. His valuable MSS. collection was purchased by the earl of Shelburne, and a curious MS. diary by him is also preserved in the noble lord's library.

KENNET, Basil, younger brother of the bishop, was born 21st Oct. 1674, at Postling. He was educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1697. In 1706, by his brother's interest, he was made chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn, but so violent was the opposition which he met from the papists, when he reached Italy, that he escaped with difficulty the horrors of the inquisition. On his return to Oxford, 1714, he took the degree of D.D. but died very soon after of a slow fever, the seeds of which he had brought with him from Italy. Basil Kennet was distinguished in private life as an amiable and benevolent man, and as an author his works are sufficient proof of his great abilities. He published in 1696, Romæ Antiquæ Notitia, in two parts, a valuable book addressed to the duke of Gloucester—the Lives and Characters of the Ancient Greek Poets, 8vo. 1697, also inscribed to the duke, to whom it was expected he was to be appointed sub-preceptor—an Exposition of the Apostle's Creed after Dr. Pearson, 1705—an Essay towards a Paraphrase on the Psalms, &c. 8vo. 1706—Sermons, &c. on various occasions, 1715, 8vo.

KENNETH II. the 69th king of Scotland, succeeded his father Alpin, 823. He made war against the Picts and conquered them, and he brought the famous stone chair to Scone, in which the kings of Scotland were crowned, till carried to England by Edward I. He died 854.

KENNETH III. son of Malcolm, obtained victories over the Danes, and also over the English at Strathclyud. He was assassinated by his subjects 994, for attempting to alter the right of succession in favour of his family.

KENNICOTT, Benjamin, a celebrated Hebrew scholar, born at Totness, Devonshire, 1718, where his father was parish-clerk. His talents were displayed at school with such success that by the liberal contributions of some gentlemen, friendly to infant merit, he was sent to Exeter college, Oxford. Here he devoted himself to study with so much assiduity, that by the publication of two popular dissertations—on the Tree of Life—and on the oblations of Cain and Abel—he obtained the degree of B.A. from the university, gratis, and before the statutable term. His excellent sermons next recommended him to public notice, but about 1753, he began to digest the plan of his great and national labour, the publication of the Hebrew text of the Bible collated from various MSS. In this arduous undertaking, too expensive for the resources of a private man, he was nobly supported by the munificence of learned bodies, and even of sovereign princes; and to accelerate, and indeed remunerate his labours, he was made canon of Christ Church, and keeper of the Radcliffe library. After indefatigable patience, and the most laudable perseverance, he completed his great undertaking. The compendious history of the Hebrew text, from the closing of the canon to the invention of printing, with an account of 103 MSS. appeared first; in 1760 the proposals for collecting the MSS. at home and abroad were laid before the public; in 1776 the first volume was published, and in 1780 his labours were brought to a conclusion in the 5th volume. After thus contributing largely to the improvement of Hebrew literature and sacred criticism, this worthy man began to publish some remarks on select passages of the Old Testament, but died before the completion at Oxford, in 1783. He left a widow, but no children. He was vicar of Culham, Oxfordshire.

KENRICK, William, a native of Watford Herts, who from the humble occupation of a rule maker, became a popular writer. He went to Leyden to improve himself, and at his return in 1759 he published his epistles, philosophical and moral, in verse. In 1766 appeared his "Falstaff's Wedding," a comedy, an admirable imitation of Shakspeare, and which he at first intended to impose on the world as the production of that great bard. For some time he wrote in the Monthly Review, but in consequence of a dispute with the principal, he set up the London Review, which did not much answer. He was equally unsuccessful in the newspaper which he began in opposition to the Morning Chronicle, which, after conducting some years, he abandoned from a similar quarrel. He translated Rousseau's Emilius and Eloisa—Milot's History of England, and other works, and produced besides various dramatic pieces, which if not all successful, yet possessed merit. He died 1779.

KENT, William, a native of Yorkshire, who abandoned the business of coach painter for the superior branches of the profession. By the liberality of some friends he was enabled, in 1710, to go to Rome, and improve himself; but the patronage and confidence of Lord Burlington raised him to consequence and independence. On his return to London, he was employed in various works, but he possessed little genius as a painter. His talents, however, displayed themselves soon as an ingenious and able architect, and his temple of Venus in Stowe gardens, Holkham house, Norfolk, and other buildings are monuments of his genius. By the influence of lord Burlington and other friends, he obtained the place of master carpenter, architect, painter, keeper of the pictures, &c. to the king, with a salary altogether worth 600*l.* per ann. He died of an inflammation in his bowels, at Burlington-house, 12th April, 1748, aged 63. He may be deservedly considered, as Walpole observes, the father of modern gardening in England.

KENTIGERN, or St. Mungo, a Scotchman, educated, according to Camden, at Oxford, and made bishop of Glasgow. He was the pupil of Palladius, and founded St. Asaph monastery in the sixth century.

KENYON, Lloyd lord, an English judge, eldest son of Lloyd Kenyon of Briyno, Esq. was born 1733 at Gredington, Flintshire, and on leaving Ruthin school, Denbighshire, he became an articled clerk to Tomlinson, attorney at Nantwich, Cheshire. On leaving Cheshire he entered at Lincoln's-inn, and was called to the bar in 1761. Though known as an able lawyer and a good conveyancer, and much employed in chancery, he did not rapidly rise to eminence till in 1780 he was called upon with Erskine to defend lord George Gordon. Distinguished on this memorable occasion, he was in 1782 made attorney-general and chief justice of Chester, and elected member of parliament for Hindon, Wilts. He was in March, 1784, made master of the rolls, and on lord Mansfield's resignation in 1788 he was by the recommendation of lord Thurlow raised to succeed him as chief justice of the King's bench, with the dignity of the peerage. In this elevated office lord Kenyon endeared himself to the people of England, as an upright and impartial judge, as the friend of his country, the supporter of her constitution, the advocate of virtue, and the unshaken punisher of vice, however great or powerful the offender. Though warm in his temper he never suffered justice to yield to prejudice or passion, but regarded the strict execution of the law as the firmest bulwark of national honour. The death of his eldest son, a young man of promising abilities, in a decline, is supposed to have hastened his dissolution, by producing, in consequence of his broken spirits, the black jaundice, of which he died at Bath, 2d April, 1802, aged 69. He left two sons, George his successor in the title, and Thomas.

KEPLER, John, a celebrated astronomer, born 27th Dec. 1571, at Wiel, in the dutchy of Wirtemberg. His family was respectable, though his father was reduced from high military offices to the humble occupation of an inn-keeper. His earliest years were not improved by education, but on his father's death he went to Tubingen university, where he studied philosophy and mathematics with great attention, and made such progress that in 1593 he was invited to a mathematical chair at Gratz, in Styria. In 1597 he married, and three years after, in consequence of the confusion which prevailed in religion and politics, he left Styria and went to settle in Bohemia where the friendship of Tycho Brahe had invited him. Tycho introduced his friend to the emperor Rodolphus, but the intimacy which it was fondly expected was calculated to contribute not only to the advancement of science, but to mutual comfort, proved the source of dissatisfaction and distrust. Kepler was offended with the reserve of his friend, and Tycho did not communicate all the knowledge which honour and promise would have dictated. These rising dissensions, however, were stopped by the death of Tycho, and Kepler left to the exertion of his own powers, was directed to finish the tables begun by his friend, which he dedicated to his imperial patron under the title of Rodolphine Tables. But though appointed mathematician to the emperor for life, and though respected for his learning and abilities, Kepler had to struggle with the horrors of poverty through the jealousy or malice of the imperial ministers, who paid him his pension with a very sparing hand, so that he removed from Prague to Lintz, and in 1613 assisted at the assembly at Ratisbon, and was particularly consulted in the reformation of the calendar. He went in 1630 to Ratisbon to solicit the payment of the arrears of his pension, and whilst there he was seized with a fever, occasioned, it is said, by hard riding, and fell a victim to the disease in Nov. of the same year. His works were, besides Ephemerides—Physica Cœlestis Tradita Commentarius de Motibus Stellæ Martis—Epitome Astronomiæ Copernicæ—Somnium Astronomicum de Astronomia Lunari—Prodromus Dissertationum Cosmographicarum, &c. a work which the author considered as his best performance, and which he valued so much that he declared he would not exchange the glory of the discoveries which he had made to become elector of Saxony. As an astronomer Kepler was a man of high celebrity, whose genius and discoveries have been deservedly commended by Des Cartes, Newton, Gregory, Horrox, and other astronomers. He first proved that the planets do not move in circles, but in ellipses, and that in their motions they describe equal areas in equal times, and that the squares of their periodical times are equal to the cubes of their distances. Yet though thus the worthy precursor of the great Newton, he maintains puerile absurdities, and foolishly imagines that the earth has a sympathy with the heavens, and that the globe is a huge animal which breathes out the winds through the holes of the mountains, as through its mouth and nostrils. After his death his wife married again. His son Lewis was a physician at Konigs-berg, in Prussia, and published his father's Somnium Astronomicum, and died at Konigsberg 1663.

KEPPEL, Augustus Viscount, second son of the earl of Albemarle, was distinguished as an able admiral. He accompanied Anson round the world, and when raised to the highest honours of his profession he was placed at the head of the English Channel fleet, and on the 12th July, 1778, he engaged the French fleet, under d'Orville's, off Ushant, but the action was partial, and the next day when the admiral wished to renew the engagement he found it impossible. This encounter spread great discontent through the nation, and the admiral was tried at Portsmouth, on the accusation of Sir Hugh Palliser, the second in command, and honourably acquitted. The charge was retorted by the admiral, and Sir Hugh Palliser was censured by the sentence of a court-martial. In 1782 the admiral was made a peer, and under two administrations was twice made first lord of the admiralty. He was an able officer, and a man of great respectability in private life, and it is much to be lamented that a political difference between him and the second in command prevented that exertion of British valour which might have ensured a most brilliant victory to the fleet. He died 1786.

KERCKHORE, Joseph Van der, a painter of Bruges, who died 1724, aged 55. His council of the Gods, preserved in Ostend town-hall, is much admired.

KERCKRING, Thomas, a physician, who lived at Hamburg, as the grand duke of Tuscany's resident. He was member of the London Royal Society, and obtained some celebrity in his profession. He died at Hamburg, 1693. His chief works are Spicelegium Anatomicum, 4to.—and Anthropogenia Ichnographia, in which he supported the doctrine of an ovary in the human female.

KERGUELIN DE TREMARA, Yves Joseph, author of a relation of a voyage in the North Sea, 4to. 1768—naval events of the war between France and England, 1778, &c. was a naval French commander of merit, and died 1797.

KERI, Francis Borgia, a learned Jesuit of Hungary, author of a history of the emperors of the East, from Constantine to the fall of Constantinople, and of the Ottoman princes, their successors. He was also an able astronomer, and made some improvements in the telescope. He died at Buda, 1769.

KERKHERDERE, John Gerard, historiographer to the emperor Joseph I. was born near Maestricht, 1673, and died 1738. He published some Latin poems, besides a Commentary on Daniel, and a Treatise on the Situation of the Earthly Paradise, which he placed above Babylon.

KERSAINT, Armand Guy Simon, count of, a native of Paris, who served with credit in the French navy, and on the breaking out of the revolution took an active part in the measures of the national assembly. He was attached to the party the Girondists, and therefore in the convention he opposed boldly the violent meaasures of the sanguinary terrorists. On the day of the condemnation of Lewis XVI. he had the magnanimity to resign his seat in the bloody assembly, and when called to their bar he with undaunted countenance defended his conduct. So much virtue could not pass unpunished in those days of slaughter. He was discovered in his retreat, and dragged before the revolutionary tribunal, and condemned to die, 5th December, 1793. He was then aged 52.

KERSEY, John, author of an excellent book in folio, called "the Elements of Algebra"—of an English Dictionary—and of an Edition of Wingate's Arithmetic, was born at Bodicott, near Banbury, Oxfordshire, and died about 1690, aged 74.

KERVILLARS, John Marin de, a Jesuit, who translated Ovid's Fasti and Elegies into French, and assisted in the Memoires de Trevoux. He died at Paris 1745.

KESSEL, John Van, a native of Antwerp, born 1626. His flowers, birds, and insects, executed according to the seasons of the year, possessed great merit, and are now very scarce. His portraits were after the manner of Vandyk. His son Ferdinand, who was also eminent, though inferior to his father in the execution of his pieces, was patronised by John Sobieski at Warsaw. A nephew of Kessel also settled at Antwerp, and acquired celebrity by painting after the manner of Teniers' Conversations, &c.

KETEL, Cornelius, a Dutch painter, who came to England and painted Elizabeth and her nobility. On his return to Holland he made himself ridiculous by his attempting to paint with his fingers, and even with his toes. He died 1602.

KETT, William, a tanner of Norfolk, who raised and headed an insurrection in the reign of Edward VI. His followers amounted to above 20,000 men, and by inveighing against enclosures, and the oppression of the nobility, he increased his influence among the deluded multitude. He took Norwich, and defeated lord Northampton, but was afterwards routed by lord Warwick, and hanged with some of his associates on the tree which he had called the tree of reformation, and where he administered justice and issued orders to his followers, 1549.

KETTLEWELL, John, an English divine, born at North Allerton, Yorkshire, 10th March, 1653. After an education in his native town, he entered at Edmund hall, Oxford, and five years after was elected fellow of Lincoln, where he became an able tutor. By his publication of "Measures of Christian Obedience," 1681, he acquired great reputation, and was patronised by the duchess of Bedford and by lord Digby, who gave him the living of Coleshill, Warwickshire. At the revolution he refused to take the oaths of allegiance, in consequence of which he was deprived of his living, and went to settle in London, where he was respected as an able writer and good divine. He died of a consumption in Gray's-Inn-lane 12th April, 1695, and was buried in the grave which once contained Laud's remains at Barking. He is represented by Nelson, who knew him well, as an amiable man in private life, benevolent, learned, and humble. His works, which consisted of Religious tracts, besides tracts upon "New Oaths," the duty of Allegiance, &c. were collected into 2 volumes, folio, 1718, with his life prefixed.

KEULEN, Janssen Van, a portrait painter of Dutch extraction, born in London, and for some time the favourite of Charles I. and of the English court before the introduction of Vandyk. Though he fell in the public estimation by the celebrity of his rival, he yet had the good sense of living with him on the most intimate terms, and died 1665.

KEYSLER, John George, a German antiquary, fellow of the London Royal Society, was born at Thournau, 1689. He was carefully educated at the university of Halle, and then travelled as tutor to the two sons of count Giech-Buchau, and visited the chief cities of Germany, France, and the Netherlands with the eyes and the judgment of a philosopher. He afterwards undertook the care of the two grandsons of baron Bernstorff, minister of state to the elector of Hanover, and after viewing in their company the chief places on the continent, he came to England, where he was received with all the respect due to learning and eminent virtue. He was admitted fellow of the London Royal Society, and deserved it by his explication of Stone-Henge, which he called an Anglo-Saxon monument, and by a dissertation on the mistletoe of the Druids. He spent the rest of life in tranquil and honourable retirement, under the patronage of his pupils, and died 20th June, 1743, aged 54, of an asthma. As he was an able antiquarian, he published Antiquitates Selectæ Septentrionales et Celticæ, &c. Hanover, 12mo. 1720—besides Travels through Germany, Bohemia, Hungary, &c. translated into English, 1756.

KHERASKOF, Michael, a Russian poet of the 18th century, made vice-president of the college of mines, counsellor of state, and curator of Moscow university. He wrote a poem on the Utility of Science—some tragedies—Pindaric odes, fables, idyls, satires—Ariadne and Theseus, a romance—Numa Pompilius, a poem in four cantos, besides "Rossiada," an epic poem in 12 cantos, which celebrates in animated and sublime, though occasionally in unharmonious verse, the conquest of Casan by Ivan Vassilevitch II.

KHILHOF, Prince, a Russian nobleman, ambassador to Charles XII. of Sweden, and ungenerously thrown into prison when that monarch undertook war against Russia. After 18 years' confinement, he died in the prison of Westeras, just as he was going to be restored to liberty, 1718. During his imprisonment he wrote the Kernel of the Russian History, in seven books, to his own times, which, though an abridgment, possesses considerable merit, and was published in 1770 by Muller in 8vo.

KICK, Cornelius, a painter of Amsterdam, of great merit. His flowers were represented with such brilliancy that they exhibited all the freshness and beauty of nature. He died 1675, aged 40.

KIDDER, Richard, a learned prelate, born in Suffolk, or as Wood says, in Sussex. In 1649, he entered at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and obtained from that society the living of Stanground, Huntingdonshire, from which he was ejected in 1662, for nonconformity. He, however, afterwards conformed, and obtained from lord Essex the rectory of Raine in Essex, and in 1674 the living of St. Martin Outwich, London. In 1681, he was made prebendary of Norwich, and in 1698 dean of Peterborough. On the deprivation of Ken for refusing to take the oaths of allegiance to William and Mary, 1691, he was appointed in his place to the see of Bath and Wells. He was unfortunately killed in his bed with his lady, by the fall of a stack of chimnies in his palace at Wells, in the great storm which happened in the night between the 26th and 27th Nov. 1703. He was privately buried in the cathedral. Dr. Kidder was an elegant and learned writer, and a most able divine. His publications were sermons preached at Boyle's lectures, and inserted in "Demonstration of the Messias," in three parts—a commentary on the five books of Moses, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. besides some controversial tracts, &c.

KIEN-LONG, emperor of China, died at the end of the 18th century, after a reign of 60 years, at the age of 90. When lord Macartney appeared at his court, he gave him some of his verses to be presented to the English king. In his character he appeared to be a popular, sensible, and benevolent monarch.

KIERINGS, Alexander, a Dutch painter of Utrecht, who died 1646, aged 56. His landscapes were much admired for correctness, so that even the fibres of trees were distinctly seen in his pieces.

KILBURN, Richard, author of a survey of Kent, published 1659 in 4to. in his 54th year, was a native of Kent.

KILBYE, Richard, a native of Radcliffe, Leicestershire, was fellow of Lincoln college, Oxford, 1577, and was elected rector in 1590. He was afterwards Hebrew professor in the university, and obtained a prebend in Lincoln cathedral, and was one of the translators of the present Bible. He was also author of some sermons, and died 1620.

KILBYE, Richard, a minister of All-hallows, in Derby, who wrote the Burden of a Loaded Conscience, often reprinted, and died 1617.

KILIAN, Cornelius, a native of Brabant, for fifty years corrector of the press to Plantin. He published Etymologicon Linguae Teutonicae—some Latin poems—an apology for correctors of the press, against authors. He died 1607.

KILLEN, William, chancellor of Delaware, a native of Ireland, came to America in early life, and settled at Wilmington, where, after having gained a respectable knowledge of the classics, and studied law, he became an attorney and soon gained distinction in the profession. Soon after the separation of the colonies from Great Britain, he was appointed chief-justice of the supreme court of Delaware, and in 1793 became chancellor of that state. He held that office with a high reputation for ability and integrity till 1801, when he resigned. He died on the 3d of October, 1805.

KILLIGREW, Catharine, daughter of Sir Anthony Cook, was born about 1530, at Giddy-hall, Essex, and married Mr. Henry Killigrew, who, for his services as ambassador, was knighted. To a great genius she joined an extensive knowledge of Greek, Hebrew, and Latin, and wrote verses with elegance. She died about 1600.

KILLIGREW, William, son of Sir Robert Killigrew, was born at Hanworth, Middlesex, 1605, and after three years' residence at St. John's college, Oxford, he travelled abroad. At his return, he was appointed governor of Pendennis castle and Falmouth haven, Cornwall, and gentleman-usher of the privy chamber to Charles I. He suffered severely during the civil wars, for his attachment to the royal cause, but at the restoration he was again taken into favour and made vice-chamberlain to the king, an office in which he continued twenty-two years. He died 1693, and was buried in Westminster-abbey. He wrote four plays, the siege of Urbin, Selindra, Ormasdes, or Love and Friendship, Pandora, published at Oxford, 1666, in folio. besides Midnight and Daily Thoughts in prose and verse, 8vo.—The Artless Midnight Thoughts of a Gentleman at Court, &c. 8vo. &c.

KILLIGREW, Thomas, brother to the preceding, page to Charles I. and groom of the chamber to Charles II. was born 1611. He visited Spain, France, and Italy.

and for some time was English resident at Venice. He wrote 11 plays, collected into one folio volume, 1664, besides other things. He was twice married, and died 1682, and was buried in Westminster-abbey. He was a man of great wit, and in his facetious company Charles II. passed many a vacant hour in the highest familiarity. Though remarkably jocular in conversation, his writings display little of that vein of humour.

KILLIGREW, Henry, brother to the preceding, was born 1612. He was of Christ church, Oxford, and then became chaplain in the king's army, and in 1642 was created D.D. and made chaplain to the duke of York and prebendary of Westminster. After suffering during the civil wars, he was, at the restoration, reinstated in his prebend, and made master of the Savoy hospital, and rector of Wheatamstead, Hertfordshire. He wrote at the age of 17 the Conspiracy, a tragedy, afterwards altered into Pallantus and Eudora, 1652. He also published some sermons, &c. and died about 1690.

KILLIGREW, Anne, called by Wood "a grace for beauty, and a muse for wit," was daughter of Henry just mentioned. To a highly finished education she added great skill in painting, and drew the picture of the duke of York, and of the dutchess to whom she was maid of honour. This excellent woman, admired for piety and benevolence, as well as learning, died of the small-pox, June, 1685, and she had the felicity of having her merits celebrated by the energetic muse of Dryden. In 1686 appeared her "poems" in 4to.

KILLIGREW, Margaret, known as the writer of 13 folio volumes, was daughter of Thomas Lucas, and second wife of W. Cavendish, duke of Newcastle. The life of this her husband is the best of her works, and it has been translated into Latin. She died 1673.

KILWARDEN, Arthur Wolfe lord, an Irish judge. Though born of an obscure family, he received a liberal education, and after some residence at Trinity college, Dublin, he was called to the bar 1766. His abilities gradually recommended him, he became king's counsel, was chosen member of parliament, and in 1787 made solicitor-general, and in 1789 attorney-general. The death of Lord Clonmel opened his way to the dignity of chief-justice of the king's bench, in which high office all his measures were conducted with wisdom, integrity, and justice. The moderation and impartiality of his public life, and his private virtues, however, were not proof against the violence of a blood-thirsty mob. During a popular insurrection in the streets of Dublin, he was met by an armed multitude, as he returned from the country, and his carriage was immediately surrounded by the ferocious rabble, and he and his nephew, the Rev. Richard Wolfe, were dragged away and piked to death in Thomas-street, Dublin, 23d July, 1803. His daughter, who was with him in the coach, was spared by the murderers, one of whom courteously protected her, and conveyed her to a place of safety. The last words of the expiring judge were, that no violent punishment should be inflicted on his murderers, but that they might be impartially tried by the law.

KIMBER, Isaac, a native of Wantage, Berks, known as a dissenting divine, and eminent as the author of the life of Oliver Cromwell, 8vo.—History of England, 4 vols. 8vo.—Life of Bishop Beveridge, prefixed to his works—Twenty posthumous sermons, &c. He was also for some years engaged in the London magazine, and died in London, 1758, aged 66.

KIMBER, Edward, son of the preceding, left the trade of a bookseller for the army, and served with credit in America. He was, after his father, editor of the London Magazine, and wrote a history of England, 10 vols. 8vo.—the Pocket Peerage of England, Scotland, and Ireland—besides Joe Thompson, a novel, and other works. He died 1769, aged 50.

KIMCHI, David, a Jewish rabbi at the beginning of the 13th century, born in Spain. His commentary on the Old Testament is much valued, as well as his Hebrew dictionary, best edited 1506, folio, and Grammar, 1545. He was, in consequence of his learning and eloquence, appointed 1232, to settle the disputes between the synagogues of France and Spain, about the works of Maimonides. His brothers Joseph and Moses were likewise eminent in literature.

KINASTON, Francis, son of Sir Edward, was born in Shropshire, and educated at Oriel college, Oxford. He took his master's degree at Cambridge, and when introduced at court was knighted. He translated into Latin Chaucer's Troilus and Cressida, and also published in 1636 the constitutions of the Musæum Minervæ, a learned society, of which he was the first president. He died 1642.

KING, John, an English prelate, born at Wornall, Bucks, 1559, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford. He became chaplain to queen Elizabeth, dean of his college, 1605, and bishop of London, 1611. He died 30th March, 1621. He was an eloquent speaker in the star chamber, according to Coke, and so eminent as a preacher, that king James called him the king of preachers. He published lectures on Jonah, besides sermons.

KING, Henry, son of the preceding, was born at Wornall, Jan. 1591, and educated partly at Thame school, and Westminster, and admitted student of Christ church, 1608. He was chaplain to James I. and was made archdeacon of Colchester, canon of Christ church, and in 1638 dean of Rochester, and 1641 bishop of Chichester. Though suspected with truth of puritanical principles, he was treated with great harshness during the civil wars. At the restoration he recovered his bishopric, and died Oct. 1669, universally esteemed as the epitome of all honours and virtues. He published Sermons—Exposition of the Lord's Prayer—the Psalms of David turned into metre—poems, elegies, sonnets, &c.—Latin and Greek poems.

KING, John, second son of the bishop of London, was student, and afterwards canon of Christ church, Oxford, and canon of Windsor. He was also public orator of the university, and died 1639. He is author of Oratio Panegyrica de Caroli Principis in Hispan. Adventu—Gratulatio pro Carolo Reduce, &c.—Cenotaphium Jacobi, &c.—besides sermons.

KING, Edward, a promising young man, fellow of Christ's college, Cambridge, 1633. He was soon after drowned as he was passing from Chester to Ireland, a melancholy circumstance which gave birth to the beautiful poem of Lycidas, by his friend Milton. A collection of his poems has been published, which does credit to his abilities as a favourite of Apollo.

KING, William, a humourous English writer, born in London, 1663, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ Church, Oxford, where he was student. In 1688 he appeared before the public as the defender of Wickliffe against the calumnies of Varillas, in a manner strongly expressive of his wit and learning, and at the same time he determined to follow the law as his profession. He took his degree of LL.D. 1692, and by the favour of Tillotson, the primate, was admitted to plead in the courts of civil and ecclesiastical law. In 1694 his Animadversion on Molesworth's pretended Account of Denmark, which had offended the Danes, was so much approved, that he was appointed secretary to the princess Anne of Denmark. In 1697 the literary world was engaged in the controversy about the epistles of Phalaris, and Dr. King published on the occasion, two letters addressed to Mr. Boyle, for which he was severely handled by Dr. Bentley. Though fully qualified to shine as an advocate, as he evinced in the case of lord Anglesea's divorce, yet he shrunk from the laborious fatigues of active business, better pleased with the character of a polite writer, whose powers were occasionally called into action by a spirit of satire, or the wish to amuse by facetious sallies. By degrees, however, a comfortable independence was dissipated in pleasure and indolence; and Dr. King was, by the interest of his friends, lords Rochester and Pembroke, appointed, about 1702, judge of the high court of the admiralty in Ireland, sole commissioner of prizes, keeper of the records in Birmingham tower, and vicar-general to the primate. These honourable and lucrative offices, however, could not fix the giddy attention of Dr. King; he preferred wit and the muses to active life and independence, and resigned all his employments, and returned to London about 1708. In 1710 he was engaged with Swift, Oldsworth, Mrs. Manley, and others in the publication of the Examiner, in vindication of the queen's measures, and of the new ministry; and at the trial of Sacheverell, he employed his pen in the happiest vein of satire against the Whigs. In 1711 he was, by the friendship of Swift, appointed to the office of gazetteer, worth 250*l.* per annum. But such was the indolence of his disposition, and the fickleness of his mind, that oppressed with the idea of sitting up occasionally till three or four o'clock, to correct the press, he resigned the appointment the midsummer, next year. He soon after found his health decline, and shutting himself up for some time against all society, he died at some lodgings opposite Somerset-house, provided him by his friend, lord Clarendon, 25th Dec. 1712. He was interred in the north cloisters of Westminster-abbey. This singular man, though apparently chargeable with levity, was in his real character, virtuous and religious, in his dealings conscientious, and though fond of trifles, entertaining in his conversation, sincere and benevolent in his disposition, and so tender-hearted that tears would often flow profusely on the least moving occasion. Besides the pieces already mentioned, he wrote, Historical Account of Heathen Gods and Heroes, for the use of Westminster school—the life of M. A. Antoninus, from Madame Dacier—Dialogues of the Dead—a Journey to London, after the manner of Lister—the Transactioneer—the Art of Love—the Art of Cookery—Rufinus, &c.—Britain's Palladium. His original works in verse and prose were published, 3 vols. 8vo. 1776.

KING, William, archbishop of Dublin, was born at Antrim, 1st Dec. 1650, and educated at the school of Dungannon, after which he entered at Trinity college, Dublin. He was patronised by archbishop Parker, of Tuam, and soon distinguished himself by his abilities as a writer in defence of the protestant cause in Ireland. He entered the lists against Manby, dean of Londonderry, who had lately become a convert to the catholic faith, and who vindicated his conduct in a pamphlet. His exertions in this controversy appeared so meritorious that he was made dean of St. Patrick, and became a most active and indefatigable supporter of the revolution, though exposed to personal danger and constant persecution in consequence of the temporary success of the catholics, and of the cause of James II. in Ireland. After the battle of the Boyne, he was promoted to the see of Derry. In 1691 he published, "the State of the Protestants in Ireland, under James II." and afterwards applied himself sedulously to promote union and concord in his diocess. In 1702 appeared in 4to. his celebrated work, "De Origine Mali," in which he supports that the evils which exist in the world are not inconsistent with the goodness of God. This able performance, though well received at home, excited the censure of foreign critics, and among others was opposed by Bayle and Leibnitz. The work was translated into English by Edm. Law, afterwards bishop of Carlisle, with notes, &c. and a refutation of the several opinions which militated against the doctrine of the author. The third edition of the translation, 2 vols. 8vo. appeared 1739. In 1702 he was translated to the see of Dublin, and at three different times was one of the lords justices of Ireland. He died at Dublin, 8th May, 1729. His other works were, a Discourse concerning the Inventions of Men in the Worship of God, 1694, which engaged him in a controversy with Boyce, one of the dissenters of his diocess—sermons, &c.

KING, Peter, chancellor of England, was born at Exeter, 1669. His father, who was a grocer and salter, intended him for an assistant in his business: but the son, after being engaged some years in the shop, at last broke from the obscurity of an humble trade. He had devoted his leisure hours to laborious study, and he was advised by his maternal uncle, Mr. Locke, who left him half his library at his death, to improve himself further by studying at Leyden, and afterwards he entered at the Inner Temple. Here his superior abilities and his unceasing application, raised him soon to eminence, and after distinguishing himself at the bar, he obtained a seat in the House of Commons in 1699, for Beeralston, Devon. But though raised to consequence by the practice of the law, he did not forget literary pursuits; his "Inquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, &c. of the Primitive Church," appeared in 1692; and in 1702 he published the History of the Apostle's creed, with critical observations on its several articles, two works of great merit and extensive popularity. In 1708 he was made recorder of London, and knighted by queen Anne. the next year he was one of the managers of the House of Commons in the affair of Sacheverell; and at the accession of George I. he was raised to the office of chief-justice of the Common Pleas. In 1725 he was created a peer, and immediately succeeded lord Macclesfield as lord chancellor. Though his abilities were great, yet it is said the public expectation was disappointed by his conduct in chancery, as more of his decrees were repealed by the lords than had been known for the short time he presided in the court of equity. He resigned the seals in 1733; and, weakened by a paralytic disorder, died at his seat, at Ockam, Surrey, July 22, 1734, leaving four sons and two daughters, and a widow, daughter of Richard Seys, of Boverton, Glamorganshire, esq.

KING, William, an English writer, son of the Rev. Peregrine King, was born at Stepney, Middlesex, 1685. He was educated at Salisbury, and Baliol college, Oxford; and in 1718, was made principal of St. Mary hall, by lord Arran, the chancellor, to whom he was secretary. In 1722 he resigned his headship upon becoming candidate to represent the university, but was defeated by Dr. Clarke, and then went to Ireland. While in that kingdom, he wrote his "Toast," an epic poem, conveying much satire, which he did not publish, but dispersed among his friends. At the dedication of the Radcliffe library in 1749, he spoke a Latin oration in the Oxford theatre, and was universally applauded, and deserved the high encomiums of T. Warton, in his Triumphs of Isis. Dr. King, in his political principles, was a strenuous tory, and not much affected to the Hanoverian succession; and in those times of violent party, he did not escape the abuse of the hirelings of ministry. He published about 1754, an "Apology," in 4to. in which he boldly attacked his adversaries, and refuted their frivolous and malevolent accusations. He published the first five volumes of South's sermons, and was esteemed for his wit and learning, and for great independence of spirit. He died 1763.

KING, sir Edmund, a surgeon and chymist, esteemed by Charles II. who is said to have spent much time in his laboratory. He attended the king in his last illness, and was ordered 1000*l.* by the privy council, which he never received. Some of his papers on ants, on the transfusing of blood from a calf to a sheep, and on animalcules in pepper, are found in the philosophical transactions. The time of his death is unknown.

KING, John Glen, D.D. a native of Norfolk, educated at Caius College, Cambridge. He was chaplain to the English factory at Petersburg, and was appointed medallist to the empress of Russia, at whose request he undertook a work on medals, but died 1787, before its completion. He published, the Rites and Ceremonies of the Greek Church, with an account of its Doctrines, Worship, and Discipline—Observations on the climate of Russia, &c. with a View of the Flying Mountains, near Petersburg—Observations on the Barberini Vase.

KING, Edward, a learned antiquary, was born in Norfolk, in 1735. He was educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge, from whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn, was called to the bar, and became recorder of Lynn. In 1767 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and, in 1770, a member of that of Antiquaries, of which last he became president, on the death of dean Milles, in 1784; but being set aside at the next election, he withdrew from the society. He died April 16, 1807. Mr. King published—1. An Essay on the English Constitution. 2. Hymns to the Supreme Being. 3. Proposals for a Marine School. 4. Morsels of Criticism, 4to. and 3 vols. 8vo. 5. Considerations on the National Debt. 6. Remarks concerning Stones said to have fallen from the Clouds, 4to. 7. Vestiges of Oxford Castle, fol. 8. Munimenta Antiqua, 3 vols. fol. 9. Remarks on the Sigus of the Times, 4to. This was answered by bishop Horsley.—W. B.

KINSEY, James, LL.D. was a delegate from New-Jersey to the first congress in 1774, but resigned his seat in November of the following year. He was active in the cause of the revolution, and a member of the committee of correspondence for Burlington county. In November, 1789, he was appointed chief-justice of New Jersey, and died at Burlington, January 4th, 1802, aged 70.

KIPPINGIUS, Henry, a native of Rostock, educated in the university there, where he took the degree of M. A. He was pressed for a soldier, and served in the army; but when observed by a Swedish counsellor with a Latin book in his hand, his fortunes and his merits became known, and he was made the librarian of the noble inquirer, by whose interest also he procured the place of sub-rector of Bremen university. He wrote a supplement to the History of John Pappus—treatises on the Creation—on Roman Antiquities, &c. and died 1678.

KIPPIS, Andrew, eminent as a biographer, was born in 1725, at Nottingham, and educated under Dr. Doddridge, at Northampton. He first settled as a dissenting teacher at Boston, Lincolnshire, 1746, and four years after removed to Dorking, Surrey, and in 1753 became the minister of the congregation of Princes-street, Westminster. In 1763, he engaged as philological tutor in Coward's academy, for the education of dissenting ministers, and afterwards acquired such eminence as a writ ter, that he was created D.D. by the university of Edinburgh, and admitted fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies in London. Dr. Kippis died 1795, in Westminster, and was buried in Bunhill-fields' burying ground. The best known of his works is the Biographia Britannica, of which he began to publish a new edition in 1777, and of which five volumes appeared, and a sixth was nearly ready for the press before his death. He published, besides, a Vindication of Protestant Dissenting Ministers in their application to parliament, 1773, which created a controversy, though in amicable terms, between him and Dean Tucker—the Life of Captain Cook, 4to. 1788—the Life of Dr. Lardner prefixed to the edition of his works, 1788—several sermons, and tracts: and he was also concerned for some years in the Monthly Review, and afterwards in the Library, a periodical work in 1761, which did not succeed; and he also wrote the History of Knowledge, &c. which so much recommended the sale of the new Annual Register. The style of Dr. Kippis was clear, elegant, and pleasing, and from his great application, and extensive reading, he was a man of intelligence, learning, and judgment.

KIRCH, Mary Margaret, a native of Leipzig, daughter of Matthias Winkelman, a Lutheran divine. She married, in 1692, Godfrey Kirch, an astronomer of eminence of Luben, in Lower Lusatia, who, when appointed royal astronomer, in 1700, in the newly established academy of sciences at Berlin, found in his wife an intelligent assistant, and an able calculator. She discovered, in 1702, a comet, on which she and her husband published some observations, and in 1707 she observed that remarkable aurora borealis which the astronomers of Europe, and particularly the Paris academy of sciences noticed in their memoirs. The husband died 1710, and the following year his wife published a Discourse on the approaching conjunction of Jupiter, Saturn, &c. This respectable woman, equally eminent for her private virtues, died at Berlin, 1720, aged 50. Her son, Christian Frederic, acquired some celebrity by his writings, and as astronomer to the Berlin academy of sciences, and died there 1740, aged 46.

KIRCHER, Athanasius, a Jesuit, born 1601, at Fulda, in Germany, taught at Wurtzburg, in Franconia, and then went to settle in the Jesuits' college at Avignon, 1635, and from thence passed to Rome, where he was professor of mathematics and Hebrew. He died at Rome 1680. His works are very numerous, but rather curious than useful, amounting to 22 vols. fol. 11 in 4to. and 3 in 8vo. He is described as ridiculously fond of hieroglyphical characters and inscriptions. The chief of his works are, Œdipus Ægyptiacus, &c. 4 vols. fol.—Ars Magnesia—Lingua Ægyptiaca Restituta—Mundus Subterraneus, &c.—Organon Mathematicum, &c.—Ars Magna Sciendi, &c.

KIRCHER, Conrad, of Augsburg, is known by his Greek concordance of the Old Testament, Frankfort, 1602, containing the Hebrew words in alphabetical order, with the corresponding Greek words placed under.

KIRCHMAN, John, a learned German born at Lubeck, 1575. He studied at Frankfort, Jena, and Strasburg, and after acquiring celebrity as a scholar, he was invited by the magistrates of Lubeck, in 1613, to undertake the office of rector of their college, which he executed with great reputation. He died 20th March, 1643. He wrote "de Funeribus Romanorum"—de Annulis, &c.

KIRCHMAN, N. an eminent professor of philosophy at Petersburg, who was unfortunately killed by a ball of fire, while he was making experiments on electricity, and endeavouring to draw down the electric fluid from the clouds, 6th Aug. 1758.

KIRCHMAYER, John Gasper, professor of logic at Wittemberg, was born at Uffenheim in Franconia, and died 1700, aged 65. He was a learned man and published some valuable commentaries on Corn. Nepos, Tacitus, Cicero, Sallust, and Pliny—Orations and Poems—a treatise de Balamo, &c.

KIRK, Colonel, an English officer in the service of James II. who disgraced himself by his cruelties in the west of England against the unfortunate abettors of Monmouth's rebellion in 1685. To the most wanton barbarity, it is said that he added lust of the most offensive nature, though some are inclined to doubt the truth of his barbarities mentioned in Pomfret's poem. It is said that James, in his wish to make converts to the catholic religion solicited this monster, who rudely replied, that when quartered at Tangier he had promised the dey, when he changed religion he would become a Mahometan. Kirk was in the army under King William. The year of his death is unknown.

KIRKLAND, Thomas, a physician of eminence who died at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Leicestershire, 1798, aged 77. He was member of the medical societies of Edinburgh and London, and acquired some celebrity as an intelligent writer and a popular practitioner. He wrote an inquiry into the state of Medical Surgery, 2 vols. 8vo.—Observations on Pott's Remarks on Fractures—Commentary on Apoplectic and Paralytic Affections, 8vo.—Treatise on Childbed Fevers, 8vo.—Thoughts on Amputation.

KIRKLAND, Samuel, an American missionary to the Indians, was a native of Norwich, Connecticut, and graduated at the college of New-Jersey in 1765. After having spent some time among the Seneca Indians to learn their language, he was, in 1766, ordained a missionary, and devoted his attention to the Oneida tribe, among whom he laboured for more than 40 years. He died at Paris, New-York, where he resided, in 1808, in the sixty-seventh year of his age.

KIRSTENIUS, Peter, professor of physic at Upsal, and in the service of queen Christina, was born at Breslaw in Silesia, 25th Dec. 1577. He applied himself assiduously to literature, and to botany and philosophy, and after studying for fourteen years at Leipsic, Wittemberg, and Jena, he visited the Low Countries and France, and afterwards extended his travels to Italy, Greece, and Asia. He had for some time the management of the school, and of the university of Breslaw, but he resigned it for the practice of physic, and the study of Arabic. He accompanied Oxenstiern to Sweden, and was in 1636 chosen professor of physic at Upsal, but he died 15th April, 1640. He was, according to his epitaph, well acquainted with 26 languages. His principal works are, Grammatica Arabica—Tria Specimina, &c.—Decas Sacra, &c. Vitæ quatuor Evangelistarum ex antiquissimo Codice M.S. Arabico erutæ, folio.—Notæ in S. Matthæum.

KIRSTENIUS, George, a native of Stettin, in Pomerania, eminent as a botanist, who died in Sweden 1660, aged 48. He was author of Disquisitiones Philologicæ, 4to.—Adversaria et Animadversiones in Agricola Commentaria, &c. 4to.

KLAPROTH, Martin Henry Von, professor of chemistry at Berlin, died there Jan. 1, 1817, at a very advanced age, having been a distinguished writer on that science above forty years. He was the discoverer of uranium, the zirconia, and Mellitic acid. He also made interesting experiments on copal, and completed the discovery of tellurium and titanium. His works in German make six volumes octavo.—W.B.

KLEBER, I. B. a celebrated French general, born at Strasburg, 1750. He was early devoted to architecture, and to improve his talents he was sent to Paris to refine his taste by the instruction of the well-known Chalgrin. Here by accident he saw some foreigners insulted in a coffee-house, and with noble indignation he defended them against their opponents, and thus secure in their gratitude and friendship he was prevailed to accompany them to Munich. In this new situation he obtained from Kaunitz, the son of the imperial prime minister, a lieutenancy in his regiment, but after eight years of honourable service in the Austrian army he returned to France. He was now appointed inspector of the public buildings of Upper Alsace by Galaisiere, and for six years devoted himself to the peaceful labours of his profession. The French revolution recalled him to a military life, and he obtained from Wimpfen the place of adjutant major in Custine's army. For his great and meritorious services at the taking of Mayence he was raised to the rank of general of brigade; but when faction solicited enemies to Custine, whom the revolutionary tyrants already doomed to the scaffold, Kleber had the courage not only not to accuse him, but to speak favourably of his conduct. In la Vendee he directed the attack of the island of Noirmoutier, but the cruelties exercised on the innocent royalists were too shocking for his benevolent mind; he solicited his recall, and was permitted to go to the army of the North. The defeat of the Austrians at Merber-le-Chateau, and at Marchiennes, was rapidly followed by the fall of Mons, the evacuation of Louvaine, and the siege of Maestricht, which in 10 days opened its gates to the conqueror. These victories followed by the submission of Dusseldorf, of Frankfort, and the battle of Butzbach, instead, however, of serving the gallant Kleber, rendered him suspected to the Directory, and he retired in discontent to the solitude of a country-house near Paris. Here he employed himself in digesting memoirs of his military life when Buonaparte going to Egypt called him away to follow his standard and share his glories. At the siege of Alexandria as he was scaling the walls he was wounded on the head, but he did not retire from the field of danger. When Buonaparte advanced against Cairo he left his faithful friend commander in Alexandria, and when he afterwards quitted Egypt to return to Europe he appointed him his successor with full powers. Though victorious on all sides, Kleber listened to a proposal of peace, and he signed the treaty of El-Arisch with Sir Sidney Smith, which permitted the French to return with their arms and baggage to Europe. This armistice was not approved by the English government, and after he had delivered some of his fortresses into the hands of the Turks, Kleber was informed by lord Keith that the treaty of El-Arisch was void. Undismayed at his situation, the general with great presence of mind provided against every imminent danger; he recovered the strong holds which had been given up, and he marched at last to the attack of a Turkish army at the obelisk of Heliopolis, and defeated them with great slaughter, though ten times more numerous than his own soldiers. After this victory he subdued the spirit of insurrection which had burst forth at Calro and in other places, and he now formed plans for the peaceful government of the country, and for a regular intercourse between the various towns of Egypt, when he was suddenly attacked, while walking in his garden, by Solyman, a Turk, who despatched him with four blows with a dagger, 1800. In his appearance Kleber was pleasing and comely, his stature was six feet, well proportioned; his features were mild, but his eyes were expressive, and in the field of battle his voice, otherwise soft and melodious, spoke with the terror of thunder.

KLEIST, Ewald Christian de, a native of Zeblin, in Pomerania, distinguished as an officer in the Prussian service, and as a poet. The battle of Kunnersdorff, between the Russians and Prussians, August, 1759, proved fatal to him as he was, as major, leading his men of Haussen's regiment into the thickest of the fight. His idyls, after the manner of Gesner, are much admired for their elegance and simplicity, and his moral treatises also possess merit. He wrote besides Reflections on the Military Art, 1759.

KLINGSTADT, a painter, born at Riga, 1657. He died at Paris, aged 77. His miniatures for snuff-boxes were much admired, though generally very licentious. His larger pieces were rare, but exquisitely finished, and for some of them he exacted as much as 50*l.* sterling.

KLOCKER, David, a painter, born at Hamburg. After improving himself in Italy, he settled at Stockholm, where the king liberally patronised him. His pieces, which are chiefly historical and possess merit, are preserved in Sweden. He died 1698, aged 79.

KLOPSTOCK, Frederic Theophilus, was born at Quedlinburg in 1724. After a liberal education at his native place, he was sent to study theology at Jena, where he wrote a great part of his "Messiah," which he published in 1747 at Leipsic. Though this poem was censured by some, it was admired by more; and Bodmer, with the Swiss in general, were loud in its praises. Klopstock was invited into that country, from whence he was called to Copenhagen by the most flattering promises, which were amply fulfilled. In 1771 he went to reside at Hamburg, as Danish legate, and counsellor of the Margrave of Baden, who allowed him a pension. He died there March 14, 1803. The character of Klopstock as a writer is that of a poet of fervid imagination; but though rich in imagery, and lofty in sentiment, he is frequently obscure, perplexed, and turgid. His wife was an amiable and very ingenious woman. She corresponded in English with Richardson, the novelist.—W. B.

KNAPTON, George, a portrait painter in crayons, the pupil of Richardson, and the keeper of the king's pictures, died at Kensington, 1778, aged 80.

KNELLER, Sir Godfrey, an eminent painter, born at Lubec, 1648. He was educated at Leyden, and was intended for the military profession, but his genius directed him to the drawing of figures; and after making rapid progress in the art, under the instruction of Rembrandt at Amsterdam, he went to Rome. Here he studied under Carlo, Marat, and Bernini, and then went to Venice, and afterwards came to England, where his reputation quickly recommended him to the notice of Charles II. and of the court. He continued in favour with the succeeding monarchs, and acquired such celebrity that he drew no less than ten crowned heads, besides electors and princes. William III. was particularly sensible of his abilities, he knighted him, and made him a gentleman of his privy chamber, and George I. honoured him with the title of baronet. He was also created a nobleman and knight of the holy Roman empire by Leopold, and received the degree of LL.D. from the university of Oxford. Kneller deserved these honours: no painter surpassed him in the outline and graceful disposal of his figures, and his likenesses were always considered as remarkably striking, though expressed in a flattering manner. Kneller, honoured by princes, and flattered by poets and wits, was not a little ostentatious of his consequence, he lived in great splendour at his house at Whitton, near Hampton-court, but though accused of vanity, his manners are represented as blameless. He died Oct. 27th, 1723, and was buried at Whitton, and a monument by Rysbrach, with a partial inscription by Pope, was erected to his honour in Westminster abbey.

KNIGHT, Samuel, a native of London, educated at St. Paul's school and Trinity college, Cambridge. He held two livings, and was prebendary of Ely, and arch-deacon of Berks, and also chaplain to George II. He published the lives of Colet, and of Erasmus, 8vo. and died 16th Dec. 1746, aged 72, and was buried in his church at Bluntisham, Huntingdonsire.

KNOLLES, Richard, a native of Northamptonshire, educated at Oxford. After being some time fellow of Lincoln college, he was elected master of Sandwiche school, where he became celebrated as a public teacher, and where he died, 1610. He wrote Grammaticæ Latinæ, Græcæ, et Hebraicæ Compendium—History of the Turks, 1610, folio, a valuable book, often reprinted and improved, especially by Ricaut, 1680, folio—the Lives and Conquests of the Ottoman Kings and Emperors, to 1610.—a brief Discourse of the Greatness of the Turkish Empire, &c.

KNOLLES, Sir Robert, a native of Cheshŷre, known as a warrior in the wars of Edward III. in France. From a common soldier, he became a general, and acquired both celebrity and opulence by his conquests in France. With the spoils of castles, cities, and monasteries, which he had destroyed, he built Rochester bridge, as a monument of his exploits. He died at his estate in Kent, 1407, aged 90.

KNOLLIS, Francis, an English statesman. He was born at Grays, Oxfordshire, and educated at Oxford, and when introduced at the court of Edward VI. he was distinguished for his zeal in the cause of reformation. During Mary's reign, he retired to the continent, but on Elizabeth's accession, he obtained the office of vice-chamberlain of the household, and of privy counsellor, and afterwards was made treasurer of the household, and knight of the garter. His abilities were employed on various occasions by the court, and he was one of those commissioners who sat at the trial of the unfortunate Mary, queen of Scots. He was author of a treatise against the Usurpation of Papal Bishops, 1603, 8vo. and a General Survey of the Isle of Wight, never printed, and he died 1596.

KNORR VON ROSENROT, Christian, a learned German, who died 1689, aged 53. He is supposed to be the author of Kabbala Denudata, seu Doctrina Hebræorum Transcendentalis, &c. Opus Antiquissimæ philosophiæ. &c. ex Hebræo, Sultzbach, 1677, and 3 vols. folio, 1684, Frankfurt.

KNOTT, Edward, a Jesuit, born at Peggsworth, near Morpeth, Northumberland. His real name was Matthias Wilson, and he entered among the Jesuits, 1606, and was professor of divinity in the English college at Rome. He was afterwards provincial of England, and died in London, 4th Jan. 1655-6, aged 75, and was buried at St. Pancras. He was a great disciplinarian, and possessed of extensive learning. His writings against the protestants, gave rise to Chillingworth's famous book, called the Religion of Protestants.

KNOWLER, William, an English divine, the learned translator of Chrysostom's Comment on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians. He died 1767, aged 68.

KNOWLES, Thomas, a native of Ely, educated at Ely school, and Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was made lecturer of Bury St. Edmund's, and prebendary of Ely cathedral, and died at Bury, 1802. He was an able divine, and wrote the Scripture Doctrine of the Existence and Attributes of a God, 12 sermons, 8vo.—Answer to Bishop Clayton's Essay on Spirit, for which he was made D.D. by Secker—Lord Hervey's, and Dr. Middleton's Letters on the Roman Senate—Dialogue on the Test Act—Observations on the Tithe Bill—Primitive Christianity, in Defence of the Trinity—Advice to a young Divine, in six Letters—The Passion, a sermon—Observations on the divine Mission of Moses—On Charity and Sunday Schools—A discourse on Confirmation.

KNOWLTON, Thomas, an English botanist. He was in the service of Dr. Sherard, and afterwards of lord Burlington, at Lanesborough, Yorkshire, and died 1782, aged 90. His observations on the situation of the ancient Delgovicia, and on two men of extraordinary size, and on large deer's horns found in Yorkshire, appeared in the philosophical transactions, in letters to Mr. Gatesby. He also discovered in Wallingfenmere, the moor balls, or globe conferva, called by Linnæus, Conferva Ægagrophila.

Knox, John, the famous reformer of Scotland, was born 1505, at Gifford, East Lothian, and educated at the university of St. Andrews, under the celebrated John Major. He applied himself sedulously to the study of divinity, but the conversation of Wishart, the English commissioner in Scotland, as well as the writings of Jerome and Austin, opened his mind to the gross impositions of popery. He embraced publicly the tenets of the protestants, and then retired from persecution, into Germany, but some time after returned to St. Andrews. Here he boldly began to preach against the pope, and afterwards passed over to England, where he became chaplain to Edward VI. and might have obtained a bishopric, had he not been an enemy to the liturgy and the established form of episcopacy. At the accession of Mary, he went over to the Continent, and after visiting Frankfort and Geneva, and profiting by the counsels of Calvin, he determined to return to Scotland, 1555. The reformation was already gaining ground, even in the absence of her able supporter, and Knox by his eloquence, and his manly undaunted appeals to the leading men of the country, increased the number of his converts. In 1556 he again visited Geneva, but in his absence his enemies accused him of heresy, pronounced sentence of death against him, and burnt him in effigy at Edinburgh. He heard of the violence of his persecutors, and wrote from Geneva, "An Appellation against the unjust sentence pronounced against him," &c. and also the "First Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous Regiment of Women," directed against the tyrannical measures of Mary of England, and of Mary of Lorraine, queen regent of Scotland. In 1559, he again returned to Scotland, and began effectually to establish the reformation. The kingdom was divided into 12 districts, and Edinburgh as the most important was intrusted to Knox. Regardless of the power of the queen, he publicly declared from the pulpit, that the mass established in her chapel was more frightful than 10,000 enemies, and when honoured with a conference with his royal mistress, he offended her with the freedom and boldness of his address, and violently inveighed against her marrying the popish earl of Darnley. Notwithstanding these measures so hostile to the government, Knox was respected in his person, and in 1567 he preached the sermon at the coronation of James VI. He met, however, with some opposition from his followers, who wished to establish in his church a sort of episcopacy, which proved very repugnant to his feelings, and was rejected with great indignation. He died Nov. 24, 1572, not a little afflicted at the intelligence of the bloody massacres just perpetrated at Paris. He was buried at Edinburgh, and his funeral was attended by many nobles, particularly Morton, the regent, who respected his abilities, and commended his zeal. His publications are not numerous, though it is to be lamented that he appeared as the defender of the violent and atrocious measures pursued at Edinburgh, and especially of the murder of cardinal Beatoun, once his persecutor. His History of the Reformation in Scotland was published after his death, and the fourth edition of it in folio, 1732, contains all his other pieces. Knox was twice married, and had children by both his wives. Two of his sons by his first wife became fellows of St. John's college, Cambridge, where they had received their education.

KNOX, John, a London bookseller, known as the planner of a herring fishery, and of a settlement on the north-east coast of Scotland. He published a Systematic View of Scotland, and died 1790.

KNOX, Hugh, D.D. was a native of Ireland, and born about the year 1730. He came to America in early life, and was employed for several years in Pennsylvania, and Maryland, in the instruction of youth; after which he entered the college of New-Jersey, then located at Newark, under the presidency of Mr. Burr, and received the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1754. He was a popular minister in the presbyterian church, and early in life settled in the Island of St. Croix, where he spent the remainder of his days, honoured and useful, and died at a very advanced age. He was a man of excellent talents and of distinguished literary and theological attainments as a testimony of which, he received from the university of Glasgow the degree of Doctor of Divinity. He made a number of publications, which are exceedingly creditable to his memory. They are chiefly "Sermons on Select Subjects."

☞ L.

KNOX, Henry, major-general in the army of the United States, was a native of Boston, born 25th July, 1750, and received his education at the schools in that town. He had displayed something of his military talents, as an officer of militia, antecedent to the revolution, and in consequence on his entering the army at the commencement of hostilities, was placed at the head of the artillery, in which station he served during the whole war with the highest reputation, for valour, talents, and activity, and rendered the most essential services to the country. Before entering on the duties of that appointment, he justified the confidence reposed in him by making an irruption at the head of a small party into Canada, and capturing all the ordnance and military stores deposited at St. Johns. The efficiency of the artillery and ordnance department during the whole war, was owing much to his talents and attention. He contributed much to the victory gained at the battle of Monmouth, and to the capture of Cornwallis; soon after which, he received the commission of major-general. In 1785, he was appointed secretary of war, and enjoyed the same office after the organization of the present government, till 1794, when he resigned and retired to private life. He settled at Thomastown, in Maine, where he lived greatly respected for his uprightness, frankness, and public spirit, as well as for his military services. He died October 25th, 1806, aged 56.

KNUPPER, Nicholas, a native of Leipsic, eminent as a painter. He died 1660, aged 57. His battles and conversations possessed peculiar merit.

KNUZEN, Matthias, a celebrated atheist, born at Holstein. He was very zealous in making proselytes, and his followers, who were numerous in some of the cities of the continent, and even in England, were called conscienciaries, as they regarded conscience, learning, and reason, as the only guides of man. They maintained that there was no God, no after-life, and they rejected religion, priests, and magistrates, as impositions on the world. This wild enthusiast died at the end of the 17th century. His Latin letter, and his two dialogues in defence of his opinions, were refuted by Musæus, a Lutheran professor.

KNUZEN, Martin, a native of Königsberg, professor of philosophy there. He wrote various works, but the chief is his Defence of the Christian Religion. He died 1751, aged 38.

KNIGHTON, Henry, author of a chronicle of the English history, from 950, to 1395, and of a History of the Deposition of Richard II. both preserved in the collection of English historians, published 1652, was a canon regular of Leicester.

KOEBERGER, Winceläus, a native of Antwerp, eminent as a painter. His Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, is his best piece, which is still viewed with admiration in the church of Notre Dame, at Antwerp. He died 1604, aged 70.

KOEMPFER, Engelbert, a German physician, born at Lemgow, in Westphalia, 16th Sept. 1651. After improving himself in the universities of Dantzic, Thorn, Cracow, and Konigsberg, he visited Upsal, and recommended himself to the notice of Charles XI. of Sweden, and accepted the place of secretary to the embassy, sent in 1683 to the Sophi of Persia. During this employment, he had various opportunities, which he gladly improved, of visiting the curiosities natural and artificial, in passing through Russia, in Georgia, and on the banks of the Caspian sea. For two years he resided at Ispahan, but when the ambassador prepared to return, he obtained permission to go further into the east, and he engaged himself as surgeon to the Dutch East India fleet. In his way he examined the ruins of Persepolis, and afterwards visited Gamron, Arabia Felix, the coast of Malabar, Ceylon, Bengal, and Batavia. In 1690, he accompanied the annual embassy of the Dutch to the court of Japan, and after staying two years in that distant country, he prepared to return to Europe. He quitted Batavia, Feb. 1693, and after touching at the Cape of Good Hope, reached Amsterdam in October. In 1694, he took the degree of M.D. at Leyden, but the popularity which he acquired as physician, prevented the immediate arrangement of his valuable papers and observations on subjects of natural history, botany, and mineralogy. Whilst he promised himself length of life, he found that his constitution was shattered by fatigues, in distant climates, and some family difficulties hastened his dissolution. He died 2d Nov. 1716. His MSS. and drawings were purchased of his executors, by Sir Hans Sloane, and his history of Japan appeared in London, 2 vols. fol. 1727. His Amœnitates Exoticæ, a valuable work, was published 1712.

KOENIG, Daniel, a Swiss, who translated into Latin, Arbuthnot's Tables of Ancient Coins, published at Utrecht, by professor Reitz, 1756. He died at Rotterdam, in consequence of the severe treatment which he received from the mob at Franeker, who mistook him for a spy, because he spoke French. He was only 22.

KOENIG, Samuel, brother to the preceding, was professor of philosophy, and natural law at Franeker, and afterwards became librarian to the prince of Orange, at the Hague. He was an able mathematician, and was engaged in a quarrel with Maupertuis, and in consequence of his "Appeal" written on the subject, he enlarged his reputation, and the number of his friends. He wrote various works, and died 1757.

KOERTEN, Joanna, a native of Amsterdam, whose great ingenuity and refined taste in embroidery, in drawing, in water colours, in wax models, in artificial ornaments, &c. was universally admired, and drew strangers to behold and commend the effects of her singular genius. Peter the Great, of Russia, was one of those who complimented her on her abilities. The figures and landscapes which she cut with scissors, out of paper, were much celebrated, and the fine exhibition of groups of trees, arms, eagles, crowns, &c. which she presented to the consort of Leopold, was liberally rewarded with 4000 guilders. She also executed a portrait of the emperor in the same style. She died 1715, aged 65.

KOETS, Roelof, a native of Zwoll. His abilities as a painter were universally known, and William III. of England paid particular attention to him. His portraits, it is said, amounted to 5000, and all in a very superior, and highly finished style. He died 1725, aged 70.

KOLLOCK, Henry, D.D. presbyterian minister of Savannah, Georgia, was born at New Providence, New-Jersey, December 14, 1778, and graduated at Princeton college in 1794. In December, 1800, he was ordained to the pastoral charge of the presbyterian church in Elizabethtown, New-Jersey, and after a popular ministry there of three years, was in December, 1803, appointed professor of theology in the college at which he graduated, and in connexion with that office also undertook the care of the church in Princeton. His talents, learning, and eloquence, happily qualified him for his station in that institution, and he discharged its duties with distinguished ability and acceptance. In 1806 he accepted a call to the pastoral care of the presbyterian church in Savannah, where, after employing himself in the labours of his office about thirteen years, he died on the 19th of December, 1819, in the 42d year of his age. A collection of his sermons in 4 volumes has been published since his death.  L.

KONIG, George Matthias, a learned German, born at Altdorf, in Franconia, where he became professor of poetry, and of Greek, and also librarian. He was an able scholar, and was author of a biographical dictionary, called Bibliotheca Vetus et Nova, 4to. 1678, which though censured by some, is yet possessed of merit. He died Dec. 29, 1699, aged 83.

KONIG, Emanuel, a physician of Basil, where he died 1731, aged 73. He published various works on medicines highly esteemed in Switzerland.

KORKMANN, Henry, a German lawyer in the beginning of the 17th century, author of some treatises, De Miraculis Vivorum—

De Miraculis Mortuorum—De Virginitatis Jure—De Linea Amoris.

KORTHOLT, Christian, professor of divinity at Keil, was born 15th Jan. 1633, at Burg, in the island of Femeren. He studied at Burg, Sleswick, Stettin, and Rostock, Jena, Leipsic, and Wittemberg. In 1662 he was made Greek professor at Rostock, and in 1665 removed to Keil, where he enjoyed the favour and the patronage of the duke of Holstein, and became vice-chancellor of the university. He died 31st March, 1694, greatly lamented. He wrote various works, De Veracitate, &c.—De Naturâ Philosophiæ, &c. and a valuable work on Christ, as God and Man.

KORTHOLT, Christian, grandson of the preceding, was professor of theology at Göttingen, and died in the flower of his age, 1751. He published, "Leibnitz's Latin Letters," 4 vols. and his French Letters in one volume.

KOSCIUSKO, Thaddeus, a Polish general, was born of a respectable family, and educated at the military school of Warsaw; after which he went to France, and next to America, where he served as aid-de-camp to Washington. On his return home he was made major-general, and distinguished himself greatly in the war of 1792, but without effect. Two years afterwards the Poles again took up arms, and were headed by Kosciusko; but all his exertions were fruitless, and he was made prisoner by the Russians, who treated him with great respect; and the emperor, Paul, gave him an estate. Kosciusko now visited America the second time; and in 1798 returned to Europe, and settled in France, where Buonaparte endeavoured in vain to tempt him into his service. He died at Soleure, in Switzerland, Oct. 16, 1817.—W. B.

KOTTER, Christopher, a fanatic, who lived at Sprottow. In 1616 he began his enthusiastic career, and threatened the princes and nations of Europe with terrible judgments, according to the directions, as he said, of an angel. He was pillored in the emperor's dominions, and afterwards banished, and he then retired to Lusatia, where he died 1647, aged 62. He was the friend of Comenius, and his reveries with those of two others, were published at Amsterdam, 1657, and called, Lux in Tenebris.

KOTZEBUE, Augustus Von, was born at Weimar, May 30, 1761. At the age of sixteen he was sent to the college of Jena, and from thence to Duisburg, where he organized a company of juvenile performers. In 1779 he returned to Jena, to study the law, instead of which most of his time was devoted to the play-house. In 1781 he became secretary to general Bauer, whom he accompanied to Petersburg, where he produced a tragedy, called "Demetrius, Czar of Muscovy." Here he married a Russian lady, and was appointed president of the civil government at Revel. After this he wrote a number of dramas; some of which obtained great popularity on the continent and in England. In 1789 he lost his wife, on which he went to Paris, and next to Vienna, where he became superintendent of the imperial theatre; but resigned that place, and returned to Russia. He had scarcely entered that country, before he was arrested by the orders of Paul, and sent to Siberia, but did not remain long in exile; and on his arrival at Petersburg, was taken into the emperor's favour. In 1813 he was appointed consul-general at Königsberg; but the climate disagreeing with him, he resigned the situation, and went to Manheim, where he was assassinated, March 23, 1819, by a fanatical student of Jena, named Sand, who then stabbed himself; but recovered from his wound, and was beheaded. The works of Kotzebue are too numerous to be specified.—W. B.

KOUCK, Peter, a Dutch painter, who after travelling to Constantinople, settled at Antwerp, and became principal painter to Charles V. and died 1550, aged 50. His views of Constantinople, &c. are highly valued.

KOULI KHAN, Thamas, or Nadir, a celebrated warrior, born 1687, in a village, in the province of Chorasán, in Persia. He was the son of a shepherd, but he quitted the humble occupation of his youth, and by selling some of his father's sheep, he collected a number of desperate followers, who, attached to him, shared his dangers and his booties in plundering caravans, and attacking defenceless travellers. By degrees he saw himself at the head of 6000 brave adherents, and became so formidable, that his assistance was solicited by the Shah Thamas, whose throne was usurped by Eschref, the chief of the Aghwans. With the most impetuous valour, Kouli attacked the enemy, and soon routed them, and then seated his master on the throne of his ancestors at Ispahan. Thus victorious, he pursued the flying Aghwans to Candahar, and after carrying terror and desolation before him, and obtaining an immense booty, he returned to Ispahan. Instead, however, of finding Thamas engaged in a Turkish war, as he had recommended, he saw him lulled into effeminate security, and therefore, displeased with his conduct, he boldly seized his person, and proclaiming his son, an infant, six months old, Sophi of Persia, he declared himself regent of the kingdom. Eager after military fame, Kouli immediately made war against the Turks, with the most astonishing success, displaying every where in his conduct, valour, prudence, and heroism. On the death of the young king, 1737, he signified his intention of resigning his honours; but the nobles, excited by his private intrigues, interfered, and invested him with the sovereign power, and seated him on the throne of Persia. Now elevated to the height of his ambition, he wisely saw that war was the only support of his greatness, and therefore with a numerous army, devoted to him by his liberality, and by his personal valour, he marched against India. The Mogul empire was rapidly conquered, 200,000 men were put to the sword, and a booty of 145 millions rewarded the victor at the taking of Delhi. To the possession of the Mogul dominions, was soon added the conquest of the Usbec Tartars, and the capture of Buchara, their chief city, and on all sides, wherever he turned his arms, he found no power able to withstand his attacks. Such astonishing successes required wisdom and decision to cement them, but unfortunately, when his abilities were wanted to give stability to his immense dominions, Kouli became capricious, proud, and tyrannical. With injudicious violence he attempted to introduce the religion of Omar among his subjects, and to render his decrees more terrible, he put to a cruel death the priests who opposed his measures, and even sacrificed his own son to his ferocious measures. This conduct revolted the attachment of the Persians, and the nobles who foresaw in the capricious cruelty of their master their own destruction, conspired against him, and assassinated him, 8th June, 1747, after he had reigned 20 years over one of the most extensive and powerful empires of the world.

KRACHENINNIKOW, Stephen, a Russian naturalist, educated at Petersburg. He was engaged 10 years in making observations on the natural productions of Kamtschatka, and the neighbouring country, and on his return, in 1743, he was made associate of the academy, and in 1753, professor of botany and natural history. His travels, &c. were published in Chappe d'Auteroche's Account of Siberia. He died 1755, aged 42.

KRANTZ, Albert, a famous historian and divine, born at Hamburg. He became professor of philosophy and divinity at Rostock, 1482, and in 1498 was elected dean of the chapter of Hamburg, where he died 1517. The best known of his learned works are, Chronica Regnorum, Aquiloniorum Daniæ, Sueciæ, &c.—Saxonia sive de Saxoniæ Gentis Origine, &c. lib. 13. ad ann. 1501—Vandalia, sive de Vandalorum Origine, &c.—Metropolis, sive Historia Ecclesiastica Saxoniæ, and other works.

KRAUSE, Francis, a native of Augsburg, the disciple of Piazzetta, and eminent as a historical painter. Though his pieces possessed merit, he died poor, after a residence of some years in France, 1754, aged 48.

KRESA, Father, a native of Moravia, confessor to the king and queen of Bohemia, where he died 1715, aged 67. He was well acquainted with Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese, and wrote Analysis Speciosa Trigonometriæ Sphericæ, &c.

KRUGER, John Christian, author of poems and comedies, and translator of Marivaux's Theatre into German, acquired also some reputation as an actor, and died at Hamburg, 1750, aged 28.

KUHLMAN, Quirinus, a famous fanatic, born at Breslaw in Silesia, 1651. While his learning promised the fairest fruits, he was attacked at the age of 18, by a violent illness, from which he recovered with difficulty. But with returning health, he displayed the wildest manners, and pretending to have held converse with departed spirits and aerial beings, he set up for a prophet. He went to Holland, where the reading of Behmen's works increased the extravagance of his reveries. Though seemingly devoted to spiritual affairs exclusively, he had some respect for the things of the world; he kept some concubines, and extorted money from the credulous, by threatening terrible and approaching vengeance if they did not satisfy his wants. After wandering over England, France, and the East, he was at last stopped at Moscow, and burnt, 3d Oct. 1689, on account of some prophecies which were interpreted as improper and seditious. He published Prodromus Quinquennis Mirabilis, 1674, and other things.

KUHNUS, Joachim, a learned native of Gripswalde, Pomerania, who after studying at Stade and Jena, became principal of the college of Oetingen, in Swabia, and three years after, in 1676, was elected Greek professor of the university of Strasburg. The professorship of Hebrew was afterwards added to his other appointments, and he acquired great celebrity by his publications, and in the number of his pupils. He died 11th Dec. 1697, aged 50. He published excellent editions with notes, of Ælian, Diogenes, Pausanias, besides other works.

KUICK, John Van, a painter of Dordt, who was accused of heresy by the Jesuits, in consequence of some offence which he had given to the fraternity, and cruelly burnt to death, 1572, aged 42.

KUNCKETT, John, an able chymist, and ingenious philosopher, born in the dutchy of Sleswic, 1630. He died 1702. He published at London Observations Chymicæ, 1678, 12mo. and discovered the phosphorus of urine, and introduced several useful improvements in the arts, and philosophy.

KUNZE, John Christopher, D.D. a learned and distinguished clergyman, was fourteen years minister of the German Lutheran church in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and was also a professor in the college in that city. In 1784 he removed to New-York, where he was twenty-three years minister of the Lutheran church. He was also professor of Oriental languages in Columbia college. He was born in 1744, and died Senior of the German Lutheran church in New-York, July 24th, 1807. His large and valuable cabinet of coins and medals was presented after his death to the New-York Historical Society.

L.

KUPIESKI, John, a painter of Bohemia, born 1667, who studied in Italy, and acquired such reputation as to deserve and enjoy the patronage of the emperor Charles, III. of the Czar Peter, and other princes.

KUSTER, Ludolf, a learned critic, born at Blomberg, in Westphalia, 1670. The abilities which he early displayed recommended him as tutor to the sons of the Prussian prime minister, and his services were rewarded by the promise of a professorship in the university of Berlin. In the mean time he travelled over Holland, Germany, France, and England, where at last he produced, after four years' laborious investigation, his edition of Suidas, in 3 vols. folio, at Cambridge. The work was honourably received by the university, the editor was complimented with the degree of doctor, and advantageous offers were made to him to settle there. He, however, declined them all, to take possession of his Berlin professorship, which, together with the place of king's librarian, he soon after relinquished with capricious indifference, and went to Amsterdam, where he published his Aristophanes, in 1710, and an edition of Mills's Greek Testament. From Amsterdam he went to Rotterdam, and then to Antwerp, where he was prevailed upon by the Jesuits to renounce the protestant tenets for the catholic faith in 1713. This dereliction of his religion, or his services to literature, recommended him to the French king, who granted him a pension of 2000 livres, and appointed him associate of the academy of inscriptions. Kuster did not long enjoy his honours at Paris.

He died the 12th Oct. 1716, of an abscess in the pancreas, aged only 46. His other works were an edition of Jamblicus's life of Pythagoras—Historia Critica Homerii—Bibliotheca Novorum Librorum ab 1697, usque 1699, 5 vols.—De Vero Usu Verborum Mediorum apud Græcos, a valuable book, &c.

KYRP, Jacob, a landscape painter of eminence, who founded the academy of painting at Dordt, 1643. His son, Albert, rose superior to his father in fame, and excelled him in the delicacy of his colouring, and the variety and correctness of his pieces.

KYD, Thomas, a writer in the age of Elizabeth. He published 1595 Pompey the Great, a play, translated from the French of Garnier.

KYDERMYNSTER, Richard, abbot and historian of the Benedictine convent of Winchcombe, Gloucestershire, was born at Worcester. Besides the History of his Convent in 5 books, he wrote some pieces against the Reformation, &c. and died at his abbey, 1531.

KYNASTON, John, an English divine, born at Chester, 5th Dec. 1728, and educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, 1751. He gained great reputation in the university by his oration, "De Impietate C. Corn. Tacito, falsò objectatâ," on the foundation of Sir Francis Bridgman, delivered in the chapel of his college, 1761, and published. He wrote some other things, and died in consequence of breaking his left arm very near the shoulder, June, 1783.

KYNWELMARSH, Francis, a native of Essex, who studied the law at Gray's-Inn, and assisted Gascoigne in his translation of Euripides's tragedy of Jocasta. He wrote some poetry of considerable merit, which, together with the poetical trifles of his brother Anthony, are preserved in the Paradise of Dainty Devices, 1576.

KYRLE, John, the celebrated man of Ross, immortalized by the muse of Pope, and more by his own beneficent actions. With an estate of only 500*l.* a year, he was the blessing of his native county of Hereford; he built a church, endowed hospitals, and had the good fortune to be seconded in his charitable works by the liberality of his opulent neighbours. He died 1724, aged 90, but "no monument, inscription, stone," as the poet observes, mark his remains.

LAB

LABADIE, John, a famous enthusiast, born 10th Feb. 1610, at Bourg, in Guienne. He was educated among the Jesuits of Bourdeaux, but quitted their society, when his studies were completed; though some affirm that he was disgracefully expelled for his irregularities and hypocrisy. He came to Paris, where as an itinerant preacher he acquired celebrity, and was presented by Coumartin, bishop of Amiens, to a canoury in his cathedral. At Amiens the singularity of his doctrines soon collected a number of devotees around him; but when his intrigues with the nuns produced his disgrace, he retired to Bazas, and afterwards to Toulouse. There his opinions had such effect upon the nuns that they were persuaded to listen to his spiritual harangues, with their person stark naked, while in thus imitating Adam and Eve, they aspired to superior mental purity; but these indecorous meetings were no sooner mentioned to the archbishop than Labadie was dismissed in disgrace. He next excited the public attention at Montauban, and then passed to Orange, and next to Geneva, where he resided some years. In 1666 he went to Middleburg, where his followers became very numerous. He afterwards retired to Erfurt, but soon left it in consequence of the war, and took up his residence at Altona, in Holstein, where a violent colic carried him off in 1674, in his 64th year. In his manners Labadie was austere, with a mixture of candour, piety, and hypocrisy, and he had the art of insinuating his principles with such efficacy that the most learned and the most virtuous became converts to his wild opinions. Among his warmest admirers were Mademoiselle Schurman, Madame Bourignon, Elizabeth princess Palatine, and others. With an air of gravity and of affected sanctity, he imposed upon the credulity of his pupils, and after beginning with ghostly advice, and the most serious exhortations to mental innocence and bodily purity, he often ended with the grossest sensualities. His mystical opinions, which once were very prevalent, and procured to his followers the appellation of Labadists, are no longer regarded. In his particular tenets he maintained that God might deceive, that the Holy Scriptures were not necessary to salvation, that the Old Testament was carnal, and that the New, regarding only the state of the spirit, made all men free; that the observation of the Sabbath was unnecessary; that the church was divided into two parts, the degenerate and the regenerate, or his followers, and that self-denial and the mortification of the senses, cherished and improved by mental prayer, would raise man to the possession of God, and to a familiar conversation with him. The propagation of these heterogeneous and inconsistent doctrines for a while had an astonishing influence on the multitude, and almost excited civil war in some of the provinces of Holland.

LAB

LABAT, John Baptist, a Dominican of Paris, professor of philosophy at Nancy. He went in 1693 as missionary to America, and returned in 1705 to France. He was for some time at Boulogne, and died at Paris, 6th January, 1738. He published Nouveau Voyage aux Isles de l'Amerique, 6 vols. 8vo.—Voyages en Espagne et Italie, 8 vols. 12mo.—Nouvelle Relation de l'Afrique Occidentale, 5 vols. 12mo. compiled from others—Voyage du Chevalier Marchais en Guinée, 4 vols. 12mo.—Relation Historique de l'Ethiopie Occidentale, from Cavazzi's Latin works, 4 vols. 12mo.

LABBE, Philip, a Jesuit of Bourges, of great learning, prodigious memory, and indefatigable application. He died at Paris, 1667, aged 60, highly respected as an able critic, and an excellent private character. His works are, de Byzantinæ Historiæ Scriptoribus, folio—Nova Bibliotheca MS. 2 volumes, folio—Bibliotheca Biblicarum, fol.—Concordia Chronologica, 5 volumes, folio—Concordia Sacræ et Profanæ Chronologiæ, &c. 12mo.—Le Chronologue Francois, 6 vols. 12mo.—Bibliotheca Antejanseniana, 4to.—Notitia Dignitatum Imperii Rom. 12mo.—De Scriptoribus Eccles. Dissertatio, 2 vols. 8vo.—Conciliorum Collectio Maxima, 17 vols. fol.—Lives of learned Jesuits, &c. and some valuable works on grammar and Greek poetry.

LABBE, Louisa, a poetess, called the fair rope-maker, because she married a rich rope-maker of Lyons, who at his death left her all his property. For some time she aspired to distinction in arms, and conducted herself courageously at the siege of Perpignan, in men's clothes. Her attachment to literature was also very great, and whilst as a courtesan she extorted a high premium for the possession of her charms, she was more condescending to men of letters, and admitted them to her favours gratis. Her works, in prose and verse, were printed at Lyons, 1555 and 1762, 12mo. and are considered as possessing high merit. She died 1566, aged 40.

LABEO, Quintus Fabius, a Roman consul, who possessed great literary talents, and is said to have assisted Terence in the composition of his plays.

LABEO, Antistius, a Roman lawyer, who opposed the government of Augustus, and refused the consulship when offered to him by the emperor. His father was one of Cæsar's murderers, and patriotism and opposition to tyranny were hereditary in the family. A tribune of that name caused the condemnation of Metellus, B.C. 148.

LABERIUS, Decimus, a Roman knight, who excelled as a writer of satirical productions, or mimes, for the stage. Cæsar to disgrace him obliged him to repeat one of his pieces on the stage, and the poet with great presence of mind spoke with censorious humour against the oppressor of his country. He died 44 B.C.

LABOUREUR, John le, a native of Montmorency, who from the humble occupation of a gentleman's servant, rose to some consideration, and became an abbé prior of Juvigné, and almoner to the king, and commander of the order of Saint Michael. He died 1675, aged 52. He published the Collection of Monuments of illustrious Persons buried in the Celestines' Church at Paris, 4to. 1642—the History of Marshal Guebriant, with the Genealogy of Budos and other families in Brittany—the Memoirs of Michael Castelnau, and other works. His brother Lewis wrote some poetry, and died 1679, and his uncle Claude, who was an ecclesiastic, published, in 1643, notes and corrections on the Breviary of Lyons, &c.

LACARRY, Giles, a French Jesuit, who died 1684, aged 79. Though much employed as a professor of philosophy and theology, he wrote some useful works, Historia Galliarum sub Præfectis Prætoris Galliarum, 4to.—Historia Coloniarum a Gallis in Externas Nationes Missarum, 4to.—de Regibus Francia et Lege Salica—Historia Romana, 4to.—Notitia Provinciarum Imperii Utriusque cum notis, 4to.—besides editions of Vell. Paterculus, and Tacitus de Germ.

LA COLONIE, John Martin de, a native of Perigord, who died at Bourdeaux, 1759, aged 85. He served in the Austrian army, and obtained the rank of marshal. He wrote military memoirs, published Frankfort 1730, and Brussels 1739, 2 vols. 12mo. and also a History of Bourdeaux, 3 vols. 12mo.

LACOMBE, James, a French historian, born at Paris 1724. He is author of some popular works, Abregé Chronologique de l'Histoire Ancienne—de l'Histoire du Nord—Revolutions de la Russie—Histoire de Christine, Reine de Suede, &c.

LACOMBE DE PREZEL, Honoré, brother to the preceding, was born at Paris, 1725. He is author of several Dictionaries—de Jurisprudence—de Citoyen—de Portraits et d'Anecdotes des Hommes Celebres, &c.—Another of the same name wrote a useful dictionary of old French, 7 vols. 8vo. 1765.

LACTANTIUS, Lucius Cælius Firmianus, a Latin father of the church, said to have been born in Africa, or according to some at Fermo in Italy. His abilities recommended him to the notice of Constantine, who made him tutor to his son Crispus. His style is much in the manner of Cicero, possessing force, elegance, and purity. Of his works the best edition is that of Paris, 2 vols. 4to. 1748.

LACY, John, an excellent actor in the reign of Charles II. with whom he was a great and familiar favourite. He wrote the Dumb Lady—the Old Troop, or Monsieur Ragou—Sir Hercules Buffoon, three tragedies. There was an English gentleman of that name, who favoured the French impostors who called themselves prophets, at the beginning of the eighteenth century, and was imprisoned for some of his publications.

LACYDAS, a Greek philosopher of Cyrene, successor to Arcesilaus in the second academy. His grief at the loss of a favourite goose was ridiculous. He died B.C. 212.

LADISLAUS I. son of Bela I. succeeded to the Hungarian throne after his brother Geisa, 1077. He was an able politician and a warlike general, and after defeating the Bohemians, Russians, Tartars, and Bulgarians, and driving away the Huns from Hungary, he marched against Dalmatia and Croatia, where his sister was cruelly treated by her husband Zuonimir, and he added those provinces to his empire. To valour in the field he also added piety at home, and deserved for his great sanctity to be canonized by Celestinus III. in 1198. He died 30th July, 1095.

LADISLAUS III. king of Hungary after his father Stephen V. was cruel and licentious. He divorced his wife to be more unrestrained with his concubines, and so offended his subjects by his oppression and immoral conduct, that he was assassinated, 1290, in the 18th year of his reign.

LADISLAUS IV. grand duke of Lithuania, and king of Poland since 1434, was made king of Hungary in 1440, on the death of Albert of Austria. He made war against the Turks and defeated their sultan Amurath II. by the valour of his general Huniades; but after making a solemn peace with his enemy he was prevailed upon by the pope's ambassador to violate it. In consequence of this, Amurath hastened to give his aggressor battle, and proved victorious in the dreadful fight near Varnes, 11th Nov. 1444. Ladislaus was slain, but though his head was carried in triumph through the Turkish camp, the conqueror honoured his remains with a most magnificent funeral.

LADISLAUS V. son of Albert of Austria, succeeded Ladislaus IV. under the protection of Huniades. It is said that he was poisoned by the Hussites, against whose sect he behaved with great rancour.

LADISLAUS VI. son of Casimir king of Poland, was raised to the throne of Hungary after Matthias Corvinus, 1490, in preference to his own brother Albert, to Maximilian of Austria, and to John the natural son of the late king. He made war against the Turks and other nations, and died after a very turbulent reign, 1516.

LADISLAUS, or LAUNCELOT, the liberal and victorious, was count of Provence and succeeded his father Charles Duras as king of Naples, 1386. His elevation was opposed by Lewis II. duke of Anjou, and by pope John XXIII. and this excited dreadful civil wars. In 1403 he seized the crown of Hungary, during the imprisonment of king Sigismund, who soon after obliged him to retire into Italy, and afterwards he was defeated by his rival Lewis on the banks of the Garigliano, in 1411. In the mean time, though defeated, he had the art to reconcile the pope to his interest; but at the moment that the pontiff promised himself tranquillity, Ladislaus marched against him and seized Rome, and afterwards turned his victorious arms against the Florentines, to whom he dictated terms of peace, 1413. Whilst promising himself greater successes, Ladislaus died suddenly at Naples, 16th Aug. 1414, aged 38. It is said that his mistress, the daughter of a physician, had been prevailed on by the vindictive Florentines to administer poison to him, so that he expired in the greatest agonies. He had been three times married, but left no issue.

LADISLAUS I. king of Poland, son of Casimir I. succeeded his brother Boleslaus II. 1081. He was fond of peace, but yet brave in war, as he defeated in three battles the Prussians and Pomeranians who wished to invade his kingdom. He died 26th July, 1102.

LADISLAUS II. king of Poland, after his father Boleslaus III. 1139, made war against his brothers, and was at last, after various successes, banished from his throne. His brother Boleslaus IV. succeeded him, and granted him Silesia at the request of Frederic Barbarossa. He died at Oldenburg, 1159.

LADISLAUS III. king of Poland in 1296, proved so oppressive in his conduct towards the clergy and the people, that his subjects revolted and placed Wenceslaus on the throne. Now a fugitive, Ladislaus learned wisdom in adversity, and on the death of his successor, by the influence of the pope, he was again placed on the throne, and showed his gratitude by the mildness, justice, and popularity of his government. He defeated the revolted Pomeranians with the assistance of the Teutonic knights; but when these warriors had seized Dantzic as the reward of their exertions, the offended king marched against them and cut to pieces their army consisting of 20,000 men. He died soon after, 10th March, 1333, highly and deservedly respected.

LADISLAUS V. surnamed Jagellon, grand duke of Lithuania, obtained the crown of Poland, 1386, by his marriage with Hedwige, daughter of Lewis king of Hungary. Hedwige had been placed on the throne of Poland, provided she took for her husband the person whom her subjects approved, and consequently Ladislaus, honoured with the affection of the queen, left the superstitions of paganism, and was baptized and raised to the sovereignty. His reign was mild but vigorous, he defeated the Teutonic Knights in frequent battles, and added Lithuania to his Polish dominions, but refused the crown of Bohemia, which was offered to him by the Hussites. He died 31st May, 1434, aged 80, universally and deservedly respected for his probity, his integrity, and all those virtues which should grace a throne.

LADISLAUS VI. king of Poland, son of Ladislaus V. was duke of Lithuania and king of Hungary, as already mentioned.

LADISLAUS, Sigismund, VII. king of Poland and Sweden after the death of his father Sigismund III. 1632, had displayed great bravery before his elevation, in his wars against the Turks, 150,000 of whom he had slain in various battles. When raised to the throne he governed with great moderation, but without forgetting the interests of his people, as he attacked the Russians who threatened him, and obliged them to make peace. He died without issue 1648, aged 52.

L'ADVOCAT, John Baptist, a Jesuit, Hebrew professor, doctor and librarian of the Sorbonne, was born in the diocess of Toul, 1709. He died at Paris 1765. He wrote a Geographical Dictionary, 8vo.—an Historical Dictionary, 2 vols. 8vo. abridged from Moreri, but since much enlarged—a Hebrew Grammar—a Tract on Councils—a Dissertation on the 67th Psalm—a Critique on some new Translations of Scripture, &c.

L'ADVOCAT, Louis Francis, author of a treatise on a new system of morals and physics, was dean of the chamber of accounts at Paris, and died there, 1735, aged 91.

LÆLIUS, Caius, a Roman consul, distinguished for his abilities as an orator and a man of learning. He was the friend of young Scipio, and is said to have assisted Terence in his plays. Another of the same name was the friend of the elder Africanus, and assisted in his victories over Asdrubal and Syphax.

LÆR, Peter, a Dutch painter, surnamed from his deformity Bamboche. Some of his pieces which were elegant, but on trifling subjects, were in the Orleans collection. He was an amiable and facetious man, and died 1675.

LAET, John de, a native of Antwerp, director of the Dutch East India Company. He died at Antwerp, 1640, and was author of some useful works—Historia Naturalis Brasiliæ, folio—Novus Orbis, folio, 1633—de Regis Hispaniæ Regnis et Opibus, 8vo.—Respublica Belgarum—Gallia—Turcici Imperii Status—Perfici Imperii Status—Vitruvius, printed by Elzivir, fol. 1649.

LÆVINUS, Torrentinus, commonly called Vander Beken, or Torrentin, was a native of Ghent, and studied at Louvaine. He made the tour of Italy, and on his return was appointed canon of Liege. He went as ambassador to Philip II. of Spain, who rewarded his services by making him bishop of Antwerp. From Antwerp he was translated to the archbishopric of Mechlin, where he died, 1595. He founded the college of Jesuits at Louvaine, and by the elegance of his Latin poetry deserved to be called the prince of Lyric poets. He also edited Suetonius, with notes.

LÆVIUS, a Roman poet, author of Love Games, and other poems now lost.

LAFITAU, Joseph Francis, a French Jesuit, missionary among the Iroquois. He published a Comparison of the Manners of the Americans, with those of Ancient Times, 2 vols. 4to.—The Discoveries of the Portuguese in the New World, 4 vols. 4to.—Remarks on Ginseng, 12mo. He died 1755.

LAFITAU, Peter Francis, brother to the preceding, was born at Bourdeaux. He distinguished himself as a preacher and a negotiator, and became such a favourite by his wit and facetiousness with pope Clement IX. that he made him bishop of Sisteron. He died 1764, aged 79. He was author of History of the Constitution Unigenitus, 2 vols. 12mo.—History of Clement II. 2 vols.—Sermons, 4 vols.—Spiritual Letters, &c.

LAGALLA, Julius Cæsar, a native of Padulla, in the kingdom of Naples. He studied at Naples, and when only 18 was made physician to the pope, and professor of logic at Rome, where he died 1623, aged 47. He was a very learned man, and wrote Disputatio de Cælo Animato, &c.

LAGERLOOF, Peter, professor of eloquence at Upsal, was employed by the king of Sweden to write the Histories, ancient and modern, of northern Europe. His Latin is considered as very correct and elegant. He died 1599, aged 51.

LAGNY, Thomas Fantet sieur de, a native of Lyons, brought up to the bar, a profession which he relinquished for his favourite study of mathematics and philosophy. By the liberal support of the duke de Noailles he studied at Paris, and was made member of the academy of sciences. After a residence of 16 years as hydrographer to the king at Rochefort, he was invited to Paris, to become librarian to Lewis XIV. with a liberal pension. He was author of New Methods for the Extraction and Approximation of Roots, 4to.—la Cubature de la Sphere—Elements of Arithmetic and Algebra, 12mo.—Analysis of Problems, 4to.—besides several papers in the memoirs of the academy. He died 1734, aged 74.

LAGRANGE, Joseph Lewis, a mathematician, was born at Turin in 1736. At the age of sixteen he became a teacher in the royal school of artillery, where he formed an association, which afterwards rose to the rank of an Academy of Sciences. Here he made many important discoveries, particularly in calculating the motion of fluids, and the theory of vibrations. He communicated to the society a number of papers, and some to the academy of Paris, of which he was chosen a foreign member. In 1766 he removed to Berlin, where he was appointed director of the academy, the transactions of which contain a number of his memoirs. In 1787 he settled at Paris, and became successively professor of the Norman-school and Polytechnic-school. He died April 10, 1813. His separate works are, 1. "Mecanique Analytique." 2. Fonctions Analytiques. 3. Leçons sur le calcul. 4. Traité de resolution numerique des Equations.—W. B.

LAGUNA, Andrew, a physician, born at Segovia, 1499. He was about the person of Charles V. with whom he was a favourite, and died 1560. He wrote Annotations on Dioscorides—Epitome of the works of Galen—a treatise of Weights and Measures.

LAHARPE DES UTINS, N. a native of Vaux, driven from his country for his attachment to French principles. He distinguished himself in the French army in Italy, under Bonaparte, and was killed near Fombio, April, 1796.

LAHAYE, William Nicholas de, a French engraver of great merit, born 1725. More than 1200 maps, charts, &c. are mentioned as finely executed by him. He died at the beginning of the present century.

LAILLIE, Archibald, D.D. was born at Kelso, Scotland, in 1720, and was educated at the university of Edinburgh. He was settled, in 1760, in a church at Flushing, Zealand, and in 1763 was called to the care of the reformed Dutch church in New-York, where he arrived in 1764, and was the first who officiated in English in that church. He died at Redhook in 1778, during an exile from the city occasioned by the war. He was an able theologian, a powerful speaker, and was eminently useful in his ministry.  L.

LAINÉ, Alexander, a French poet, born 1650, at Chimay, in Hainault, and educated at Rheims. He travelled over Greece, the Archipelago, Constantinople, Asia Minor, Palestine, Egypt, Malta, Sicily, Italy, Switzerland, and France; but on his return to his native town, he found himself reduced to poverty. Two years after, the Abbe Faultrier, after suspecting him improperly of seditious measures, extended his protection towards him, and enabled him to settle at Paris, in possession of a comfortable competence. In this situation he was the soul of company, courted by the learned, the gay, and the opulent, but though given much to the pleasures of the table, yet fond of learning. He died April 18th, 1710, at Paris. His poetical pieces, which possess great vivacity and elegance, are all short, as the effusions of the moment and not of laborious study. They were collected and published, 1753, in 8vo.

LAINÉZ, James, a Spaniard, the friend and successor of Loyola, as general of the Jesuits, in 1558, was at the council of Trent, where he distinguished himself as the zealous supporter of papal power. His services were warmly acknowledged by pope Paul IV. who not only granted him power of altering and modifying the laws of his society, and of making contracts and agreements without their knowledge, but permitted him to have prisons independent of the secular power. Though ambitious, he refused a cardinal's hat, and died at Rome, 1565, aged 53.

LAING, Malcolm, a historian, was born in 1762, at Stryorey, in Orkney, and educated at Kirkwall, from whence he removed to Edinburgh, after which he studied the law, and was called to the bar, but had little practice. On the death of Dr. Henry he was employed to complete an unfinished volume of that writer's history of England; in which he gave little satisfaction to the public. After this he published "A History of Scotland," 4 vols. remarkable only for its partiality, and attack upon the character of the unfortunate Mary. During the Foxite administration, to which he was attached, he was elected into parliament for the county of Orkney. His last literary undertaking was an edition of Ossian's, or Macpherson's poems, the authority of which he demolished by a preliminary dissertation. He died in 1819.—W. B.

LAIRE, Francis Xavier, a native of Vadans, near Gray, distinguished for his learning, and knowledge of bibliography. He wrote, Memoirs of the history of some great men of the 15th century, with a Supplement to Mattaire's Annals of Typography, 4to.—Specimen Historicum Typographiæ Romanæ, &c. 8vo.—Epistola ab Abate Ugolini, 8vo.—the Origin and Progress of Printing in Franche Comté, 12mo.—Index Libror. ab Inventa Typographia ad 1500, 2 volumes 8vo.—the edition of Aldini, 12mo. &c. He died at Sens, 1800, aged 61.

LAIRESSE, Gerard, a Flemish painter, born at Liege, 1640. He studied under his father, who was also a painter; but he soon surpassed him in execution, and acquired fame by painting some historical pieces for the electors of Cologne and Brandenburg. His gallantries reduced him to indigence; but one of his pictures falling into the hands of a Dutch merchant, he was persuaded to go and settle at Amsterdam, where his merits were soon known and rewarded. His pictures were so highly finished, that the Hollanders called him their best history painter, and their second Raphael. In his old age he lost his sight, and died at Amsterdam, 1711, aged 71. His best piece is said to be a Moses, when a child, trampling on Pharaoh's crown. He was also eminent as a musician and an engraver, and wrote a work on the Principles of Painting, translated into English. He left three sons, two of whom were painters. Of his three brothers, Ernest and John were eminent for painting animals, and James excelled as a flower painter.

LAIIS, a celebrated courtesan of Hyccara, in Sicily, who chiefly resided at Corinth, where she sold her favours so high, that non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum, became proverbial. Diogenes, the cynic, was one of her admirers. She is said to have been stoned in Thessaly by the women, jealous of her power over their husbands.

LAKE, Arthur, a native of Southampton, educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, where he became fellow. He was in 1608 made dean of Worcester, and in 1616 raised to the see of Bath and Wells. He died 1626, respected as an amiable man, and an exemplary prelate. A folio volume of his sermons appeared after his death.

LALANDE, Michael Richard de, a musician, born at Paris, 1657. The pleasing powers of voice which he possessed when chorister of the church of St. Germain l'Auxerre, were unfortunately lost when he reached to manhood; but when refused, by Lulli, to appear as a violin player at the opera, he broke his instrument with indignation. Under the patronage of the duke of Noailles, he studied the organ, and became instructor to two of the princesses in music, composer to Lewis XIV. and master of his chapel. His compositions appeared in 2 vols. fol. deservedly admired. He died at Versailles, 1726.

LALANDE, Joseph Jerome Francis, was born at Bourg, in the department of L'Ain, July 11, 1732. He was intended for the law, but relinquished that pursuit to study mathematics; and so great was his progress, that, at the age of eighteen, he was deputed by the Academy of Sciences to go to Berlin, to make observations for determining the parallax of the moon, and its distance from the earth. In 1759 he published an edition of Halley's Tables; and the year following he began the "Connoissance des Temps." In 1764 appeared his "Traité Astronomique;" and his reputation being now established, he was employed in the Encyclopédie. He was also appointed professor of astronomy in the college of France; and it is only to be lamented that with so much science he should have taken a decided part in the sanguinary revolution, and more so that he should have avowed atheistical sentiments. He died April 4, 1807. Besides the works already mentioned, he published—1. "Voyage d'Italie." 2. Traité des Canaux. 3. Bibliographie Astronomique. 4. Abrégé de Navigation. 5. An edition of Montucla's History of Mathematics.—W. B.

LALLI, John Baptist, an Italian poet, born at Orsia. He was employed in civil affairs under the pope, and the duke of Parma, and died 1637, aged 64. He wrote Domiziano Moscheida—il Mal Francese— besides the Destruction of Jerusalem, the Æneid travestied, and other miscellaneous poems.

LALLY, Thomas Arthur, count, an Irishman, in the service of France. His family had followed the fortunes of James II. He distinguished himself at the battle of Pontenoy; and in 1756 was sent as governor-general to the French possessions in the East Indies. After taking Gondalore and Fort St. David, he was defeated before Madras, and obliged to retreat to Pondicherry, which he surrendered, after an obstinate siege, to the English, 1761. On his return to Europe he was accused of selling Pondicherry to the English, and was condemned by the parliament to lose his head. The sentence was executed in 1766, but his son, Lally de Tollendal, obtained, in 1783, a reversion of the cruel sentence, and was restored to his father's possessions and honours.

LAMBALLE, Marie Therese Louise of Savoy Carignan, princess of, was born at Turin, 8th Sept. 1749, and married the duke of Bourbon Penthièvre, by whom she was left a widow, young, beautiful, and amiable. When appointed intendant of the royal household of Marie Antoinette, she gained and deserved, by her good conduct, the confidence and friendship of her mistress. On the flight to Varennes, Madame Lamballe, by another road, quitted France, and from Dieppe came to England, where she might have lived happy; but she no sooner heard of the imprisonment of her royal friend, than she hastened back to Paris to share her sorrows, and soothe her miseries in the Temple. This attachment was too noble to escape the notice of her tyrants. She was dragged to the prison of la Force, and on the fatal 3d of September, 1792, she was summoned to appear before a self-created and bloody tribunal. When questioned about the queen by these ferocious murderers, she answered with firmness and dignity; but when some seemed to express pity for her misfortunes, and to applaud her innocence, the others stabbed her with their sabres, and after cutting off the head and the breasts, they tore out her still palpitating heart. Not satisfied with this, the diabolical monsters went in procession with the bleeding head and the heart, at the top of a pike, to expose them to the view of the unfortunate queen and her wretched family; while the mangled body, with fresh insults, was dragged triumphantly through the streets. This illustrious female was one of the most innocent victims of the revolution; her name was never attacked with revolutionary sarcasms or libellous invectives; and though her tyrants cut her off by a horrid assassination, they never dared to asperse her character.

LAMBECIUS, Peter, a learned German, born at Hamburgh, 1625. He studied in Holland and Paris, and at the age of 19 obtained great reputation by his essay on Aulus Gellius, published 1647. In 1652 he was appointed history professor of Hamburgh, and in 1660 rector of the university. In this situation he found himself exposed to great vexation from the censures of critics, and from the disobedience of his students; and when he attempted to repair his shattered fortune by marrying an old but rich woman, he found himself more bitterly exposed to persecution. His wife's temper was so intolerable, that within a fortnight of the celebration of his nuptials, he left Hamburgh, determined never to return to it. He repaired to Rome, where he renounced protestantism, by publicly professing the catholic faith, and afterwards returned to Vienna, where he was appointed librarian to the emperor, and also counsellor, and historiographer. He died of a dropsy at Vienna, 1680. He wrote Origines Hamburgenses, from the year 808 to 1292, 2 volumes, 4to.—a catalogue of the MSS. of the Vienna Library, 8 vols. folio.

LAMBERT, Anne Therese, marquise de, an ingenious lady, born at Paris, 1647. She married Henry Lambert, marquis of St. Bris, in 1666, and he died 20 years after. Her house became the general rendezvous of the learned, the polite, and the elegant. She died 1733, aged 86, universally respected. Her works have been collected into 2 vols. 12mo. and display an elegant taste, great sense, and the effusions of a virtuous heart. Her advice of a Mother to a Son and Daughter; Reflections on Women; treatise on Old Age; and the Female Hermits, are much admired.

LAMBERT, John, a lawyer, who during the civil wars, distinguished himself at the battles of Naseby and Fife, and was made a major-general. He favoured the elevation of Cromwell to the protectorate, but opposed his assuming the title of king. At the restoration he was excluded from the indemnity act, and was therefore tried and condemned to death. He was, however, reprieved, and sent in exile to Guernsey, where he died.

LAMBERT, Claude Francis, a French ecclesiastic, who became a writer for the booksellers, and died 1765 at Paris. He was author of New Telemachus, 3 vols.; Memoirs of a Woman of Quality, 3 vols.; His- tory of all Nations, 14 vols. ; Literary History of Lewis XIV.

LAMBERT, George, a landscape painter, who died Feb. 1st, 1765. He imitated the manner of Wootton, and afterwards that of Gaspar, and executed some admired scenes for the play-houses, and some large pictures for the East India company, still preserved in Leadenhall-street.

LAMBERT, George Henry, an able mathematician, born at Mulhausen, in Alsace, 1728. His treatises on the Orbits of the Comets—on the properties of Light—on Perspective, &c. were much admired. He died at Berlin of a consumption, 1777.

LAMBERT of Schawemburg, a German Benedictine, who went to Jerusalem in 1053, and published on his return, a dychronicle from Adam to the year 1077, printed Basil, 1669, folio. The work is little else but a compendious history of Germany.

LAMBIN, Denys, professor of belles lettres at Paris, was born at Montreuil, in Picardy. His commentaries on Plautus, Lucretius, Cicero, and Horace, and his Latin translations of Aristotle's Morals and Politics, and of some of the orations of Demosthenes and Æschines, do credit to his abilities as a critic and a scholar. He died 1672, of grief for the death of his friend, Peter Ramus, who had been murdered at the massacre of Bartholomew, a melancholy fate, which he dreaded for himself.

LAMBRUN, Margaret, a Scotch heroine. The tragic fate of Mary, queen of Scots, so affected her husband, who was in her confidential service, that he died of a broken heart; and Margaret therefore determined to avenge, by one fatal blow, the death of her beloved mistress, and of her affectionate husband. Thus roused to revenge, she assumed a man's dress, and came to England, and appeared in the presence of Elizabeth. Her eagerness, however, to reach the queen, made her drop one of her pistols, and this circumstance immediately occasioned her arrest. When brought before the queen and interrogated, she, with undaunted countenance, declared herself to be not a man but a woman, and that she was determined to avenge the deaths of her mistress, who had been so iniquitously murdered, and of her husband, who had fallen a sacrifice to his sorrow. Neither reason nor force, added she, can hinder a woman from vengeance, when she is impelled by love. Elizabeth heard this with calm dignity, and replied, "You then persuade yourself that in assassinating me you have done your duty in satisfying your love for your mistress and your husband; what think you now to be my duty towards you?" On her asking whether she made this question as a judge, or as a queen, Elizabeth replied, as a queen, then, rejoined Margaret, you ought to grant me a pardon. What assurance have I, answered Elizabeth, you will not repeat the attempt? Madam, replied Margaret, a favour granted under restraints is no longer a favour, and in so doing you would act against me as a judge. The address and the unyielding firmness of the assassin, had due weight with the magnanimous queen. Margaret received an unconditional pardon, and at her request she was conducted out of the kingdom, and landed on the coast of France.

LAMI, Bernard, a philosopher, born of a noble family at Mons, 1645. He was so warm an admirer of the principles of Des Cartes, that he was in consequence exposed to persecution, and deprived of his professorship at Saumur, and of all his ecclesiastical preferments. He died at Rouen 1715. His writings were esteemed. They were, Elements of Geometry, &c. 2 vols. 12mo.—Discourses on the Sciences, &c. treatise on Perspective—Demonstration of the Holiness and truth of Christian Morality, 5 vols. 12mo.—Apparatus Biblicus, a valuable book, 4to.—de Tabernaculo Fœderis, &c. folio—Harmonia Evangelica, 2 vols. 4to.—the Art of Speaking, with reflections on Poetry, 12mo.

LAMI, Dom. Francis, a writer, born at Montyreau, in the diocess of Chartres. From a soldier he became an ecclesiastic, and distinguished himself against Spinoza. He died at St. Denys, much regretted, 1711, aged 75. His book on Self Knowledge, 6 vols. 12mo. is greatly esteemed. He wrote besides, Philosophical Letters—a treatise on the Effects of Thunder—and other pieces, in a pure and elegant style.

LAMI, John, ecclesiastical professor at Florence, is well-known as the careful editor of the works of Meursius, in 12 vols. folio. His book on the Trinity was censured by the Jesuits, and defended by himself. He was a very facetious and agreeable companion. He died at Florence 1774.

LAMIA, a Greek courtesan, concubine to Ptolemy, king of Egypt, and afterwards to Demetrius Poliorcetes.

LAMOIGNON, Christian Francis de, an able lawyer, son of the marquis de Basville, born at Paris 1644. His learning, intelligence, and great powers of oratory, recommended him to the notice and partiality of Lewis XIV. and he became advocate-general, and president of the parliament of Paris. He died in 1709, highly respected not only by the court, but by the people, by whom his virtues and abilities were deservedly admired. He was author of le Plaidoyer—a Letter on the Death of Bourdaloue, &c. His father, who was a man of great literary merit, and president of the parliament of Paris, died 1677.

LAMPE, Frederic Adolphus, professor of theology, and rector of the university of Bremen, died there, 1729, aged 46. He wrote an admired treatise, de Cymbalis Veterum, 12mo.—besides History, Sacred, and Ecclesiastical, 4to. Commentary on St. John's Gospel, &c.

LAMPLUGH, Thomas, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he was fellow 1642. He followed the torrent during the civil wars, but at the restoration conformed, and was made head of Alban hall, and rector of St. Martin in the fields. In 1672, he was raised to the deanery of Rochester, and four years after to the see of Exeter. On William's landing, he exhorted the people to adhere to the fortunes of James, but soon after fled to London, and reconciled himself to the conqueror, on whose head he placed the crown, and by whom he was made archbishop of York. He died at Thorp castle, 1691, aged 76.

LAMPRIDIUS, Ælius, a Roman historian, author of the Lives of Commodus, Antoninus, &c. edited in the Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores, 2 vols. 8vo. 1671.

LAMPRIDIUS, Benedict, a Latin poet of Cremona, who taught Greek and Latin at Rome under Leo X. In 1521, he went to Padua, and some time after to Mantua, where he became tutor to the son of Frederic Gonzaga. His Greek and Latin epigrams, and his lyric verses are elegant, but far inferior to the style of Pindar, which he imitated. He died 1540.

LANA, Francis de, a Jesuit, born at Brescia 1637. From his Magisterium Naturæ et Artis, published, Breseia 3 vols. folio, it appears, that he first had an idea of aërosation, and in support of his prior claim, before Montgolfier, the inventor of air balloons, a work called, Navis Volans, extracted from his works, was published at Naples 1784.

LANCASTER, James, an English navigator. He went, in 1591, with a squadron to the East Indies, where he visited Ceylon and Sumatra, and after destroying some of the enemy's ships not without loss, he sailed back to England. Unfavourable winds drove him on the African coast, and while on shore, his crew cut the cables and set sail, leaving him on an island, from which he escaped by means of a French ship, and landed at Rye, 1594. In another expedition he coasted along the Brazils, and took the town of Fernambuco, and returned 1595, loaded with immense booty. He was afterwards sent to the East Indies by the East India Company, and he obtained advantageous settlements at Achen, and at Bantam from the native princes, and soon after returned to England, where he spent the remainder of his life in ease and independence. He died about 1620.

LANCASTER, Nathaniel, D.D. a native of Cheshire, patronised by lord Cholmondeley. He became rector of Stamford Rivers, near Ongar, Essex, and died 20th June, 1775, aged 75, leaving two daughters. His Essay on Delicacy, published 1748, was much admired. He wrote also, Public Virtue, or the Love of our Country, a sermon—the Old Serpent, or Methodism Triumphant, a long poem, &c.

LANCELOT, Claude, a native of Paris, tutor to the prince of Conti, and afterwards a Benedictine monk, in the abbey of St. Cyran, from which he was banished, in consequence of some private quarrels, to Rumperlay, Lower Brittany, where he died 1659, aged 79. He was the able author of Nouvelle Methode pour apprendre la Langue Latine, 1644—et le Grec, 1656, translated into English by Nugent, under the title of Port-royal Grammars. He published also, Delectus Epigrammatum, 2 vols. 12mo.—Life of St. Cyran—Observations on Sacred Theology, &c.

LANCELOTTI, John Paul, a native of Perugia, eminent as a canonist, whose abilities were employed by pope Paul IV. in compiling the institutions of canon law, in imitation of Justinian's civil institutions. He wrote some other things, and died 1591, aged 80.

LANCJEAN, Remi, the most eminent of Vandyck's pupils, was a native of Brussels. His subjects are generally religious, and finished in a very superior style. He died 1671.

LANCISI, John Marca, a physician, born at Rome, 26th Oct. 1654. He distinguished himself early for his abilities as a medical man and a philosopher, and in 1663 was made physician to pope Innocent XI. He was in the same office with his successor Clement XI. and gained universal reputation by his writings, and the excellence of his private character. He died 21st Jan. 1720. He gave in his lifetime, his noble library, of more than 20,000 volumes, to the hospital of the Holy Ghost, for the use of students, &c. He wrote several books on his profession.

LANCRET, Nicholas, a French painter, brought up under Jellot and Watteau. He strongly imitated, but not with success, the manner of Watteau: his pieces, however, are agreeable. He died at Paris, 1743, aged 53.

LANCRINCK, Prosper Henricus, a German painter, born at Antwerp about 1628. He lost his father when very young, but having a strong genius for painting, he improved himself by studying the manner of the most eminent masters of Europe in the collection of Van Lyan. He came over into England, where he was liberally patronised by the nobility; but unfortunately the most finished of his pictures were burnt in the house of his friend, Sir William Williams. His landscapes were much admired. He fell a sacrifice to his intemperance, and died in August, 1692. There still remains a valuable collection of pictures, drawings, prints, antique heads, &c. most of which he brought from abroad.

LANDA, Catherine, a learned lady, author of an elegant Latin letter to Peter Bembo 1526. She was sister to count Augustin Landa, and wife of count John Fermo Trivulcio.

LANDEN, John, a self-taught mathematician, born in Northamptonshire. He obtained the patronage of Lord Fitz-William, to whom he was agent: and in 1766 he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society. He died 1790, aged 71. Besides interesting papers in the philosophical transactions, he published, Mathematical Lucubrations, 1755—Mathematical Memoirs, in 2 vols. very abstruse, but very curious and valuable.

LANDINI, Christophcr, a learned Venetian of the 15th century, author of a translation of Pliny's Natural History into Italian—of some notes on Dante—and of Commentaries on Horace.

LANDO, Hortensio, a physician of the 16th century, born at Milan. He is author of several works under fictitious names. He wrote Philoctetes, a dialogue reflecting on Erasmus—and two others, called Cicero Relegatus—and Cicero Revocatus, ascribed falsely to cardinal Alcander.

LANDO, Bassiano, a physician of Padua, author of some medical works. He was assassinated by a robber, 1562.

LANDRI, bishop of Paris, and founder of the hospital called, Hotel de Dieu, was known for his great charity and benevolence during the famine of Paris. He died about 1660.

LANE, Jane, an English woman, to whose great heroism and presence of mind Charles II. was indebted for his escape. The royal fugitive, after his concealment in Boscobel tree, rode before her in the livery of her servant, from her father's house, Bentley-hall, Staffordshire, to the house of Mr. Norton, near Bristol, from whence he proceeded to Brighton, and escaped to France. At the restoration she was amply rewarded, and married Sir Clement Lister, bart. of Packington hall, Warwickshire.

LANFRANC, archbishop of Canterbury, was a native of Pavia. After studying at Bologna, he came to France, and taught at Avranches, from whence he came to Bec abbey, where he was elected prior 1044. He afterwards visited Rome, and complained to the pope of the doctrines of Berenger, and soon after his return he was made abbot of St. Stephen at Caen, by William of Normandy. When that prince had conquered England, he raised Lanfranc to the see of Canterbury, vacant by the deposition of Stigand. The new primate repaired to Rome to obtain the pall from the hands of the pope, who treated him with great respect; but he showed throughout a firm and becoming opposition against the encroachments of the holy see. He died 28th May, 1089. He rebuilt the cathedral of Canterbury, and founded some hospitals, and repaired several churches and religious houses. In his character he was esteemed as an able politician. His writings, including his piece against Berenger, were published in 1648, by Dom. d' Acheri, a Benedictine monk of St. Maur.

LANFRANC, John, an Italian painter, born at Parma, 1581. As he was poor, he was placed in the service of count Horatio Scotti, who observing his genius by his various drawings in coal on the walls, placed him under the care of Augustus Caracci. He afterwards studied under Annibal, whom he assisted in the execution of some of his finest pieces. He assisted also in the adorning of St. Peter's church at Rome with such taste and success, that Urban VIII. knighted him. He was a great imitator of the manner of Corregio, but such was the impetuosity of his genius, that he frequently forgot the rules of his art, and substituted boldness for correctness. He chiefly excelled in painting domes, and in painting in fresco, and in drawing figures above the natural proportion. He died at Rome, 1647, aged 66, leaving a widow and several children, respectable in life, and possessed of great genius, and many accomplishments.

LANFRANC, a physician of Milan. His abilities, and the success which he displayed in restoring surgery to a regular and respectable system, procured him enemies in his profession, and he removed to France, where he died, 1300. His Chirurgia Magna et Parva appeared at Venice, fol. 1490, and Lyons, 1553.

LANG, John Michael, author of Philologia Barbaro-Græca, 1708, Nurimb. 4to.—Dissertationes Botanicae-Theologicae, 1705, Altorf, 4to.—De Fabulis Mohammedicis, 1697, 4to. was professor of divinity at Altorf, and died 1731, aged 67.

LANGALIERE, Philip de Gentils, marquis de, first baron of Saintonge, distinguished himself in the service of France, during 20 years, and in 32 campaigns, but his merits did not prevent his disgrace by the intrigues of his enemy, Chamillar the minister. He was afterwards in the service of the emperor, and of the king of Poland, but at last he was suspected of secret intrigues with the Turks, and was arrested by the direction of the emperor, as he was going to Hamburgh. He died of a broken heart, in prison, at Vienna, June, 1717, aged 66. The French Memoirs, published under his name, in 8vo. 1708, are fictitious.

LANGBAINE, Gerard, an English writer born at Batronkirke, Westmoreland, educated at Blencow school, and removed to Queen's college, Oxford. He became fellow of his house, and acquired literary celebrity by his edition of Longinus, and by other publications, so that he was elected keeper of the archives in 1644, and the next year provost of the college. He died 10th Feb. 1657-8, and was buried in the college chapel. During the civil wars he remained unmolested in the cultivation of literature in his college, and in familiar correspondence with Usher, Selden, and other learned men.

LANGBAINE, Gerard, son of the preceding, was born at Oxford, 15th July, 1656. In his younger years, he was imprudent and extravagant, but afterwards applied himself to dramatic compositions. He was elected senior beadle of the university, and published, about 1690, an appendix to a catalogue of all the graduates of the university. He died June, 1692. He is also author of a new Catalogue of English Plays—an Account of English dramatic poets.

LANGDALE, Marmaduke, an Englishman of great courage. In the civil wars he warmly espoused the royal cause, and raising a troop, he defeated Fairfax, raised the siege of Pontefract castle, and seized Berwick and Carlisle. On the final triumph of the republicans, he retired to Flanders, and was, in reward of his gallant services, created a baron by Charles II. He died 1681.

LANGDON, Samuel, D.D. president of Harvard college, was a native of Boston, Massachusetts, and graduated in 1740, at the seminary over which he afterwards presided. In 1747 he was settled in the ministry at Portsmouth, New-Hampshire, where he remained till his appointment, in 1774, to the presidency of the college. A want of dignity and energy soon rendering him unpopular in that station, in 1780, he resigned it, and the following year settled at Hampton-falls, New-Hampshire, where he rendered himself highly useful both as a minister, and as a member of the convention of that state, assembled to deliberate on the federal constitution, in which he did much by his talents and zeal to procure its adoption. He died November 29th, 1797.

✍ L.

LANGDON, John, LL.D. governor of New-Hampshire, distinguished himself by his activity in the cause of liberty, during the progress of the revolution. He was a principal leader of the company which, in December, 1774, attacked fort William and Mary, at Portsmouth, and captured a quantity of military stores. In 1775 he was chosen a delegate to congress. In 1780 and 1781 he was a member of the state legislature, and speaker of the house of representatives. In 1785 he was elected in the place of Mr. Weare, president of the state, and continued in that office until 1788. In that year he was a delegate to congress, and a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States. Under this constitution he was appointed one of the first senators from the state of New-Hampshire. Mr. Shaffle succeeded him in 1800. In 1805 he was elected governor, and continued in office three years. In 1810 he was again elected, as the successor of governor Smith. He died at Portsmouth, Sept. 18th, 1819, aged 79.

LANG, Joseph, Greek professor of Friburg, in 1600, published Elementale Mathematicum, reprinted 1625, and he edited Polyantha, 2 vols. folio, &c. He turned, in the latter part of his life, catholic.

LANG, Charles Nicholas, a Swiss naturalist, author of Historia Lipidum Figuratorum Helvetiæ—Origo Eorundem—Methodus Testacæ Marinæ distribuendæ, 1722, 4to. &c.

LANG, Rodolphus, canon of Munster, studied Greek and Latin in Italy, and distinguished himself as a poet. His Taking of Jerusalem, a poem, is mentioned with approbation. He died 1519, aged 81.

LANGELANDE, Robert, an old English poet, one of the first disciples of Wickliffe. He is the author of "the Visions of Pierce Plowman," a poem in 20 parts, replete with spirit and humour, and severely satirical against the various occupations of life, but particularly against the clergy. To the obscurity of an obsolete style in this once admired poem, is to be added an ungrateful alliteration, so harrassing to the ear of the reader, and so inimical to the freedom of the poet.

LANGHAM, Simon, an English bishop, and a cardinal, successively abbot of Westminster, bishop of Ely, and, in 1366, archbishop of Canterbury. He was made treasurer of England by Edward III. and cardinal legate by Urban VIII. He died at Avignon, 1376.

LANGHORNE, John, D.D. an English poet and divine, born at Kirby Stephen, Westmoreland, son of a clergyman. When in orders he became tutor to the sons of Mr. Cracroft, of Lincolnshire, whose daughter he married, and whose early death he lamented pathetically with his friend Mr. Cartwright, in his poem called Constantia. Besides the living of Blagden, Somersetshire, he was prebendary of Wells, and justice of the peace. He died 1st April, 1779. He wrote sermons, 2 vols.—Plutarch's Lives translated—Poems, 2 vols. 12mo.—Letters of Theodosius and Constantia, 2 vols. 12mo.—Solyman and Almena, a tale—Prederic and Pharamond—Effusions of Fancy, 2 vols.—Fables of Flora, in verse, &c. besides critiques in the Monthly Review.

LANGIUS, John, of Lawenburg, in Silesia, studied physic at Pisa, where he took his degrees, and afterwards practised at Heidelberg, and was physician to four successive electors palatine. He died at Heidelberg, 1565, aged 80. He published Medical Epistles, Basil, 1554, in 4to. a curious work.

LANGLAND, John, a native of Henley, Oxon, educated at Magdalen college. He successively became principal of Magdalen-hall, dean of Salisbury, canon of Windsor, bishop of Lincoln, and, in 1532, chancellor of Oxford. He was a popular and benevolent man, and favoured strongly the king's divorce from Catherine of Arragon. He died, May 7th, 1547, and had his body buried at Eton college, his heart at Lincoln, and his bowels at Woburn. His works were published in folio, 1532, London.

LANGLE, John Maximilian, a native of Evreux, for 25 years the minister of the reformed church of Rouen. He wrote a Defence of Charles I. of England—2 vols. of sermons—the Whole Duty of Man, translated from the English, and died 1674, aged 84.

LANGLE, Samuel de, son of the preceding, was born in London, but carried to France when only one year old. From the ministry of Rouen reformed church he removed to Charenton; but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he came over to England, where he obtained a Westminster prebend, and the degree of D.D. from Oxford university. He died 1699. His Letter on the Differences between the church of England and the dissenters, was published by Stillingfleet.

LANGLEY, Batty, an English architect, author of some useful books on the prices of work, and of materials, as the builder's Jewel—and Builder's Price Book, and other treatises for bricklayers, masons, carpenters, &c. He died 1751.

LANGTON, Stephen, an Englishman, educated at Paris. He became chancellor of Paris, and a cardinal of Rome, and afterwards was made archbishop of Canterbury, by the pope, who refused to admit the candidate nominated by the monks of that city. King John resisted this appointment; but the pope, armed with the spiritual power, put the monarch and his people under an interdiction, if they refused to obey. The timid monarch, alarmed by the preparations of France to invade his kingdom, submitted at last to the papal decrees, received Langton as archbishop, and accepted absolution from his hands. Langton afterwards became obnoxious to the pope's displeasure at Rome, for resisting the extension of his power in England, and for refusing to excommunicate the rebellious barons; but was reconciled to the holy see, and died in peace in England, 9th July, 1223, after being 22 years at the head of the church. He was a man of great abilities as a writer, and as a politician. His works are mentioned by Bayle and Tanner.

LANGTON, John, an English Carmelite monk, who was at the council of Basil, and wrote an English chronicle.

LANGUET, Hubert, a learned Frenchman, born at Viteaux, 1518. He was minister of state to the elector of Saxony, and from a catholic became a strong protestant, by reading the works, and frequenting the company, of Melancthon. After making the tour of Italy, of Livonia, and Laponia, and enjoying the confidence of Gustavus, king of Sweden, Languet was employed as envoy to France, by Augustus, elector of Saxony, 1565. He was afterwards engaged in negotiations at Heidelberg, Cologne, Spire, and Stettin, and in his second embassy to France he was nearly sacrificed in the horrid massacre of St. Bartholomew, though he had the good fortune to save life of his friend, Philip de Mornay, and of the learned Wechelius, in whose house he lodged. In 1574 he was envoy at Vienna; but in the controversy which took place in Saxony, between the Lutherans and the Zuinglians, about the eucharist, he was violently suspected of favouring the latter, upon which he retired from the court of the elector to Prague, where he entered into the service of John Casimir, count Palatine. He next was employed by the prince of Orange, at Antwerp, but his health did not permit him to display those active services which he had shown in the affairs of other princes. He died at Antwerp, 20th Sept. 1581, and was honoured at his funeral by the attendance of the prince of Orange. He was a man of great political knowledge, and deservedly esteemed by the wisest and most eminent men of his age, particularly Thuanus, Mornay, &c. Mornay says of him, with feeling and truth, Is fuit qualis multi videri voluit, is vixit qualis optimi mori cupienti. His letters in Latin to the elector of Saxony, were printed, Halle, 4to. 1699. Besides letters to Sir Philip Sidney, 12mo. 1646, and other things.

LANGUET, John Baptist Joseph, a relation of the above, born at Dijon, June 6th, 1675. He studied at Paris, and became a doctor of the Sorbonne, and vicar of St. Sulpice, after being curate of the place for some years. He rebuilt his church, and rendered it one of the finest in the world for architecture and ornaments. He began the work with little money, but his zeal, and the emulation which he excited among his parishioners, whose number amounted to 150,000, surmounted every obstacle, and the consecration, in 1745, was attended with such splendour, that the king of Prussia, with his own hand, thanked the public spirited vicar for the success and popularity of his great exertions. He also founded the house of the infant Jesus, divided into two parts, one of which was for the support of 35 poor ladies, and the other of more than 400 poor women, who are usefully employed in spinning, and in the working of cloths and linens. This noble institution, in 1741, contained more than 1400 women and girls, engaged in industrious labours, and encouraged in habits of virtue, by example and precept. The whole life of this truly great man was spent in deeds of humanity, so that it is said, he expended annually little less than a million of livres in charity. His popularity commanded not only the public esteem, but the favour of the great; but he refused all the high ecclesiastical promotions and bishoprics to which cardinal Fleury, the duke of Orleans, Lewis XIV. and XV. wished to raise him. He died 11th Oct. 1750, aged 75, at the abbey de Bernay.

LANGUET, John Joseph, brother to the preceding, was bishop of Soissons, and in 1731 archbishop of Sens, where he died 1753. He was a polemical divine, and translated the Psalms, and was esteemed for his benevolence and piety.

LANIER, a painter whom Charles I. employed abroad to make a collection of pictures for him. Such pieces as he brought over, were distinguished by a particular mark, which now points them out to the curious. No further account is known of him.

LANNOY, or LAUNOY, Charles de, an able general in the service of the emperor, Charles V. He took Francis I. prisoner, at the battle of Pavia, and conducted himself with great humanity, and becoming respect towards the captive monarch. When Francis was restored to liberty, Lannoy was commissioned by the emperor, to conduct him back in safety to his dominions. He died at Gazette, 1527.

LANSBERGHE, Philip, a learned mathematician, born at Ghent, 1561, and minister of Antwerp, which he left for Holland when that city was taken by the Spaniards. He died at Middleburgh, 1632, leaving behind him Sacred Chronology, published 1626—Essays on Astronomy, on Geometrical Triangles, on Measuring the Heavens, on the Motion of the Earth, &c. His son James was also an able mathematician, and defended his father against the attacks of Fromond, of Louvain, who pretended that the earth stood still. He died 1657.

LANZANO, Andrea, a painter born at Milan. He was the pupil of Carlo Maratti, and excelled for the correctness and elegance of his figures, and the beauty of his colouring. He died 1712.

LANZI, Lewis, an Italian antiquary, was born in 1732, near Macerata. He became a member of the order of Jesuits, and, on the suppression of the society was appointed sub-director of the gallery at Florence. He published a guide to that gallery in 1782; which was followed by an "Essay on the Tuscan Language," 3 vols. 8vo.; but his greatest work is "A History of Painting in Italy," 6 vols. 8vo. His other publications are "Dissertations on the Etruscan Vases;" and a translation of "Hesiod." He died at Florence in 1810.—W. B.

LANZONI, Joseph, a native of Ferrara, who restored the academy there, of which he became secretary, and medical professor. Eminent as a physician he was equally great as a man of letters, and an antiquarian. He published various works collected in 3 vols. 4to. in Latin, 1738. He died 1730, aged 67.

LAPARELLI, Francis, a native of Cortona, eminent as an architect, a mechanic, and an engineer. His abilities recommended him to Cosmo I. duke of Tuscany, and he was employed by Pius IV. in the fortifications and defence of Civita Vecchia. He was in 1565 employed in the fortification of Malta, against the power of Solyman and his Turkish army, and under his judicious eye the city of Valette was planned. He afterwards was in the service of the Venetians, and died of the plague while before Candia 1570, aged 49. He assisted Michael Angelo in the completion of his designs for the erection of St. Peter's church at Rome.

LAPIDE, Cornelius, a French Jesuit, author of 10 vols. fol. in Explanations and Commentaries on the Scriptures. He died at Rome 1637, aged 71.

LAPÒ, Arnulphus di, a native of Florence, known as an able architect. He restored the genuine art of architecture, and in his edifices, displayed taste, elegance, and solidity. The cathedral of Florence and other public buildings are monuments of his genius. He died 1300, aged 68.

LARCHER, Peter Henry, an ingenious writer, was born at Dijon in 1726. He studied in the college of Laon, at Paris; and, in 1750, published his translation of the Electra of Euripides, which met with indifferent success. In 1758 appeared his translation of "Chereas and Callirhoe," from the Greek; after which he had a violent quarrel with Voltaire, who was, however, the aggressor. Larcher now undertook a translation of Herodotus, which did not come out till 1786. The best edition is in nine volumes octavo. His other works are "Memoire sur Venus;" and a translation of Xenophon. He died Dec. 22, 1812.—W. B.

LARDNER, Nathaniel, a dissenting minister born at Hawkhurst in Kent, 1684. He was educated in London, and then went to Utrecht, where he improved himself under Grævius and Burnan, and afterwards he studied at Leyden. In 1713 he was engaged as tutor to the younger son of lady Treby, widow of the chief justice of common pleas, with whom he travelled over France, Holland, and the Netherlands. In 1723 he was employed with others in a course of lectures at the Old Bailey; but though his abilities were great and universally acknowledged, he did not obtain a settlement among the dissenters till the 45th year of his age, when in 1729, he became assistant minister at Crutched Friars. His literary labours had now so distinguished him, that the college of Aberdeen conferred on him the degree of D.D. This learned man, so well skilled in Scriptural erudition and ecclesiastical history, died at Hawkhurst, where he had a small estate, in 1768, of a decline. The best known of his works are his "Credibility of the Gospel History," in five volumes completed in 1743, a work of great merit, and so highly respected abroad that it was translated into Dutch and Latin—Letters on the Logos—a Vindication of three of our Saviour's Miracles, against the petulant cavils of Woolston—Supplement to the Credibility, &c. All his works were collected by Dr. Kippis in 11 large vols. 8vo. to which his life is prefixed.

LARGILLIERE, Nicholas de, a French painter, born at Paris, 1656. He studied under Gobeau, and then came to England, where he was noticed by Lely, and recommended to the patronage of Charles II. He returned to Paris, where he enjoyed the friendship of Vander Mulen and Le Brun, and was made historical painter to the French academy. On the accession of James II. he again visited England, and painted that monarch and his queen; but he soon after returned to France, where he was made director of the academy as a reward for his great merit. He died 1705. His best piece is the crucifixion of Christ.

LARON, Marcellus, a painter, born at the Hague, 1653. He came to England with his father, and displayed such abilities, that Kneller employed his pencil in finishing the drapery of his pictures. He possessed the art of copying with great success and astonishing correctness, the pieces of the first masters. He died 1705, aged 52.

LARREY, Isaac de, a Calvinist born at Lintot near Bolbec. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes he fled to Holland, and became historiographer to the States. He died 1719. His works are a History of England, 4 vols. fol. valuable for its intrinsic merit, as well as its excellent portraits—History of Lewis XIV. 3 vols. 4to. —a History of Augustus, 8vo.—a History of the Seven Wise Men, 2 vols. 8vo.

LARROQUE, Mathew de, a French protestant, born at Leirac, in Germany, 1619. His popularity was such, that after being 27 years minister of Vitré in Brittany, by the favour of the dutchess of Tremouille, he was invited by the churches of Montauban, Bourdeaux, and Rouen, and in consequence of the honourable testimonies accepted the offers of the last. He died at Rouen 1684. His works are, a History of the Eucharist, 4to.—an Answer to Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux on the Communion of two Kinds, 12mo.—a treatise on the Regale, &c.

LARROQUE, Daniel de, son of the preceding, was born at Vitré, and in consequence of the revocation of the edict of Nantes, came to England, and afterwards visited Copenhagen and Amsterdam. He came to Paris, determined to become a catholic; but the satire which he wrote on Lewis XIV. on account of the famine of 1693, threw him into the prison of the Chatelet for five years. At his release he obtained a pension from the ministry, and died 1731. He wrote the Life of the historian Mezeray—and translated Echard's Roman History—and Prideaux's Life of Mahomet, &c.

LASCARIS, Constantine, one of the learned Greeks, who upon the sacking of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453, fled to Italy. He taught Greek and polite literature at Milan, and afterwards at Messina, where his great abilities and high reputation drew crowds of respectable disciples, and among them Bembo. He died at Messina, when very old, at the close of the 15th century, and left his library to the senate. He published a Greek grammar at Milan 1476, 4to. and other things.

LASCARIS, John, surnamed Rhyndaceus, was of the imperial family. He was employed by Laurence de Medicis to make a collection of books in Greece, and he was so fortunate as to be permitted by the grand signior to examine all the libraries of Constantinople and in Greece, in consequence of which he greatly enriched the collections of Italy. He was afterwards ambassador from Lewis XII. of France to Venice, and on the election of Leo X. he went to Rome, where he became director of the Greek college. He was an admirable scholar, and brought again into use the capital letters of the Greek alphabet, and wrote some epigrams and moral sentences in that language. He died 1535.

LASCI or LASKO, John de, a learned Pole, made provost of Gresna, and bishop of Vesprim in Hungary. He had shown such partiality for Zuinglius at Zurich, that he now boldly declared in favour of the reformation; in consequence of which he was dismissed from his bishopric, and retired in 1542, to East Friesland, where he became minister of the church of Embden. He afterwards came to England, and was held in great esteem by the clergy, though he ventured to write a pamphlet against the habits and ceremonies of the English church; but in the reign of Mary he was obliged to fly from the country. He afterwards was reconciled to Sigismund, king of Poland, and employed by him in affairs of trust and importance. He died 13th Jan. 1560. He wrote some controversial tracts, &c. and was highly esteemed by Erasmus and others.

LASENA or LASCENA, Peter, a learned Italian, born at Naples, 25th Sept. 1590. He settled at Rome, and under the protection of cardinal Barberini, and other learned men he cultivated literature. His intense application proved at last fatal to him, he fell into a fever of which he died 30th Sept. 1636. He wrote Nepenthes Homeri, scu de abolendo Luctu—Cleombrotus—a tract on the Sports, Shows, &c. of Naples, &c.

LASSELS, Richard, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Oxford and at Douay, where he embraced the catholic religion. He wrote Travels in Italy, 2 vols. 8vo. and died at Montpellier 1768, aged 65. A person of his name and family was very instrumental in the escape of Charles II. from the fatal battle of Worcester. He was then a cornet in the king's army.

LATHROP, Joseph, D.D. congregational minister of West Springfield, Massachusetts, was born at Norwich, Connecticut, October 20th, 1731, and graduated at Yale college in 1754. He was ordained pastor of the church in West Springfield, August 25th, 1756, and after a ministry there of sixty-four years, died December 31st, 1820, in the 90th year of his age. He was one of the most eminent in talents and excellence of character among his cotemporaries. His perceptions were rapid and clear, his invention uncommonly fertile, and his views marked by great originality. He was amiable in his manners, pleasing and instructive in conversation, and remarkable for good sense and a keen discernment of character. He was eminently pious and profoundly versed in theology, and a dignified and popular preacher, and by his publications became extensively known in Great Britain as well as America. He was in 1793 elected to the professorship of theology in Yale college, but declined the appointment. He published five volumes of sermons which have had an extensive circulation, and prepared a sixth which has been given to the public since his death.

LATHROP, John, an American poet, was born in Boston, Massachusetts, in January, 1772, and graduated at Harvard college in 1789. He employed himself for some time in the practice of law in Boston, but from his devotion to literary pursuits did not enjoy extensive patronage. He was a cotemporary and an associate of Paine and Prentiss, and the rival of the former, with whom he for a long time carried on a war of wit in the public papers. In 1799 he embarked for India to improve his fortune, and spent ten years at Calcutta as an instructor. He continued his literary employments during that period, and published his principal poem "The Speech of Canonicus." His writings were chiefly for the newspapers. He returned to America in 1809, and taught a school for several years in Boston, and delivered lectures on natural philosophy. He afterwards removed to Washington and pursued the same employment, and was at length appointed to a place in the post-office. He died in January, 1820. He possessed a superior genius, and his writings were spirited, classical, and elegant. He was amiable, generous, and frank, but was too desultory in his habits to succeed in a profession. His writings have never been collected for publication. ⚔ L.

LATIMER, Hugh, an illustrious prelate, born at Thurcaston, in Leicestershire 1470. His father, who was rather an industrious than rich farmer, educated him at a grammar-school, and as his abilities were of superior order he sent him to Cambridge, where he took his degrees. Young Latimer, when admitted into the church, was a warm supporter of the established religion, against the innovations of Luther and Melancthon; but by degrees his prejudices in favour of the pope disappeared in the conversation of his friend Bilney, a man of pious character and of deep learning, who even laid down his life in the support of the doctrines of the reformation. With his usual warmth the new convert zealously devoted himself to propagate those tenets which lately he had censured as impious and heretical, and so great was his influence, and so powerful his eloquence, that he was regarded as the head of his party. His severe trials, and successful efforts against the papists at last recommended him to the notice of lord Cromwell and of Henry VIII. during the time of his intended divorce; and in reward for his services in the cause of the king and of the reformation, Latimer was nominated to the see of Worcester. In this new office he behaved with his usual spirit, yet not without moderation. In the convocation of 1536 he ably opposed the measures of the popish party, and was happily instrumental in the recommendation of the English translation of the Bible to general perusal. But while he expected the final triumph of his party, he found the influence of Gardiner too powerful, and the enactment of the famous act called the six articles in the parliament of 1539, proved so disagreeable to his feelings that he refused any longer to hold his bishopric, but preferred a life of retirement and privacy. His enemies, however, were not inactive, and not satisfied to see him stripped of his honours, they procured his imprisonment in the tower for the last six years of Henry's reign. The accession of Edward VI. restored Latimer to favour and to liberty; but while his friends solicited him to resume his episcopal functions, he repeatedly refused, and retired to Lambeth palace, where he lived on the bounty and in the friendship of Cranmer. Here his abilities were called into action; he assisted his learned friend in the composition of the Homilies, and frequently preached before the king, and displayed those powers of eloquence, and that strong vein of humour which the manners of the time allowed to be used in the pulpit. On the restoration of popery in the reign of Mary the venerable Latimer was marked for destruction by the sanguinary Gardiner. He was seized, and from the tower was sent to Oxford, where he with Cranmer and Ridley were appointed to hold a dispute with some popish divines. This disputation was artfully intended to expose these champions of the reformation to the severest punishments of a partial and prejudiced tribunal, and therefore when Latimer and his revered associates rejected all the popish doctrines, except they rested on the clear authority of Scripture, sentence of death was passed upon them. Latimer and Ridley were consequently burned at Oxford 1554, in the midst of the insults of the monks, and as they recommended their souls to God, while the fatal flames spread around them, the venerable Latimer comforted his fellow-sufferer, exclaiming, We shall this day, my lord, light such a candle in England as shall never be extinguished. His sermons have often been printed.

LAUD, William, archbishop of Canterbury, was born 7th Oct. 1573, at Reading, where his father was a clothier. He was educated at the free-school, Reading, and in 1589 he was removed to St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow in 1593. He afterwards took orders, and in 1601 was ordained priest; but his chapel exercises against the puritans, whose doctrines he censured and refuted, drew upon him the displeasure of Abbot the primate, then chancellor of the university. Though virulently attacked by the puritan party in the university, his learning and his abilities procured him friends; he, in 1607 obtained the vicarage of Stanford, Northamptonshire, and the next year the living of North Kilworth, Leicestershire. In 1608 he took the degree of D.D. and became chaplain to bishop Neile, and exchanged Kilworth for Tilbury rectory in Essex, in 1609. In 1610 he succeeded to the living of Cukstone, Kent, and resigned his Oxford fellowship; but the next year he was elected president of his college, by the assistance of his patron Neile, who exerted all his influence to counteract the partial misrepresentation of Abbot, and of chancellor Ellesmere, with the king. He was next appointed chaplain to the king, and in 1616 made dean of Gloucester, and the next year he accompanied the king to Scotland, to endeavour to persuade the Scotch clergy to conform with the rites and the liturgy of the English church. In 1617 he was made rector of Istock, in 1621 prebendary of Westminster, and soon after raised to the see of St. David's. In 1622 he held his famous conference with Fisher, the Jesuit, in the presence of the duke of Buckingham and his mother, who were wavering in the protestant faith, and he had the good fortune not only to fix his opinions, but to obtain his future friendship. He officiated as dean of Westminster in 1626, at the coronation of the first Charles, and the same year he was translated to Bath and Wells, and two years after to London. In 1630 he was elected chancellor of Oxford, and in this dignified situation he contributed most liberally, during the whole of life, to adorn and improve his favourite university. He not only built the inner quadrangle of his college, and improved the foundation by various donations, but he raised that elegant building now called the Convocation house, and the library above, and enriched the public collection by the munificent present of 1300 valuable MSS. in Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, Egyptian, and other ancient and modern languages, procured at great expense, and with infinite labour. The death of Buckingham raised him to the dangerous situation of prime minister, and in 1633 he succeeded Abbot as primate. In these high offices he laboured strenuously to repress the fanatical spirit of the times, but his attempts to produce a uniformity between the churches of England and Scotland, not only proved unavailing, but exposed him to great obloquy. His attention to the independence of the Irish clergy was highly commendable, as he obtained from the king, in their favour, a grant of all the impropriations remaining in the crown. But the purest of his motives in these turbulent times were unfortunately misrepresented, because he was connected with the court, and had a share in the prosecutions of the Star chamber against the obstinate puritans. He was branded with the name of incendiary because he exhorted his clergy to contribute to the raising of an army against the Scots, and when the parliament of 1639 was abruptly dissolved, all the odium of the violent measure was heaped upon him by the factions of the times, and his palace at Lambeth was attacked by an unprincipled mob of above 5000 rioters. Thus unpopular in the nation, and suspected by the commons, he was particularly attacked in the next parliament. The fate of Stafford was the forerunner of his own, and on the accusation of Sir Henry Vane, he was seized and conveyed to the tower, 1st March, 1640-1. During the three years which preceded his trial he was exposed to every indignity, his revenues were confiscated, he was fined 20,000*l.* for his connexion with the Star chamber, and every article of comfort which might cheer his hours of solitude was carefully removed, and even the papers which he had prepared for his defence were rudely seized, and never returned. His trial began 12th, and finished July 29th, 1644; but though nothing treasonable could be proved, such was the virulence of the commons, that a bill of attainder was passed the following November against him, and the peers in the next January were forced by the threats of the mob to pronounce against him. His defence, firm, eloquent, undaunted, and pathetic, could not avail before a prejudiced tribunal, and he was sentenced to be beheaded. He suffered on Tower-hill, 10th Jan. aged 71, maintaining to the last the composure of innocence, and the resignation of piety. His body was deposited in All-Hallows church, Barking, and 1663 removed to St. John's college. In his character, Laud was a man of integrity, zealously attached to the rites of the church, sincere and ardent, but too often indiscreet and obstinate, and eager to sacrifice his fame and the interests of his master even for the sake of trifles. The severe prosecutions of the Star chamber and of the high commission courts were invidiously attributed to him, and in his zeal to unite the three kingdoms in the same form of worship, he exposed himself to the fury of the puritanical party, whose designs were the demolition of the throne. Though unhappily tinctured with too high notions of divine right and of unlimited prerogative for times of turbulence and civil dissension, it does not appear that he was inclined to favour the tenets of the church of Rome, though they might more powerfully have supported the measures of an arbitrary court. He was a man of extensive knowledge, and as Clarendon observes, his learning, piety, and virtue, have been attained by very few, and the greatest of his infirmities are common to all, even the best of men. He wrote "seven Sermons" on several occasions—Annotations on the Death of king James—Answer to the Remonstrance of the House of Commons—Diary published by Warton, with other pieces, &c.—Summary of Devotions—Remains, fol.—Private Devotions, &c.—Letters, &c.

LAUDER, William, a native of Scotland, who studied in the university of Edinburgh, and taught Latin there. He published in 1739 an edition of Johnston's psalms, and in 1742 was appointed master of Dundee school. He afterwards came to London, and 1747 began to publish in the Gentleman's Magazine his forgeries on Milton, which in 1751 he collected together under the name of an Essay on Milton's Use and Imitation of the Moderns in his Paradise Lost, 8vo. His quotations, though for some time supposed to be genuine, were soon after proved to be forgeries from Grotius and others, by Dr. Douglas, afterwards bishop of Salisbury, and the wretched plagiarist, overwhelmed with confusion, subscribed a confession of his offence, dictated by Dr. Johnson, and acknowledged the baseness of his conduct. Thus lost in the public opinion he went to Barbadoes, where he kept a school, but with little reputation. He died at Barbadoes, 1771.

LAUDON, or LOUDON, Gideon Ernest, a celebrated Austrian general, descended from a Scotch family, and born at Tootzan, 1716. He was in 1731 engaged in the Russian service, but despairing of preferment he entered into the Austrian army, and obtained the rank of captain in 1742. After the peace of 1748 he rose to the rank of major, and was afterwards made lieutenant-colonel of Croats; but his genius and abilities displayed in the seven years war against the brilliant evolutions of the great Frederic, soon called him to higher honours. He was made major-general and a knight of the military order of Maria Theresa in 1757, and the confidence placed in his valour and judgment was soon evinced in the great victory of Hochkerchen, and that of Kunnersdorff. The Prussians were afterwards defeated at Landshut, and the gates of Glatz opened to the victorious general. At the peace of 1763 his services were rewarded with the dignity of a baron, and a pension, and three years after he was appointed member of the Aulic council, and in 1778 made field-marshal of the empire. In the war which took place between Turkey and Austria, he had fresh opportunities of distinguishing himself, the Turks were routed, and Belgrade was taken 1789. This illustrious chief died 14th July, 1790.

LAUGIER, Mark Antony, a Jesuit, born at Monosque, in Provence, 1713. He quitted the Jesuits upon some private dispute, and applied himself to the arts. He died 1769. He is author of Essay on Architecture—History of Venice, 12 vols. 12mo.

—History of the Peace of Belgrade, 2 vols. 12mo.—Apology for French Music, &c.

LAUNAY, Francis de, a French advocate of eminence, author of Remarks on the Roman and French System of Jurisprudence—and Commentaries on Laysel's Institutes, &c. He died 1693, aged 81.

LAUNOI, John de, a learned French writer, well skilled in the discipline, rights and privileges of the Gallican church, which he ably defended against the encroachments of the see of Rome. He was also a violent and determined enemy against legends, traditions, and saints, and showed himself so disinterested, that he refused benefices, satisfied with the independence of a humble situation. He died at Paris 1678, aged 75. His writings, which are very numerous, are enumerated by Nicéron.

LAUNOY, Charles de, a French general. Vid. LANNON.

LAUR, Philippo, an eminent painter, born at Rome, 1623. He studied under his elder brother Balthasar, who died at the early age of 25, and under Angelo Corosselli, and soon acquired some celebrity. His large pictures for churches were admired, but particularly his historical subjects, with excellent landscapes in the back ground. His chief pieces were metamorphoses and bacchanals, in which he displayed great taste and judgment. He was of a cheerful disposition, and died at Rome 1694, aged 71, leaving a considerable fortune to his great nephews.

LAURA, the mistress of Petrarch, was the wife of Hugo de Sades. She died of the plague in 1348, aged 38. Vid. PETRARCH.

LAURATI, Peter, a native of Sienna, celebrated as a painter. He was the disciple of Giotto, and particularly excelled in his draperies, which were finished in such exquisite taste that the delicate proportions of the human limbs became visible through them. He flourished in the 15th century, and chiefly resided at Sienna and Arezzo.

LAURENS, or LARENTIUS, Andrew, a native of Arles, professor of medicine at Montpellier, and physician to Henry IV. He died 16th August, 1609. His anatomical works, more elegant than correct, were printed at Paris, folio, 1600.

LAURENS, Honorus, brother to the preceding, was advocate of the parliament of Paris, and a strong friend of the league, and afterwards became by the favour of Henry IV. archbishop of Embrun. He wrote the edict of Henry III. to reunite the protestants and catholics, and died 1612.

LAURENS, Henry, president of the American congress, was a native of South Carolina. He took an early part in resisting the arbitrary claims of the British government which led to the revolution. In 1775

he was appointed president of the assembly of South Carolina, and in the following year, on the establishment of a temporary constitution, was chosen vice president of the state. In 1777, being a member of the continental congress, he was on the resignation of Hancock appointed its president. In 1780 he was appointed ambassador to the Netherlands, for the purpose of forming a treaty with those provinces, and to negotiate a loan; he was captured on his passage, and carried to England, where he was confined in the tower as a criminal, and treated with great severity. The ministry were deterred from executing their threats of capital punishment, by the fear of retaliation, and in December, 1781, restored him to liberty. He passed into France, and in the following year, with Franklin, Adams, and Jay, signed the provisional articles of peace, and in 1782, the definitive treaty. He returned to the United States in 1784, and died in South Carolina in 1792, in his seventieth year.

LAURENS, John, lieutenant-colonel in the American army, was the son of Henry Laurens, of South-Carolina, and born in 1755. He was educated in England. He entered the army in 1777, and rendered himself conspicuous by his brilliant talents and daring bravery. In 1781 he was deputed by congress to France to solicit a loan of money, and procure military stores. He returned the same year, and received the thanks of congress for his success. He immediately re-joined the army, and on the 27th August, 1782, received a mortal wound, while opposing a foraging party near the Combabee, in South Carolina, and died at the age of twenty-six. Colonel Laurens was distinguished for the excellence of his education, and the engagingness of his manners, as well as for his talents and courage. He was highly popular in the army, and enjoyed the high respect of general Washington, whom he served as an aid.

LAURENT, Peter Joseph, a native of Flanders, famous for his astonishing mechanical powers. When only eight years old he constructed a hydraulic machine of great ingenuity, and when matured by time and by education, he was, at the age of 21, appointed superintendent of various public works, and of the canals of the Low Countries, and of Hainault. The junction of the Scheldt with the Somme, though presenting great difficulties, was effected by his persevering genius, by the means of a subterranean canal of three leagues extent; and other works were effected in Flanders, which, by removing the obstacles of nature, secured comfort and communication to the inhabitants of Valenciennes, Lisle, &c. This ingenious man was ho-poured with the order of St. Michael by the French king, and died 1775, respected in private life.

LAURENTIO, Nicholas, a remarkable character in the history of modern Rome. Though but the son of a vintner and a laundress, he rose by his intrigues and eloquence to notice, and prevailed upon the Roman populace to expel their nobles, and intrust the sovereign power into his hands. His usurpation was the cause of war, and at last he was defeated; but a second time he rose to the supreme authority, and might have long continued absolute, had he not been cruel in his punishments. The populace, irritated against him, set his palace on fire, and he was run through the body in his attempts to escape, and stabbed by a thousand wounds. His body hung by the heels in public derision, was at last taken down and buried by the Jews.

LAVATER, Lewis, an ecclesiastic, known for his abilities as a controversialist in favour of the protestants. He wrote Commentaries—Homilies, &c.—and a treatise de Spectris, a curious work. He died canon of Zurich, 17th July, 1586, aged 50.

LAVATER, John Gaspar Christian, a celebrated writer, born at Zurich, 1741. He was pastor of the church of St. Peter's at Zurich, and as a minister he acquired great reputation both by his eloquent discourses and his exemplary life. He was wounded by a French soldier when Zurich was taken by storm under Massena in 1799, and died there in consequence of it, 12th Jan. 1801. He acquired deserved celebrity as a physiognomist, and his writings on the subject, possessing great merit, ingenious remarks, and truly original ideas, have been translated into all the languages of Europe. His works are, Poems—Solomon—Jesus Messiah, 4 vols.—Nathaniel, 8vo.—Letters Paternelles—treatise on Physiognomy—Journal of a Self Observer, 8vo.—Prose Works—Letters supposed to be written by Paul before his conversion, &c.

LAVINGTON, George, a native of Heavitree, Devonshire, educated at Exeter college where he took the degree of LL.D. He afterwards obtained a prebend at Worcester, a canon residentiaryship at St. Paul's, and the see of Exeter. He wrote the Enthusiasm of Methodists and Papists compared, a curious work—a Tract on the Moravians—Single Sermons, &c. and died 1762, aged 79. He was buried in Exeter cathedral.

LAVIROTTE, Lewis Anne, a native of Nolay in the diocese of Autun, eminent as a physician and as the translator of MacLaurin's Account of Newton's Discoveries; he wrote also Observations on the Hydrophobia and other medical works, and died 1759, aged 34.

LAVOISIER, Antony Laurence, a celebrated chymist, born at Paris, 26th Aug. 1743. At the age of 23 he obtained from the academy of sciences a golden medal for a memoir on the best method of lighting the streets with economy and efficacy. In 1768 he was chosen member of the academy, and enriched its memoirs by above 40 valuable dissertations on subjects of chymistry and political economy, the result of deep and laborious experiments. His new system of chymistry was received with great applause in France and over the continent, though it militated against the prevalent doctrine of phlogiston adopted and supported by the experiments of Dr. Priestley. He was treasurer of the academy after Buffon and Tillet, and successively was appointed farmer-general, register of powder and saltpetre, and commissary of the national treasury, and in these offices he laboured assiduously with the most conscientious integrity, to advance the interests of the nation as well as to promote the improvement of science and natural history. These services deserved the highest rewards of national gratitude; but the revolution came to shorten his days. His abilities and virtues were too conspicuous to escape the notice of the sanguinary tyrants of France. He was dragged before the revolutionary tribunal, but when he demanded the suspension of his sentence for fourteen days, that he might finish some experiments serviceable to the public, the blood-thirsty judge replied that France was not in want either of learned men or chymists, and immediately Lavoisier walked with composure to the fatal spot, and was guillotined, 6th April, 1794. He wrote Chymical and Physical works, 2 vols. 8vo. 1773—Nouvelles Recherches sur le Fluide Elastique, a valuable work, 1775—Report on Animal Magnetism, 8vo.—Methode de Nomenclature Chymique—Elementary treatise on Chymistry, 2 vols. 8vo. 1789—Instruction on the making of Saltpetre, &c. 8vo.—de la Reproduction et de la Consommation comparées à la Population, 8vo. &c. Fourcroy pronounced his eulogy at the Lyceum, and la Lande has painted his character in the liveliest colours, and represented him as he was, a man of great virtue and benevolence, endued with all the amiable qualities of the heart, and the amplest resources of the mind.

LAW, John, a celebrated projector, born at Edinburgh, 16th April, 1671. He early applied himself to the study of arithmetic, geography, mathematics, and algebra, but his prospects were all at once clouded by his unfortunate conduct. He debauched the daughter of a gentleman in London, and killed her brother who interfered in vindication of her character, and in consequence of this he was condemned to be hanged, but escaped from the hands of justice and fled to Holland, and then to Italy. He returned to his country in 1700 under the protection of the duke of Argyle, and proposed to the parliament various plans of finance, which were disapproved, in consequence of which he left the kingdom to seek encouragement and protection in foreign courts. He visited Brussels, Venice, and Genoa, and at last he gained the confidence of the duke of Orleans, the regent of France, and settled at Paris. He there established a bank in 1716, and soon it became the general bank of the kingdom, to which were united the interests of the Mississippi company. The hopes of immense gain, and the love of novelty, gradually brought all the specie of the kingdom under his control, and his paper rose to full twenty times its original value, and in 1719 was calculated as worth more than eighty times the circulating coin of the whole nation. Thus while France considered itself as rapidly rising into opulence and power, and while the inflated projector purchased vast possessions, and united in his person the offices of comptroller and financier, the real sources of the kingdom were gradually diminishing, extravagance took place of economy, and the love of glory and distinction was disregarded for the sudden acquisition of riches. At last the bank was found incapable of answering the demands made upon it, and of paying for its paper, and though the decrees of the regent for a while supported its tottering credit, soon the eyes of the nation were opened, and each individual discovered that in parting with his gold and silver, he had received in return only paper which was of no value. The dissatisfaction became general, the people without bread and without money, besieged in vain the avenues of the bank, and afterwards carrying before the gates of the regent the bodies of three men who had unhappily been trampled to death in the tumultuous crowd, they exclaimed, behold the fruit of your system. At last the unfortunate Law, now become odious in the eyes of suffering France, fled in disgrace from a country which he had promised to raise to affluence and prosperity, and after wandering over Germany, Denmark, Holland, and England, he settled at Venice, where he died 1729. He wrote a small treatise on money and paper credit. He was in his person well proportioned, of a dignified and commanding aspect, but in his conduct he was so immoderately attached to play, that he did not hesitate to venture his all on the chance of a die.

LAW, Edmund, a native of Westmoreland, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He was afterwards fellow of Christ's college, and was one of the members of that society, in the university, for a time celebrated under the name of Zodiac. In 1739 he obtained the living of Graystock, and soon after Salkeld, and in 1755 was made head of Peterhouse. In 1767 he was presented to a prebendal stall at Durham, and two years after raised to the see of Carlisle, over which he presided with great dignity, and with truly pastoral care. He was author of the Theory of Religion, 8vo.—Archbishop King's Origin of Evil, with notes, 8vo.—A View of the Controversy concerning an Intermediate State, 12mo.—Sermons, &c. and he died 1787, aged 84.

LAW, William, an able divine, born at King's Cliff, Northamptonshire, 1686. He was educated at Oxford, where he took his degrees, but did not enter into orders, as he had some scruples with respect to the necessary oaths, and thus could not obtain some valuable preferment which was intended for him. He wrote a Serious Call to a devout and holy Life—a treatise on Christian Perfection, &c. besides some tracts against Bishop Hoadley, and the works of Jacob Behmen, whose extravagant opinions he adopted in the latter part of his life. He died 1761, in Northamptonshire, at the house of Mrs. Hesther Gibbon, the aunt of the famous historian, where he had for several years found a hospitable asylum. As a preacher among the dissenters he possessed influence, and his doctrines were powerfully enforced by the meekness and sanctity of his life, and by his inoffensive manners.

LAW, Jonathan, governor of Connecticut, was born at Milford in that state, August 6th, 1674, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1695. He soon after entered on the practice of law in his native town, and in 1710 was appointed chief judge of the county court, and in 1715 was transferred to the bench of the supreme court, as an associate judge, where he continued with the exception of one year till 1725. He was in 1717 an assistant, and in 1725 was chosen lieutenant-governor, and appointed chief justice of the superior court, which offices he continued to hold till his election as governor in 1742. He remained in that station till his death, November 6th, 1750, in his 77th year. A Latin funeral oration was delivered on the occasion at Yale College, by Mr. Stiles, afterwards president of that institution. Governor Law was distinguished for talents, learning, and amiableness of character.  L.

LAW, Richard, LL.D. judge of the district court of the United States, was the son of the preceding, and born at Milford, March 17th, 1733. He was educated at Yale college, where he was graduated in 1751. He established himself in the practice of law at New-London, Connecticut, and soon rose to the highest eminence in the profession. After a lucrative practice of several years, the decline of his health induced him to accept a seat as chief judge on the bench of the county court, which he continued to occupy till 1784, when he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and in 1786 chief judge, in which office he continued until the adoption of the federal constitution in 1789, when he received his appointment as United States district judge. He continued in that office till his death, January 26, 1806, in his 73d year.

LAWES, Henry, an English musician, born at Salisbury about 1600. He was in the service of Charles I. and in 1653 published his "Ayres and Dialogues," in folio, with commendatory verses by the poets, Milton, Philips, Waller, &c. He set to music the Comus of Milton, and performed in it, when it was represented at Ludlow castle, 1634. He was long patronised by the family of the earl of Bridgewater, and was the friend of Milton and other learned men. He died October 21, 1662, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

LAWES, William, brother to the preceding, was also an excellent musician. He was commissary to general Gerard, and was killed at the siege of Chester. Two large MS. volumes of his works are preserved at Oxford.

LAWRENCE, Stringer, an English general in the service of the East India company. He died 1775, aged 78, and his services were honourably acknowledged by the company, who erected to his memory a handsome monument in Westminster abbey.

LAWRENCE, James, captain in the navy of the United States, was born at Burlington, New-Jersey, Oct. 1, 1781. His father designed him for the bar, and gave him a respectable education, but at the age of seventeen he entered the navy as a midshipman, under Captain Tingey. He afterwards served as a lieutenant in the Tripoline war, and assisted Decatur in destroying the frigate Philadelphia. He spent several years in the Mediterranean, having the command at first of the schooner Enterprise, and afterwards of a gun-boat. He then became the first lieutenant of the Constitution, and successively had command of the Vixen, the Wasp, the Argus, and the Hornet. In the last vessel, while returning from a cruise on the coast of South America, he fell in with the British brig Peacock, near Demarara, on the 24th of February, 1813, and succeeded in capturing her after a battle of fifteen minutes. He was received with great distinction on his return to the United States, and soon appointed to command the frigate Chesapeake, then lying at Boston.

He sailed in that vessel on the morning of the 1st of June, and at 4 in the afternoon commenced a battle with the British frigate Shannon, which had been waiting for him, and after a desperate contest of a few minutes, during which he was mortally wounded, his vessel was surrendered. He died on the 4th day after, and was conveyed to Halifax, and thence to New-York, where he was interred.

LAWSON, sir John, a native of Hull, who from an obscure origin rose in the navy, and became captain of a ship under the parliament. Though by principle a republican, he joined Monk in effecting the restoration, and for his services was thanked by the houses of parliament. He served as rear admiral under the duke of York, and in a battle fought against the Dutch on the 3d June, 1665, he was wounded by a musket-shot in the knee, of which he died.

LAYARD, Charles Peter, an English divine, son of a physician of Greenwich, was educated at Westminster school, and St. John's college, Cambridge. He obtained in 1773 and 1775, the Seatonian prize, and was, by the strong recommendation of his friends, appointed minister of Oxendon chapel, and librarian to Tenison's library, St. Martin's parish. He was promoted in 1800 to the deanery of Bristol, and died 1803. He published some single sermons, and since his death a subscription has been raised, by the publication of a volume of his sermons, for the benefit of his family.

LAZARELLI, John Francis, a native of Gabio, author of sonnets, odes, and satirical poems of merit, often printed. He died 1694, aged 80.

LEAKE, Richard, master gunner of England, was born at Harwich, 1629. He distinguished himself in various engagements, especially against Van Tromp, 1673, when the Royal Prince, the ship in which he was, after the loss of her masts, and of 400 of her crew killed and wounded, was attacked by a man of war and two fire ships. In this distressing situation the English admiral Rooke, made a signal for the ship to strike her colours, but Leake, animating his companions, declared the Royal Prince should never be given up while he lived, and thus boldly seconded by his two sons and an obedient crew, he brought off the ship safe to Chatham, though he had the misfortune to see his son Henry fall by his side. In consequence of this bravery he was made master-gunner of all England, and store-keeper of Woolwich ordnance. He first contrived to fire off a mortar by the blast of a piece, a method still used, and he displayed great ingenuity in the composition of fire-works. He died 1696.

LEAKE, sir John, son of the above, was born at Rotherhithe, Surrey, 1656. He was educated in naval knowledge under his father, and was with him at the memorable fight of 1673. He was afterwards in the merchants' service, but at last preferred advancement in the navy. He was made master gunner of the Neptune, 1675, and continued in that situation till 1688, when he was appointed to the Drake fire ship, against the intended invasion from Holland. He afterwards joined the party of the prince of Orange, and was very serviceable in rescuing Londonderry from the power of James II. In 1692 he was one of the heroes of the battle off Cape la Hogue, and till the peace of Ryswick, in 1697, he continued to distinguish himself as an active and enterprising officer. In 1702 he was sent on the Newfoundland station, and he drove the French totally from the place, and thus acquired both reputation for the celerity of his measures, and opulence from the value of the prizes which he made. On his return he was made rear admiral of the blue, and soon after knighted, and he then assisted sir George Rooke in the reduction of Gibraltar, and afterwards relieved that fortress, 1705, when besieged by the French by sea, and the Spaniards by land. That same year he again, a second time, relieved the fortress, with the co-operation of the prince of Hesse, and defeated the French fleet, and reduced Barcelona. In 1706, he again appeared before Barcelona, and relieved it so effectually that king Philip abandoned the siege, rendered memorable at the moment by a total eclipse of the sun, which spread consternation among the enemy, whose device was a sun. From Barcelona, sir John proceeded to the reduction of Alicante and Ivica, and the island of Majorca, and then returned to England to receive the rewards of the queen and the congratulations of the people. On Shovel's death he was made admiral of the white and commander of the fleet, in which high office he convoyed the new queen of Spain to her consort Charles, and then reduced Sardinia and Minorca to the obedience of the allied monarchs. In 1708 he was elected member for Rochester, and the next year became one of the lords of the admiralty, but refused, on the resignation of lord Orford, to accept the place of first lord. In 1712 he was at the head of the expedition to take Dunkirk, and his various services were acknowledged by his being appointed a fifth time admiral of the fleet. The change of ministry at the accession of George I. reduced him to a private station, and he spent the rest of his life in retirement, between Greenwich and Beddington, in Surrey, where he had two seats. He had an only son, whose ill conduct in the first part of his life, embittered his moments, and whose death in March, 1719, afflicted him so severely that his senses were clouded at intervals. This brave man died at his house, Greenwich, 1st Aug. 1720, aged 65, leaving his property to his wife's sister's husband, captain Martyn.

LEAKE, Stephen Martyn, son of captain Martyn, rose in the herald's college to the office of Garter. His work on English coins, called "Nummi Britannici Historia," 8vo. was twice edited, and is valuable. In 1750 he published the life of Admiral Sir John Leake, who had bestowed his estates upon him as being the son of lady Leake's sister. Of this work only 50 copies were printed, and also 50 of the statutes of the order of the garter, 4to. He died at Mile-end, Middlesex, 24th March, 1773, and was buried at Thorp, in Essex.

LEAKE, John, founder of the Westminster lying-in-hospital, was a physician of reputation both as to practice and learning. He wrote various tracts on female diseases, midwifery, &c. and died 1792.

LEAPOR, Mary, an ingenious woman, obscurely born, and educated as the daughter of a gardener, in the house of judge Blencowe, at Marston, Northamptonshire. In her 24th year she was seized with the measles, and after a short life of unaffected modesty, and practical piety, she fell a victim to the disease, 1735, a few days after her mother. On her death-bed she gave her father some papers, which were published in 2 vols. 8vo. and contained original poems of great merit, especially the Temple of Love, a Dream, and the Unhappy Father, a Tragedy.

LEBID, an Arabian poet, whose abilities were employed by Mahomet to answer the satirical works written against him. He died at the age of 140, and his poems were so much esteemed that they were affixed on the gates of the temple of Mecca.

LE BLANC, Marcel, one of the 14 Jesuits whom Lewis XIV. sent to Siam. He was taken by the English as he was going to China, to convert the people to Christianity, and he died in 1693, at Mosambique, at the age of 40. He is author of a valuable History of the revolutions of Siam, 2 vols. 12mo.

LECLAIR, John, a native of Lyons, who excelled as a player on the violin. His compositions, consisting of sonatas, duets, trios, concertos, Scylla and Glaucus, an opera, &c. are highly and deservedly esteemed. He was assassinated in the night, at Paris, 23d Oct. 1764, aged 67.

LECTIUS, James, a learned Genevese, four times syndic of his native city. He is known as the editor of "Poetæ Græci Veteres," 2 vols. folio. He was also a poet and critic, and died 1611, aged 53.

LEDESMA, Alphonsus, a Spanish poet, who died 1623, aged 71. He received the epithet of divine, more from the sacred subjects which exercised his muse, than the sublimity of his compositions.

LEDYARD, John, an enterprising traveller, was a native of Groton, in Connecticut. After studying at Dartmouth college, in New-Hampshire, he came to London, and embarked as a marine with Captain Cooke on his second voyage. At his return he resolved to explore the Arctic circle on foot; and, after enduring many difficulties, arrived at Petersburg in 1787. From thence he travelled through Siberia, and proceeded to Oczakow; but at Yakutz he was arrested by order of the government, and conveyed to the Polish frontiers, where he was told that if he returned to Russia he should be hanged. He now made the best of his way to England, and was employed by the African association upon a journey to trace the source of the Niger. In this enterprise he died at Cairo, in August, 1788.

LEE, Samuel, a native of London, educated at Wadham college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He was, in 1662 ejected from his living of Bishopsgate, London, for nonconformity, and in 1686 embarked for North America. The report of the revolution roused him with a wish to return to England, but in his passage, he was taken by a French ship, and died in prison, aged 64. He wrote a Description of Solomon's Temple, fol.—Discourse on the Ten Tribes—Israel Redux—the Life of John Rowe, &c.

LEE, Nathaniel, an English dramatist, son of a clergyman. He was educated at Westminster school, under Busby, and went to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of B.A. 1668, but failed in his application for a fellowship. Upon quitting the university he came to London, and in 1672 exhibited himself as Duncan, in the tragedy of Macbeth, but without success, and therefore he had recourse to his pen for support. His first tragedy was "Nero, emperor of Rome," in 1675, and it was received with such approbation that he every year, till 1681, produced a tragedy. His indigence at last, and the wild enthusiastic turn of his imagination, deprived him of his reason, in 1684, and for four years he was confined in Bedlam. Afterwards his senses recovered, so that he wrote two plays, the princess of Cleves, 1689, and the Massacre of Paris, 1690. His only income was now only ten shillings a week from the theatre, as a pitiful reward for his services, but his reason was at times clouded, and he was found dead one night in the street, after a drunken frolic, 1690. He was buried in the churchyard of St. Clements Danes, in the Strand. His plays are eleven in number, and though the language is frequently bombastic, yet they possess strength, fire, and pathos; and he was, as Addison has observed, the first of modern tragedians, if he had known how to check the impetuosity of his genius. His Rival Queens, and Theodosius, are still favourites on the stage.

LEE, Thomas, succeeded president Robinson in the administration of the government of Virginia, in 1749. His influence and connexions in England rendered it probable that he would have been appointed governor had his life continued, but he died suddenly in 1750, when Lewis Burwell succeeded him as president of the council.

☞ L.

LEE, Charles, major-general in the American army, was a native of Wales. He received a classical education, and gained by travelling on the continent, a knowledge of the principal modern languages. He entered the army at an early age, and served under general Abercrombie in America, in the campaign of 1758, and four years after under general Burgoyne, in Portugal, when he held a colonelcy. He afterwards spent some time in the Polish service, but in 1773 came to America, and settled in Virginia. On the commencement of the war of the revolution in 1775, he was appointed major-general, and repaired with general Washington to the army at Cambridge. He remained there till the following year, when he was despatched to New-York to defend it against the British, and discharged the duty with great promptness and energy. Not long after he was appointed to command the forces in the southern states, and rendered the most important services by exciting the soldiery to resolution and ardour. In October, 1776, he rejoined the army under Washington, and was soon after captured by the British, while reconnoitring; and remained in their hands, suffering the most severe treatment, till the spring of 1778, when he was released and returned to his command. Soon after he was intrusted with a division of the army at the battle of Monmouth, and for disobedience of orders, and disrespect to the commander-in-chief on that occasion, was suspended from his command, and retired to private life. He lived on his farm in Virginia till 1782, when he removed to Philadelphia, and soon after died, apparently of chagrin at his loss of reputation. He was clownish in his dress, and rude in his manners, impious in his principles, and profligate in his habits. Irascible, addicted to sarcasm, vindictive, and ambitious, he often incurred the dislike of those around him, and seems never to have enjoyed much respect except in his official character in the army, where he obtained the reputation of talents, activity, and courage. ¶ L.

LEE, Richard Henry, president of the American congress, was a native of Virginia, and devoted his eminent talents to the service of his country. He had the honour of being one of the first in exciting resistance to the encroachments of the British on the rights of the colonies by the stamp act, in 1765, and, in 1773, procured, in the house of Burgesses of Virginia, the appointment of a committee of correspondence for the purpose of disseminating and obtaining information, and exciting the colonies to the defence of their liberties. He was a member of the congress in 1774, and 1776, and was the first who proposed to that body the declaration of independence. He was again elected a member of congress in 1784, and appointed its president, and on the organization of the present government in 1789, was chosen a senator, and held the appointment till 1792, when he resigned, and two years after died in the sixty-third year of his age. Mr. Lee was one of the most distinguished of those statesmen by whom the independence of his country was accomplished. His endowments were of a superior order, and he cultivated them by an intimate acquaintance with the classics, with philosophy, and politics. He possessed a chaste and lofty eloquence, which gave him great influence in the councils of the nation, was ardent in his patriotism, and inflexible in his integrity. ¶ L.

LEE, Arthur, LL.D. minister of the United States to France, was a native of Virginia, and brother of Richard Henry Lee. He received his education at the university of Edinburgh, where he also studied medicine. He returned to Virginia and practised physic at Williamsburgh several years, but then went again to England, and entered on the study of law in the Temple. While residing there he rendered important services to his country, by transmitting the earliest intelligence of the designs of the ministry respecting it. He visited Virginia again about the year 1769, and published the Monitor's letters in defence of the rights of the colonies. But he again returned to London where he was employed as the agent of Virginia, and in 1775 presented the second petition of Congress to the king. In 1776 he was appointed minister to France in conjunction with Doctor Franklin and Mr. Deane, and assisted in negotiating the treaty with that nation. In 1779 he was recalled in consequence of false accusations which Mr. Deane had circulated respecting his conduct, and which, on his arrival in America the following year, he immediately repelled, and regained the public confidence. In 1784 he was employed to negotiate a treaty with the six Indian nations. In February, 1790, he was admitted a counsellor of the Supreme Court of the United States. He died Dec. 14th, 1792. He possessed a vigorous understanding, was ardent in his passions, plain in his manners, and eminently patriotic and upright. ¶ L.

LEE, Francis Lightfoot, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was a member of the committee of safety of Virginia, in 1775, and the same year elected a delegate to Congress in the place of Mr. Bland. He had been a member of the house of Burgesses in 1768, and one of the committee for preparing the memorial and remonstrance to parliament respecting taxation. He was a brother of Arthur Lee, and died at Richmond, April, 1797, aged 63. ¶ L.

LEE, Thomas Sim, governor of Maryland, succeeded Johnson in 1779, and continued in office until 1783, when he took his seat in Congress as one of the delegates of that state. He was afterwards member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States, and was a second time governor of Maryland in 1792. He early withdrew from public life to indulge his taste for agricultural pursuits, and died at Needwood, in Frederick county, November 9th, 1819, aged 75. ¶ L.

LEE, Charles, attorney-general of the United States, was appointed to succeed Mr. Bradford in 1795. He was an eminent lawyer, a member of the legislature of Virginia, and was appointed by President Jefferson, chief-justice of the circuit court of the United States for the fourth circuit, but declined accepting the office. He died in Farquhar county, Virginia, June, 1815. ¶ L.

LEE, Ezra, an officer in the army of the American revolution, who, for his intrepidity, was selected to navigate the marine Turtle constructed in the harbour of New-York for the purpose of destroying the British ship Asia. He was prevented from attaching the instrument to the ship by her copper—but by exploding it in the vicinity, alarmed the enemy so that they immediately removed the fleet to the Hook. He fought in several of the most important battles of the war, and enjoyed, in a high degree, the respect of his superior officers. In private life he was distinguished for amiableness, integrity, and benevolence. His death took place at Lyme, Connecticut, in 1821, in his 73d year. ¶ L.

LEECHMAN, William, D.D. principal of Glasgow university, was author of 2 vols. of Sermons, and an Essay on Prayer, which possess great merit. He died 1785, aged 78.

LEEF, John Anthony Vander, a painter of Bruges. His landscapes, painted after nature, his sea views, &c. were greatly admired. He died 1720, aged 56.

LEESE, Anna, founder of the sect of Shakers, was born in England, of low parentage, and procured subsistence at the expense of her character. She first made her extraordinary pretensions in 1770, and collected a few followers, but her meetings were suppressed as disorderly. She came to New-York in 1774, and two years after settled with eleven proselytes near Albany. She gave out that she was the woman clothed with the sun, mentioned in Revelation, the dispenser of the divine influences, the judge of the dead, and that she was not herself liable to death, and instituted a worship made up chiefly of grimace, muttering, and dancing. She received a considerable accession to her followers in 1780, and died in 1784.  L.

LEETE, William, governor of Connecticut, was a native of England, where he studied law, and served some time as a clerk in the bishop's court, but gave up the place from aversion to the tyranny he saw practised there. He came to New-England in 1638, in company with governor Eaton, and settled at Guilford, Connecticut. He was soon chosen a magistrate, and in 1658 deputy governor of the colony of New-Haven. Three years after he was elected governor. He rendered himself obnoxious to the British by furnishing the regicides, Whalley and Goffe, an asylum from the king's officers who were sent to arrest them. On the union of the two colonies of Connecticut, he was at first appointed a magistrate, and from 1669 to 1676, deputy governor. He was then placed in the chair of the chief magistrate. He died in 1683. He was rigidly puritanical in his religion, and a stern republican in his politics. His administration was characterized by great uprightness and prudence.  L.

LEEURO, Gabriel Van der, a native of Dordt, who excelled in the painting of animals, of herds of oxen, sheep, &c. He died 1688, aged 45. His brother Peter was also eminent in the same line of the profession.

LEGGE, George, lord Dartmouth, an able naval officer, brought up under admiral Spragge. He displayed such gallantry, that at the age of 21 he was made, in 1667, by Charles II. captain of a ship. In 1672 he distinguished himself in a battle against the Dutch, and the next year was appointed governor of Portsmouth, master of the horse, and gentleman to the duke of York. In 1682 he was raised to the peerage, and the next year was sent to Africa, as governor of Tangier, with orders to destroy the works of that fortress, and bring off the English garrison, whose situation had been rendered perilous by the frequent attacks of the Moors. He successfully effected this, and was rewarded by the king with ten thousand pounds. On James's accession, he was master of the horse, general of the ordnance, and constable of the tower, and when the prince of Orange meditated the invasion of the country, he sailed against him as admiral of the fleet, but the failure of the wind prevented the meeting of the two squadrons. As he was strongly attached to James, he became suspected at the revolution, and was, in consequence, sent a prisoner to the tower, where he died, 25th Oct. 1691, aged 44.

LEGUANO, Stefano Maria, a historical painter, the pupil of Cignani, and Carlo Maratti. His pieces are masterly, and in the judicious diffusion of light and shade, and in the display of a correct taste, and strong genius, he is particularly eminent. He was born near Bologna, and died 1715, aged 55.

LEIBNITZ, William Godfrey, baron of, a celebrated philosopher, born 23d June, 1646, at Leipsic, where his father was professor of moral philosophy, and secretary to the university. Though he lost his father at the early age of six, his education was not neglected, but the strong powers of his mind were assiduously cultivated at his native university, where at the age of 20, he took his degree of master of arts. Not only here, and at Jena, his studies were directed to the acquisition of whatever could be reaped in mathematics and literature, from learned professors, but the contents of his father's valuable library were perused with avidity and success. The law was the profession to which he particularly directed his attention, but when he was refused the degree of doctor in that faculty, at Leipsic, because he spoke with disrespect of the principles of Aristotle, he repaired to Altorf, where his Thesis de Casibus Perplexis, ensured him not only the academical honours he solicited, but the applauses of the learned students, and the liberal offer of a professor's chair. Declining this honourable offer, he went to Nuremberg, where he became acquainted with the minister of the elector of Mentz, who prevailed upon him to enter into the service of his master. Leibnitz accepted the offer with joy, and to prove his attachment, to his new sovereign, he wrote a treatise to recommend the elevation of the elector to the vacant throne of Poland. He afterwards went to Paris in 1672, on the affairs of his friend, the prime minister, and in this journey, he not only formed a connexion with the most learned men of France, but he applied himself more particularly to mathematical knowledge. In 1673 he visited London, and there received from John Collins, the secretary of the Royal Society, some hints about the invention of fluxions, by Newton, to which he afterwards laid claim, but on very slight and doubtful grounds. The death of his patrons, the elector and his minister, left him in narrow circumstances, but he found in the duke of Brunswick Lunenburg, a new friend, who not only favoured his views in his literary pursuits, but settled a pension on him, with the appointment of counsellor. The next duke, afterwards George I. proved an equally favourable patron, and prevailed upon him to write the History of the House of Brunswick. In 1700 he was elected member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and on the erection of the Berlin academy that year, he was liberally nominated by the king of Prussia, perpetual president, and though not resident there, he largely contributed by his papers to enrich the memoirs of that learned body. He about this time devoted much of his attention to invent "a universal language," which might become the common language of the whole world. The plan had once been undertaken by D'Algarne, and by Dr. Wilkins, but not on so broad a foundation. Leibnitz proposed characters, which, like those in algebra, might not only be simple, but expressive, and enable men of all nations to converse familiarly together, but though above 13 years were employed in this extraordinary design, the death of the philosopher prevented its final completion. In 1711 Leibnitz was made Aulic counsellor to the emperor, and privy counsellor to the Prussian court, with a salary; but the multiplicity of his engagements prevented him from finishing his History of Hanover. He was employed by Caroline, afterwards queen of England, to undertake a controversy against Dr. Clarke, on the subject of free-will, the reality of space, and other philosophical subjects. He proposed the erection of a learned academy at Vienna, under the patronage of the emperor, but death prevented the completion of his plans. He died 14th Nov. 1716, of those complicated disorders, the gout and the stone, aged 70. In his temper, Leibnitz was passionate, he possessed great strength of mind, a most retentive memory, and strong eagerness after knowledge. He was in his character, avaricious, and at his death, such a quantity of money was found in his house, boarded in sacks, that the wife of his nephew, who inherited his property, died with excessive joy at the sight of so unexpected a sum. He had in his life the singular felicity of being esteemed as the greatest and most learned man in Europe, and he did not belie the public opinion. He was in his principles a strict Lutheran. He was never married, though it was said he left a natural son. His works are Scriptores Rerum Brunsw. 3 vols. fol.—De Jure Suprematus et Legationis Principum German. under the fictitious name of Furstener—Codex Gentium

Diplomaticus, 2 vols. fol.—Miscellanea Berolinens.—Notitia Opticæ Promotæ—De Arte Combinatoria—Essays of Theodicia, on the Goodness of God and Liberty of Man, 2 vols. 12mo.—Metaphysical Tracts—Questions of Philosophy and Mathematics—Theoria Motus Abstracti et Motus Concreti Accessiones Historiæ, 2 vols. 4to.—De Origine Francorum Disquisitionio—Poems, Latin, French, &c.—Collectanea, &c.—Recueil, &c.—His mathematical works have been published by Dutens, 6 vols. 4to. 1767.

LEIGH, Sir Edward, a learned Englishman, born at Shawell, Leicestershire, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford. He was member of the long parliament, and of the assembly of divines, and also a parliamentary general. He was imprisoned in 1648, as being a violent presbyterian, and afterwards employed himself totally in literary pursuits. He died at his house called Rushall hall, Staffordshire, June 2d, 1671. He wrote Critica Sacra—Annotations on the New Testament—Observations on the 12 Cæsars—Treatises of Religion, &c.—a Body of Divinity, &c.

LEIGH, Charles, an able naturalist, born at Grange, Lancashire. He practised physic, and was fellow of the Royal Society, and author of "the Natural History of Lancashire, Cheshire, Derbyshire,—History of Virginia—Treatises on Mineral Waters, &c." He died in the beginning of the 18th century.

LEIGHTON, Alexander, a native of Edinburgh, educated at the university there, where he became professor of moral philosophy. In 1613 he came to London, and by his two books called "Zion's Plea," and the "Looking Glass of the Holy War," against the government, he drew upon himself the notice of the star chamber, who ordered him to have his nose slit, and his ears cut, and to be whipped from Newgate to Aldgate, and then to Tyburn. This dreadful sentence was executed with barbarity, but after eleven years of confinement, he was set at liberty by the parliament, 1640, and made keeper of Lambeth palace, now a state prison. He died insane, 1644, aged 57.

LEIGHTON, Robert, a Scotch divine, born at Edinburgh, son of the preceding. He was minister of a small church near Edinburgh, and conducted himself with such moderation, as offended the violent partisans of his times. His amiable character, however, was seen and admired by the magistrates of Edinburgh, who unanimously appointed him to preside over their college, where for ten years he displayed all the abilities of a learned and popular preceptor. He was afterwards made bishop of Dumblane by Charles I. but finding his moderation and humility unable to stem the torrent of persecuting presbyterianism, he came to London, to resign his holy office. Instead, however, of accepting his abdication, Charles prevailed upon him to become archbishop of Glasgow, at a time when he hoped that exemplary piety, and the most unaffected manners, might recommend the measures of the court. But the virulence of party was so deeply rooted, that Leighton, about a year after, resigned the dangerous dignity which he could not support with comfort to himself, or advantage to his sovereign. He retired to Sussex, and by a sudden death, closed a life of literary labours and of genuine goodness in 1684. He wrote a Commentary on St. Peter's Epistles, besides sermons and divinity tracts.

LEISMAN, John Anthony, a German painter, two of whose pieces are particularly admired; a landscape, with rough mountains and shady woods, with robbers darting unexpectedly to attack some travellers—and a sea-port with elegant buildings and antiquities, ruins, &c. He died 1698, aged 94.

LEISLER, Jacob, who headed the insurrection in New-York in 1689, had previously enjoyed some influence among the people, but was totally unqualified for such an enterprise. After he had dispersed the party in the city of New-York favourable to king James, and assumed the administration, he proceeded to Albany, took the fort, and confiscated the property of those who opposed his authority. On the arrival of Sloughter with the commission of governor in 1691, he for some time refused to surrender the fort at New-York to him, but at length abandoned it, and was soon after seized and condemned for treason. Sloughter disapproved of the sentence, but in a moment of intoxication into which he was betrayed for the purpose, was induced to sign the death warrant, and it was immediately executed.

LELAND, John, the first and last antiquary royal of England, so called by Henry VIII. and deservedly named the father of antiquaries, was born in Leland, and educated at St. Paul's under Lilly. By the friendship of Thomas Myles, he, on the death of his parents, was maintained at Christ college, Cambridge, from which he removed to All-Soul's, Oxford. He improved himself afterwards by studying at Paris, and became, in ancient and modern languages, and in literature, the most accomplished writer of the age. His zeal for antiquarian research was happily patronised by the king, and he was empowered in 1533, by his master, to peruse the records of all libraries, and collections private and public, in the kingdom, for the elucidation of English history. Six years were thus laboriously employed in travelling through England and Wales, and that his income might be adequate to the expenses of his journey, he was liberally presented by the king to the living of Popeling, near Calais, and afterwards made, in 1542, rector of Hasely, Oxfordshire, canon of Christ church, and prebendary of Sarum. In 1545 he had digested four books, as the beginning of his labours, which he presented to the king, under the title of a New Year's Gift. To complete his further works he retired to his house in the parish of St. Michael le Querne, London; but such is the uncertainty and misery of human hopes, after six years' study he was suddenly deprived of his reason, probably in consequence of his intense application; and so violent was the phrenzy, that he never recovered. He died two years after, 18th April, 1552, and was interred in St. Michael le Querne's church, at the west end of Cheapside, which disappeared at the great conflagration of 1666. As to his character, England, says one of his contemporaries, never saw, and perhaps never will see again a man equally skilled in the antiquities of his country. His Itinerary, and Collectanea, were published by Hearne, and so extensive are his resources, that he is, as it were, the common spring from which his successors and imitators, the Bayles, the Camdens, the Burtons, the Dugdales, the Gibsons, and others, have copiously drawn.

LELAND, John, a native of Wigan, in Lancashire. At the age of six he was deprived of the powers of his understanding and memory by the small-pox, and for twelve months continued in that deplorable situation. His recollection afterwards gradually recovered, and when his parents removed to Dublin, he there applied himself with unusual diligence and success to literary pursuits. In 1716 he became assistant to Mr. Nathanael Weld, over a dissenting congregation; but he acquired greater popularity as a writer than as a preacher, respectable as he was. His view of the deistical writers that have appeared in England, 2 vols. 8vo.—and his Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation, 2 vols. 4to. are the works of an able divine, by the most solid and convincing arguments, employing all his powers to refute atheism and infidelity. He wrote besides, a Defence of the Christian Religion against Tindal, 8vo.—a volume of Family Devotions, 12mo. and died 16th Jan. 1766, universally respected. His funeral sermon was preached by Nathanael Weld, his coadjutor.

LELAND, Thomas, D.D. a native of Dublin, senior fellow of Trinity college there, died 1785, aged 83. He was a man of learning, and strong powers of mind, and wrote, a History of Ireland, 4to.—the Life of Philip of Macedon—Principles of Human eloquence, attacked by Warburton—translation of Demosthenes' Orations, &c.

LE LONG, James, author of the "Historical Library of France," a curious work, was of the Oratory, and died at his native place, Paris, 1721, aged 66.

LELY, Sir Peter, an eminent painter, born in Westphalia, Germany, 1617. He studied his art at the Hague, and under de Crebber; and in 1641 came to England, where his landscapes and historical compositions recommended him to notice. He, however, soon discovered that portrait painting was a more lucrative employment, and therefore all his powers were directed to that branch of the art in which he acquired such celebrity. Though unable to travel to Italy, he procured the best pieces of that famous school, and uniting all their beauties to the suggestions of his own genius, he became a pattern of excellence to all other artists. In the graceful air of his heads, the variety and interest of his postures, and the easy management of his draperies, he was said to be inimitable. He was deservedly a favourite with Charles I. and with Charles II. who knighted him, and made him his chief painter. He married an English lady, and died of an apoplexy, at London, 1680, and was buried in St. Paul's church, Covent-garden.

LEMENS, Balthasar Van, a native of Antwerp, eminent as a historical painter. His figures were very graceful, and evinced the man of genius and of taste. He settled in London, and died there 1704, aged 67.

LEMERY, Nicolas, a French chymist, born 17th Nov. 1645, at Rouen, and placed there as apprentice to an apothecary. Anxious to study chymistry, he left Rouen, and came to Paris, and soon after went to Montpellier, where he soon acquired reputation under the instruction of Vernant, and became an able and interesting lecturer on chymistry. In 1672 he returned to Paris, and there began to dissipate those clouds of ignorance and prejudice which enveloped the science and language of chymistry: he provided himself a laboratory, and saw his lectures attended by numerous and respectable classes. As he was a protestant, his religion exposed him to persecution: therefore, after refusing to accept the invitations of the court of Berlin, he passed over to England in 1683, where Charles II. received him with great condescension. He, however, soon after returned to France, and yielding to the pressure of the times, he became a Roman catholic, that he might pursue his chymical studies without fear of persecution. On the revival of the academy of sciences 1699, he was made associate chymist, and became a pensionary. He died of an apoplexy, 19th June, 1715, aged 70. His works are, a Course of Chymistry, often edited—an Universal Pharmacopœia—a Universal treatise of Drugs—a treatise of Antimony.

LEMERY, Lewis, son of the above, was born at Paris, 1677, and became physician to the king, and member of the academy of sciences. He wrote a useful treatise on Food, 2 vols.—another on the Worms of the Human Body—besides several papers in the memoirs of the academy, and died 1743.

LEMNIUS, Lævinus, a physician, born at Ziric-zee, Zealand, 1504. On the death of his wife, he took orders, and became canon of Ziric-zee, where he died 1568. He wrote, de occultis Naturæ Miraculis—a treatise on Astrology—an Account of the Plants mentioned in Scripture.

LEMOINE, Francis, a French painter, born at Paris. Though without genius, he, by astonishing application, became an eminent painter. This unfortunate man destroyed himself in a fit of melancholy, 4th June, 1737, aged 49. His chief works are, the Nativity at St. Roche—the Flight into Egypt—a Transfiguration—the Conversion of St. Paul—the Apotheosis of Hercules, at Versailles, the saloon of which he took four years in painting.

LEMON, George William, author of an Etymological English Dictionary, 4to. 1789, a work of merit, was a clergyman, and died 1797, aged 71.

LE MONNIER, Peter Charles, a native of Paris, who went with Maupertuis to measure a degree of the meridian towards the north pole. He wrote, Astronomical Institutions—Tables of the Sun—Corrections for those of the Moon—Lunar Nautical Astronomy, &c. He was member of the academy of sciences, and afterwards of the national institute, and died 1799.

LE MONNIER, Lewis William, brother to the preceding, was member of the academy of sciences, of the national institute, and of the London Royal Society. He distinguished himself as an able physician, and as an experimental philosopher, and he contributed several valuable articles to the French Encyclopedie, especially on electricity, &c. He died 1799.—There was an ecclesiastic of that name, who, besides fables, tales, and epistles, translated Terence and Persius into French.

LENCLOS, Ninon de, a celebrated beauty, born 1615, at Paris, of a respectable family. Her mother wished to devote her to the seclusion of a convent, but her father, who was a man of wit and gallantry, prevented it; and the daughter, losing both her parents at the age of 15, soon showed how attached she was to the pleasures of the world. Courted for her polished understanding, and the vivacity of her wit, but more for her beauty, she rejected the honourable offers of matrimony; and as she possessed opulence, managed by economy, she determined to enjoy her liberty, and therefore yielded her person to those, who for greatness of talents, of birth, or of rank, were most pleasing to her licentious imagination. Yet in these voluptuous enjoyments, she affected to preserve the manners of a woman of virtue, and so captivating was her conversation, and dignified her personal deportment, that ladies of character and respectability became her friends and constant associates. Sensible of the charms of virtue, and well skilled in the works of Montaigne and Charron, she talked as a philosopher; but while she reasoned like Socrates, she unfortunately acted the part of Lais. Thus long flattered by the gay, the learned, and the opulent, she preserved her beauty almost to the last, and died 1706, aged 90. She left some children behind her. One of her sons, ignorant of her relationship to him, became enamoured of her; and when she, to check his passion, declared herself, by infallible proofs, to be his mother, the unfortunate youth, in despair, stabbed himself in her presence. Some of her letters are preserved in the works of St. Evremont, but the letters to the marquis de Sevigné, published as her own, though entertaining, are spurious.

LENFANT, James, a protestant divine, born 1661. He distinguished himself at Saumur and Geneva, and became minister of the French church at Heidelberg, 1683; but when the palatinate was invaded by the French, he retired to Berlin, where he died of a palsy 1728, aged 67. This respectable man was author of three capital works, the History of the Council of Constance; of Basil; of Pisa, each 2 vols. 4to. He wrote besides, the History of pope Joan; Poggeana; sermons; and the New Testament translated into Latin with Beausobre.

LENGLET, Nicolas du Fresnoy, a French writer, born at Beauvais, 1674. He was engaged in embassies, first as secretary to the French minister at the court of Cologne, and was afterwards engaged in the correspondence between Brussels and Holland. After reaching his 82d year, he fell asleep while reading by the fire, and then dropped into it, so that his head was nearly burnt off before he was discovered, 1756. His "Methode pour etudier l'Histoire," has been admired and translated into English. He was a voluminous but incorrect writer.

LENNARD, Sampson, a friend of Sir Philip Sidney, with whom he distinguished himself at the battle of Zutphen. He died about 1630, eminent as a translator of some works from the Latin and the French, and as well skilled in heraldry.

LENNOX, Charlotte, a native of New-York, known as the learned author of Shakspeare illustrated, 3 vols. 12mo. containing an account of the histories from which the great bard is supposed to have drawn his plays; the Female Quixotte, a novel of merit; Memoirs of Harriet Stuart; and of countess Berci; Henrietta, a novel; Philander, a dramatic pastoral;

Sophia; Euphemia, novels; Sister; Old City Manners, two comedies; translations of Burnoy's Greek Theatre; and of Sully's Memoirs, &c. She was intimate with Johnson, Richardson, and other men of learning and wit, and died in low circumstances, 1804.

LENS, Bernard, a miniature painter, and good copyist of the works of others. He was painter and enameller to George II. and died 1741. He published some views, and drawing books much admired.

LENTHAL, William, speaker of the long parliament, was born at Henley on Thames, Oxfordshire, 1591, and educated at Alban hall, Oxford. He afterwards removed to Lincoln's inn, and was regularly called to the bar, where he became known as an able counsellor. He was elected in 1639 member for Woodstock, and the next year, when the government were not popular enough to elect Gardiner, the recorder of London, speaker of the Commons, Lenthal, whom Clarendon represents as scarce equal to the high office, was seated in the chair. In this new and honourable situation, Lenthal consulted his interest and his fortunes by siding with the republican party, and while he affected respect towards the unfortunate Charles when he seated himself in the chair of the house, and inquired for the members who had offended him, his measures tended to secure the attachment of the Commons, and the good opinion of the people. Though dismissed from office by Cromwell in 1653, Lenthal was re-elected speaker the next year, and continued in office in the rump parliament. His dubious character, and the partiality which he had shown to the usurpation, exempted him, at the restoration, from the general bill of indemnity; but he afterwards obtained pardon from the king. The support, however, which he had given to the violent measures of the civil war, and the influence which he had exercised to prevent the restitution of royalty, embittered, it is said, his moments of reflection; and at his death in 1663, he expressed sincere contrition for his conduct. Some of his speeches and letters have been printed.

LENTULUS, Cneius, a Roman consul, put to death by Tiberius. He was both a poet and a historian.

LEO I. or ancient, succeeded Marcian on the throne of Constantinople, 457. He was a Thracian, though the particulars of his early history are unknown. He confirmed, in the beginning of his reign, the decrees of the council of Chalcedon against the Eutycheans, and obtained signal victories against the barbarians; but his expedition against the Vandals was unsuccessful through the treachery of Aspar, his general. Leo punished this powerful offender, and destroyed him and all his family, 471; but the Goths resented the severities exercised against their countrymen, and laid waste the provinces of the empire, even to the gates of Constantinople. Leo died soon after, 26th January, 474, praised by some historians, but severely censured by others.

LEO II. or younger son of Zeno the Isaurian, and Ariadne, daughter of Leo; succeeded his grandfather, 474. Leo, who had ruined his constitution by his debaucheries, died soon after, aged 16, and his father Zeno, who had governed the empire for him, declared himself his successor.

LEO III. or Isaurian, was the son of a cobbler. He served first in the army, and was made by Justinian II. one of his body guards, and raised by Anastasius II. to the rank of general, and in 717 he became emperor. He signalized himself against the Saracens, who had ravaged Thrace, and attacked Constantinople itself, and he destroyed their fleet by means of the Greek fire. Proud of his victory, he banished Germanus from the see of Constantinople, and placed Anastasius in his room, and waging war against learned men and literature, he impiously set on fire the valuable library of his capital. Above 30,000 volumes, besides the choicest paintings and curious medals, perished in this dreadful conflagration. The popes, Gregory II. and Gregory III. excommunicated this uncivilized barbarian; but while he prepared to revenge himself against the anathemas of Rome, he saw his invading fleet wrecked by a storm on the coast of the Adriatic; and he died soon after, 18th June, 741, detested as a tyrant.

LEO IV. succeeded in 775, his father, Constantine Copronymus. His reign was marked by the violent disputes between the Iconoclastes, or image breakers and their religious opponents, whose cause he capriciously espoused by turns. He was successful in his attack against the Saracens in Asia, and died soon after, 780, aged thirty. He was the husband of the famous Irene.

LEO V. the Armenian, became a general by his valour in the Roman armies, but he was disgraced and scourged as a slave by Nicephorus. Michael Rhangabus recalled him from exile to command the army, and so great was his popularity, that he prevailed on his troops to proclaim him emperor 813, and to depose his master. He afterwards obtained a signal victory over the Bulgarians, but disgraced himself by his cruelty. He was assassinated on Christmas-day, 820.

LEO VI. or the philosopher, succeeded his father, Basil, the Macedonian, 886. He made war against the Bulgarians, Hungarians, and Saracens, and when he found himself unequal to the contest, he called to his assistance the Turks, who laid waste the country, and after plundering their enemies, sold their booty and their prisoners to their ally. Leo deposed the patriarch Photius, and afterwards his successor Nicolas, because he presumed to excommunicate him for marrying a fourth time. He died of a dysentery, 9th June, 911, in the 26th year of his reign. He was surnamed the wise, from the protection which he extended to men of letters. He wrote some books of merit, the best known of which is, a treatise on Tactics, published by Meursius, Leyden, 1612.

LEO I. pope, surnamed the great, was employed in affairs of moment and difficulty by pope Celestinus I. and Sixtus III. the last of whom he succeeded in 440. He pursued vigorous measures to repress heresy, and was severe against the Manicheans, the Pelagians, the Priscillianists, and the Eutycheans. He sent four legates to the council which Marcian had assembled at Chalcedon, and afterwards he was commissioned, as the most powerful ambassador, by Valentinian, to meet Attila, who was ravaging Italy, and marching to the gates of Rome. His eloquence prevailed with the fierce barbarian, who was induced to make peace, and to march back his forces across the Rhine. Four years after, however, he was less successful against Genseric, who ferociously entered the capital of Italy 455, and for 14 days abandoned it to the pillage and lust of his uncivilized soldiers. After a useful reign, Leo died, 3d November, 461. His works are preserved, printed in 2 vols. 4to. and also in folio, and they contain 96 sermons, 141 letters, &c.

LEO II. a native of Sicily, who succeeded Agatho in the popedom, 682. He was an able and resolute pontiff, and attempted to extend his power over the ecclesiastical bodies of the east. He first established the kiss of peace at the mass, and also the use of holy water. He died 3d July, 683.

LEO III. a Roman, who succeeded Adrian I. as pope, 795. In 799 a conspiracy was formed against him by the nephews of his predecessor, who were jealous of his elevation, and after the murderers had attempted to stab him, and to tear out his eyes and his tongue, they confined him in a monastery, from which he escaped to Charlemagne. Charlemagne espoused his cause, and reinstated him in the pontifical chair, and in 800 went himself to Rome, and received the imperial crown from his hands. In another conspiracy, after the emperor's decease, Leo behaved with greater severity, and put some of the accomplices to death. He died 11th June, 816. He was an eloquent and popular pontiff, respected abroad, and beloved by his subjects. Thirteen of his epistles are preserved.

LEO IV. a Roman, made pope after Sergius II. 847. He was a wise and courageous pontiff, and when the Saracens approached Rome, and to pillage it, he boldly marched out to meet them, and though unsupported by the emperors of the east and the west, he gave them battle, and defeated them with great slaughter, and afterwards employed the captives to adorn and fortify that city, which they intended to destroy. He died 17th July, 855.

LEO V. a native of Andrea, pope after Benedict IV. 903. He was soon after exiled and imprisoned by Christopher, and died of grief.

LEO VI. a Roman, pope after John X. 928. He died about seven months after.

LEO VII. a Roman, elected pope in 936, after John XI. He possessed many virtues, and died 23d April, 939.

LEO VIII. was elected pope by the authority of the emperor Otho, on the deposition of John XII. 963, and in consequence of this irregular appointment, he is called an anti-pope by Baronius and others. He was a pontiff of great merit and respectability, and died April, 965.

LEO IX. Brunon, bishop of Toul, was elected pope, 1048, and deserved the name of Saint, in the Romish calendar. He exerted all his authority in the councils of Italy, France, and Germany, to repress the debaucheries of the clergy, and the licentious morals of the laity, and to check the influence of heresy, particularly that of Photius. He visited Germany in 1053, to solicit the assistance of the emperor against the Normans, but in his attack upon these barbarous invaders, he was defeated near Beneventum, and taken prisoner. He was conducted in triumph to Rome by the conquerors, and died there, 19th April, 1054. His sermons and other works are extant.

LEO X. John de Medicis, son of Lorenzo de Medicis was born 1475, at Florence, and at the age of eleven was made an archbishop by Lewis XI. of France, and cardinal at fourteen, by Innocent VIII. He was employed as legate by Julius II. and was at the battle of Ravenna, where the French obtained the victory, 1512; but though taken prisoner, he was treated with great respect, and even veneration by the soldiers, as the representative of the holy pontiff. On the death of Julius he had the good fortune, by artifice and intrigue, to secure his elevation to the papal chair, 1513, and his coronation was conducted with the most unusual magnificence. Educated by the most learned men of the times, and allied to a family particularly dear to literature, he evinced his respect for learning, by the liberal patronage which he extended to its votaries.

Though at the same time attached to pomp, and fond of pleasure, he did not neglect the duties of his high office, and the interests of the church. He put an end to the differences which had existed between his predecessor and Lewis XII. of France, and he concluded the protracted council of Lateran, in 1517. The affairs of the church were intrusted to Bembo, Sadolet, and other men of enlightened mind, and Leo considered that his throne was best supported, and his fame most surely extended by patronising genius and literary talents, and encouraging the fine arts. Notwithstanding his popularity, Leo found enemies about his person; two of the cardinals, Petrucci and Sauli, prevailed upon his surgeon to poison a wound which he was to cure, but the conspiracy was timely discovered, and the accomplices punished. Petrucci was strangled in the prison, and Sauli purchased his life by the sacrifice of his immense possessions. Ambitious to distinguish himself, Leo formed two projects of great importance and glory; he meditated the union of all the Christian princes, for the expulsion of the Turks from Europe, and he wished to complete the stupendous building of St. Peter's church, begun by his predecessor. To effect this, he in 1518, published the granting of indulgencies, by which the purchasers, for a sum of money, might free themselves from their sins. This extraordinary measure produced a schism between the Dominican and Augustine monks in Germany, and at last excited Martin Luther to preach first against the efficacy of these popish pardons, and next against the corruptions of the Roman church. The opposition of Luther at last drew down upon him the thunders of the Vatican, but the reformer, secure in his popularity, and in the protection of some of the German princes, prevailed against the pope, and severed the fairest part of the north from the dominion of Rome. In the war between Charles V. and Francis I. the support of the sovereign pontiff was solicited by both parties, but Leo in pretending to oblige both, sought only the aggrandizement of his family, and the extension of his power in Italy. It is said, that he died of a slight fever, caused by his excessive rejoicing at the misfortunes of France, though others attribute his death to the effects of some slow poison. He died 1st Dec. 1521. Besides his protection of poets and of learned men, he showed his attention to literature, by enriching the public libraries with collections of curiosities, and with valuable MSS.

LEO, an archbishop of Thessalonica, in the ninth century, distinguished as a mathematician, and as one of the great revivers of Grecian literature.

LEO, Pilatus, Greek professor at Florence, about 1360, first gave lectures on Homer and other Greek authors. He perished in a shipwreck, as he returned from Constantinople to Italy.

LEO, of Modena, a celebrated rabbi of Venice, author of an Italian history of the rites and customs of the Jews—a dictionary, Hebrew and Italian, published Venice, 4to. 1612, and Padua, 1640. He flourished in the 17th century.

LEO, the grammarian, compiled in the 12th century a chronicle of Constantinople, from the time of Leo the Armenian, to Constantine VII.

LEO, John, a native of Grenada, eminent as a geographer. After the ruin of his country, 1492, he went to Africa, in consequence of which he is sometimes called the African. He renounced the religion of Mahomet, and was esteemed by Leo X. He was author of the Lives of Arabian Philosophers—a Description of Africa in Arabic, and died about 1526.

LEO, of Byzantium, a pupil of Plato, who was employed by his countrymen as ambassador to Athens, and to Philip of Macedonia. He was put to death by the treachery of Philip.

LEO, of Orviette, a Dominican, who wrote an account of the Popes—and another of the Emperors 1308. These works, though not very elegant, were edited by Lami, 1737, 2 vols. 8vo.

LEO, Peter Cieca de, a Spaniard who travelled in America, and published an interesting account of Peru, finished at Lima 1550. It is a work of merit.

LEONE, Arto or Conaria, a historical painter, the pupil of Cornelius Engelbrecht. He died 1564, aged 66.

LEONI, Giacomo, a Venetian architect, who after being in the service of the elector Palatine, settled in England, and published a fine edition of Palladio, 1742. He died 1746.

LEONICENUS, Nicholas, professor of physic at Ferrara, was the first who translated Galen's works, which he enriched with commentaries. He also translated the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, and besides Lucian and Dio Cassius. He died 1524, at the great age of 96.

LEONICUS THOMÆUS, Nicholas, a learned Venetian. He studied Greek under Demetrius Chalcondyles, at Florence, and read lectures on Aristotle, at Padua, with great reputation. He translated Proclus's Commentary on the Timæus of Plato, besides other works, and died at Padua, 1531, aged 75.

LEONIDAS, king of Sparta, was sent by his country to oppose the invasion of Xerxes. He met the enemy at the pass of Thermopylæ, and opposed them with such bravery, that had not treachery pointed out a secret way to the rear of the Spartans, their further progress would have been checked. Leonidas and his 300 brave companions fell, one only fled to meet disgrace at Sparta, B.C. 480.

LEONTIUM, an Athenian courtesan, strongly attached to the philosophy of Epicurus. She wrote a book against Theophrastus.

LEOPOLD, Saint, succeeded as marquis of Austria, 1096, and by his virtues deserved the surname of pious. He married Agnes, the sister of the emperor Henry V. by whom he had eighteen children, eight sons and ten daughters. He died 1139, and was canonized by Innocent VIII. in 1485.

LEOPOLD I. second son of the emperor Ferdinand III. and Mary Anne of Spain, was born 1640, and was made king of Hungary, 1655, of Bohemia, 1656, and elected emperor, 1658. He waged war against the Turks, and though he proved successful by the valour of his general Montecuculi, he made a disadvantageous peace with them. Afterwards when engaged to check the insurrections of his nobles in Hungary, Leopold found himself attacked by the Turkish forces, which penetrated with great rapidity into the heart of the empire, and laid siege to Vienna. While panic and terror prevailed, and the emperor saved himself by flight to Passau, the celebrated John Sobieski came to the assistance of his ally, the siege of Vienna was raised and the Turks defeated. Leopold was also engaged in war with Lewis XIV. and lost Alsace, and saw his frontier towns pillaged and destroyed. The glory of his arms was, however, well supported by the valour of his generals, especially of prince Eugene, of Savoy; but though he had the art to persuade the various princes of the Germanic constitution to espouse his cause in his quarrels with neighbouring princes, he did not display that moderation towards his Hungarian subjects, which wisdom and interest might have dictated. The nobles were so dissatisfied with the severity of his measures, that in an assembly they meditated resistance against their sovereign, and declared the kingdom hereditary; but the death of the emperor prevented the fatal consequences of civil discord. He died 5th May, 1705.

LEOPOLD II. Peter Joseph, son of Francis I. and Maria Theresa, was born 1747. He was for 25 years grand duke of Tuscany, and in this principality, though perhaps too much attached to trifling forms, he governed with wisdom and moderation. On the death of his brother Joseph II. in 1790, he was elected emperor of Germany, and in this high dignity he evinced great abilities and enlightened conceptions. By his influence, a reconciliation took place between the Turks and Catherine of Russia, a treaty was made with Prussia, and the connexion with England was cemented by every liberal mark of attachment and sound policy. The encroachments of French ambition had already irritated him, and he prepared to declare war against these lawless republicans, but death carried him off in the midst of his preparations, 1st March, 1792. His death, occasioned by a violent diarrhœa, was so sudden that it was attributed, by some, to poison, but without truth. He was succeeded by his son, Francis II.

LEOPOLD, duke of Lorraine, son of Charles, the fifth duke, and of Eleanora of Austria, was celebrated for his military valour. At the peace of Ryswick he recovered Lorraine, of which a war with France had dispossessed his father, but though he was not permitted by the treaty to fortify his capital, he devoted himself to the happiness and prosperity of his country, and by the mildness of his government, raised around him an impregnable bulwark in the love and devotion of his people. He was a liberal patron of arts and sciences, and founded the university of Luneville, where he invited, by the most liberal promises, professors of merit and distinction. He died at Luneville, 27th March, 1729, aged 50, universally regretted. His son Francis, by Elizabeth, daughter of the duke of Orleans, was afterwards emperor of Germany.

LEOPOLD, William, archduke of Austria, bishop of Passau, &c. was at the head of the imperial armies in the 30 years' war against the Swedes and the French, and he distinguished himself by his valour and wisdom in the field and in the cabinet. He died at Vienna, 1662.

LEOTAUD, Vincent, a French Jesuit and mathematician, author of "Examen Quadraturæ," in which he proves the impossibility of squaring the circle. He died 1672.

LEOWICQ, Cyprian, or LEOVITIUS, a noble Bohemian, born 1524. His "Ephemerides" was a collection of astrological productions, and incoherent reveries, by which he amused and terrified the superstitious. His prophecy that the world would be at an end in 1584, for a while drew the attention of his countrymen from their pleasures and pursuits to acts of devotion and piety. He held a conference with Tycho Brahe in 1569, and died 1574.

LEPAUTE, John Andrew, a French clock and watch maker, who made some valuable improvements in the mechanical parts of his profession, and died 1802. He wrote a Treatise on Clock making, published 1755, and again 1768, in 4to.

LEPICIER, Bernard, a French engraver, secretary and historian to the royal academy of painting at Paris. His engravings, after the style of Audran, were much admired. He died 1755, aged 59. He published in 2 vols. 4to. a catalogue of the French king's pictures. His son Nicholas Bernard died at Paris, 1784, aged 49, distinguished as a painter after the manner of Carlo Vanloo, and as a professor in the academy of painting and sculpture.

LEPIDUS, Marcus Æmilius, one of the triumvirs with Augustus and Antony. He had Africa for his share in the division of the Roman empire, but soon lost it by the intrigues of Augustus, and retired to privacy.

LEPRINCE, John, a French musician and painter, who in his way to Petersburg was taken by an English privateer, whose crew plundered him of all his property except his violin. The musician, trusting to his powers, seized the despised instrument, and played upon it with such skill and effect that the astonished sailors restored him all his property. During his residence at Petersburg he was employed in adorning the palaces and public buildings, but on Catherine's accession he returned to France, where he died 1781, aged 48, member of the academy. His pieces, which are finished in the style of Teniers and Wouvermans, are much admired.

LE QUIEN, Michael, a learned Dominican, who wrote against Courayer, on the validity of ordination by English bishops. He was well skilled in ecclesiastical history, and died 1703, aged 42.

LERNUTIUS, John, a Latin poet, born at Bruges. His "Basia, Ocelli et Alia Pœmata," were published by Elzevir. He died 1619, aged 74.

LESBONAX, a philosopher of Mitylene, in the first century, some of whose grammatical treatises are still extant.

LESCAILLE, Catherine, a native of Holland, for the sweetness of her poetry called the Dutch Sappho, and the tenth muse. Her poems, which display great genius, though often irregularities, consist of tragedies, published 1728. She died 1711, aged 62.

LESLEY, John, bishop of Ross, in Scotland, was born 1527, of a very ancient family. He was educated at Aberdeen, and obtained a canonry in the cathedral there 1547. He afterwards studied in the universities of Toulouse, Poitiers, and Paris, and in 1554 he was recalled home by the queen regent, and made vicar-general of Aberdeen, and ordained priest of the parish of Unc. In the dissensions which the reformation introduced in Scotland, Lesley, who was a zealous papist, was commissioned by his party to go and hasten the recall of queen Mary, who had lately lost her husband, Francis II. of France, and after meeting her at Vitri, he returned with her 1561. His services to the queen recommended him, soon after, to the see of Ross, and he laboriously employed himself, with fifteen others, to make a collection of all the laws of the kingdom, which were published at Edinburgh, 1566, and called the black acts of Parliament, because printed in black letter. Upon Mary's flight to England he appeared at York, 1568, and ably and zealously defended her cause against her accusers, and afterwards went to London as her ambassador. His measures to procure her liberty, by a marriage with the duke of Norfolk, proved offensive to Elizabeth, who regardless of the sanctity of his rank, sent him a prisoner to the isle of Ely, and then to the tower. In 1573 he obtained his release, and then retired to the Netherlands, anxiously soliciting the interference of the kings of Spain and France, the princes of Germany and the pope, in the favour of his injured and captive mistress. In 1579 he was made suffragan to the see of Rouen, but in one of his visitations he was rudely seized by the Huguenots, who threatened to deliver him to the English, but he purchased his ransom for 3000 pistoles. Under the reign of Henry III. and of his successor in France, he was again exposed to persecution; but in 1593 he was nominated bishop of Constance. Yet grandeur did not add to his happiness, and when he found it impossible to return to his diocese of Ross, by the prevalence of the protestant religion, he retired to the monastery of Guirtenburg, near Brussels, where he died 1596. His abilities were acknowledged by friends and enemies to be very great, his integrity most exemplary, and his attachment to his unhappy mistress unshaken. Besides several pieces in favour of Mary, and other treatises, he published an excellent work, "De Origine, Moribus, et Rebus Gestis Scotorum," 1578, 4to.

LESLIE, John, a native of Scotland, educated at Aberdeen and Oxford. He travelled abroad, and acquired such a knowledge of the French, Spanish, Italian, and Latin, that he spoke those languages not only with fluency, but with remarkable elegance. After 22 years' residence abroad he came back to England, and was patronised by Charles I. and the second. He was made bishop of Orkneys, in Scotland, and in 1633 translated to Raphoe, in Ireland, where he built a palace, so strongly fortified, that he was the last who surrendered to the arms of Cromwell. At the restoration he returned to England, and in 1661 was translated to Clogher. He died 1671, aged above 100, being the oldest bishop in the world.

LESLIE, Charles, second son of the preceding, was born in Ireland, and educated at Dublin, where he took his degree of M.A. He afterwards studied the law at the Temple, London, which he relinquished for divinity. In 1680 he took orders, and in 1687 he was made chancellor of the cathedral of Connor. He afterwards rendered himself very obnoxious to the papists of Ireland, he publicly entered the lists of theological disputation against them, and made converts to his own cause. Respected as a magistrate and as a divine he remained attached to the king's government; and though he opposed tyranny, he was zealous to support legal authority. In consequence, therefore, of his loyalty to James, he lost all his preferments at the revolution, and in 1689 he came over to England to avoid the civil commotions which began to distract his native country. In his retirement he usefully employed the powers of his mind in combating the errors of the enemies of the church, both Jews and Deists, Socinians and Papists, Quakers and Infidels. He was, however, suspected of too familiar an intercourse with the abdicated monarch, and therefore was obliged to retire to France, where he joined the Pretender at Bar le Duc. He here exerted himself by his writings in favour of that unhappy family, and when their schemes of insurrection, in 1715, had failed, he attended them to Italy; but finding his adherence to protestant principles disagreeable to the pretender, he returned to Ireland in 1721, and died in his own house at Glasgow, county of Monaghan, 13th April, 1722. As a friend of the church of England, and as a man of principle, virtue, and integrity, Leslie was inferior to no man. His abilities as a writer were of a superior cast, and whatever he sent into the world was read with avidity, and received with deference. His tracts, both theological and political, are very numerous, amounting to near 50. He left besides two folio volumes of theological works, in which he discussed the controversies which too much disturb the Christian church.

LESSING, Gotthold Ephraim, a German poet, whose father, a man of literary talents, was minister of the congregation at Kametz. The son inherited the talents, and the application of the father; for five years he studied at Meissen, and after obtaining from his instructors, Klemm and Grabner, the character of an able and indefatigable scholar, he went to Leipsic, where he learned to excel in horsemanship, leaping, and fencing, and began to write for the stage. The liveliness of his temper, however, exposed him to calumny, and gave uneasiness to his father. With his friend Weisse he translated Marivaux's tragedy of Annibal, and here he finished his "Young Scholar," a comedy. Afterwards he went to Wittemberg, and also to Berlin, where he became acquainted with Voltaire, and published various things, often more in haste than with judgment. During the seven years' war he was, for a little time, secretary to general Tauenzien, at Bresaw, and to other irregularities added gaming, in the indulgence of which he forgot his character, and his literary pursuits. The abilities which he possessed, he unfortunately frequently misapplied, and in his wish to do something useful, he often promised more than he performed. His friend Mendelssohn, observed of him after his death, that he was advanced at least a century before the age in which he lived.

LESSIUS, Leonard, a Jesuit, born near Antwerp. He was professor of philosophy at Douay, and afterwards filled the divinity chair at Louvain, where his propositions on some scholastic subjects were exposed to ecclesiastical censure, which, however, the pope Sixtus V. in consequence of an appeal, fully reversed. He wrote De Justitia et Jure, fol.—*De Potestate summi Pontificis—Hygiasticon, seu Vera Ratio Valetudinis—*a Treatise on the Existence of a Deity, and on the Soul's Immortality, which have appeared in an English dress. He died 1623, aged 69.

L'ESTRANGE, sir Roger, descended from an ancient family, was born 17th Dec. 1616, at Hunstanton-hall, Norfolk. He was educated at Cambridge, and then attended Charles I. to Scotland, in 1639, and during the ensuing civil wars, adhered most firmly to the royal cause. In 1646, however, he was betrayed by two villains, and tried and condemned as a spy by the parliamentary rebels, but his execution was delayed at first for fourteen days, and then put off till he took an opportunity of escaping, in 1648, and saving himself, into France. In 1653, he took advantage of Cromwell's indemnity bill, and came back to England, and was, by application to the usurper, discharged. At the restoration; he was for a while neglected, till he was appointed licenser of the press. In 1663 he published the Public Intelligencer, a newspaper, which was laid aside when the London Gazette, first published at Oxford, made its appearance, 1655. He again, in 1679, set up another paper, called the Observer, in defence of the ministry, and of the character of the king; but while he ridiculed the popish plot, and the other secret machinations of the enemies of all order, he exposed himself to the calumny of some interested persons, who wished to represent him as a dangerous man to government. When James II. came to the throne he knighted him, as he said, in consequence of his services and unshaken loyalty to the crown. In 1687 his Observer ceased, as he refused, though a loyal man, to espouse the cause of toleration recommended by the king. Yet some failed not to accuse him of being a papist, especially when his daughter became a convert to that communion. At the revolution sir Roger was neglected by the ruling powers, and even treated with contempt by the queen. He died 11th Sept. 1704, and was buried in the church of St. Giles in the Fields. His political tracts are very numerous, and besides these he translated Josephus, from D'Andilly's French—Cicero's Offices—Seneca's Morals—Æsop's Fables—Erasmus's Colloquies—Quevedo's Visions—Bona's Guide, &c. His language, however, was, as Gordon, the author of the Independent Whig, observes, coarse and vulgar. His genius tended to low wit and licentious buffoonery, and even in his fables he has made his beasts jesters, and instead of the language of freedom, he instils into their dialogue doctrines of servitude, and a tame submission to tyranny.

LETHIEULLIER, Smart, esq. an English gentleman, born at Aldersbrook, in Essex, from an ancient family which had left France on account of their attachment to the reformation. He was of Trinity college, Oxford, and afterwards made a most valuable collection of medals, books, MSS. and natural curiosities on the continent. He died without issue, Aug. 27, 1760, aged 59. Some of his curiosities were consigned by his executors to the British Museum, and his library was sold by auction. He wrote some papers in the Philosophical Transactions, and in the Archæologia.

LETTI, Gregorio, an Italian writer, born at Milan, 1630, and educated among the Jesuits. He travelled, and embraced the protestant religion at Lausanne, and for 20 years lived at Geneva. He afterwards came to London, but though patronised by Charles II. he settled at Amsterdam, where he died, 1701, with the title of historiographer of the town. His daughter married John le Clerc, and died 1734. As a historian he was esteemed, though often incorrect. He wrote the history of Lewis XIV.—of Philip II. of Spain—of Charles V.—of Queen Elizabeth—of Oliver Cromwell—of Pope Sixtus VI.—of Geneva, &c.

LETTSON, John Coakley, a physician, was born on a small island, called Little Vandyke, near Tortola, in 1744. His father was a planter, and his mother was descended from a respectable Irish family. They were of the society of Quakers; and young Lettson, being sent to England, was placed under the care of Samuel Fothergill, a celebrated preacher of that sect, who sent him to an academy at Warrington. On arriving at a proper age he was bound apprentice to an apothecary at Settle, in Yorkshire; after which he became a pupil of St. Thomas's hospital. The death of his elder brother induced him to visit his native island, to look after his property; but finding that it chiefly consisted of slaves, he emancipated them all, and settled at Tortola. His stay there was not long, and, on his return to Europe, he took his doctor's degree at Leyden. He then fixed his residence in London, where, by the friendship of Dr. Fothergill, and his connexion with the Quakers, he attained a most extensive practice. Dr. Lettson, however, quitted the society, some years before his death, which happened Nov. 1, 1815. He was a zealous philanthropist, and a member of most of the literary and scientific societies in Europe and America. His works are numerous and well known.—W. B.

LEUCIPPUS, a philosopher of Abdera, B. C. 428. He was the pupil of Zeno, and first proposed the system of atoms, from which he made the world to originate.

LEUNCLAVIUS, John, a learned German, born at Amelburn, in Westphalia, 1533. He travelled much, and published a history of the Ottoman Empire, from materials which he collected in Turkey. He also translated Xenophon, Zosimus, &c. into Latin. He died at Vienna, 1593.

LEUSDEN, John, eminent for biblical knowledge, was born at Utrecht, where he became professor of Hebrew, and where he died 1699, aged 75. He was author of Onomasticon Sacrum—Clavis Hebraica et Philologica Vet. Testamenti—Novi Test. Clavis Græca—Compendium Biblic. Vet. Testam.—Compendium Græcum Novi Testamenti.—Philologus Hebræus—et Hebræo Græcus—Notes on Jonah, Joel, Hosea, &c.

LEUWENHOEK, Anthony de, an eminent physician, born at Delft, in Holland, 1632. He acquired great celebrity by his curious and astonishing discoveries by the microscope. His letters to the royal society of London, of which he was member, printed 1722, 4to. and his Arcana Naturæ Detecta, 1714, 4 vols. 4to. are valuable. He died 26th Aug. 1723, aged 91.

LEVER, sir Ashton, son of sir d'Arcy Lever, knight, of Alkington, near Manchester, was celebrated as a judicious collector of rare and valuable curiosities. From Corpus Christi college, Oxford, where, as a gentleman commoner, he was admired for his skill in horsemanship, he went to reside with his mother, and then settled on his estate, where he employed himself in collecting birds, and forming the most valuable aviary in the kingdom. Strongly attached to whatever was rare and astonishing in natural history, he devoted himself to the improvement of his collection, and by the favour of his friends, and his own indefatigable exertions, he soon found himself master of the most admired private museum in the nation. This curious collection, which was formed at great expense, was for some time exhibited in London, to the admiration of the public, and, in 1785, was disposed of by way of lottery, and fell to the share of Mr. Parkinson, though it did not repay the proprietor the fourth part of his original expenses. This valuable museum has lately been sold in small separate lots; but while a few individuals have thus been able to enrich their private collections, it is to be lamented that the public purse was not opened to purchase the whole, and thus largely and liberally contribute to the enlargement of those institutions which display in so pleasing a view the taste, the genius, the labours, and the munificence of the English nation. Sir Ashton died in 1788.

LEVERETT, John, governor of Massachusetts, was born in England, and previously to his coming to New-England served in the army, and distinguished himself by his courage. After his arrival in Massachusetts he was employed in many important stations. In 1653 he was appointed commissioner by Cromwell to raise forces against the Dutch at New-York, and at the restoration was employed in England as an agent of the colony. Having returned to Boston, he was, in 1664, appointed major-general, the next year one of the governor's assistants, in 1671 deputy governor, and at length, in 1673, chief magistrate, and held the office, discharging its duties with great popularity, till his death in 1678.

LEVERETT, John, F. R. S. president of Harvard college, and a grandson of the preceding, was born in Boston, Massachusetts, and graduated at the institution of which he was afterwards president, in 1680. He for a number of years served the colony as a civilian, first as a member of the assembly, of which he was often chosen speaker, then in his majesty's council, and at length as a judge of the superior court, in which situations he gained a high reputation for talents, uprightness, and patriotism. He entered on the presidency of the college in Jan. 1708, and retained the office till his death on the 3d of May, 1724. Endowed with talents of a very superior order, and equally distinguished by the extent of his learning, the correctness of his judgment, and the firmness of his resolution, he was one of the greatest, most popular, and most useful men of his age. ☞ L.

LEVESQUE DE PONILLI, Lewis, a member of the French academy of inscriptions, and governor of Rheims, which he improved by the establishment of mathematical schools, and other valuable institutions. He wrote the Theory of agreeable Sensations, a curious book, translated into English, and died 1746.

LEVESQUE, Peter Charles, a French writer, was born at Paris in 1736, and died there in 1812. He wrote—1. Le Reves d'Aristobule, philosophe Grec, suivis d'un abrégé de la vie de Formose, philosophe Francois. 2. L'Homme Moral. 3. L'Homme Pensant. 4. Histoire de Russie, 5 vols. 12mo. 5. Histoire des differens peuples soumis à la domination des Russes, 2 vols. 6. Eloge historique de Pabbé Mably. 7. La France sous les cinq premiers Valois, 4 vols. 8. Dictionnaire des arts, de peinture, sculpture, et gravure, 5 vols. 9. L'étude de l'histoire de la Grèce, 4 vols. 8vo. He also translated Thucydides from the Greek, and Plutarch from the Italian.—W. B.

LEVI, third son of Jacob by Leah, was honoured among the tribes of Israel, and his posterity more immediately devoted to the service of God. He died in Egypt, B. C. 1612, aged about 136 years.

LEVINGSTON, James, a brave Scotchman, who distinguished himself in the wars of Bohemia, Holland, Sweden, and Germany, and afterwards became gentleman of the bed-chamber to Charles I. who created him lord Levingston, and, in 1641, earl of Calendar. At the beginning of the civil wars he sided with the parliament, but soon after he was reconciled to the king, whose forces he assisted in reducing York. He also attempted to rescue his master from the Isle of Wight, and took Carlisle, where he found a large supply of ammunition and arms. He died October, 1672.

LEWIS, John, a native of Bristol, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He obtained from Tenison, the primate, Minster vicarage in the Isle of Thanet, and the mastership of Eastbridge hospital, Canterbury, and died at Margate, 1746, aged 71. He published the Life of Wickliffe, 8vo.—the Life of Caxton, 8vo.—the History of Faversham Abbey, 4to.—the History and Antiquities of the Isle of Thanet, 4to.—History of the Various Translations of the Old and New Testaments into English, 8vo.—Wickliffe's Translation of the New Testament, folio.

LEWIS, kings of France. Vid. LOUIS.

LEWIS, Meriwether, governor of Louisiana, was born near Charlottesville, Virginia, August 18th, 1774. He received a respectable education, and, after serving as a volunteer in the militia called out by Washington to suppress the insurrection in Pennsylvania, was transferred to the regular service as a lieutenant, and soon after was promoted to a captaincy. On the accession of Mr. Jefferson to the presidency Mr. Lewis became his private secretary, and was selected by him, in 1803, in conjunction with captain Clark, to conduct the party despatched to explore the Missouri, and the waters descending on the west side of the highlands to the Pacific. They set out on that expedition in the summer of 1803, and, after visiting the Pacific ocean at the mouth of the river Columbia, returned to the United States in 1806, and not long after published the history of the journey. Soon after Mr. Lewis returned to Washington; in 1807, he was appointed governor of Louisiana, and, after a residence there of about two years, was seized with delirium, while on a journey to the capital of the United States, in September, 1809, and deprived himself of life. He possessed uncommon enterprise, courage, and integrity, and discharged the duties of the several stations to which he was advanced, with great judgment and fidelity.

LEY, sir James, sixth son of Henry Ley of Jessent, Wilts, was raised by merit to the office of chief justice in Ireland, and afterwards in England, and afterwards created baron Ley, and earl of Marlborough, and lord high treasurer, by James I. Some of his pieces on antiquity have been published by Hearne, and also his Reports, 1659.

LEYBOURN, William, originally a painter, became a mathematician of eminence. He published Cursus Mathematicus, folio—a treatise on Surveying, folio, improved by Cunn—a treatise on Dialling 4to.—and also the Trader's Guide. He died about 1690.

LEYDECKER, Melchior, a native of Middleburg, professor of theology at Utrecht, where he died 1721, aged 69. He is author of a curious treatise on the Republic of the Hebrews, 2 vols. fol.—History of Jansenism—Analysis of Scripture—Continuation of Hornier's Ecclesiastical History—History of the Church of Africa, &c.

LEYDEN, Lucas Van, a Dutch painter in oil, in distemper, and on glass, and also eminent as an engraver. He acquired great celebrity by his painting of the history of St. Hubert, which he finished before the age of 15. With all his genius the proportional height of his figures to their distances is liable to censure. He died 1533, aged 39.

LEYDEN, John, a physician and poet, was born in 1775 at Denholm, in the county of Roxburgh, where his father was a shepherd. He received his education at the parish school of Kirktown, and next under a minister of the Seceders; after which he went to Edinburgh, where he wrote several poems. He was also employed as a private tutor, and, on going to St. Andrew's, obtained a license to preach, but relinquished that profession for surgery, in which capacity, having first taken his doctor's degree, he went to India. In 1806 he was appointed professor of the Hindostanee language at the college of Calcutta, and he also for some time officiated as a judge. In 1811 he went on the expedition to Java, where he died the same year. His poetical works and memoirs were printed in one volume in 1819.—W. B.

LEYSSENS, N. a native of Antwerp. He studied painting at Rome, and settled at Antwerp, where his pious attentions to an aged and infirm parent were rewarded by the respect of his neighbours, and great success in his profession. He died at Antwerp, 1720, aged 59.

LHUYD, Edward, a learned Welchman, born at Llanvyrde, Caermarthenshire, and educated at Jesus college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. 1701. He succeeded Dr. Plot, his tutor, as keeper of the Ashmolean museum, and zealously devoted himself to study the antiquities of his native country. For this purpose he travelled with the observation of an active antiquarian, over Wales, Cornwall, Scotland, Ireland and Bretagne, but before he had completed the digestion of his valuable materials he unfortunately died, July 1709. He published Archæologia Britannica, or an account of the Languages, Histories, and Customs of the Ancient Britons, &c. 1 vol. fol. 1707, and left in MS. a Scottish or Irish English dictionary, which Malcolm a Scotch divine proposed to publish by subscription in 1732. Many of his observations were communicated to Dr. Gibson, and inserted in his edition of Camden's Britannia. His MSS. amounted to 40 vols. folio, 10 4to. and above 100 smaller, and were in the possession of the Seabright family, by whom they were communicated to Mr. Pennant. Some of his letters are preserved in the Oxford museum.

LHWYD, or LHUYD, Humphrey, an antiquarian, born at Denbigh. He studied physic at Oxford, and took his degrees at Brazen-nose college, and then removed to practise physic in his native town. He died 1570, leaving behind him the character of an excellent rhetorician, sound philosopher, and indefatigable and accurate antiquarian. His publications were "an Almanack, &c. — Commentarioli Britannicæ Descriptionis Fragmentum 1572, published again by Moses Williams 1671, 4to. and translated into English by Th. Twyne under the title of the Breviary of Britain 1753, 8vo.—De Monâ Druidum Insulâ, Antiquitatî suæ Restitutâ 1568—de Armamentario Romano—Chronicon Walliæ a Rege Cadwalladero ad A. D. 1294—the History of Cambria, left unfinished, but afterwards edited by Dr. Powell 1584, in 4to.

LIBANIUS, a sophist, born at Antioch, on the Orontes. He had among his pupils Julian the apostate, and died at Antioch 390. He was a violent enemy of Christianity. His works have appeared, 2 vols. folio, 1606 and 1627, Paris.

LIBAVIUS, Andrew, a native of Hall in Saxony, who died at Cobourg in Franconia 1616. He was an able physician, and wrote Syntagma Selectorum Alchemiæ Arcanorum, 2 vols. folio.—Epistol. Chemic. 1595, besides tracts against Paracelsus, &c.

LIBERI, Peter, a native of Padua, eminent as a painter. His pieces adorn the churches and palaces of Italy, the best known of which is Moses striking the rock. He died 1677, aged 77.

LIBERIUS, a native of Rome, pope after Julius I. 352. He subscribed very unwillingly to the condemnation of Athanasius, agreeable to the direction of Constantius. He died 366.

LICETUS, Fortunius, a physician, born at Rappollo in Genoa, 1577, became professor of philosophy and physic at Padua where he died 1655. He is author of some curious works on his profession, especially "de Monstris." He was himself born before the seventh month of his mother's pregnancy, but by being wrapped up in cotton his life was preserved.

LICHTENBERG, George Christopher, professor of philosophy at Gottingen, was an able German writer, and died there 1799.

LICINIUS, Tegula, a Latin poet B.C. 200. Nothing but fragments remain of his comic compositions. An orator and poet of that name flourished in the age of Cicero.

LICINIUS, C. Flavius Valerianus, son of a Dalmatian peasant, rose to the rank of a general in the Roman armies, and was made assistant emperor by Galerius. Constantine, who knew his merit, gave him his sister in marriage, but afterwards so great an enmity arose between them that only the death of Licinius in battle A.D. 324, ended the contest.

LICINIUS, Caius, a Roman plebeian, tribune of the people, author of a law to forbid the possession of more than 500 acres of land in any single individual. He also made a law to make the plebeians eligible to the consulship, and he was himself the first plebeian consul.

LIDDEL, Duncan, a native of Aberdeen. After studying in his native town he went at the age of eighteen to Frankfort, where he applied to the mathematics, and then to Helmstadt, where he took the degree of M.D. 1596, and became professor of mathematics and medicine. After travelling through Germany and Italy, he returned to his native country, where in gratitude for the honours and the success he had met in the world, he founded six scholarships in Aberdeen university. He was author of Disputationes—Medicinales, Helmstadt 1603, 4to.—Ars Medica succinctè et perspicuè Explicata, Hamburg, 1607, 8vo. and he died on his estate near Aberdeen, 1613, aged 52.

LIEVENS, John, a native of Leyden, 1607, eminent as a historical and portrait painter. He came to England at the invitation of Charles I. and painted the persons of the court, and several of the nobility, and after three years he returned to Antwerp, where he died.

LIEUTAUD, Joseph, physician to Lewis

XVI. and member of the academy of sciences in 1752, was born at Aix in Provence. His chief works are "Anatomical Essays—Elements of Physiology—Synopsis of the Practice of Medicine—Historia Anatomico-Medica, 2 vols. 4to.—besides papers in the memoirs of the academy, &c. He died highly respected 1780.

LIGARIUS, Quintus, a proconsul of Africa, who opposed the ambitious views of Cæsar, but afterwards was reconciled to him. When accused by Tubero he was ably defended by Cicero. He was afterwards one of Cæsar's murderers.

LIGER, Lewis, author of the Paris Guide, and some useful works on gardening and agriculture, was born at Auxerre, and died 1717, aged 59.

LIGHTFOOT, John, a most eminent divine, born 29th March, 1602, at Stoke on Trent, Staffordshire. He was educated at Morton Green school, Cheshire, and in 1617 entered at Christ's college, Cambridge, where he soon became distinguished as an able scholar and an eloquent orator. After being some time assistant at Repton school, Derbyshire, he took orders, and from the curacy of Norton, Shropshire, was admitted as chaplain into the family of Sir Rowland Cotton, of Bellapont, a great Hebraist in those days. Under the patronage of this hospitable man he devoted himself to the study of the oriental languages, and in 1629 published his "Erubhim, or Miscellanies Christian and Judaical," dedicated to his friend Sir Rowland, who two years after gave him the rectory of Ashley, Staffordshire. Before this time Lightfoot had wandered in quest of settlement from London to Stone, and again to Hornsey near London, but now being in possession of a comfortable independence he devoted himself totally to literary pursuits, till, in the troubles of the times, his abilities made him known to the ruling powers, and in 1642, he departed for London, after resigning his living to his younger brother. He was now nominated one of the assembly of divines for settling the administration of the church, and in their meetings he distinguished himself as an eloquent, manly, and independent speaker. He was afterwards chosen minister of St. Bartholomew, behind the Royal Exchange, and in 1653 was, on the expulsion of Dr. Spurstow, made master of Catherine hall, Cambridge, and presented to the living of Much-Munden, Herts. He took his degree of D.D. 1652, and in 1655 was vice-chancellor of Cambridge. At the restoration he offered to resign to his predecessor Spurstow, but as his compliance with the measures of the usurpation was considered more as a matter of quiet resignation to superior authority, than of disloyalty to the exiled monarch, he was, by the interference of Sheldon the primate, and of others, permitted to retain his preferment. In 1661 he was one of the divines who had a conference at the Savoy about the liturgy; but disgusted with the violence of his associates, he retired to his peaceful studies. He died 6th Dec. 1675, and was buried in Munden church, where his two wives were deposited before him. By the daughter of W. Crompton, Esq. his first wife, who died 1656, he had four sons and two daughters, and by the second, widow of A. Brograve, he had no issue. Lightfoot in the acknowledgment both of Englishmen and of foreigners, was one of the most eminent men in rabbinical learning this country ever produced, and his researches and commentaries were the grand store-house of succeeding annotators. Upon his "Harmony," he bestowed great and long labour. His works were collected together and first published in 1684, 2 vols. folio, of which a second edition appeared at Amsterdam, 1686, to which a third volume was added in a third edition by J. Leusden, Utrecht, 1699, folio. Some more of his papers were published in 1700 by Mr. Strype.

LIGNAC, Joseph Adrian de, a priest of the Oratory, author of Letters to an American on Buffon's Natural History, 2 vols. 12mo. and other learned works. He was a native of Poitiers, and died 1762.

LIGONIER, John, earl of, an English field-marshal, who served under the great Marlborough, and in succeeding wars under Anne, and distinguished himself in the field, and also in the cabinet. He died 1770, aged 92.

LIGORIO, Peter, a Neapolitan, distinguished as a painter and architect. Paul IV. appointed him the architect of St. Peter's church, in which he was soon after succeeded by Michael Angelo. His designs after the antique compose 30 volumes. He died 1580.

LILBURN, John, an English enthusiast, born in 1618, at Thickney-Purcharden, Durham, the ancient seat of his family. At the age of twelve he was bound apprentice to a wholesale clothier, in London; but here he manifested the independent spirit of the times, and paid more attention to puritanical books than to business. In 1636 he was prevailed upon by Bastwick, a prisoner of the Star chamber, to go to Holland, and to print there his "Merry Liturgy," a violent pamphlet against the bishops, and in consequence of this, he was on his return taken up while distributing that and other obnoxious books, and for the offence he was whipt at the cart's tail, pilloried, fined 500*l.* and imprisoned. These punishments, he underwent with such firmness and triumph that he was called by his party the saint, but at last the parliament interfered, though he had published some virulent papers, and headed a mob, clamouring for justice against Strafford. His sentence under the Star chamber was deemed tyrannical by the commons, and 2000*l.* were voted to him by the lords out of the estates of the royalists, which sum was afterwards increased, though he never received the whole. In the civil wars he gradually rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and behaved with great bravery, especially at the battles of Edge-hill, Brentford, and Marston-moor; but his temper was so violent that he quarrelled even with his friend and patron the earl of Manchester, and wrote some virulent papers against him, for which he was sent by the lords to the tower. He petitioned the commons, but finding them slow in listening to his complaints, he vented his abuse against the house, and declared in his "Oppressed Man's Oppression," that they were tyrants, and ought to be pulled down. He at last, however, procured his enlargement, by means chiefly of Cromwell, whom he soon after abused, but his intemperance of language and conduct was such at last that the parliament ordered him to be fined 7000*l.* and banished out of the kingdom. He escaped beforehand, and went to Amsterdam where he began to intrigue for the restoration of the royal family, which he promised to effect for the reward of 10,000*l.* His offers, however, were regarded as the measures of a disappointed man, so that at the dissolution of the long parliament, he again returned to England, 1657, and was acquitted by a jury. After this he escaped Cromwell's resentment by the interference of his friends, and retired to Eltham, where he turned preacher among the Quakers. He died at Eltham, 29th Aug. 1657, aged 49, and was buried in the new burial-place, Moorfields. His writings were numerous, but all abusive and political, and now deservedly forgotten.

LILIENTAL, Michael, a Prussian professor at Königsberg. He published various dissertations, preserved in the memoirs of the Berlin academy, besides other works, and died 1750.

LILLO, George, a dramatic writer, born near Moorgate, London, 4th Feb. 1693. Though a jeweller by profession, and a man of business, he cultivated the muses, and acquired great celebrity. His subjects were the common incidents of private life, but they were wrought in so masterly a manner, and delineated in such pathetic characters as touched the heart more forcibly than the misfortunes of kings and heroes. His "George Barnwell," "Fatal Curiosity," and "Arden of Feversham," have long been, and continue to be, the admiration of crowded audiences, when the tears that are shed by sympathizing nature bear a stronger testimony to the merits of the author than the most pompous descriptions of language. This worthy advocate of virtue was a dissenter in his religious opinions. He died Sept. 3, 1739. He was lusty in his person, not tall, and had the use of only one eye. His works were edited 2 vols. 12mo. 1775, by Th. Davies; and Henry Fielding who knew him well, said in "his Champion," after his decease, that he had the spirit of an old Roman, with the innocence of a primitive Christian.

LILLY, John, a native of Kent, educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts. He afterwards removed to Cambridge and became a great favourite at court. He was author of Euphnes, a miscellaneous description of characters, fol.—Endymion, Campaspe, Midas, played before queen Elizabeth—Woman in the Moon—the Maid's Metamorphosis, &c. He died 1600, aged about 47.

LILLY, William, an English astrologer, born in Leicestershire, 1602. He was taught writing and arithmetic at Ashby-de-la-Zouch school, and then came to London 1620, and engaged himself first as servant to a mantuanaker, and four years after as book-keeper to a master of the Salters' company, and after his death he married his widow with a fortune of 1000*l.* Thus become his own master, he began to frequent the puritanical meetings, and in 1632 applied himself to the study of astrology under Evans, a Welchman of debauched character. In this new character he acted with great precaution, his predictions were generally ambiguous, and if they failed, the deception was ascribed to untoward circumstances or false representations. In 1637 he settled at Horsham with a second wife, who, unlike his first, was violent in her temper, and extremely quarrelsome, but in 1641 he returned to London, where, in these superstitious times, his profession was much respected by all parties. He was frequently consulted by the parliamentary generals, and his assurances of success were productive of great animation in the soldiers. Though attached to the republicans, his services were solicited also for the king, and Mrs. Whorwood consulted him on the part of his majesty, and he informed her he might conceal himself in Essex, about 20 miles from London, and when he was confined in Carisbrook castle, he provided him with a saw and aquafortis, by which he might effect his escape. The parliament in the mean time patronised him by a salary of 100*l.* a year, which he resigned in two years, and in 1648, and the next year he greatly improved his property by delivering lectures on his art. At the restoration he was examined by the commons about the beheading of Charles, which he declared was done by cornet Joyce. After obtaining his pardon, under the broad seal of England, he returned to Horsham, where he practised physic, as he had, through the friendship of Elias Ashmole, obtained a license from archbishop Sheldon. He died of a palsy at Horsham, 1681, and was buried in Walton church, where a marble was placed by Ashmole, with a Latin inscription, written by Smalridge, afterwards bishop of Bristol. Lilly lost his second wife in 1654, and married again the same year. He acquired property by his publications, and especially by his almanacs, and in 1659 was complimented with a gold chain and medal by the king of Sweden, whose name he had mentioned with particular respect. He adopted for his son Coley a tailor, whom he called Merlin junior, and to whom he gave the almanacs which for 36 successive years he had printed; but he left his estate at Horsham to the son of his friend Bulstrode Whitelock, and his magical instruments to his astrological successor, Dr. Causin. His chief works are, Christian Astrology, 4to. 1647—a Collection of Nativities—Observations on the Life, &c. of Charles I.—Annus Tenebrosus, or the Black Year, &c.

LILY, William, an English grammarian, born at Odiham, Hants, 1466. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, and after taking his bachelor's degree he went on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. On his return he stopped at Rhodes, where he studied Greek, and also at Rome, where he still more fully improved himself. In 1510, the year after his arrival in England, he was, in consequence of his great reputation for learning, made first master of St. Paul's school, then founded by dean Colet. For 12 years he presided with high celebrity over this foundation, and had among his pupils many persons who afterwards distinguished themselves in the state. He died of the plague in London, 1522, aged 54. By his wife Agnes he left two sons and a daughter, who married Ritwise, his successor in St. Paul's school, who died 1532.—Lily is the author of a valuable grammar, in which it is said he was assisted by his friends, Erasmus, Colet, and Wolsey; but though it has been recommended by royal authority for general use, Roger Ascham and some others have ventured to censure it as very imperfect and incorrect. He wrote, besides, "Poemata Varia," and other pieces.

LILY, George, eldest son of the grammarian, was born in London, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, after which he went to Rome, and was patronised there by cardinal Pole. On his return to England, he was made canon of St. Paul's, and prebendary of Canterbury. He wrote some historical books, and was the first who published a correct map of Britain. He died 1559.

LILY, Peter, second son of the grammarian, was a dignitary of the church of Canterbury. His son Peter, was fellow of Jesus college, Cambridge, D.D. prebendary of St. Paul's, and archdeacon of Taunton. He died 1614, and some of his sermons were published by his widow.

LIMBORCH, Philip, a learned divine, born at Amsterdam, 19th June, 1633. His education was completed under the first masters, and after studying divinity for some time at Utrecht, he embraced the tenets of the remonstrants, and first appeared as a public probationary preacher at Haerlem, 1655. From Haerlem he went to Gonda; and in 1667 he was invited to Amsterdam, where he became deputy, and the next year successor to Pontanus, the divinity professor. But he acquired popularity not only as a preacher, but as a writer, and as the editor of the letters of his uncle Episcopius, which contained the regular history of Arminianism. In 1686 he published his popular work, Theologia Christiana ad Praxim Pietatis, &c. in fol. which was well received, and quickly passed through four editions. In 1686 he had also a dispute with Isaac Orobio, a learned Jew, who had escaped from the Spanish inquisition at Seville, and practised physic at Amsterdam, and the result of this controversy appeared under the title of Collatio Amica de Veritate Christianæ Religionis cum Erudito Judæo. In this and other performances he displayed great abilities, but in the management of his arguments he was modest and candid. He was employed in 1694 to recover from Judaism a young lady of Amsterdam, of the age of 22, who had, at the persuasion of the Jews, embraced their religion, and he succeeded, by the strength and solidity of his arguments, to remove all her doubts. This good, pious, and active man, was seized with St. Anthony's fire in the autumn of 1711, and died in consequence of it the following 30th of April. His funeral oration was spoken by John Le Clerc, and he is described as a solid preacher, an able annotator, a candid lover of truth, and in his private character amiable and benevolent. He was greatly esteemed by Locke and Tillotson, and was the correspondent of several learned men in Europe. His History of the Inquisition, published 1692, folio, was translated into English by Sam. Chandler, 2 vols. 4to. 1731. He wrote, besides other works.

LIMNÆUS, John, a German lawyer of Jena, known as the author of various learned works. He was tutor to Albert, margrave of Brandenburg, and died 1663, aged 71.

LINACRE, Dr. Thomas, a learned physician descended from an ancient Derbyshire family, was born at Canterbury 1460. From the king's school in his native town he passed to Oxford, and was elected fellow of All Souls 1484, after which he travelled on the continent, and improved himself at Florence and at Rome, by the instruction of those eminent scholars, Demetr. Chalcondyles, Aug. Politian, and Herm. Barbarus. On his return home he took his degree of M.D. and was made professor of physic at Oxford, and afterwards became preceptor to prince Arthur, and physician to Henry VII. and afterwards to Henry VIII. In 1500, he abandoned physic for divinity, and obtained a prebend in Wells, and another in York cathedral, besides other preferment, by the friendship of Wareham, the primate. He was also rector of Wigan, Lancashire, and prebendary of Westminster. He was not only the best Grecian and Latinist of his age, but he proved himself one of the most zealous promoters of the revival of learning in the kingdom; and by his means the college of physicians was founded, and of this excellent institution he became the first president. This good and worthy man died of the stone, after suffering great pain, 20th Oct. 1524, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral, where a Latin inscription, by Dr. Caius, recorded his meritorious services to literature and to mankind. He published a Latin translation of Proclus' Sphere, 1499—the Rudiments of Grammar, for the Use of the Princess Mary—de Emendatâ Structurâ Latini Sermonis, Libri sex, a valuable work—and translations of Galen's works, in truly classical language.

LINANT, Michael, a French poet, the intimate friend of Voltaire. He three times obtained the prize of the French academy, and published some odes and other poems. He died 1749, aged 41, universally respected.

LINCOLN, Benjamin, a major-general in the army of the American revolution, was the son of the honourable Benjamin Lincoln, and born at Hingham, Massachusetts, Jan. 23d, 1733. His advantages for education were limited, and until the age of forty he was employed in the pursuits of agriculture. He was, however, distinguished for judgment and intelligence, was the representative of the town in the provincial assembly, a colonel of the militia, secretary of the house of representatives, and a member of the council. In February, 1776, he was appointed a brigadier, and soon after major-general in the provincial army, and in February, 1777, a major-general on the continental establishment. His services were conspicuous towards the close of that year in the northern campaign. He was second in command in the army which, under general Gates captured the British under Burgoyne. On the day after the battle of Stillwater, he received a dangerous wound while reconnoitring. In the following year he was appointed by congress to take the command in the southern department at the solicitation of the delegates from that portion of the union. After a number of inferior operations, on the 20th June, 1779, he made an unsuccessful attack on the British post at Stone-ferry. He afterwards retired to Charleston and attempted its defence, but was compelled, on the 12th of May, 1780, to capitulate. He was exchanged in November, and in the spring following joined the army on the North river. At the siege of Yorktown he commanded a central division, and shared largely in the dangers and triumphs of the day. He was designated to conduct the surrendering army to the field where their arms were deposited, and to see the conditions of the capitulation executed. In October, 1781, congress appointed him secretary of the war department, and afterwards, on several occasions, a commissioner to negotiate with the Indians. He resigned his office as secretary in October, 1783, and received, in a resolution of Congress, a flattering expression of their respect. After the establishment of peace he returned to his native state, and in 1787 was appointed to command the troops employed for the suppression of the insurrection in that state. He was also one of the commissioners to propose terms of indemnity to the insurgents. In 1788, he was chosen lieutenant-governor. The following year he was a member of the convention which ratified the constitution of the United States, and was appointed collector of the ports of Boston and Charlestown. This office he held and discharged its duties greatly to the public satisfaction, until the increased embarrassments arising from the restrictions on commerce induced him to resign in January, 1809. He died in the house in which he was born, May 9th, 1810, aged 78. General Lincoln was a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and president of the Society of Cincinnati of Massachusetts. He published several letters and essays, principally on subjects connected with natural history.

LINCOLN, Levi, attorney-general of the United States, was a native of Hingham, Massachusetts, born May 15th, 1749, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1772. In 1775, he commenced the practice of the law at Worcester, and for more than twenty years was at the head of his profession in that county. In 1787 he was appointed one of the delegates of Massachusetts to congress, but declined accepting the trust. In 1800 he was elected a representative for Worcester district, and in 1801 was appointed by Mr. Jefferson attorney-general of the United States. He resigned in 1805, having, during a short period, discharged also the duties of secretary of state. In 1806 he was elected a member of the council of Massachusetts, and in 1807, lieutenant-governor of the state. While in this office, the administration devolved on him in consequence of the death of governor Sullivan. In 1811 he was again elected a member of the council, and the same year received the appointment of judge of the supreme court of the United States, to supply the place of Mr. Cushing, deceased. This office, however, he declined accepting, and appeared no more in public life. He died April 14th, 1820, aged 71.  L.

LIND, James, an English physician, author of a valuable treatise on the Diseases of Seamen, 8vo. and other works. He died 1794.

LINDANUS, William, a Dutchman, made the first bishop of Ruremonde, by Philip II. of Spain. He was in 1588 removed to Ghent, and died there that year. He was a native of Dordt, and wrote some Latin works on Theological subjects, and in defence of the catholic religion.

LINDENBRUCH, Frederic, the laborious and learned editor of Virgil, Terence, and other classics, and the author of "Codex Legum Antiquarum," folio, a curious work—was a Fleming, and died 1638.

LINDSAY, John, a learned divine, educated at St. Mary-hall, Oxford. For some years he was the minister of a dissenting congregation in Aldersgate-street, and was also a corrector of the press to Mr. Bowyer. He died June 21st, 1768, aged 82, and was buried in Islington churchyard. He wrote, "the Short History of the Regal Succession"—Remarks on Whiston's Scripture Politics, 8vo.—and translated Mason's Vindication of the Church of England, reprinted 1727.

LINDSAY, Sir David, a Scotch poet, born at the Mount, Fifeshire, 1496, and educated at St. Andrews. After the fatal day of Flodden-field, he went over to France, and distinguished himself in the battle of Pavia; and on his return home, was made by James V. master of the herald's office. He was also employed in several embassies, and wrote some admired poems. His Satires on the Vices of the Clergy were much admired. He wrote also a History of Scotland, three vols. now in MS. in the advocates' library Edinburgh. He died 1557, aged 61.

LINDSAY, David, a relation of the preceding, was born at Pitsothie, Fifeshire, 1527, and educated at St. Andrews. After studying in foreign universities he returned to support the reformed religion against queen Mary. He wrote the History of Scotland from 1437 to 1542, a curious work, but often injudicious, and wickedly partial. He died at his native seat 1593, aged 66.

LINDWOOD, William, divinity professor at Oxford in the reign of Henry V. was ambassador in Spain 1422, and for his services was made bishop of St. David's 1434. He wrote the Constitutions of the archbishops of Canterbury from Langton to Chichely, printed Paris 1505, and Oxford 1663; and he died 1446.

LINGELBACK, John, a German painter, born at Frankfort, on the Maine, 1625. He travelled over Holland, France, and Italy, to improve himself by studying foreign models; and on his return he exhibited a highly polished style of painting. His pictures were adorned with ruins of antiquity, his landscapes were rich and beautiful, and his genius proved so fertile, that the same subjects never appeared twice in his pieces. He returned to Amsterdam 1650, but the time of his death is not ascertained.

LINGUET, Simon Nicolas Henry, a French writer, born 14th July, 1736, at Rheims. He went, when young, into the suite of the French general who led an army against Portugal; and during his residence in Spain, he applied himself to the language, and translated some dramatic pieces into French. On his return to France, he devoted himself to the labours of the bar, and by his application and the brilliant powers of his eloquence, he acquired great celebrity, especially in his masterly defence of the duke of Aiguillon, and of Morangies. His high reputation excited the jealousy of his oratorical rivals, and by an unmanly combination they obtained a decree from the parliament that he should no longer be permitted to exercise his profession of pleader. Thus cruelly robbed of his honours, the disappointed orator had recourse to his pen, and produced several political pamphlets, a periodical journal, and his celebrated Theory of the Laws. The freedom of his observations excited against him the persecution of the prime minister, Maurepas, but upon the arbitrary suppression of his journal he fled to Switzerland, and then to Holland, and to London. From England he passed to Brussels, and from thence wrote a petition to Vergennes to be permitted to return to France in security. His request was granted; but in 1779 some political delinquency threw him into the Bastille, where he remained two years, and was at last liberated on the promise of being moderate and prudent in his writings and in his conversation. He soon after passed to England, where he wrote his Memoirs on the Bastile, and then retired to Brussels, where he began his Political Annals. His observations on the Freedom of the Navigation of the Scheldt, were read with admiration by the people of Brabant; and Joseph II. was so pleased with his arguments that he permitted him to come to Vienna, where he complimented him with a present of 1000 ducats. The liberality of the monarch ought to have roused the gratitude of Linguet, but regardless of the kindness of his patron, he scrupled not to defend the violent measures which Vandernoot and the rebellious Brabanters were meditating against the authority of their monarch. Deservedly banished from Germany, Linguet came to Paris, to share in the dangers of the revolution, and in 1791 he appeared at the bar of the national assembly to plead the cause of the negroes of St. Domingo, and to inveigh against the tyranny of their white masters. During the reign of terror he fled from the capital, but his retreat was discovered, and he was dragged from the country before that bloody tribunal which paid no respect either to age, to virtue, or to misfortunes. He was condemned to death 27th June, 1794, on pretence of having disgraced his nation by paying the tribute of respect to the governments of London and Vienna. He walked to the scaffold with great composure, and fell with the resignation of a good Christian. He wrote various works, 35 in number, the best known of which, besides those already mentioned, are, the History of the age of Alexander—the Fanaticism of Philosophers—the History of the Revolutions of the Roman Empire, 2 vols.—Reflections on Light—History of the Jesuits—a Critique on Voltaire—Socrates, a tragedy.

LINIERE, Francis, a French poet, of great literary merit, but of a dissipated character, and in opinion an obstinate atheist. He died as he had lived, a profligate, 1704, aged 76. His verses are said to possess great sweetness and elegance.

LINING, John, M.D. a respectable physician of South Carolina, was a native of Scotland, and after receiving a classical education came to America in 1730. He is known as the author of the first history of the Yellow Fever, given to the world from America. It was published in 1753. He had a taste for philosophical inquiries, and enjoyed a correspondence with Franklin on the subject of electricity. He made a variety of judicious statistical experiments, which were published in the transactions of the Royal Society of London, and contributed much to the literary reputation of his adopted country. ¶ L.

LINLEY, Thomas, an English musician and composer, who died 1795. He was one of the proprietors of Drury-lane theatre.

LINN, William, D.D. was born in Pennsylvania in 1752, and graduated at the college of Princeton, New-Jersey, in 1772. He was first pastor of a presbyterian church in the neighbourhood of his native place, after serving in the revolutionary army as a chaplain for some time. In 1784 he was appointed to the care of a respectable academy in Somerset county, Maryland. In 1787 he accepted a call to the pastoral charge of the presbyterian church in Elizabethtown, New-Jersey; and shortly afterwards was invited to the city of New-York, as a collegiate pastor in the Dutch presbyterian church, where he resided nearly twenty years, highly popular and useful. A short time before his death he was induced by ill health to resign his pastoral charge, and retire from the active services of his profession. He died at Albany, in January, 1808, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. He possessed a vigorous mind, and was distinguished for his natural impressive eloquence. His social qualities were peculiarly amiable and attractive. His chief publications were two volumes of sermons. ¶ L.

LINN, John Blair, D.D. minister of Philadelphia, and a poet, was born at Shippenburgh, Pennsylvania, 14th March, 1777, and graduated at the age of eighteen at Columbia college, New-York. He soon after commenced the study of law under the direction of general Hamilton, but yielding to a passion for theatrical amusements and literature, he soon abandoned the profession. Not long after becoming religious, he engaged in the study of theology under the tuition of Dr. Romeyn, theological professor at Schenectady, and in 1798 received a license to preach. He was soon after settled in the first presbyterian church in Philadelphia, where he continued to labour till his death, on the 30th of August, 1804. He published several poetical works which gave him notoriety, the chief of which were "on the death of Washington," and "the Powers of Genius." He possessed a mind of vigour and great sensibility, a sprightly and luxuriant fancy, and had studied English literature with great relish and assiduity. He also published several tracts in controversy with Dr. Priestley, exhibiting vigorous powers of argumentation, and extensive knowledge. ¶ L.

LINNÆUS, Charles Von, or Linné, the father of modern botany, son of a Swedish clergyman, was born at Roesult, in the province of Smaland, Sweden, 24th May, 1707. He was educated at Lund in Scania, and at the university of Upsal, and he afterwards studied at Leyden, where he took his degree of M.D. in 1735. On his return to Stockholm, he practised physic with such popularity and success, that at the age of 34 he was nominated professor of physic and botany in the university of Upsal. He was also appointed physician to king Adolphus who in 1753 created him a knight of the polar star, and in 1757 raised him to the honour of nobility; and his services were farther acknowledged by the succeeding monarch, who in 1776 doubled his pension, and settled on him and his family a valuable portion of land. With an unparalleled ardour after knowledge, Linnæus undertook to explore the barren and inhospitable deserts of Lapland, and through 10 degrees of latitude he exposed himself, generally on foot, to every sort of fatigue. He afterwards visited the mines of Sweden, and extended his researches to the natural productions of Dalecarlia. In 1735 he visited Denmark, Germany, and Holland, and the following year he came to England. He was received in this country with distinction, recommended by a flattering letter from Boerhaave; but it has been observed that Sir Hans Sloane, to whom the introduction was made, did not pay him that respect and attention which his merits deserved, and this probably prevented the intended settlement of this immortal philosopher here. The return of Linnæus to Stockholm was a glorious era in the Swedish annals of literature. He promoted the establishment of the royal academy of sciences, and became its first president. This great man was seized in 1776 with an apoplexy, but it did not prove fatal, as he survived till 1778, when an ulceration of the urinary bladder put an end to his existence 11th Jan. in his 71st year. To his sagacious discernment, science is indebted for the useful and familiar division of plants, of animals, of herbs, &c. into classes. To the most extensive knowledge he united the most indefatigable industry; and before the publication of his Genera Plantarum, he most minutely examined the characters of more than 8000 plants. His works are, Systema Naturæ, sistens tria regna Naturæ, 1735, fol. and 2 vols. 8vo. 1756—Bibliotheca Botanica, 8vo.—Hortus Cliffortianus, folio.—Critica Botanica, 8vo.—Flora Laponica, 8vo.—Genera Plantarum, earumque Characteres Naturæ. 8vo.—Flora Suecica—Fauna Suecica, 8vo.—Flora Zeylanica, 4to.—Hortus Upsaliensis, 8vo.—Amœnitates Academicæ, 5 vols. 8vo.—Materia Medica, 8vo.—Animalium Specierum in Classes, 8vo.—Oratio de Incrementis Telluris Habitabilis, 8vo.—Nemesis divina—Plantæ Surinamenses. His son Charles, the last survivor of the family, died 1783, aged 45, professor of medicine at Upsal.

LINT, Peter Van, a native of Antwerp, 1609, known as a historical and portrait painter. He studied in Italy, and painted there with great reputation, and afterwards returned to Antwerp. His relation, Hendrick Van, was also a good painter. His landscapes near Rome were much admired. Two of his pieces are in lord Moira's collection.

LINTRUSI, Severinus, bishop of Wiburgh, Jutland, professor of divinity and eloquence at Copenhagen, was author of some theological works in Latin, and died 1732.

LINUS, St. successor of St. Peter at Rome, ranks among the martyrs of that celebrated city. Tertullian, it is to be observed, places St. Clement as next successor to Peter.

LIOTARD, John Stephen, a crayon painter, born at Geneva 1702. He studied at Paris, and afterwards at Rome, and for a short time visited England in the reign of George I. He then made a journey to the Levant, and adopted the manners and habits of the east, which he relinquished upon marrying. He was in England in 1772, where he disposed of a large collection of pictures by auction. He was very correct in his paintings, but stiffness and formality were too visible. A fine head of him is preserved in Walpole's anecdotes. He died about 1780.

LIOTARD, Peter, a French botanist, born at Dauphiny. From an obscure peasant he became a soldier, but retired from the profession in consequence of a wound received at the siege of Mahon, and settled with his uncle, who was a herbalist at Grenoble. In this place the particular powers of his mind unfolded themselves. Though 40 he applied himself with such zeal and attention to botany, that he was made director of the public garden of Grenoble. He was the friend of Rousseau, and other learned men; and was so partial to Linnæus, that he knew the whole of his system of plants by heart. He died 1796.

LIPPI, Philip, a native of Florence, who from a Carmelite became a painter, and was surnamed the Old. He was a dissipated character, and died 1488, aged 67. In his style he imitated the manner of his master Massaccio. His son Philip was also eminent as a painter, and died 1505, aged 45.

LIPPI, Lawrence, a native of Florence. He excelled as a painter in historical pieces and in portraits, and as a poet he possessed merit. His Malvantiile Raquistato, under the assumed name of Pernoli Zipoli, is a burlesque performance, printed at Florence, 4to. 1688, and again edited 1731, with notes, 4to. and Paris 1768, 12mo. He died 1664, aged 58.

LIPSIUS, Justus, a learned critic, born at Iscanum, between Brussels and Louvaine, 18th Oct. 1547. In his earliest years he displayed great powers of memory while at school at Brussels, at Aeth, at Cologne, and at the university of Louvaine, where he devoted himself assiduously to the cultivation of belles lettres and ancient literature. At the age of 18 he published his "Variarum Lectionum Libri tres," which he dedicated to the general patron of letters, cardinal Granvellan: and therefore, when he visited Rome in 1567, he was made secretary to that distinguished ecclesiastic, and for two years treated with the greatest respect and hospitality. After viewing the classical remains of ancient Rome, and exploring the contents of her rich libraries, he in 1569 returned to Louvaine. He afterwards went to Vienna, and being prevented from settling in his country, he stopped at Jena, where he was honoured with a professorship. From Jena he determined to retire to solitude and study in his own native seat of Iscanum; but the tumults of war drove him away again to Louvaine, and from Louvaine he came to Leyden, where he lived 13 years till 1590. The remainder of his life was spent at Louvaine, notwithstanding the flattering invitations and offers of patronage which he received from the pope, from the cardinals, and from the kings of France and Spain, and there he died 23d March, 1606, in his 59th year. Celebrated as a scholar, and respected as a critic, Lipsius was, in his conversation, his dress, and his appearance, far from prepossessing, but rather disagreeable and mean. In his religious opinions he was culpably inconsistent, without faith, and without honour. He was born a Roman Catholic, but he became a Lutheran at Jena, again a catholic at Brabant, a Calvinist at Leyden, and again a bigoted catholic at Louvaine. His last days indeed were clouded by disease, and weakness of understanding, but some parts of his conduct were long before ridiculous and puerile, and it could be scarcely credited, that the same man was at one time regardless of religion, and at another, so anxious to obtain the protection of the Virgin Mary, that he dedicated to her a silver pen, and a favourite gown, lined with fur. His works were published at Antwerp, 6 vols. folio, 1637, the most esteemed of which are, a Commentary on Tacitus, much admired—His Orations, De Concordiâ, and on the Death of the Duke of Saxony—Electa—Saturnalia—De Militiâ Romanâ—Satira Menippæa—De Amphitheatris—De Rectâ Pronunciatione Lingvæ Latinæ, &c.

LIRON, John, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, born at Chartres, and died at Mans, 1749, aged 84. He was author of Bibliothèque des Auteurs Char- trains—Les Annales de la Critique—Les Singularités Historiques et Littéraires, 4 vols. 12mo. works of great merit.

LIS, John Van der, a painter, born at Oldenburgh. His pieces were generally on Scriptural subjects, and on moral sports, and possessed great merit. He died 1629, aged 59. Another painter of that name, eminent in historical representations, was born at Breda, and the disciple of Cornelius Poeleberg.

LISLE, Claude de, a native of Vaucouleurs, in Lorraine, bred to the law, which he quitted to study geography. He excelled as a teacher of geographical knowledge, and had among his pupils, Orleans, afterwards regent of France. He wrote Historical Relation of Siam, 12mo.—Introduction to Geography, with a treatise on the Sphere, 2 vols. 12mo.—an Abridgment of Universal History, 7 vols. 12mo. He died at Paris, 1720, aged 76.

LISLE, William de, a French geographer, son of Claude, was born at Paris, 1675. His map of the world, published in 1699, recommended him so strongly, that he was elected into the academy of sciences. He was afterwards appointed geographer to the king, and instructed Lewis XV. himself in geography, and wrote several works for his use. Scarcely any respectable publication appeared without being decorated with his maps. He died of an apoplexy, 1726, when preparing a map of Malta for Vertot's History.

LISLE, Joseph Nicholas de, an able astronomer, brother to William. He was born at Paris, and became by his celebrity, member of all the learned academies in Europe. He was in England 1724, and obtained, as he deserved, the friendship and admiration of Newton and Halley. In 1726 he was invited to Russia, and there he contributed greatly to the advancement of astronomy and geography, at the head of the observatory. At the age of 18 he made valuable observations on a total eclipse of the sun, but his greatest work is his Memoirs of the History of Astronomy, 2 vols. 4to. He returned from Petersburg in 1747, and died at Paris 1768, aged 80.

LISLE, Sir George, son of a London bookseller, learned the art of war in Flanders, and distinguished himself in the civil wars. At the last battle of Newbury, when it grew dark, he fought in his shirt, to render his person more conspicuous to his men, and in consequence of his valour he was knighted by the king in the field of battle. He bravely defended Colchester, in 1643, and when the town surrendered, he was inhumanly ordered to be shot by the victorious republicans. He suffered with great intrepidity, 28th Aug. 1648.

LISOLA, Francis de, a native of Besancon. for four years ambassador in England.

from the emperor Ferdinand III. and afterwards envoy extraordinary at Madrid. His work "Bouclier d'Etat et de Justice," on the ambitious views of Lewis XIV. was highly offensive to the French. He died 1677. Some of his letters and memoirs have also been published, 12mo.

LISTER, Matthew, president of the college of physicians, was born at Thornton, Yorkshire, and educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of Oriel college. He studied physic abroad, and took his degree of M.D. at Basil, and afterwards became physician to Anne, James's queen, and to Charles I. who knighted him. He was a great sufferer during the civil wars, and died near Louth, Lincolnshire, 1657, aged 92.

LISTER, Martin, nephew of Sir Matthew, was born in Buckinghamshire, about 1638, and educated under his uncle, who sent him to St. John's college, Cambridge, where he became fellow, 1660. He studied physic, and travelled abroad, and at his return home, 1670, he settled at York, where he acquired great reputation. He also devoted much of his time to the study of antiquities and natural history, and for his many valuable communications he was elected fellow of the royal society. In 1684 he removed to London, and in 1698 attended the earl of Portland, when ambassador to the court of France. He published an account of his journey to Paris, which was ridiculed by Dr. King's Journey to London. He was made physician to queen Anne, 1709, and died Feb. 1711-12. His other publications are about eight in number, on natural history, on shells, &c.

LITHGOW, William, a Scotchman, who travelled on foot over Europe, Asia, and Africa, where he met with various adventures, of which he has given a curious but marvellous relation. At Malaga he was tortured by the inquisition, and on his return was presented to king James and his court, so mangled that he was carried on a feather bed into the royal presence. He applied to the Spanish ambassador Gondamar, and when deceived by him, he insulted him, and even struck him in the king's chamber, for which he was sent a prisoner for nine months, to the Marshalsea. His travels are now a scarce book. He informs his reader, that he has walked on foot, more than 36,000 miles. The better part of his travels appears in Morgan's "Phoenix Britannicus."

LITTLE, William, an English historian, born at Bridlington, Yorkshire, 1136. He is often called Naubrigensis, as he was a monk of Newborough abbey. His History of England, from the invasion of William the Conqueror, to 1197, in five books, is highly esteemed for accuracy, judicious arrangement, and veracity. There is preserved in Christ-church hospital, Abingdon, Berks, a MS. by John Little, which records various interesting and curious particulars, concerning the abbey, and the history of that town.

LITTLEBURY, Isaac, an English divine, who published a translation of Herodotus. The work is well and faithfully executed, but without notes. The second edition in 2 vols. 8vo. appeared in 1720.

LITTLETON, or LYTTLETON, Thomas, an English Judge, born at Frankley, Worcester. After a liberal education, he entered at the Inner Temple, and so ably distinguished himself, that Henry VI. appointed him steward of the court of the palace, and in 1455, king's sergeant, and a judge on the northern circuit. The troubles of the time did not lessen the public opinion of his integrity, Edward IV. granted him a pardon, and continued him in his offices, and afterwards made him one of the judges of the common pleas. In 1745 he was created knight of the bath, and died in a good old age, 23d Aug. 1481. He was buried in Worcester cathedral. He left three sons, William, Richard, and Thomas. The eldest son lived in splendour at Frankley, and died 1508. From him the present ennobled family are descended. The second was a lawyer of eminence, and it was for his use and instruction, that his father, in his old age, wrote his famous treatise on tenures and titles, first printed 1477, and often republished with Coke's commentary. The third son, Thomas, was knighted by Henry VII. for apprehending Lambert Simnel, the pretended earl of Warwick.

LITTLETON, John, a descendant of the Worcestershire Littletons, was known as an active member of parliament for his native county, in the 27th year of Elizabeth, but his attachment to Essex proved unfortunate. He was seized when that favourite was discarded from the protection of the queen, and being fined and condemned as a conspirator, he was saved with difficulty by the interference of Sir Walter Raleigh, to whom he wrote an excellent letter. He died in prison, 1600. Several of his letters appeared in the Biographia Britannica.

LITTLETON, Edward, a native of Shropshire, related to the Worcestershire family. He removed from Christ-church, Oxford, to the Inner Temple, and in 1628, distinguished himself in parliament as one of the members that appeared before the lords with the bill of rights. He was afterwards one of the managers in the impeachment of Buckingham, but notwithstanding his opposition to the court, he was made, in 1639, chief justice of the common pleas, and the following year lord keeper of the great seal, and a peer by the title of Lord Littleton. In those turbulent times his partial adherence to the republican factions procured his dismissal from office, and he died at Oxford, 1645.

LITTLETON, Adam, a learned divine, born at Hales Owen, Shropshire, 8th Nov. 1627. He was educated at Westminster, under Busby, and in 1647 went as student to Christ-church, from which he was ejected the next year. Soon after he was usher at Westminster, and in 1658 was elected second master. In 1670 he was honoured with the degree of D.D. by the university, in consequence of his merit, and four years after was made rector of Chelsea, and about that time obtained a grant from Charles II. to succeed Dr. Busby in Westminster school, to which, however, he did not succeed. He died 30th June, 1694, aged 67, and was buried in his church, Chelsea, where a monument records his services to literature. He was in his private character a worthy and amiable man, and as a philologist and grammarian, he had few equals. He published "A Latin Dictionary"—Elementa Religionis, &c.—Sixty-one sermons—Seldon's Jani Anglorum, &c. translated, and other works. He began, but did not live to complete, a Greek Lexicon.

LITTLETON, Edward, an amiable divine and poet, educated at Eton, under Dr. Snape. In 1716 he went to king's college, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself as a scholar and a man of genius. In 1720 he was made assistant at Eton, and seven years after was elected one of the fellows of the college, and presented to the living of Maple Durham, Oxfordshire. In 1730 he took the degree of LL.D. and became chaplain to the king. He died 1734, and was buried at Maple Durham, leaving a widow and three daughters. He was not ambitious of appearing as an author. His "Discourses," 2 vols. were published for the benefit of his family, and his poems have occasionally been printed in miscellanies, particularly in Dodsley's. His poem on the spider is much admired.

LIVIA, wife of Tiberius Claudius Nero, afterwards married Augustus, and prevailed upon him to adopt her children. Some authors assert that she poisoned Augustus, to make room for her son Tiberius, who treated her with the highest disrespect. She died A.D. 29.

LIVINGSTON, John, a Scotch presbyter, educated at Glasgow, where he took the degree of M.A. 1621. He was banished, 1663, from Scotland, because he refused to take the oath of allegiance, on account of his intolerable religious opinions; and he went to Holland, where he officiated at the Scot's chapel, Rotterdam. He died Aug. 9th, 1672, aged 69. He wrote letters from Leith to his parishioners at Ancrum, and other works.

LIVINGSTON, Philip, a distinguished member of the memorable American congress in 1776, was born in Albany, January 15th, 1716, and graduated at Yale college in 1737. He settled in the city of New-York, and devoted himself to merchandize. In 1759 he was elected to a seat in the provincial assembly, and was for many years one of the most able and influential members of that body. In 1774 he was chosen a member of the general congress, and took a distinguished part in its deliberations during the four succeeding years. He boldly advocated the separation of the colonies from the parent country, and signed the declaration of independence. In 1776 congress appointed him a member of the board of the treasury, and in the following year one of the marine committee; he was also during this period a member of the legislature of New-York, one of the convention which in 1777 formed a constitution for that state, and on the organization of the new government was appointed to a seat in the senate. He died June 12th, 1778, while attending the session of congress. He possessed a strong and discriminating mind, was profoundly acquainted with human nature, and exhibited in his public and private life the virtues of a sincere and enlightened Christian.  L.

LIVINGSTON, William, LL.D. governor of New-Jersey, was a member of a respectable family of that name in New-York, and was born in that city about the year 1723, and graduated at Yale college in 1741. He studied law, and possessing an understanding of great energy, a brilliant imagination, and a retentive memory, and devoting himself assiduously to the cultivation of his mind, he soon rose to distinction in the profession. He early exhibited himself an able and zealous advocate of civil and religious liberty, and employed his pen in vindicating the rights of the colonies against the arbitrary claims of the British. After enjoying several important offices in New-York he removed to New-Jersey, and as a representative of that state was one of the most distinguished of the congress of 1774. On the formation of a new constitution for that state in 1776 he was appointed the first governor, and was annually re-elected to the office till his death in 1790. He was characterized by simplicity in his manners, and ease, amiableness, and wit in his social intercourse. His writings display uncommon vigour, keenness, and refinement, and are often eloquent. He devoted himself during the revolution ardently to the cause of his country, and did much by the shrewdness and severity of his writings both to encourage his countrymen and exasperate the British.  L.

LIVINGSTON, Robert R. chancellor of New-York, and minister of the United States to France, was born in the city of

New-York, September 2d, 1747, and educated at King's college, where he was graduated in 1765. He studied law, and commenced its practice in New-York, but was soon after appointed recorder of that city, and held the office till near the commencement of the revolution, when he was dismissed by governor Tryon, on account of his attachment to liberty. Mr. Livingston boldly advocated the cause of his country at that crisis, was elected to a seat in the first congress, and was one of its ablest and most influential members. He was one of the committee which drew up the declaration of independence, and on the establishment of the executive departments in 1780 was appointed secretary of foreign affairs, and held the place till 1783. He was chosen in 1777 a member of the convention which formed the constitution of New-York, and on its adoption was appointed chancellor of the state, and continued in that office till he went to France in 1801. It was in that capacity that he administered the oath of office to president Washington on his first inauguration. In 1788 he was a member of the convention of New-York, which assembled to consider the constitution of the United States, and was a principal instrument in procuring its adoption. He was appointed minister to France in 1801, and rendered the most important services to his country while residing there, by negotiating the purchase of Louisiana, and procuring redress for the numerous spoliations by the French on the commerce of the United States. While at Paris he cultivated an acquaintance with his distinguished countryman, Robert Fulton, then residing in that city, and encouraged him, by furnishing one-half the requisite capital, to pursue those experiments which resulted in the discovery of a successful method of employing the steam-engine in navigation. He returned to the United States in 1805, and though not afterwards employed in public life, continued to be eminently useful, by promoting the progress of the arts and agriculture. He made some attempts to employ steam in navigation, which were, however, unsuccessful, but on the return of Mr. Fulton to New-York he formed a co-partnership with him, and by contributing capital enabled him to carry his discoveries into effect. He did much for the benefit of agriculture, by introducing the use of gypsum, and the merino race of sheep. He was a principal founder and the president of the New-York Academy of Fine Arts, and also of the Society for the promotion of agriculture. He died in Christian hope on the 15th of February, 1813, in his sixty-seventh year, lamented as one of the most distinguished among his countrymen in talents, learning, public spirit, and usefulness. He possessed an active and vigorous mind, uncommon quickness of perception, was a profound lawyer and statesman, and ranked among the first Americans in eloquence. ¶ I.

LIVINGSTON, Brockholst, judge of the supreme court of the United States, was the son of William Livingston, governor of New-Jersey, and was born in the city of New-York, November 25th, 1757. He entered Princeton college, but in 1776 left it for the field, and became one of the family of general Schuyler, commander of the northern army. He was afterwards attached to the suite of general Arnold, with the rank of major, and shared in the honours of the conquest of Burgoyne. In 1779 he accompanied Mr. Jay to the court of Spain as his private secretary, and remained abroad about three years. On his return he devoted himself to law, and was admitted to practice in April, 1783. His talents were happily adapted to the profession, and soon raised him into notice, and ultimately to eminence. He was called to the bench of the supreme court of the state of New-York, January 8th, 1802, and in November, 1806, was transferred to that of the supreme court of the United States, the duties of which station he discharged with distinguished faithfulness and ability until his death, which took place during the sittings of the court at Washington, March 18th, 1823, in the 66th year of his age. He possessed a mind of uncommon acuteness and energy, and enjoyed the reputation of an accomplished scholar, an able pleader and jurist, an upright judge, and a liberal patron of learning. ¶ I.

LIVINIUS, or LIVINEUS, John, Latin translator of some of the works of Gregory Nazianzen, of Chrysostom, and other fathers, and editor of Panegyrici Veteres, 8vo. 1599, was a native of Dendermonde. He studied at Cologne, and distinguished himself as a Grecian. He was canon of Antwerp, and he died there 1599.

LIVIVS, Andronicus, a Roman comic poet, whose plays are lost. He flourished 240 B. C.

LIVIVS, Titus, a celebrated Latin historian, born at Padua, and patronised by the emperor Augustus, who intrusted to him the education of his grandson Claudius. He died at Padua, A.D. 17, aged 67. The best edition of his valuable history, which has not descended whole to modern times, is by Crevier, 1735, 6 vols. 4to. It has been translated into English by Mr. Baker, in 6 vols. 8vo.

LLOYD, William, an English prelate, born 1627, at Tilehurst, Berks, where his father was rector. He was educated under his father, and in 1638 entered at Oriel college, Oxford, and the next year removed to a scholarship at Jesus, where he became fellow, 1646. He was afterwards for some years tutor to the children of Sir John Backhouse, and at the restoration was made prebendary of Rippon, Yorkshire. In 1666 he was made king's chaplain, and successively promoted to a prebend of Salisbury, the vicarage of St. Mary's, Reading, the archdeaconry of Merioneth, deanery of Bangor, prebend of St. Paul's, and the vicarage of St. Martin in the fields. In 1680 he was raised to the see of St. Asaph, and was one of the seven bishops sent to the tower in 1688, for refusing to permit the publication of the royal declaration for liberty of conscience. He was a zealous promoter of the revolution, and in 1692 was translated to Lichfield and Coventry, and in 1699 to Worcester. He died at Hartlebury castle, Aug. 30th, 1717, aged 91, and was buried in Fladbury church, near Evesham, where his son was rector. His publications were numerous, they consist of Tracts against Popery—Sermons—the History of the Government of the Church of Great Britain—a Dissertation on Daniel's 70 Weeks—a System of Chronology—a Harmony of the Gospel—a Chronological Account of the Life of Pythagoras, and other theological works.

LLOYD, Robert, an English poet, educated at Westminster school, where his father, Dr. Pierson Lloyd, was second master, and from thence elected to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. He was for some time usher of Westminster school, and during that time published "the Actor," 1760, a poem of great merit. His irregularities, however, obliged him to resign his situation in the school, and he now depended for subsistence on the exertions of his pen. At last his imprudence and his debts lodged him in the Fleet-prison, where he lived supported chiefly by the bounty of his steadfast friend the poet Churchill. The death of this liberal benefactor overwhelmed him with sorrow, and in less than a month he followed him to the grave. He died 15th December, 1764. He was the author of the "Capricious Lover," a comic opera, 8vo. and four other dramatic works. A partial collection of his works by Dr. Kenrick, appeared 2 volumes, 8vo. 1774. His imitation of Theocritus has been much admired.

LLOYD, Nicholas, an English divine, author of a Historical, Geographical, and Poetical Dictionary, printed Oxford, 1670, folio, and in 4to. 1695, a work to which Hoffman, Moreri, other succeeding lexicographers, are much indebted. This active and indefatigable scholar died 1680, aged 49, and was buried at St. Mary's, Newington, Surrey, where he was rector.

LLOYD, Thomas, succeeded Penn as deputy governor of Pennsylvania, on his return to England in 1684. He resigned in 1688. In 1689 the administration again devolved on him as president of the council. He was of an ancient family of Wales, and educated at Oxford, but embracing the principles of the Quakers he lost all hopes of preferment in England, and accompanied William Penn to America. He was one of the most intimate and confidential friends of the proprietor, and a valuable acquisition to the province. He died July 10th, 1694, aged 54.  L.

LLYWARCH AP LLYWELYN, a Welsh bard, whose poetical effusions possessing merit are preserved in the Welsh Archaeologia. He flourished from 1160 to 1220.

LLYWARCH HEN, a Welsh poet, distinguished also as an able defender of his country against the Saxon invasion, in which it is said he lost 24 sons. He flourished about 630, and died in a cell at Llanvor, near Bala, aged 150. His poems, &c. have been collected by Mr. Owen.

LLWELYN AP GRUFFYDD, a Welsh prince, who heroically resisted the invasion of Edward I., of England, but at last fell under the power of his superior antagonist, 1282, after a reign of 28 years. The independence of his country perished with him.

LLYWELYN AP JORWERTH, king of North Wales, after the deposition of his tyrannical uncle, David Owen. He was a wise, active, and warlike prince, and died 1240, after a reign of 46 years.

LLYWELYN AP SITSYLT, a Welsh prince, sovereign of South Wales and Powys, 998. He fell bravely fighting in battle 1021, after defeating Aulaff, the Scotch invader, supported by the treacherous assistance of Hywill and Merenydd, sons of Edwin ap Einion.

LLYWELYN VARD, a Welsh poet, son of Cyfwrdd. Some of his pieces are preserved in the Welsh Archaeology. He flourished between 1130 and 1180.

LLYWELYN O LANGEWYDD OR LLYWELYN SION, a Welsh bard of Glamorgan, who died 1616. His collections of the System of Bardism are valuable, as he was not only eminent himself, but frequently presided at the meetings of the bards.

LLYWELYN, Thomas, author of a History of the different editions of the Welsh Bible, in which he evinced great learning as a divine, and much judgment as a critic, died 1796.

LOBB, Theophilus, a native of London, where his father was a dissenting minister. He was eminent as a physician, and wrote some medical as well as theological tracts, and died 1763, aged 87.

LOBEL, Matthias, a native of Lisle, who studied at Montpellier, and devoted himself attentively to botany. After travelling through Switzerland, Germany, Italy, &c. he came to England about 1570, and afterwards was nominated physician and botanist to James I. In the cultivation of his art he superintended lord Zouch's botanical garden at Hackney, and he wrote Stirpium Adversaria, London, 1570—Observationes, seu Stirpium Historiæ, &c. folio, 1576—Dilucidæ Simplicium Medicamentorum Explicationes, &c. He died 1616, aged 78.

LOBINEAU, Guy Alexis, a French Benedictine monk, born at Rennes, 1667. He is eminently known by his works, the History of Britany, 2 vols. folio—of the Conquest of Spain by the Moors, 12mo.—a History of Paris, 5 vols. folio—the Saints of Britany, folio—a translation of Polybius. He died 1727. He also translated some of the plays of Aristophanes.

LOBKOWITZ, Boleslaus de Hassenstein, baron de, a Bohemian nobleman, who after visiting various countries, and distinguishing himself as a negotiator and as a warrior, entered the ecclesiastical profession, and died 1510. His Latin poems appeared at Prague, 1563 and 1570, and possess merit.

LOBO, Jerome, a Jesuit of Lisbon, who went as a missionary to the east. He wrote a very interesting account of his travels into Abyssinia, in Portuguese, translated into French by Le Grand, and from French into English by Dr. Johnson. Lobo at his return was made rector of the college of Coimbra, Portugal, and died 1678, aged 85.

LOBO, Rodrigues Francis, a Portuguese poet, born at Leiric, in Estramadura. His "Euphrosyne," a comedy, is very popular in Portugal. He wrote besides other poems, printed 1721, in folio.

LOCKART, Alexander, a lawyer, born at Carnwath, near Edinburgh. He was a member of the Scotch parliament, and violently opposed the union, and also the Hanoverian succession, after which he retired to his country house, and wrote his Memoirs of Scotland, published 1714, London. He fell in a duel, 1732, aged 57.

LOCKE, John, an illustrious philosopher, born 1632, at Wrington, near Bristol, of a respectable family. He was educated at Westminster school, and in 1651 was elected to Christ church, Oxford, where he took regularly his degrees in arts. Already distinguished by his great proficiency in polite literature, he now applied himself to physic, but though he obtained some reputation at Oxford, he soon found his constitution inadequate to the fatigues of the profession, and gladly accepted the office of secretary to Sir William Swan, sent envoy to the elector of Brandenburg, 1664. Two years after he became acquainted with lord Ashley, afterwards earl of Shaftesbury, and not only by curing him of a dangerous abscess in the breast, but by the intelligence of his conversation, and the great powers of his mind, he deserved and obtained his lasting friendship. At the recommendation of this noble patron he relinquished medicine for the study of politics, and of civil and ecclesiastical history, and soon after employed himself in drawing up constitutions for the government of Carolina, of which his friend, now chancellor of the exchequer, and other lords, had obtained a grant from the crown. In 1672, on the elevation of Shaftesbury to the office of lord chancellor, Locke was made his secretary of the presentations, but on the disgrace of his patron the next year he lost his appointment, though he still continued secretary to the board of trade, where the earl was a commissioner, and enjoyed it with an annexed salary of 500*l.* per year till the dissolution of the commission in 1674. Soon after he went to Montpellier, for the benefit of his health, as he was apprehensive of a consumptive attack, and here he devoted himself partly to medical pursuits, and to the composition of his Essay on Human Understanding, till in 1679 his patron raised to be president of the council recalled him home. His prospects of preferment were transitory, the earl in six months was disgraced and imprisoned, and in 1692 escaped for fear of being prosecuted for high treason, to Holland, where Locke, equally faithful to him in adversity as in prosperity, followed him. There, by his intercourse with some suspected person after the death of his patron, the exiled philosopher drew upon himself the resentment of the government; he was not only removed from his studentship at Christ church, which he had hitherto kept as an honourable literary retreat, but he was accused by the English envoy before the States General, and his person claimed as guilty of treasonable correspondence in favour of Monmouth's invasion. Thus persecuted, Locke concealed himself for 12 months, devoting his time to literary labours, and two years after, when he returned to England in consequence of the revolution, he published his celebrated essay, which had engaged him nine years in the composition. As he was considered a sufferer for political opinions he was rewarded with the place of commissioner of appeals, worth 200*l.* a year, and he was offered the honourable office of envoy to some foreign courts, but this he declined, ambitious only after that tranquillity and retirement, which he found in the friendly invitations of Sir Francis and lady Masham at Oates. In 1695 he was prevailed upon to accept the place of commissioner of trade and plantations, for which he was so well qualified by information and knowledge, but this he resigned five years after, on account of the delicate state of his health, which did not permit him with safety to breathe the air of the capital. The latter part of life was usefully employed in the exertion of his talents on political subjects, and also in reading and commenting with all the zeal and humility of a true Christian on the holy Scriptures. With nothing to disturb the serenity of his mind, he found himself happy in the retirement which he had chosen, and in the society of lady Masham, a woman of superior virtue, of great information, and of contemplative habits of mind, whose son had the happiness to be educated and improved under the eye, and in the principles of her illustrious friend. Thus situated in the hospitable mansion of Oates, as if in his own house, he saw the gradual approach of death with calmness and resignation. Seeing his legs swell, he became sensible that dissolution was not distant, and after receiving the sacrament with fervour and piety, he told his sorrowing friend, lady Masham, that he had lived long enough, that he thanked God for having passed his days so happily, and that life appeared to him mere vanity. He expired with little pain, 28th Oct. 1704, in his 73d year, and was buried in the church at Oates, where a decent monument, with an inscription written by himself, marks the spot. His works are, besides the Essay in 2 vols. 8vo.; Letters on Toleration, 4to.; treatise on Civil Government, 8vo.; Thoughts concerning Education, 12mo.—Considerations on lowering the interest, and raising the Value of Money; Reasonableness of Christianity, 8vo.; Posthumous works, &c.; Paraphrase on St. Paul's Epistles, 4to.; Letters, &c. all which have been edited together, 3 vols. folio, and 9 vols. 8vo. On the character of this great and good man little need be said. The virtues and the charities of human nature he possessed in the highest degree, and as a philosopher, a Christian, a politician, and a man, he claims the first rank in the admiration and in the homage of posterity. With judicious taste and becoming simplicity, queen Caroline erected in her pavilion at Richmond, his bust with those of Bacon, Newton, and Clarke, as the four principal philosophers of which England may boast with real pride and satisfaction when she enumerates her departed heroes.

LOCKE, Samuel, D.D. president of Harvard college, Massachusetts, was graduated at that institution in 1755, and two years after settled in the ministry at Sherburne, where he continued till advanced to the presidency of the college in March, 1770. He resigned the station in December, 1773. He possessed uncommon powers of mind, was an accomplished preacher. ☞ L.

LOCKER, John, an English gentleman of a respectable family in Middlesex. He was educated at Merchant-tailors', and Merton college, Oxford, and then entered at Gray's Inn, where he occupied the same chambers which lord Bacon once had. When called to the bar he became a commissioner of bankrupts, and held other offices. He devoted much of his time to the cultivation of literature, and he was a perfect master of the Greek, and also of the modern Greek, which he acquired by the conversation of a poor native of the Morea, whom he found by accident destitute and begging in the streets of London, and whom he and Dr. Mead liberally patronised. He was an enthusiastic admirer of lord Bacon, some of whose papers he carefully collected for publication, which he communicated to Dr. Birch, and Mr. Mallet. He wrote a preface to Voltaire's Charles XII. and translated the two first books, and Dr. Jebb the rest. He died much regretted, May, 1760, nearly a year after the death of his lady, a descendant of bishop Stillingfleet, by whom he had nine children.

LOCKMAN, John, author of Rosalinda, a musical drama, 1740, and of David's Lamentations, an oratorio, was one of the compilers of the General Dictionary, and also concerned in "Blainville's Travels." He died 2d Feb. 1771, much respected.

LOCKYER, Nicholas, a native of Somersetshire, chaplain to Cromwell, and provost of Eton under his usurpation. As he was a nonjuror he was ejected at the restoration from this provostship, and the livings of St. Benet's Sheerhog, and St. Pancras, Soperlane. He wrote some theological tracts, and died 1684.

LODBROG, Regner, a celebrated king of Denmark, at the beginning of the 9th century. He was a warrior, and also a poet, but his poems breathe nothing but wild fanaticism and religious phrenzy.

LODGE, Thomas, a learned physician, educated at Oxford, according to Wood. He afterwards studied medicine at Avignon, where he took his doctor's degree, and at his return was incorporated at Cambridge. He settled in London, where he acquired an extensive practice, especially among the Roman catholics, of whose persuasion he was. He died 1625, much respected. He wrote Wounds of Civil War, a tragedy, 1594, 4to.—Looking-Glass for London and for England, a tragi-comedy, 1598, in which, and in other pieces attributed to him, he is said to have been assisted by Robert Green.

LOEWENDAL, Ulric Frederic Woldemar, count de, a native of Hamburg, distinguished as an officer in the service of Poland, and afterwards of Denmark against Sweden. He next entered into the imperial army, and displayed his bravery at the battle of Peterwaradin, the sieges of Temeswar, and Belgrade, and in the other exploits of that celebrated war. Augustus king of Poland, sensible of his merits, made him field-marshal and inspector-general of the Saxon infantry, and he afterwards obtained the chief command of the Russian forces. From Russia he passed into the French service, and was particularly distinguished at the battle of Fontenoy 1745, and at the taking of Bergen-op-Zoom, 16th Sept. 1747, hitherto regarded as impregnable. The French king acknowledged his meritorious services by raising him to the rank of field-marshal. He died 1755, aged 55.

LOGAN, Frederic, baron de, a German poet of considerable merit, whose epigrams and other pieces have been edited by Lessing and Ramler. He died 1655, aged 51.

LOGAN, John, a native of Mid-Lothian, in Scotland, educated at Edinburgh, and made minister of South Leith 1770. He distinguished himself as a writer and as a poet, and died in London 1788, aged about 40. His works are the Philosophy of History from his lectures delivered at Edinburgh 1781—Runnameda, a tragedy, refused at Covent-garden, on account of some political allusions to the times, but acted with great applause at Edinburgh—Poems, of which the second edition appeared in 1782—and Review of the Principal Charges against Mr. Hastings, for which his publisher in London, Stockdale, was tried and acquitted.

LOGAN, James, distinguished for his learning and president of the council of Pennsylvania, was of Scotch descent, but born in Ireland, in 1674. He was well educated in the sciences and the various branches of polite literature. In 1699, he came to America with William Penn, in whose religious creed he was a believer, and was soon introduced by him into several public employments, and at length in 1701, appointed secretary of the province and clerk of the council. He afterwards was advanced to the offices of commissioner of property, chief justice, and president of the council, and was for some time unpopular by attaching himself to the interests of the proprietary, in opposition to those of the people. On the death of the governor in 1736, the government for two years devolved on him as president of the council, and he exercised an administration highly acceptable to the people. Several of the last years of his life he spent in retirement in literary pursuits. He was well versed in ancient and modern learning, and fond of mathematics, philosophy, and natural history, and published several valuable tracts on those subjects. His large and choice library he bequeathed to the citizens of Philadelphia.  L.

LOGAN, a distinguished Indian Chief of the Cayuga nation, who lived on the Ohio, and whose misfortunes and eloquence are commemorated by Mr. Jefferson in his Notes on Virginia. He was gifted with superior talents, was brave, and strongly attached to the white people, till in 1774, a party of whites under the command of a captain Cresap, without provocation, murdered all his family; a war of retaliation ensued, in which great numbers of the whites were put to death, till at length the Indians being defeated in a general battle sued for peace, and Logan, disdaining to appear among the supplicants, sent to lord Dunmore, governor of Virginia, the speech recorded by Mr. Jefferson, in which he recounts his wrongs. His calamities threw him into melancholy, and occasional delirium, which he attempted to relieve by intoxication. He was at length murdered on his way to Miami from Detroit, where he had lived for some time.  L.

LOGES, Mary Bruneau, a French lady of the protestant persuasion. She was much admired for her wit and genius, not only by Balzac, Malherbe, and other learned men; but the king of Sweden, the duke of Orleans, &c. She had by her husband, who was a gentleman of the king's bed-chamber, nine children, but though called the tenth muse, and a divinity on earth, she left none of her poetical productions behind her.

LOHENSTEIN, Daniel Gaspard de, a learned German, born at Nimptsch, Silesia. He wrote some dramatic pieces—Arminius, a historical romance, 2 vols. 4to.; Poetical Reflections on Isaiah's 53d chapter, &c. He died 1683, aged 45.

LOIR, Nicholas, a painter born at Paris 1624. He was disciple to Le Brun, but though possessed of genius, he did not excel in any particular branch. He painted landscapes, figures, &c. and assisted in the completion of the paintings of the palace of the Thuilleries. He died professor of the academy of painting. His son Alexis was an able engraver.

LOKMAN, an Abyssinian prophet, said to have been sold as a slave among the Israelites in the reign of David and Solomon. His wisdom, and the good sense and striking morality of his fables are so like those of Æsop, that he is considered by some authors as the same personage. He has been esteemed by the ancients as an extraordinary character, so that Mahomet has inserted a chapter in the Koran, with his name, where he introduces God saying, we heretofore bestowed wisdom on Lokman. He is said to have lived 300 years, and to have been buried near Jerusalem. A translation of his fables was published by Galland, at Paris, 1724.

LOLLARD, Walter, the founder of the sect of the Lollards, was according to some, an Englishman. His opinions were first disseminated in Germany, 1315, and afterwards were preached by him in Piedmont and in England. He was burnt as a heretic at Cologne, 1322. The followers of Lollard believed that mass, baptism, and extreme unction were superfluous, they renounced obedience to civil and ecclesiastical magistrates, and persuaded themselves that God did not punish faults committed on the earth.

LOM, Jossu Van, a physician born at Buren, Guelderland, 1500. He practised at Tournay and Bruges, and died 1562. His works written in elegant and polished Latin, all on medical subjects, were published at Amsterdam, 3 vols. 12mo. 1745.

LOMAZZO, John Paul, a native of Milan, known as an ingenious landscape and portrait painter. He also wrote an Italian treatise on Painting, 4to. 1585; and Idea del Tempio della Pittura, 1590, 4to. and died 1598, aged 40.

LOMBARD, Peter, called Master of the Sentences, was born at Novara, in Lombardy, and educated at Paris. He was for some time tutor to Philip, son of Lewis le Gros, king of France, and so universally respected, that upon the death of the archbishop of Paris he was placed in his room. He died four years after 1164. His work of the Sentences is divided into four books, and has been ably commented upon by succeeding divines. He wrote also Commentaries on the Psalms, and on St. Paul's Epistles.

LOMBARD, John Lewis, a native of Strasbourg, bred up to the law, but by nature formed for military affairs. He became in 1748, professor of artillery, at the military school of Metz, and afterwards in 1759, at Auxonne, and died 1st April, 1794, aged 71. He wrote Table du Tir des Cannons et des Obusiers, 8vo.; Memoire a l'Usage des Officiers d'Artillerie de France, 2 vols. 8vo.; Traité du Mouvement des Projectiles, 8vo.; Instruction sur la Manœuvre and le Tir du Cannon de Batille, 8vo.; besides Robins' Principles of Gunnery translated into French.

LOMBART, Lambert, a native of Liege, who studied painting in Germany, France, and Italy, and afterwards settled in his native country, where he acquired reputation, and died 1565, aged 59. He excelled also as an architect. His life was published by Hubert Goltzius.

LOMENIE, Henry Augustus, count de Brienne, son of Anthony Lomenie, for some time French ambassador to England, and secretary of state, who died 1638, succeeded to the honours of his father in the service of Lewis XIV. He died 1666, aged 71, and his memoirs were published at Amsterdam, 1719, 3 vols. 12mo.

LOMENIE, Henry Lewis, count de Brienne, son of the above, was also his succes-or in his high offices. The loss of his wife, whom he tenderly loved, had such effect upon his understanding that, to the prudence and sagacity of the statesman unhappily succeeded the extravagance of a deranged lunatic. He was consequently dismissed from power and confined. During his confinement and lucid intervals, he wrote Memoirs of his own Life, 3 vols. fol. — Satires and Odes—an account of his Travels, and other things. He died much respected and lamented 1698, aged 56.

LOMENIE DE BRIENNE, Stephen Charles de, a French prelate of the same family, born at Paris 1727. He was in 1760 made bishop of Condom, archbishop of Toulouse 1764, and then removed to Sens. Respected as a prelate, hostile to abuses, and friendly to reform, he became by the intrigues of Vermont, whom he had recommended as confessor to the queen, a cardinal, and the prime minister of Lewis XVI. but the expectations formed of his abilities were unhappily disappointed. He caused the disgrace of Calonne, but followed his steps of government, and politics, and his weakness, and his impotent disputes with the parliament of Paris, rapidly contributed to the French revolution. He quitted at last a station to which he was unequal, and by sending back his cardinal's hat to the pope, at the beginning of the revolution, he acquired a little popularity. He died at Sens, 16th Feb. 1798.

LOMONOZOF, a Russian poet of merit, born 1711. He was son of a fishmonger at Kolmogori, but despising this humble occupation, and inflamed with the love of literature by reading the Song of Solomon in the translation of Pototski, he fled from the protection of his father to a monastery of Moscow, where he studied the learned languages. He so distinguished himself, that he was in 1736 sent at the expense of the imperial academy of sciences, to Marburg, in Hesse Cassel, where for four years he applied himself to grammar, rhetoric, and philosophy, under Wolf, and afterwards studied chymistry under Henckel, at Freyberg. In 1741 he returned to Russia, and became professor of chymistry in the imperial academy. In 1744 he was raised by the empress to the rank of counsellor of state, but unfortunately died that year, April 4th, aged 54. As a writer, Lomonozof is deservedly esteemed by his countrymen as the polisher of their language. His poetical compositions are particularly valuable for their originality, sublimity of sentiment, and their animated diction. As the respectable imitator of Pindar, he ranks very high, and the appellation of father of Russian poetry is becomingly bestowed upon him. His works have been published in 3 vols. containing ten sacred and nineteen paucyric odes and other poetical pieces, idyls, tragedies, &c. besides passages translated from Cicero, Lucian, Erasmus, Ælion, Homer, Ovid, Virgil, and others, besides treatises on philosophical subjects. He published also, "Annals of the Russian Sovereigns," and Ancient History of Russia, from the origin of the nation to 1504.

LONDE, Francis Richard de la, a French poet of considerable merit, born at Caen. He wrote also some pieces on history, morals, and antiquity, and died 1765, aged 80.

LONDON, John Campbell, earl and baron of London, succeeded his father Hugh Campbell in 1732. He arrived in Virginia in 1756, with a commission as commander-in-chief of the British forces in America, in which office he succeeded general Abercrombie, who again assumed it on the return of London to England the following year. He was appointed major-general in 1756, and lieutenant-general in 1758, and commanded in the campaigns against the French in Canada in 1756 and 1757. He had also the appointment of governor of Virginia as the successor of the earl of Albemarle in 1756. Mr. Dinwiddie, however, continued to discharge the duties of the office, and lord London had little concern with the civil administration. He gained little reputation in America, but was charged with arrogance and indiscretion in his general deportment, and with indecision and delay as a military commander.

LONG, James le, a priest of the oratory, born at Paris 1665. He was professor in several colleges, and was elected librarian of St. Honoré, at Paris, where he died 1721. He was well skilled in ancient and modern languages, and in mathematics and philosophy. His chief works are Bibliotheca Sacra, 2 vols. folio, 1723—Bibliothèque Historique de la France, folio—a Historical Discourse on the Polyglott Bible, 8vo.

LONG, Roger, D.D. master of Pembroke hall, Cambridge, Lowndes' professor of astronomy and rector of Cherry Hinton, Huntingdonshire, and Bradwell, Essex, was a native of Norfolk. He is celebrated as an able astronomer, as his "Treatise on Astronomy," 2 vols. 4to. fully proves. He wrote besides an answer to Dr. Gally's pamphlet on "Greek Accents," and some sermons. He also invented a curious machine, which represented the zodiac, the meridians, and other circles, and all the constellations and stars visible at Cambridge, on plates of iron. The machine is in the form of a globe, eighteen feet in diameter, in which thirty persons may conveniently sit, and is easily turned by means of a winch. Dr. Long, equally known as a pleasant and facetious companion, died Dec. 16th, 1770, aged 91. He was vice-chancellor of Cambridge, 1737.

LONG, Thomas, B. D. an able divine, born at Exeter, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. He was author of a history of Donatists, 8vo.—Examination of Hale's Treatise on Schism, 8vo.—History of Popish and Fanatical Plots and Conspiracies, 8vo.—Life of Julian, 8vo. Vindication of Charles's Claim to be the author of the Eikon Basilicæ, &c. He obtained a prebend in Exeter cathedral, but lost it at the revolution, for refusing to take the oaths to king William. He died 1700, aged about 79.

LONG, Edward, an ingenious gentleman, was the son of Samuel Long, Esq., of the island of Jamaica, and born in the parish of St. Blaize, in Cornwall, in 1734. He was brought up to the law, and on the death of his father, went to the West Indies, where he became a judge of the vice-admiralty court, but returned to England, in 1769, and died in 1813. He wrote a "History of Jamaica," in 3 vols. 4to.; and some other works.—W. B.

LONGBEARD, William, a priest, of great abilities, which he employed against the government. By his eloquence he assembled a large mob in the reign of Richard I. and by calling himself the saviour of the poor, he threatened the royal authority with destruction. After for some time heading a lawless populace, he fled for refuge into St. Mary-le-bonne church, where he was at last overpowered, and then, with nine of his associates, torn to pieces by horses and hung on a gallows, 1196.

LONGEPHERE, Hilary Bernard de, a learned Frenchman, born at Dijon, 1658. He translated into verse, Anacreon, Theocritus, Sappho, Bion and Moschus, and was author of some idyls, and of tragedies after the Greek model, such as Medea, Electra, and Sesostris, the two first of which appeared on the stage. He died 1727.

LONGINUS, Dionysius, a native of Athens, celebrated as a philosopher and critic. After teaching philosophy and rhetoric at Athens, he was invited to become tutor to the children of Zenobia, queen of Palmyra. When the fortunes of Zenobia were ruined, the conqueror Aurelian cruelly ordered the philosopher to be put to death, 273 A.D. His valuable treatise on the Sublime was best edited by Toup, 1778, and translated by Dr. Smith.

LONGLAND, John, a native of Henley, Oxfordshire, educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. He was in 1505 appointed principal of Magdalen hall, in 1514 made dean of Salisbury, and seven years after bishop of Lincoln. It is said that he recommended and enforced the necessity of a divorce between Henry VIII. and Catharine of Arragon. He died 1547. His works appeared in fol. 1532.

LONGOMONTANUS, Christian, the son of a poor labourer, who became an eminent astronomer, and was born at Longomontanum, in Denmark, 1562. His genius was seen and fostered by the minister of his parish, and after spending his time in deep study, and in following the plough, he went without the knowledge of his friends, to Wiburgh, at the age of 15, and there maintained himself by his labour, that he might enjoy more independently the opportunity of study. He was afterwards at Copenhagen, and then became the companion, and the friend of Tycho Brahe for eight years. In 1600 he left this beloved master, and after visiting the spots where Copernicus had made his observations on the stars, he came to Copenhagen, and was in 1605 nominated professor of mathematics in the university, where he died, 1647. He published "Astronomia Danica," folio—Systema Mathematicum, 8vo.—Problemata Geometrica, 4to.—Disputatio Ethica de Animæ Humanæ Morbis, 4to.

LONGUEIL, Gilbert de, a physician of Utrecht. He wrote Remarks on Plautus, Ovid, Nepos, Cicero, Valla, &c. 4 vols. 8vo.; a Greek and Latin Lexicon; a Dialogue on Birds, with their Greek, Latin, and German Names; besides translations of some of Plutarch's lesser works. He died 1543, aged 36.

LONGUEIL, Christopher de, an able scholar, born at Malines, 1490. He was highly favoured by Lewis XII. of France, and by pope Leo X. who engaged him to write against Luther. He wrote besides Latin Commentaries on Pliny's Plants, Observations on the Civil Law, &c. He died at Padua, 1522, aged 34.

LONGUERUE, Lewis, Dufour de, a French abbé, born at Charleville, 1652. He was so early distinguished for application, that at the age of four he was seen and admired by Lewis XIV. as he passed through Charleville. This very learned and amiable man died 1732, aged 80. He wrote a Latin Dissertation on Tatian, 8vo. 1700; a Historical Description of France, folio, 1719; Annales Arsacidarum, 4to. 1732; Remarks on Wolsey's Life; a Dissertation on Transubstantiation, &c.

LONGUEVAL, James, a French Jesuit, born at Peronne. He studied at Amiens and Paris, and wrote History of the French Church, 10 vols.; Dissertation on Miracles; a Treatise on Schism, &c. He died at Paris, 1735, aged 55.

LONGUS, a Greek sophist, author of four pastorals, and of the Loves of Daphnis and Chloe, edited 1660, 4to.

LONI, Alexander, a native of Florence, eminent as a painter. He imitated with success the style of his master Carlo Dolce, and died 1702, aged 47.

LONICERUS, John, a learned German, born at Orthern, Germany. He was professor of languages at Marburg, where he died 1569, aged 70. He compiled a Greek and Latin Lexicon, begun by Melancthon and Camerarius, and published Dioscorides, and other Greek writers.

LONICERUS, Adam, son of the above, was a sagacious physician, who died at Frankfort, 1586. He was author of Methodus Rei Herbariæ, 4to; Historia Naturalis Plantarum, Animalium et Metallorum, 2 vols. fol.; Explicatio Corporis Humani Affectuum; Hortus Sanitatis, &c.

LOON, Theodore Van, a native of Brussels, whose excellent paintings adorn the churches and public buildings of Rome, and of Venice. He was born 1630.

LOREDANO, John Francis, a senator of Venice, learned and ingenious, author of a Life of Adam; History of the Kings of Cyprus; some comedies, &c. collected in six vols. 12mo. He was born 1606, but the time of his death is not known.

LORENZETTI, Ambrogio, a painter of Sienna, a disciple of Giotto, and the first who painted with success, rain, storms, and the effect of winds. He died 1350, aged 83.

LORENZINI, Lawrence, a native of Florence, eminent as a mathematician. He was the pupil of the Viviani, and was recommended for his abilities to the service of Ferdinand, son of the grand duke Cosmo III. but some unfortunate circumstance in his conduct procured his imprisonment in the tower of Volterra. During his confinement of twenty years, he devoted himself to his mathematical studies, and wrote his twelve books on conical and cylindrical sections, in Latin. He died 1721, aged 69.

LORIT, Henry, or GLAREANUS, from Glaris in Switzerland, where he was born, studied at Cologne, Basil, and Paris. He was the friend of Erasmus, and laboured much for the advancement of literature. He died 1563, aged 75. He wrote various dissertations, notes, &c. on classical subjects, and on ancient authors.

LORME, Philibert de, master of the works to the French king, was born at Lyons. He is the architect of the palaces of the Thuilleries and Le Louvres, and other public buildings, which he adorned with great taste and judgment. Though exposed to the satire of the poet Ronsard, he long enjoyed the patronage of the French court, and died 1557. He wrote ten books of architecture, folio, &c.

LORME, John de, a French physician, born at Moulins, 1544. He studied at Montpellier, where he took his degrees, and practised at Forcz, and afterwards became physician to Louisa of Lorraine, wife of Henry III. and to Mary de Medicis, and other branches of the royal family. He was universally esteemed, and, in his old age, retired to his native place, where he died, 1634, aged 90.

LORME, Charles ed, son of the above, was born 1587, and became physician to Lewis XIII. He was fond of literature, which he cultivated with success, and he spared no expense to discover the truth in his experiments and researches. He acquired great celebrity and equal opulence, and died much respected, 1678, aged 91. He was the promoter of a particular ptisan, called "red broth," which proved of great service to thousands. He published "Lauræ Apollinaris," Svo.

LORRAINE, Robert le, an eminent sculptor, born at Paris, November, 1666. His chef-d'œuvre is his Galatea, which he composed when admitted into the academy of sculpture, 1701. He died governor of the academy, June 1st, 1743. He was the intimate friend of the learned of his time, and his statues adorned the gardens of Versailles, Marli, &c.

LORRAINE, Charles of, cardinal and archbishop of Rheims, son of the first duke of Guise, was born 1525. His great abilities were meanly prostituted to the worst purposes of ambition, the love of power and of money. His influence, in the reigns of Henry II. and of Francis II. was almost unlimited, and to his intrigues the war of Italy is totally attributed. He was a man of great eloquence, which he displayed at the council of Trent, and at the conference at Poissy. He died 1574.

LORRIS, William de, author of the "Romance of the Rose," in imitation of Ovid's Art of Love, and other things, was a poet of considerable merit. He died about 1620. The best edition of the Romance is Lenglet's, Amsterdam, 1736, 3 vols. 12mo.

LORRY, Anne Charles, a French physician, born at Crosne, near Paris. He is well known for his Latin Treatises on Melancholy, and its Affections, 2 vols. 8vo. and on the Use of Aliments. He wrote besides a treatise on Cutaneous Diseases, 4to. and edited Dr. Mead's works, &c. He died 1783, aged 58.

LOSA, Isabella, a native of Cordova, so illustrious for her knowledge of Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, that she was honoured with the degree of D.D. When she became a widow she took the habit of St. Clair, and went to Italy, and founded there the hospital of Loretto, where she ended her days in the bosom of devotion and benevolence, 5th March, 1546, aged 73.

LOT, son of Haran, was the nephew of Abraham, with whom he was brought up, and from whom he separated on account of the number of their respective flocks, and the quarrels which arose between their shepherds. He settled at Sodom, from whence he was carried away captive by the king of Edom, till Abraham set him and all his possessions at liberty. When Sodom was about to be destroyed, God, out of mercy to Abraham, spared Lot, and sent an angel to remove him from the sinful city. Lot, with his wife and two daughters, left Sodom before it was destroyed, but his wife, by looking back, contrary to the command of God, was changed into a pillar of salt. His two daughters, by intoxicating him in a cave, where they had taken refuge, defiled him, and from this incestuous intercourse they had the one Moab, and the other Ammon, the progenitors of those two nations which proved so inimical to the Israelites.

LOTEN, John, a Dutch painter, who lived in England. His landscapes were much admired, especially where he represented storms and showers of rain, with trees torn up, and cattle running for shelter. His Views of the Alps, and his craggy rocks, had also great beauty. He died in London, 1681.

LOTHAIRE I. son of Lewis the Debonnaire, was partner on the throne of Germany with his father, 817, and made king of Lombardy three years after. Ungrateful for the confidence and kindness of his father, he revolted against him, and, seizing his person, confined him in a monastery at Soissons. This cruel conduct roused against him his brothers, Charles and Lewis, but though a reconciliation took place after the death of the old emperor, the three brothers appeared in arms against each other. The bloody battle of Fontenai, 841, in which 100,000 men are said to have perished, seemed indecisive, but at last a truce was effected between the unnatural brothers, and the treaty of Verdun, in 843, settled their respective rights. Lothaire obtained the empire, Italy, and the provinces between the Rhine, the Rhone, the Saone, the Maese, and the Scheldt, whilst the rest of the French dominions was partitioned between Lewis and Charles. Ten years after this settlement, Lothaire, dissatisfied with the cares of government, abdicated the crown to retire to a monastery in Ardennes, where he died, six days after his assumption of the monkish habit, 28th September, 885. He was buried at Prum. He left three sons, Lewis, Charles, and Lothaire, among whom he divided his possessions.

LOTHAIRE II. duke of Saxony, son of Gerhard, count of Supplemberg, was elected king of Germany, 1125, after the death of Henry IV. and crowned emperor at Rome, 1135. As he kissed the feet of Innocent II. who crowned him, the popes assumed in consequence a sovereign right over the German empire. He died 4th Dec. 1137, at Bretten, near Trent, leaving no issue.

LOTHAIRE, king of France, son of Lewis

IV. succeeded his father, 954. He made war against the emperor Othó II. and permitted him to hold Lorraine as a fief of the French crown. He died at Compiègne, 2d March, 986, in consequence of poison, said to be administered by his wife Emma, daughter of Lothaire, king of Italy.

LOTHAIRE, king of Lorraine, son of the emperor Lothaire I. abandoned his wife Thietberga, to marry his mistress, Valdrade. Though this measure was countenanced and approved by the councils of Mentz and of Aix la Chapelle, yet the pope Nicholas I. had the spirit to interfere in favour of the injured queen, and compelled, by the influence of his spiritual power, the obedient Lothaire to quit his favourite mistress, for his lawful wife. Lothaire afterwards assisted his brother Lewis I. and pope Adrian II. against the Saracens in Italy, in hopes of obtaining a divorce from his wife, but he was unsuccessful. He died at Placentia, of a violent fever, 7th Aug. 869.

LOUIS I. surnamed the Debonnaire or Feeble, son of Charlemagne and Hildegarde, was born 778, and proclaimed king of France and Emperor of the West, 814. Instead of strengthening his power by union, he weakened it by division, and by making his eldest son Lothaire his associate in the empire, and the two others, Pepin and Louis, kings of Aquitaine and Bavaria, he permitted different interests to prevail in his dominions. Bernard king of Italy, the illegitimate son of Pepin, eldest son of Charlemagne, displeased with the elevation of Lothaire to the throne, took up arms in 818, and was immediately met in the field by Louis, but instead of fighting, the Italian troops fled, and their unfortunate leader threw himself at the feet of his conqueror. Louis refused to spare his suppliant, and he caused his eyes to be put out, an operation which proved fatal. This cruel punishment, inflicted also on some of the partisans of the unhappy Bernard, so offended the clergy and the people, that Louis was restored to the good opinion of his subjects only by doing public penance. His sons afterwards, too sensible of his weakness, rebelled against him and succeeded in withdrawing all his troops from his standard, so that the deserted monarch threw himself into the power of his unnatural children in the plains of Rotleub. Here, instead of compassion, he met with indignity; he was not only imprisoned in a monastery, but obliged to perform public penance at Soissons as a most atrocious delinquent. In sharing the spoils, however, the new kings quarrelled, and Louis, by another revolution, was drawn from his confinement again to fill the throne, but he died soon after, in an island of the Rhine, above Mentz, 20th June, 840, aged 62.

LOUIS II. the Young, eldest son of Lothaire I. was made king of Italy, 844, and in 855 succeeded to the imperial throne. He was a virtuous and benevolent monarch, brave, yet not fond of war, and only anxious to maintain the dignity of the throne, the public prosperity, and the due execution of the laws. He died without male issue, 13th Aug. 875.

LOUIS III. surnamed the Blind, was son of Boson, king of Provence, by Ermengarde daughter of Louis the Younger, and he succeeded to the throne of his father, 890, at the age of 10. He twice defeated Berenger, who disputed with him the succession to the empire, and was crowned at Rome by Benedict IV. but soon after he suffered himself to be surprised by his rival at Verona, who cruelly put out his eyes, and sent him to Provence, where he died, 934.

LOUIS IV. called the Child, succeeded his father the emperor Arnold in 900, though only seven years old. His reign was a scene of desolation and civil war. His dominions were invaded by the Hungarians, whose violence, though repeatedly repressed by large sums of money, at last obliged the timid monarch to fly. He died at Ratisbon, 21st Jan. 911. He was the last emperor of Germany, of the Carlovingian race, and though the laws had settled the succession in the descendants of Charlemagne, such is the effect of revolutions, the imperial crown afterwards became elective.

LOUIS V. called the Fourth, by those who exclude the short reign of the infant Louis from the list of emperors, was son of Louis the Severe, duke of Bavaria, by Matilda, daughter of Rodolphus I. and he was elected emperor at Frankfort, 1314. His elevation was disputed by some of the electors, who declared Frederic the Fair, son of Albert I. emperor, and consecrated him at Cologne, and this unhappy division produced a civil war. After various skirmishes, however, Louis proved victorious, and Frederic, after an imprisonment of three years, renounced his claims to the throne, to recover his liberty. This decision displeased the pope, John XXII. who declared the empire vacant, but Louis no way intimidated, appealed from the pontiff to a general council, and at last, retorting injury for injury, he caused Peter de Corbiere to be elected pope in the room of his enemy. These divisions were still fomented by the conduct of five of the electors who, at the instigation of Clement VI. the new pope, chose Charles of Luxemburg, marquis of Moravia, to fill the throne; but when a new civil war threatened the happiness of Germany, Louis was killed by a fall from his horse in hunting, 11th Oct. 1347.

LOUIS I. king of France. Vid. Louis I. the Debonnaire.

LOUIS II. the Stammerer, was son of Charles the Bald, and succeeded as king of Aquitaine in 867, and to his father as king of France, 877. He was a weak prince, and to ensure tranquillity he yielded up Provence to Boso, who created himself king. He died at Compiègne, 10th April, 879, aged 35, leaving three sons, Louis and Carloman who divided his kingdom among themselves, and Charles, a posthumous son, called afterwards Charles the Simple.

LOUIS III. son of Louis II. shared the kingdom with his brother Carloman, with whom he lived in perfect union, and ably defended himself against the attacks of his enemies. Hugh the Bastard, son of Lothaire, was defeated, Boso was checked in his plans of aggrandizement, and the Normans were routed in the famous battle of Vimeu. Louis died 4th Aug. 882, without children, and Carloman became sole monarch.

LOUIS IV. surnamed Transmarine, because he resided 13 years in England, was son of Charles the Simple, and succeeded Raoul as king of France 936. He was engaged in war with Richard duke of Normandy, and was taken prisoner, but the year after restored to liberty on condition of leaving his antagonist in peaceful possession of Normandy, and of yielding Laon to Hugh le Blanc. In a subsequent war Laon was recovered, but the king soon after was killed by a fall from his horse while hunting. He died 10th Sept. 954, aged 38, and was succeeded by his son Lothaire.

LOUIS V. surnamed the Lazy, succeeded his father Lothaire, 986. He seized upon Rheims, and was vigorously preparing to march against the Saracens, to the relief of the count of Barcelona when he was perfidiously poisoned by his queen Blanche, 21st May, 987. He was the last of the second race of the Carolingian kings, and though the crown at his decease belonged to his uncle Charles duke of Lower Lorraine, he was on account of his unpopularity among the French, rudely dispossessed, and Hugh Capet the most powerful of the French dukes was elected king.

LOUIS VI. called the Big, son of Philip I. and Bertha, succeeded to the throne, 1108. His reign was disturbed by war, and not only foreign enemies invaded his dominions, but he had much to dread from the ambition and the factious spirit of his nobles who each wished to establish themselves into independent princes. His quarrels with Henry I. of England were numerous and frequent, about the possession of Normandy, but these differences did not prevent his attention to the interests of his kingdom. He died at Paris, 1st Aug. 1137, aged 57. He was a wise and popular monarch, benevolent as a man, and impartial as a public magistrate. His judiicious and humane regulations in the government of the people were suggested and improved by the advice of his faithful minister Suger.

LOUIS VII. the Young, son and successor of the preceding, was early engaged in a quarrel with the pope, about the investiture to French bishoprics, for which he was excommunicated by the incensed pontiff Innocent II. and his kingdom laid under an interdict. Regardless of the papal thunders, Louis turned his arms against Theobald III. count of Champagne, who favoured the cause of the pope, and in 1141 he laid one of his towns Vitri, in ashes. This violence was represented by St. Bernard in such odious colours before the eyes of the superstitious monarch, that he was persuaded to take up the cross, and with an army of 80,000 men, he, accompanied by his wife Eleanor, marched into Palestine. He was defeated by the Saracens, and in 1147 obliged to raise the siege of Damascus, and on his return to Europe he had the misfortune to be seized by the Greeks and delivered into the hands of Roger, king of Sicily. Restored to liberty he found his domestic happiness destroyed; by the conduct of his queen, who had disgraced herself by an illicit amour with her uncle Raymond, of Antioch, and with Saladin a young Turk, and to wipe away the dishonour he obtained a divorce, and married Alice the daughter of Theobald his ancient enemy. Eleanor six weeks after took for her husband Henry II. of England, and as she was the heiress of Poitou and Guienne, her dominions became the property of her new lord, and created great dissensions and long wars between the English and the French. Louis died at Paris 18th Sept. 1180, aged 60.

LOUIS VIII. surnamed the Lion, son of Philip Augustus and of Isabella, succeeded his father 1223. He was distinguished by his valour in his father's life-time, and when he ascended the throne he waged successful war against the English, from whom he conquered Limousin, Perigord, Aunis, &c. and afterwards he turned his arms against the Albigenses, and laid siege to Avignon. Though successful he lost the greatest part of his army by disease, and he himself was attacked by the contagious complaint, and died soon after at Montpensier in Auvergne, 8th Nov. 1226, aged 39. By his wife the beautiful Blanche of Castile, he had 11 children, of whom only five sons and one daughter survived him.

LOUIS IX. called Saint, was son of Louis VIII. and Blanche, and succeeded in 1226. His minority was protected by his mother, with wisdom and vigour, and when he attained the age of manhood he pursued the same course of prudent government, eager to maintain the dignity of the crown and ensure the happiness of the subject. He made war against Henry III. of England who supported his revolted nobles, and he twice defeated their confederated forces, and at last made an honourable and advantageous peace. During an illness with which he was attacked in 1244, Louis made a vow that if he recovered he would undertake a crusade, and after a vigorous preparation of four years, he set out on this romantic expedition, leaving the reins of government in the hands of his mother. He landed in Egypt, took Damietta, and crossed the Nile in sight of the Saracens, but though victorious, disease and famine came to thin his ranks. As he attempted to retreat to Damietta in hopes of supplies, he was defeated in a terrible battle, and fell into the hands of the enemy. In his prison he agreed to ransom his army with a large sum of money, and to give up Damietta in exchange for his person, after which he passed into Palestine, and remained there four years. On his return to France he devoted himself to the happiness of his people, justice was administered with impartiality, profaneness and immorality were repressed, and honest industry encouraged. The rights of the church were confirmed in 1269 by a pragmatic sanction, and religion supported by the wisest decrees. After thus promoting the public good, Louis again embarked in 1270 for another crusade, and laid siege to Tunis, in Africa, but the contagious disorder which was so fatal to his troops proved equally fatal to himself. This great and good man died in his camp, 25th Aug. 1270. His remains were conveyed to Paris, and he was canonized by Boniface VIII. 1297.

Louis X. called Hutin, was king of Navarre, in right of his mother Jane, and he succeeded his father Philip the Fair, 1314, as king of France. He recalled the Jews into his kingdom, and made war against the count of Flanders, but was unsuccessful. He died at Vincennes 8th June, 1316, aged 26. He was twice married; by his first wife he left one daughter who succeeded to the throne of Navarre, and his posthumous son by the second wife died soon after his birth. He was succeeded in France by Philip the Long.

Louis XI. son of Charles VII. and Mary of Anjou, was born at Bourges 1423. In his youth he displayed his valour against the English, whom he obliged to retire from the siege of Dieppe 1443, but his conduct towards his father tarnished all his glory. He not only rebelled against him, but showed such animosity, that the aged monarch, afraid of being poisoned by his son, starved himself, and Louis on his death ascended the throne in 1461. So ungrateful a child did not promise a virtuous monarch. Louis regarded his subjects as conquered slaves, and provided he could command their obedience he little regarded their hatred. His oppressions therefore excited the people against his government, and a league was formed against him, supported by the dukes of Berry, Britany, Calabria, and other dissatisfied nobles, and an indecisive battle was fought at Montlheri, 1465. Louis purchased peace by granting to the insurgents all their demands, by the treaty of Conflans, but with the intention of not executing his part. Another war now threatened the country, but Louis by artifice averted the blow, and he caused his own brother, the duke of Berry, whom he had lately made duke of Guienne, to be poisoned. The unsuspecting prince, while courting the daughter of the duke of Burgundy, was presented with a beautiful peach, by his almoner, and in sharing the fruit with his intended bride he prepared his own destruction. The princess died almost immediately, and the duke survived six months. The duke of Burgundy, who some time before had compelled Louis to make a very disadvantageous treaty, now determined to avenge the death of his daughter, and he ravaged by fire and sword the provinces of Picardy and Normandy. Though for a few months the treaty of Bouvines stopped the carnage, a new alliance between the dukes of Burgundy and Britany, and Edward IV. of England, threatened to increase the miseries of France. Louis, however, had the art to intrigue with his formidable enemies; he gained the king of England by bribing his ministers, and promising him a pension; the duke of Britany was reconciled by similar means, and the duke of Burgundy, left without protectors, joined in the general peace at Amiens and Verbins. The death of the duke at the siege of Nancy, 1477, might have stopped all further differences, but Louis imprudently refused to marry his own son to the heiress, whose subsequent union with Maximilian of Austria, son of Frederic III. laid the foundation of war between the French and the Austrians. This new dispute, after some battles, was settled by the peace of Arras, 1482, and cemented by the marriage of the Dauphin with Margaret, daughter of Mary of Burgundy. Soon after, the ambitious monarch was seized with a deep melancholy, and afraid of death he retired to the castle of Plessis-lestours, where none were permitted access to him. Death at last delivered him from the horrors of his terrified imagination, 30th Aug. 1483, in his 60th year. Louis has been deservedly called the Tiberius of France, as in cruelty, malice, and perfidy he equalled the Roman tyrant.

LOUIS XII. surnamed the Just, was son of Charles, duke of Orleans, and Mary of Cleves, and he succeeded Charles VIII. on the throne of France. He took up arms during the weak reign of Charles VIII. supported by other dissatisfied nobles; but the battle of St. Aubin, in 1488, proved fatal to his hopes, and he was made prisoner, and confined with tyrannical severity. The tears and entreaties of his wife Jane, at last procured his deliverance, and in 1498, he obtained the crown, and with heroic magnanimity forgave all the persecutors and enemies of his former privacy. After wise regulations at home, he directed his arms to foreign conquests, and rapidly subdued the Milanese, Genoa, and Naples, and made the king of Naples prisoner; but the successes of Gonsalvo of Corduba turned the tide of affairs and affected the expulsion of the French from Italy, 1503. He afterwards rallied his forces, and again defeated the Genoese and the Venetians, and took possession of Cremona, Padua, and other towns; yet victory again declared against him, and in three months his conquests vanished, and the battle of Navaro, 1513, ruined the French influence in Italy. Instead now of conquering abroad, Louis had to defend his own dominions, as Maximilian the emperor, Henry VIII. and the Swiss, confederated together against him, and in various encounters obliged him to sue for disadvantageous terms of peace. This amiable monarch who, though unfortunate in his foreign expeditions, was beloved by his subjects, and revered as a father, died 1st Jan. 1515, aged 53.

LOUIS XIII. surnamed the Just, son of Henry IV. and Mary de Medicis, ascended the throne 1610, in the ninth year of his age, under the guardianship of his mother. The kingdom weakened by the imprudent measures of the queen regent, saw little prospect of better times when the young king took the reins in his own hands. He was governed by the counsels of Marechal d'Ancre, a proud and ambitious favourite; but after his death, which happened 1617, he showed more vigilance and was reconciled to his mother who had been banished. This was, however, but a momentary calm, the queen took up arms against her son, while on the other hand the Huguenots were leagued on pretence of religion against the throne. Guided now by the advice of the bishop of Luçon, the celebrated Richelieu, Louis evinced vigour in his measures, and Rochelle, though relieved by the English and defended by the heroic conduct of the brave mother of the duke of Rohan, at last yielded and ruined the hopes of the protestant insurgents. From Rochelle Louis marched to the assistance of the duke of Mantua, and by a successful campaign, and the treaty of Susa, 1631, he established him in the possession of his dominions. On his return to France, Louis found himself exposed to the intrigues of his brother Gaston of Orleans, who was jealous of the influence of Richelieu, but the projects of this powerful subject were defeated at Castelnaudari, and Montmorency the governor of Languedoc who had supported him was tried and beheaded at Toulouse. A new war soon after broke out against Spain, and the emperor, and for many years desolated the kingdom without enriching the monarch, or enlarging his dominions. But while Richelieu excited discontent and discord in Europe more for views of ambition than to serve his master, a sudden attack hurried him and Louis to their grave. The cardinal died on the 4th Dec. 1642, and Louis, 4th May following, aged 42.

LOUIS XIV. surnamed the Great, was son of Louis XIII. by Anne of Austria, and was born 5th Sept. 1638, after the sterility of the queen for 22 years. He was only four years old when he succeeded his father, and his minority was governed by his mother, who received all her advice and instructions from her favourite cardinal Mazarin. The war was continued against the emperor, and the Spaniards, and Louis saw his arms victorious at Rocroy, under the duke of Enghein, and in Catalonia under la Mothe. The campaign of 1644 added Thionville, Barlemon, Philipsburg, Mayence, Worms, Manheim, and other towns to the French dominions, and in 1645, fresh conquests awaited Louis in Flanders, Artois, Lorraine, and Catalonia. The Swedish general Torstenson in alliance with France defeated the Imperialists in Bohemia, Turenne took Treves, and d'Enghein after the battle of Nortlingen made himself master of Furnes, Dunkirk, and Ypres, and defeated the archduke in 1648, in the plains of Lens. These glorious events, crowned by the defeat of the Spanish fleet on the coast of Italy, were stopped by the peace of Munster, between France, the emperor, the Swedes, and the German states, and Louis saw added to his domains by this treaty, Metz, Toul, Verdun, Alsace, Brisach, and Pignerol. Though victorious abroad, however, Louis was unpopular at home, in consequence of the general odium excited against the queen-mother and Mazarin, and he was obliged to fly from the capital to avoid that factious spirit which the arts of the duke of Beaufort and Condé had kindled. The Spaniards in the mean time profiting by this dissension invaded Champagne, Lorraine, and Catalonia, though repulsed by the arms of the French. In 1651, Louis declared himself of age, and the flight of Mazarin seemed to promise the restoration of tranquillity, but his return to power the next year again raised a ferment in the kingdom, and his enemy Condé ventured to attack the royal army which he defeated under d'Hocquincourt at Bleneau, though soon after he was taken prisoner. In the midst of these civil broils the archduke Leopold took Gravelines and Dunkirk, John of Austria seized Barcelona, and the duke of Mantua Casal, but the restoration of internal tranquillity soon tended to the recovery of these places, and in 1654, Turenne defeated the Spaniards at Quesnoy, and raised the siege of Arras. Success continued to attend the French arms, and Bourbourg, Mardick, Dixmude, and other towns were conquered, till at last in 1659, the treaty of the Pyrenees restored peace to the two nations, and as one of the articles of the reconciliation made the infant Maria Theresa queen of France. The death of Mazarin in 1661, now changed the face of affairs; and Louis, who had hitherto paid little attention to business, took the reins into his own hands. A new order of things began therefore to appear; the superintendent Fouquet was banished for peculation, and Colbert, a man of vast powers of mind, was called to direct the destinies of France. Under his administration commerce began to flourish, the arts were patronised, industry every where was encouraged, and the academies of painting, of sculpture, and of the sciences, were erected to improve the taste of the nation. Colonies were planted in Madagascar and at Cayenne; and while discipline was restored to the armies, and subordination in the marine, the extremities of the world were visited by men of talents in search of science; and the learned of foreign nations found in Louis and in his virtuous minister a patron and a friend. In the war between England and Holland Louis supported the cause of his allies the Dutch, but the peace of Breda in 1667 restored tranquillity to the continent. On the death of Philip IV. father of his queen, Louis laid claim to his dominions, and especially to the Low Countries, which he invaded with an army. The chief places of the Netherlands soon submitted to his power, but the rapidity of his conquests alarmed the powers of Europe, and England, Sweden, and Holland soon combined to oppose his career. The peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1668 gave to Spain Franche Compté, but assured to France her conquests in the Low Countries. Though employed in fortifying his frontier towns, as well as in encouraging learning and industry among all his subjects, Louis did not lay aside the plans of his ambitious heart. In 1672 he attacked Holland, and after taking above 40 places on the Rhine he crossed that river, and seized upon Gueldres and Utrecht, but his conquests were stopped by the inundation with which the terrified Dutch overwhelmed their country. The states of Europe too were indignant at his gigantic schemes, and the empire, Prussia, and Spain, united to arrest his progress, but the treaty of Nimeguen checked the victories of the great Turenne, and restored peace to the continent. Proud of his triumphs, and flattered by the title of Great, which his subjects bestowed on him in 1680, Louis again directed his attention to the improvement of his kingdom; the canal of Languedoc was completed, the ports of Toulon, Brest, Dunkirk, Havre-de-Grace, and Rochefort, were enlarged and beautified; and by the establishment of cadets, the foundations of future military glory were laid. Algiers, whose corsairs had insulted the French commerce, was bombarded in 1684, by Du Quesne, and reduced to submission; and the Genoese, who had sold powder to the pirates and supported them, claimed forgiveness by sending their doge and four senators to Versailles. But these glorious measures were tarnished by the imprudence and cruelty of the monarch, who in a thoughtless hour revoked the edict of Nantes, by which Henry IV. had granted toleration to protestants; and thus by one stroke of the pen he banished 50,000 families from his kingdom into foreign countries, and with them the arts, the manufactures, and the treasures of France. The league of Augsburg in 1687 was formed between the duke of Savoy, the electors of Bavaria and Brandenburg, and the prince of Orange, to which the emperor and the king of Spain were soon united. Though Louis opposed this formidable confederacy by a powerful army under the dauphin, his son, who took Philipsburg, and reduced every place between Basil and Coblenz, yet the enemy soon poured superior numbers into the field, and made the French retreat. The campaign of 1690 was more successful for Louis. Marshal Luxembourg defeated the prince of Waldeck at Fleurus, Catinat conquered Nice, Susa, and Villefranche, and routed the troops of Savoy, and the following year Mons, Valencia, Carmagnole, and Montmelian were added to the French conquests. In 1692 the defeat of the French fleet under Tourville, off Cape la Hogue, by admiral Russel, was counterbalanced on land by the fall of Namur, which Louis took in person. Luxembourg afterwards gained the battle of Steinkerque, and the next year that of Nerwinden. In 1695 Casal fell, and the next year the duke of Savoy, tired of the war, and terrified at the approach of Catinat, who was only six miles from Turin, made peace with France; and the following year hostilities ceased among all the confederates by the treaty of Ryswick. The death of Charles

II. of Spain without children, unhappily renewed again hostilities; and when the duke of Anjou, grandson of the French monarch, assumed the title of king, agreeable to the will of the Spanish prince, under the name of Philip V. the powers of Europe rose up to defend the claims of the archduke Charles to the vacant throne. Eugene, at the head of the imperial forces in Italy in 1702, conquered the country between the Adige and the Adda; and in the North, Marlborough in 1704 gained the great battle of Hochstet, and totally cut in pieces the French army under Tallard and Marchin. In 1705 France conquered Nice and Villefranche, and defeated Eugene at Cassano, while on the other hand Barcelona and Gironne submitted to the allies. Villeroy lost the battle of Ramilies against Marlborough, and Ghent, Ostend, Antwerp, and other towns were snatched from the French dominions. Success continued to attend the allies; Alcantara and Madrid fell into their hands, and the Milanese and Modena were subdued; but in 1707 the battle of Almanza was gained by the French, and the squadrons of Forbin and Duguay Trouin were successful at sea. The campaigns of 1708 and 1709 were disastrous to the French arms; the victory of Oudenarde was followed by the fall of Tournay, and the battle of Malplaquet; and Louis, disheartened by his misfortunes, sued for peace, and even offered money to the allies to enable them to dethrone his grandson. The pride of the allies continued the war, and the success of Villiers, who forced the camp of Denain, and the taking of Douay, Quesnoy, and Bouchain, reanimated the French monarch, whose spirits domestic calamities, as well as public disasters, had broken down. The treaty of Utrecht was at last signed 1713 with the allies, and proved more favourable to France than she expected; and the following year peace was concluded with the empire at Radstadt. Louis died soon after, 1st Sept. 1715, aged 77, in the 73d year of his reign; during which he had seen four kings in Sweden, four in Denmark, five in Poland, five in Portugal, three in Spain, four in England, three emperors, and nine popes. Louis, by his first wife, had one son, the dauphin, who died 1711, leaving three sons, Louis, Philip, and Gaston, and by his mistresses he had several natural children. The character of this monarch is entitled to praise. Though fond of military glory, and too often awake to the voice of flattery, he yet had the sagacity to discern merit, and to patronise virtue. His reign is as illustrious for great names in literary pursuits and in science, as for able characters in the field and in the cabinet. Though unhappily too much given to sensual pleasures in the midst of a voluptuous court, yet Louis sought for friendship, and the reciprocity of kindness; and in the last part of his life he became penitent, serious, and devout, by the influence of his mistress, Madame de Maintenon, whom, it is said, he privately married.

Louis XV. son of the duke of Burgundy, was born 15th Feb. 1710, and in 1715 succeeded his great-grandfather, Louis XIV. as king of France. Philip, duke of Orleans, was appointed his guardian, and he laboured earnestly to restore the impaired finances of the kingdom, but the schemes of Law, and the Mississippi projects brought desolation and ruin upon above 100,000 families in France. In 1723 the king was declared of age, and the affairs of the kingdom, after passing into the hands of Dubois, were intrusted, after Orleans' death, to the care of the duke of Bourbon, as prime minister. In 1725 the king married Mary, the daughter of Stanislaus, nominal king of Poland, and cardinal Fleury succeeded to the disgraced and unpopular Bourbon in the management of public affairs. The death of Augustus, king of Poland, in 1733, was fatal to the peace of Europe; Louis supported the pretensions of his father-in-law, and was opposed by the emperor of Germany, who upheld the claims of the elector of Saxony. The French troops were successful in Italy, but in 1738 a treaty restored tranquillity; and while Stanislaus renounced the throne of Poland, he was permitted to retain the title of king, and to become duke of Lorraine and Bar, which, after his death, were to descend to France. On the death of the emperor, Charles VI. in 1740, new dissensions arose, and Louis, who had guaranteed the pragmatic sanction, and the succession of Maria Theresa, very dishonourably united with Prussia and Poland to place the duke of Bavaria, Charles Albert, on the imperial throne. Thus protected, the new monarch quickly seized Passau and Prague, and caused himself to be crowned king of Bohemia, and emperor; but his triumph was of short duration; the conquered towns were recaptured, and the battle of Dettingen, in 1743, gained by the allies, shattered all his hopes. Though Louis appeared at the head of his armies in 1744, and took Courtray, Menin, Ypres, and Friburg, and witnessed the defeats of Fontenoy and Lawfeld, and the conquests of Ghent, Ostend, Brussels, Brabant, Bergenop-Zoom, and other places, yet he found reverses in Italy and Provence. His commerce was ruined by the English, and the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748, was welcomed by all the powers of Europe. In 1755 a new war was kindled between England and France about their possessions in Canada, and while Prussia supported the English, the emperor declared himself in favour of Louis. At the first the French were very successful; Portmahon surrendered to their arms, Galissonniere obtained some advantage over the English fleet, the duke of Cumberland was defeated at Hastenback, and the English army submitted to a disgraceful capitulation at Closterseven. The conquest of Hanover, however, was followed by the defeat of the French forces at Rosbach, by the king of Prussia, in 1757, and they experienced another loss at the battle of Crevelt, in 1758. The next year Broglie defeated the allies at Bergen, near Frankfort; but after various disasters on both sides, the rival powers grew tired of the war; and though the famous family compact, joining in one bond of union all the branches of the house of Bourbon, seemed to promise much, it contributed little to the glory of France; and Spain lost Havanna, Cuba, and the Philippines. At last a treaty of peace was signed in 1763, by which England acquired great additions to her colonies; and the succeeding years presented little interesting in the history of France, except the conquest of Corsica, and the final banishment of the Jesuits from the country. In May, 1774, Louis was attacked a second time by the small-pox, which proved fatal on the 10th of that month. He was then 65 years old, and had reigned upwards of 59. Louis was a weak character, and though possessed of some good qualities of heart, he suffered himself too patiently to be governed by his favourites and his mistresses. He wrote a book on the course of the principal Rivers of Europe, 8vo. He had two sons and eight daughters by his wife.

Louis XVI. son of the dauphin, and of Mary Josephine, of Saxony, the daughter of Frederic Augustus, king of Poland, was born 23d August, 1754, and in consequence of the death of his father, 1765, he exchanged the title of duke of Berry for that of dauphin, and ascended the throne of France on the death of his grandfather, 1774. His union with Marie Antoinette, of Austria, in 1770, was attended by the unfortunate death of above 4000 persons, who had assembled to behold the public rejoicings at Paris. On the day of his elevation to the crown, the young monarch, as if foreboding the miseries which awaited him, exclaimed, O my God, how unfortunate for me! Nevertheless, to repair the misconduct of his predecessors, and to meet the exigencies of an exhausted treasury, a ruined commerce, a shattered marine, and the discontents of a nation loaded with taxes, the new king called around him ministers of credit and ability. Vergennes took the charge of foreign affairs, Turgot presided over the finances, Malherbes became counsellor of state, Sartine directed the affairs of the marine, and Maurepas was made prime minister. The first act of his reign endeared Louis to his people, and he nobly remitted the tribute which was expected on the accession of a new monarch. Already abuses began to be redressed, the exiled parliament was recalled, and commerce and industry began to recover their usual activity, but unfortunately the American war broke out. Eager to humble England by assisting her revolted colonies, the ministers of Louis pursued a course which was to prove fatal to their master, and disastrous to Europe. By supporting the Americans, they kindled a dreadful war against England, which, while it separated the colonies from the mother country, increased, in a more intolerable degree, the debts of France, and the miseries of her subjects. To repair the ruined finances proved too mighty a labour for the abilities of Colonne, and the cardinal de Brienne, wishing to gain by violence what his predecessor sought by persuasion, laid severe imposts, which the poverty of the people, and the dissatisfaction of the great, could not discharge. The parliament of Paris was exiled to Troyes, for refusing to register these unpopular taxes; and when recalled by the fatal moderation of the monarch, they, instead of complying, called for the meeting of the states general of the kingdom, to assist in the difficulties of the government. Obedient to the general voice of the people, Louis convoked the states general, which met at Versailles, 5th May, 1789. But while the three orders, the nobles, the clergy, and the commons, disputed which should be exempted from contributing to the burdens of the state, dissension arose between them, and instead of labouring earnestly all for the public good, each sought the aggrandizement of his own order, and listened to the voice of the factious and the intriguing. The troops which surrounded Paris gave offence to the deputies; and at the voice of the hypocritical democrat, Mirabeau, the people of Paris arose, and on the 14th July, 1789, they seized the Bastile, and after the most atrocious barbarities, bid defiance to the government. Though the mild character of the monarch, and the hesitating measures of his ministers, seemed to promise every concession, the factious leaders of the populace determined to attempt new crimes. On the 5th of October following, an armed multitude, with women of the most abandoned and ferocious character, set out from Paris for Versailles. The guards of the palace were murdered, the doors of the apartments were broken open, and the bed, from which the unhappy queen scarce could escape, was pierced through with a thousand stabs. The monarch, surrounded by his terrified family, was with difficulty spared, but it was to suffer new indignities.

He was immediately hurried to Paris, preceded by the insulting cavalcade; while around his carriage were presented on pikes, with the grossest exclamations, the heads of his faithful servants who had been murdered in defence of his person. Placed as a prisoner in the palace of the Thuilleries, he made every sacrifice which could restore tranquillity; and on the 14th Feb. 1790, he gave his assent to the new constitution, which reduced his power to a mere shadow. Notwithstanding these humiliating concessions, he was still insulted; murder and insurrection still continued, or rather were encouraged; and at the last, tired of a situation which left him no prospect of liberty, the monarch escaped privately from Paris, 21st June, 1791, and nearly reached the frontiers of France. His person, however, was recognised at Varennes, and he was brought back to Paris to endure fresh indignities. Though treated with seeming respect by the national assembly, the insults of the populace were not checked, and on the 20th June, 1792, a ferocious mob forced its way to the palace, and threatened the destruction of the royal family. Louis, undismayed, presented himself to these barbarians, and for two hours, disarmed them of their murderous fury, till Petion, with hypocritical marks of respect, came to liberate the monarch from this perilous situation. The events of this day warned Louis of his approaching fate, and it is said, that now he began to write his will, and to prepare himself for death. The declaration of war by the emperor and Prussia against France, and the threats of the duke of Brunswick, and his invasion of Champagne, roused more powerfully the resentment of the mob, as they were taught, by their flagitious leaders, that these measures were dictated by their imprisoned monarch. In the midst of these events, with a victorious enemy approaching the capital, and an ungovernable multitude thirsting for blood, the 10th of August, still more terrible than all others, came; the tocsin was sounded, the Thuilleries attacked, and the faithful Swiss guards murdered in every avenue of the palace. Already the cannon was pointed against the apartments of the monarch, when he was persuaded to fly for safety to the hall of the assembly, and though often interrupted by the sight of heaps of slain, by the shrieks of the dying, and by the outrageous insults of the mob, he reached this spot, where he heard his name treated with studied indignity, his power suspended, and his sentence of imprisonment pronounced. Confined in one of the towers of the Temple, he for some time was permitted to enjoy the soothing company of his family; but as his tyrants increased in power, they decreased in compassion and humanity. The convention succeeded the assembly, and they not only decreed the abolition of royalty in France, but they proclaimed the necessity of trying their fallen monarch. Depicted, in the speeches of this vile assembly, as a tyrant and a traitor, Louis had no mercy to expect from such perjured judges. Though deprived of pen and paper, and of every means by which he might have prepared himself, he appeared with his usual serenity before this murderous tribunal, and in his answers to interrogatories, he maintained the dignity of the monarch, and the firmness of the Christian. Though thus insulted, yet an apparent show of candour in the convention, permitted his faithful ministers, Malesherbes, Tronchet, and Deseze, to appear at their bar as his defenders; but neither the tears nor the venerable appearance of these aged and illustrious men, nor the present misfortunes of the past greatness, and the well known innocence of Louis, could avail. On the 17th Jan. 1793, he was condemned to death, but only by a majority of five voices. He heard of his fate with composure and resignation; but his parting with the queen and with his family, was tender and affecting beyond the power of description. On the 21st he was conveyed to the scaffold, attended by M. Edgeworth, a catholic priest, and on the fatal spot he attempted to address the multitude which surrounded him, but the beating of drums drowned his voice. As he placed himself on the machine, his confessor fervently exclaimed, O son of St. Louis, ascend to heaven, and that moment his head was severed from his body. His remains were conveyed to the churchyard of St. Magdalen, and immediately consumed in quicklime. He left a son, who in history bears the name of Louis XVII. and as if to offer new indignity to a throne that had crumbled to the dust, this young prince, aged eight, was intrusted to the care of Simon, a shoe-maker, and died soon after from the rude treatment he received, or as some suppose, from poison. His daughter, after seeing the murder of her parents, and of her aunt, was exchanged with Austria for the deputies detained by the imperialists, and she married her cousin, the duke of Angouleme. Louis, regarded as a monarch, but not contemplated with the misfortunes which closed his life, must be acknowledged to be a virtuous and amiable man. His letters display the goodness of a benevolent heart, attached to religion, anxious to do good, and eager to maintain integrity and uprightness. If as a monarch he had possessed greater resolution, and more firm consistency of character, he might have averted the miseries which awaited him; and instead of marching to a scaffold, he might have upheld the honour of the throne, repressed insurrection, and restored the kingdom to tranquillity, happiness, and prosperity.

LOUIS I. called the Pious, king of Germany, was third son of Louis the Debonnaire, and was proclaimed king of Bavaria, 817. He joined his brother Charles the Bald, and at the battle of Fontenai defeated his half brother Lothaire, 841, and rendered himself powerful and formidable to his neighbours. He died at Frankfort, 28th Aug. 876, aged 70.

LOUIS II. son of the preceding, and his successor on the throne of Germany, defeated his uncle Charles the Bald, and died at Frankfort, 20th Jan. 882.

LOUIS III. king of Germany, vid. LOUIS III. emperor.

LOUIS I. of Anjou, king of Hungary and Poland, succeeded Charles II. 1342, and after expelling the Jews from his kingdom, he made war against the Transylvanians, the Croats, Tartars, and Venetians, and was elected king of Poland, after his uncle Casimir, 1370. He died at Tirnanu, 12th Sept. 1382, aged 57, leaving two daughters, one of whom, Mary, inherited Hungary, and the other, Hedwige, married Ladislaus, king of Poland.

LOUIS II. was king of Hungary after his father Ladislaus, 1516, and was defeated by the Turks under Solyman, at Mohatz, 1526. He was drowned in a marsh, as he fled from the field of battle, 29th August, aged 22.

LOUIS, prince of Tarentum, nephew of Robert, king of Sicily, married Jane, the queen of Naples, and after the invasion, and the defeat of the Hungarians, was crowned king of Naples, 1352. He died 25th May, 1362.

LOUIS I, duke of Anjou, second son of John, king of France, was regent of the kingdom during the minority of his nephew Charles VI. He afterwards attempted to gain possession of the kingdom of Naples, left him by the will of queen Jane, but could not succeed. He died of a broken heart in consequence of the ill success of his measures, at Paris, 20th Sept. 1384.

LOUIS, Antony, secretary of the academy of surgeons at Paris, and member of that of sciences, became one of the most intelligent anatomists of Europe. He was born at Metz, and died of a dropsy, 20th May, 1792, aged 69. He was a man of great integrity, as well as of extensive knowledge in the medical profession. He wrote a Course of Practical Surgery on Gunshot Wounds, 4to.—Essay on the Nature of the Soul and its Union with the Body, 12mo.—Observations on Electricity, and its Effects on the Animal Economy, 12mo.—Observations on the Effects of the Cancerous Virus, 12mo.—Refutations of Combalusier—Positions Anatomico-chirurgicæ de Capite, 4to.—de Partium Externarum Genera- ratione in Mulieribus, 4to.—Eloges de Bas-suel, Molavia, et Verdier—Dissertatio de Apoplexia curanda, and other medical works.

LOVE, James, an actor, whose real name was Dance, the son of Mr. Dance, the city surveyor, and the ungraceful architect of the London mansion-house. He was educated at Westminster school, and Cambridge, but took no degree. He expected patronage from Walpole, in consequence of his answering an attack against the minister, but was disappointed, and at last turned his thoughts to the stage. He was on the Dublin and Edinburgh theatres, and appeared at Drury-lane, 1762. His Falstaff was much admired, till eclipsed by the better acting of Henderson. He died 1774. He wrote Pamela, a comedy, 1742, and some other dramatic pieces.

LOVE, Christopher, rector of St. Anne's, Aldersgate, and St. Laurence, Jewry, and author of 3 vols. of sermons, was accused of correspondence with the king against Cromwell's government. He was condemned, and lost his head, July, 1651, though several parishes, and 54 ministers interested themselves in his behalf.

LOVELACE, Richard, an English poet, born at Woolridge, in Kent, 1618, and educated at the Charter-house, and Gloucester hall, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. 1636. He embraced the cause of the king during the civil wars, and was a great sufferer for his loyalty. The persecutions which he endured, and the poverty to which he was reduced, at last brought on melancholy, and produced a consumption. He died in a very poor lodging, Gunpowder-alley, Shoe-lane, 1658, and was buried in St. Bride's church. His poetry was very spirited and elegant. He wrote, besides poems, two plays, the Scholar, a comedy—and the Soldier, a tragedy.

LOVELACE, Francis, governor of New-York, under the duke of York, succeeded Richard Nicholls in May, 1667. He continued in office until the surrender of the colony to the Dutch in 1673, when he was ordered to depart from the province, and return to England. He was a man of great moderation, and his administration was quiet and happy, but was distinguished by no transaction of great importance. The most memorable act which took place under it was the purchase of Staten-Island from the natives.  L.

LOVELACE, John, lord baron of Hurley, governor of New-York, arrived in the colony in December, 1708, as the successor of lord Cornbury. He died on the 5th of May following. He was succeeded in the barony of Hurley by Navil, his son, who dying July 28, 1736, the title became extinct. He had a daughter married into the family of the earl of Strafford.  L.

LOVIBOND, Edward, an English poet, born in Middlesex, and educated at Kingston school. Besides an elegant collection of poems, published 1785, he contributed several papers to the periodical newspaper, called the World, and he died at his house near Hampton, 1775.

LOUPTIERE, John Charles de Relongue de la, of the Arcadian academy at Rome, was born at Louptiere, in the diocese of Sens, and died 1784, aged 57. He wrote a collection of poems, 2 vols. 8vo. which possess spirit, ease, and delicacy; besides the six first parts of the Journal des Dames, 1761.

LOUVET, Peter, a native of Reinville, near Beauvais, was master of requests to queen Margaret, and died 1646. He wrote the History and Antiquities of Beauvais, 2 vols. 8vo.—Nomenclatura et Chronologia Rerum Ecclesiast. Dioc. Bellovæ, 8vo.—Remarques sur la Noblesse Beauvoisine et plusieurs Familles de la France, 8vo. in a style not very elegant.—A physician of Beauvais bore also that name, and was professor at Montpellier, 1680. He wrote various works on the history of Provence and Languedoc, &c. possessing little merit.

LOUVET DE COUVRAY, John Baptist, a native of Poitou, author of a licentious work, the Amours of Faublas. During the revolution he was an active member of the convention, and though proscribed in 1793 he had the art to escape the guillotine. As the editor of the Sentinelle, he acquired popularity with the vulgar; and he soon had the boldness to accuse Robespierre, surrounded with his satellites, and by his firmness to overturn the tyrant. He is praised for the steadiness of his principles; and Madame Roland says of him, that he was courageous as a lion, and simple as a child. He died at Paris, 25th Aug. 1797, of an asthmatic disorder, as he was going consul to Palermo. Besides his Faublas, and his Sentinelle, he wrote, Paris justifié, 8vo. 1789—Emilie de Vermont, ou le Divorce necessaire, 3 vols. 12mo. 1794—Notice pour le Recit de mes Dangers, 1795, 8vo.

LOUVILLE, Eugene d'Allonville, Chevalier de, a native of Beauce, of a noble family, who served, as colonel of dragoons, Philip V. of Spain. At the peace of Utrecht he devoted himself to mathematics and astronomy, and after making observations at Marseilles, he came to London, 1715, to see with greater effect, the total eclipse of the sun. While in England he was made member of the Royal Society of London, as he had before been of the Academy of Sciences, at Paris. He afterwards fixed his residence near Orleans, and devoted himself to astronomical pursuits. He died there, of a fever, at the end of 1732, aged 61. He wrote various curious dissertations, inserted in the memoirs of the academy, &c.

LOWE, Peter, a Scotch surgeon, who for 22 years was in foreign service, in Flanders and France. He afterwards settled at Glasgow, 1612, and was empowered by the king to examine all persons who wished to practise surgery in the western parts of the kingdom. He wrote some books on his profession.

LOWELL, John, LL.D. judge of the United States' circuit court, was born at Newbury, in 1744, and graduated at Harvard college in 1760. He studied law, and soon after entering on its practice, rose by his superior abilities and integrity to distinction. In 1761 he removed to Boston, and distinguished himself as a representative of the town in the general court, and in the convention which formed the constitution, by his political knowledge and eloquence. In 1781 he was elected a member of congress, and the next year appointed by that body a judge of the court of appeals from the courts of admiralty of the states; and on the establishment of the federal government a judge of the United States' circuit court, in which situations he was highly respected for his legal knowledge, candour, and dignity. He died on the 6th of May, 1802.

LOWEN, John Frederick, a native of Klansthal, who wrote a collection of poems, printed at Hamburgh, 1765—Romances, printed at Leipsic, 1774, a valuable work. He died at Rostock, 1773, aged 44.

LOWER, Sir William, a loyalist, under Charles I. born at Tremare, in Cornwall. When his master's affairs were ruined, he retired to Holland, and applied himself to literature. He formed the plan of the four of the six plays which he has written in the manner of Corneille and Quinault, his favourite authors. He died 1662.

LOWER, Richard, son to the above, was a physician, educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, and instructed in medical and anatomical knowledge, by Dr. Willis. He settled in London, and practised with great reputation. His books, "De Corde," "Et de Motu et Colore Sanguinis, et Chyli in Eum Transitu," are much admired. He practised the transfusion of blood from one animal to another. He died 1691. Some of his papers appear in the philosophical transactions.

LOWMAN, Moses, for upwards of 40 years dissenting minister of a congregation at Clapham, Surrey, was well skilled in Jewish history and antiquities. He died 1752, aged 72. He wrote a valuable book on Revelation—a tract, now scarce, proving mathematically the Unity and Perfection of God à priori—and after his death appeared his three treatises on the Shechinah and Logos.

LOWNDES, William, LL.D. a native of South Carolina, was for several years a representative from that state in congress, and one of the most eloquent and influential members of that body. He sustained no other appointment of importance, but his splendid talents, wisdom, moderation, eloquence, and devotedness to the duties of his station, gave him a rank among the most able and useful statesmen of the nation. In private life he was amiable, modest, and blameless. Owing to the decline of his health he resigned his seat in congress in 1822, and embarked for Europe, but died on his passage, Oct. 27th.  L.

LOWTH, William, B.D. a learned divine, born in St. Martin's parish, Ludgate, London, 11th Sept. 1661. He was first educated under his grandfather, the rector of Tilehurst, Berks, and then sent to Merchant-tailors' school, where he so distinguished himself, that at 14 he was elected to St. John's, Oxford. His great merit recommended him to bishop Mew, of Winchester, who made him his chaplain, and gave him a prebend in his cathedral, and the rectory of Buriton, with the chapel of Petersfield, Hants. This worthy and exemplary clergyman died 1732, and was buried in the churchyard, Buriton, leaving three daughters and two sons. He is the author of Commentaries on all the Prophets, first published 4to. afterwards folio—a Vindication of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Old and New Testaments, 12mo. in answer to Le Clerc—Directions for the profitable reading of the Scriptures—sermons, &c.—the character of an Apostolical Church, &c. which engaged him in a controversy with a dissenting minister of Portsmouth, called Norman.

LOWTH, Robert, a learned prelate, son of the above, born in the Close, Winchester, 8th Dec. 1710. He was educated at Winchester school, and passed to New college, Oxford, where he soon began to display the native powers of his ardent mind. In 1741 he was elected Hebrew professor of poetry, and in that character delivered his admirable lectures, "De Sacra Poesi Hebræorum," published 4to. afterwards in 8vo. and edited with additions, by Michaelis, in Germany. His great reputation recommended him to the duke of Devonshire, who appointed him tutor to his son, marquis Hartington, and with whom he made the tour of Europe. In 1750 he was appointed archdeacon of Winchester, by bishop Hoadly, and in 1754 he was honourably created by diploma D.D. by the university of Oxford. In 1755 he went as chaplain to his pupil, now lord lieutenant of Ireland, and there soon obtained the bishopric of Limerick, which he afterwards exchanged for a prebend of Durham. His "Life of William of Wykeham," appeared in 1758. In 1766 he was made bishop of St. David's, two months after translated to Oxford, and in 1777 to London. On the death of Cornwallis, the primate, 1783, he was offered the archiepiscopal chair, which his infirmities obliged him to decline. His domestic peace had been deeply wounded by the death of his eldest daughter, in 1768, on whose grave at Cuddesdon he inscribed those beautiful and pathetic verses, beginning with "Cara, vale," &c. and his other daughter died suddenly, 1783, while presiding at his tea-table, and in conversation with bishop Newton. This truly venerable prelate and most amiable man died 3d Nov. 1787, aged nearly 77. He published, besides "Isaiah," translated from the Hebrew, a most masterly performance—an English Grammar, universally esteemed—a Poem on the Genealogy of Christ—some Controversial Papers with Warburton—Occasional Sermons, &c.—His father's life, for the Biogr. Britan.

LOYER, Peter le, a native of Anjou, author of a curious History of Spectres, 4to.—Edom, or the Idumean Colonies in Europe and Asia, 8vo. and other works, in verse and prose. He died at Angers, 1634, aged 84.

LOYOLA, Ignatius of, the founder of the order of the Jesuits, was born of a respectable family at Loyola in the province of Guipusecoa, in Spain, 1491. The early part of his life was spent in the military service, and in a conspicuous manner, but when his leg was broken by a cannon-ball, at the siege of Pampeluna, 1521, he made a vow to renounce the world, to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and to devote himself to the service of God. He dedicated his arms to the Virgin at Montserrat, and hanged them on her altar, and began his career of devotion by the most severe mortifications. He embarked at Barcelona, and after obtaining the pope's blessing at Rome, he proceeded to Jerusalem, and after many extraordinary visions, and miraculous adventures, he returned to Barcelona. In 1524, he, it is said, began to study the rudiments of Latin grammar, but the wise rules contained in the Enchiridion of Erasmus, were soon laid aside for the reveries of Thomas à Kempis. He now became so popular among his followers, that he was thrown into the prison of the inquisition, and escaped only upon promise of not publishing his opinions for four years. From Spain he passed to Paris, 1528, and there gained some converts, but the number of those who wished to bind themselves to the austerities of a new mode of life, amounted only to seven, and afterwards to ten. These religious men at last met one another from various quarters, at Venice, 1537, and there bound themselves by five rules, which inculeated the duties of self-mortification, and of charity, and enforced the precepts and practice of virtue, and laboured assiduously without the hope of reward, for the glory of God. They called themselves, therefore, the Society of Jesus, and soon their zeal was increased by the sanction of Paul III. who confirmed the order in 1540, on condition that their members should not exceed 60, and in 1543, without restriction. Loyola was deservedly created general of this new order, and his companions quickly spread themselves over the world to convert infidels and heretics, and to promote the cause of virtue and piety. His order was again confirmed 1550 by Julius III. and he then wished to resign his office as general, but was prevented by the affection of his followers. He died 31st July, 1556, aged 66, 35 years after his conversion, and 16 after the foundation of his society. Before his death he had the satisfaction to know that his zealous associates were respected all over the world, and gave laws wherever they appeared. He was canonized 1609, and then all the miracles of the apostolic ages were said to have been wrought by the influence of his superior sanctity. In 1622 his name was inserted by Gregory XV. among the saints, and greater honours were decreed to his memory by Innocent X. and Clement IX. The Jesuits, so inconsiderable in their origin, grew to an astonishing number: at the death of their founder, 1556, they amounted to 10,581, and in 1679 to 17,655. The causes which contributed to their increase were, besides the great patronage of Rome, of Spain, and Portugal, the wish to convert the newly discovered territories of America to the Christian faith, and in Europe, to oppose the progress of Lutheranism, and no order of men for zeal, for ability, for perseverance, were more capable of undertaking the arduous task. After, however, long giving secret laws to the world, and influencing the affections of men by their external piety and discipline, the Jesuits have fallen into disrepute. They not only promoted the cause of religion, but they frequently encouraged plots and machinations against existing governments, and therefore, in 1773, Clement XIV. was obliged to yield to the representations of the house of Bourbon, and on the 21st July, to issue a bull for the suppression of this famous order. Their last general was L. Ricci, who died in confinement that same year. The Jesuits of late years have again met encouragement; they are tolerated in Russia, and maintain a secret influence in other countries.

LUBIENETSKI, Theodore, a native of Cracow, eminent as a painter in portraits, and in history. He died 1716, aged 63.

His brother Christopher was equally known as an able artist.

LUBIENIETSKI, Stanislaus Lubieniecicus, a Socinian divine, born at Cracow, in Poland, of a noble family, 1623. He studied at Thorn, and afterwards visited France and Holland, as a travelling tutor, and in 1648, on the death of his father, returned to Poland. He was highly favoured by the king of Sweden, while he was in Poland, but he exerted his influence in vain with that monarch, that the Unitarians might be included in the general amnesty granted to all those who dissented from popery. In consequence of this disappointment he went to Copenhagen, 1660, and was there honourably received by the Danish king, who granted him a pension. The Lutheran divines, however, saw with jealousy the influence he had acquired, and the new favourite yielding to the general odium, retired to Hamburg, 1662, where he held a conference with queen Christina. In 1667, he again returned to Copenhagen, and from thence to Fredericksburg, but persecution followed him every where, and another time he attempted to find an asylum at Hamburg. Here he did not long enjoy tranquillity; he was ordered by the magistrates to leave the city, but before he removed, the unfortunate man was poisoned by his maid servant, May 18th, 1675. His two daughters had fallen victims, two days before, to the same diabolical measures, and his wife with difficulty recovered from the effects of the poison. His death prevented his completion of the History of the Reformation in Poland. Of the many books which he wrote, a few have been printed. He is regarded by the Socinians, as a martyr to their tenets. The best known of his works is "Theatrum Cometicum," 1667, folio, which contains an account of comets, from the flood to 1665.

LUBIN, Eilhard, a learned protestant, born at Westersted, in Oldenburg, 24th March, 1556. He studied at Leipsic and Cologne, and other universities, and in 1595 was made professor of poetry at Rostock, and ten years after raised to the divinity chair. He died of a tertian ague, June, 1621. To his extensive knowledge of Greek and Latin, he added the graces of poetry and oratory, and was also a good mathematician and divine. His publications are 13, containing notes on Anacreon, Juvenal, and Persius—a Translation of the Anthologia—Clavis Græcæ Linguae, &c. besides a curious Treatise, called "Phosphorus, &c." in which he maintained two co-eternal principles, God and Nothing, of which he considered God as the good principle, and Nothing, as the evil principle. He supposed that sin was only a tendency towards nothing, and that sin was necessary to make known the nature of good. By his first wife he had no children, by his second, nine.

LUBIN, Augustin, an Augustine friar, geographer to the French king, was born at Paris, 29th Jan. 1624. He applied himself to ecclesiastical history and wrote the Geographical Mercury—Present State of Abbeys in France, and in Italy—a Description of Lapland,—Notes on Plutarch's Lives, and other works. He died at Paris, 17th March, 1695.

LUCA, John Baptist, a native of Venosa, in the Neapolitan territory. He quitted the profession of the law for the church, and became a cardinal. He died 1683, aged 66. The best known of his numerous works is an Analysis of the Civil Law, 4 vols. 4to.—a composition of great merit, and properly called the Philosophy of Jurisprudence.

LUCAN, Marcus Annæus, a Latin poet born at Cordova, A. D. 39. He was the favourite of Nero, but afterwards offended and joined Piso's conspiracy against the tyrant. He was obliged to destroy himself and was suffocated in a bath, 65. The best edition of his Pharsalia is that of Strawberry-hill, 1760, 4to.

LUCAS, Tudensis, bishop of Tudæ or Tuy in Galicia, in the 13th century, was author of an History of Spain from Adam to the year 1236—the Life of Isidorus of Seville—a work against the Albigenses, 1612.

LUCAS, Van Leyden, a painter and engraver, born in 1494. His works procured him celebrity, and Albert Durer visited Holland merely to see him. The last six years of his life he spent in his bed, pretending that he had been poisoned. His time, however, was devoted to his pencil, and he said that his bed should still be a bed of honour. He died 1533. Though his figures abound in expression, yet the whole wants correctness.

LUCAS BRUGENSIS, Francis, dean of St. Omer, was a learned orientalist, and the author of Critical Notes on the Scriptures—Commentaries on the New Testament, 3 vols. folio.—Concordance of the Bible, &c. He died 1619, aged 67.

LUCAS, Richard, a learned divine born at Presteign, Radnorshire, 1648. He was educated at Jesus college, Oxford, where he took the degree of D. D. He was for some time master of Abergavenny free-school, but afterwards obtained the vicarage of St. Stephens, Coleman-street, and the lectureship of St. Olave, Southwark, and in 1696 became prebendary of Westminster. He died June 1715, after having been afflicted for some years with blindness, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He was author of some valuable compositions,—Practical Christianity—an Inquiry after Happiness, 2 vols. 8vo.—5 vols of Sermons, 8vo.—the Morality of the Gospel, &c.

LUCAS, Paul, a French traveller, born at Rouen, 1664. He several times visited the Levant, Egypt, Turkey, and other countries, where he made a valuable collection of curiosities, which he presented to the French king, who in 1714 appointed him his antiquary. He extended his travels to Spain, and died, after an illness of eight months, at Madrid, 1737. His travels, though not very accurate, are yet interesting. They have appeared in 7 vols. 12mo.

LUCAS, Charles, an Irishman, who, from an apothecary became a physician, and afterwards obtained a seat in the House of Commons, where he displayed his zeal in his opposition to the measures of government. He died 1771, aged 58, and his remains were honoured by the attendance of the Dublin corporation, who liberally conferred a pension on his widow. He published some Medical Tracts, &c.

LUCCHESINI, John Vincent, a historian, born of a noble family at Lucca. He was educated at Sienna and at Pisa universities, and became secretary to the pope, and canon of St. Peter's at Rome. He died 1744, aged 84. Besides a Latin translation of Demosthenes, 1712, much and deservedly commended by Rollin, he wrote Historia sui Temporis, published 1738, 3 vols. 4to. a work of merit.

LUCIAN, a Greek writer, born at Samosata. He left the business of sculpture for the life of an author, and became the favourite of M. Aurelius, who appointed him registrar of Egypt. His satires are very severe on heathen religion, but often obscene and profane. He died 180 A. D. aged 90. His works were well edited by Reitzius, Amsterd. 4 vols. 4to. 1743.

LUCIFER, bishop Cagliari, in Sardinia, refused to admit the apostate Arian bishops to communion, according to the decree of the council of Alexandria, 362. Rather than to yield in opinion he resigned his see, and became the author of a new schism, whose supporters were called Luciferians. He died 370. His works appeared at Venice, 1779.

LUCILIUS, Caius, a Roman satirist, who was with Scipio in his expedition against Numantia. He died 103 B. C. Fragments of his poetry remain.

LUCIUS I. pope and saint, was elected 253, after Cornelius, and the next year suffered martyrdom.

LUCIUS II. Gerard de Caccianemici, a native of Bologna, elected pope after Celestinus II. 1144. He died 25th Feb. the next year, in consequence of a blow from a stone in a popular commotion.

LUCIUS III. Humbaldo Allineigoli, a native of Lucca, succeeded pope Alexander III. 1181. He was obliged in a popular tumult to fly from Rome to Verona, but he afterwards returned, supported by the princes of Italy, and he punished the seditious disturbers of the public peace. Another commotion afterwards again occasioned his flight, and he died at Verona, 25th Nov. 1185. He established, with the emperor Frederic, constitutions for the punishment of heresies, which may be considered as the origin of the inquisition.

LUCRETIA, a celebrated Roman lady, wife of Collatinus. Violence was offered to her person by Sextus the son of Tarquin, and in consequence of this she stabbed herself after she had related the horrid indignity to her father and husband. Her death was avenged by the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome, and the establishment of the consular government, A.U.C. 244.

LUCRETIUS, Titus Carus, a Roman poet, educated in the epicurean school of Zeno and Phædrus. He wrote a beautiful poem, De Rerum Naturâ, founded, however, on the atheistical doctrine of Atoms. It is supposed that he became mad by drinking a philter given him by his mistress Lucilia. He died B.C. 54, aged 42. The best edition is that of Wakefield, 4 vols. 4to. The work has been translated into English verse by Creech.

LUCULLUS, Lucius Licinius, a Roman general, celebrated for his conquests over Mithridates in Bithynia and Armenia. After the honours of a triumph he retired to privacy, and patronised learned men. He died aged 68.

LUDLOW, Edmund, a republican chief in the civil wars, born at Maiden Bradley, Wilts, 1620. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, where he took his first degree in 1636, and then removed to the Temple to study the law, but on the breaking out of the civil war, by the advice of his father, who was representative in the long parliament, for Wiltshire, he became a volunteer in lord Essex's life guards. He distinguished himself at the battle of Edgehill, and in the siege of Wardour castle, of which he was made governor, and afterwards he was made by the parliament high sheriff of his native county. He was at the second battle of Newbury, and in 1643 succeeded, on his father's death, as representative for Wiltshire, but while he opposed on the one hand the dark designs of Cromwell, he on the other voted for the abolition of royalty, and for the establishment of a pure commonwealth. With these principles it is not to be wondered at that he was one of the unfortunate king's judges, and that he concurred in voting the house of peers not only useless but dangerous. He was employed by Cromwell as lieutenant general of horse in Ireland, and on Ireton's death he succeeded him in the chief command of the island. The elevation of Cromwell to the protectorate was particularly displeasing to him, but his attempts to oppose it rendered him suspected to the tyrant, who at last ensured his tranquillity, by seizing his person, and then obliging him to give a security not to act against the government. Thus bound to inactivity, he lived in Essex till the death of the usurper, and then, under Richard, appeared in parliament, and was violent in the disturbed state of affairs for the restoration of the rump parliament. By the influence of the Wallingford house party he was prevailed upon to resume the chief command in Ireland, but here he met with some opposition, and on his return to England soon after he found himself accused of various misdemeanors. Sensible that the nation, and the army headed by Monk, had determined to restore the king, he left the kingdom by the advice of his friends, and retired to Dieppe. A reward of 300*l.* was offered by proclamation for his apprehension, but he escaped his pursuers, and flying to Geneva, he at last settled at Vevay in Switzerland. At the revolution he ventured to return to London, but though he was regarded as a proper person to reduce Ireland from the power of the papists, some of the commons moved an address to William to seize him, in consequence of which he retired again to Vevay, where he died, 1693, aged 73. A monument was erected over his body by his widow. After his death appeared his "Memoirs," in 2 vols. 8vo. 1693, to which another was added on the following year. This work is curious and valuable, and in communicating important particulars concerning the civil wars, exhibits the author as a stern, unshaken republican, not, like Cromwell, turning every accident to his own views and interest, but regarding the democratical government, pure and uncorrupted, as the most perfect system of political union.

LUDLOW, Roger, a native of the west of England, came to Dorchester, Massachusetts, in 1630, and was immediately elected a magistrate of the colony, and four years after deputy governor. Soon after, removing to Fairfield, Connecticut, he was appointed a number of years to the same offices there, and rendered the most important services to the colony, by assisting in forming its civil constitution, for which he was happily fitted by an extensive knowledge of jurisprudence. He compiled the first code of laws of Connecticut, printed in 1672. In 1648 he was appointed one of the commissioners of the United Colonies, and repeatedly afterwards. But becoming displeased with the conduct of the people, in the war with the Dutch, he left the colony in 1654, and went to Virginia.

LUDOLPH, Job, the well-known Ethiopic historian, was born at Erfurt in Thuringia, 15th June, 1624. Though his countrymen were unfortunately engaged in military affairs, he devoted himself to studious pursuits, and at the age of 20 was a perfect master of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and then employed himself assiduously in the study of the Ethiopic language, of which he wrote a grammar. He studied also the law under the famous professor Muller, and after spending about six years in travelling, and visiting France, Holland, Rome, and the residence of Christina, the celebrated patroness of learning in Sweden, he returned to Erfurt, and gained applause in the office of counsellor of state. After 18 years devoted to the public service he returned to Frankfort, with the intention of cultivating literature, but the elector Palatine placed him at the head of his administration, and twice employed his abilities as negotiator in France. The last years, however, of his life, were spent in the perfecting of his works. He died universally lamented, 8th April, 1704, nearly 80 years old. It is said that he was well versed in 25 languages. His character in private life was as respectable as his public fame as a scholar and a politician. He wrote Historia Ethiopica, fol. 1681—Commentaries in Hist. Ethiopic. folio—Dissertatio de Locustis, folio—Grammatica Amharicæ Linguae, &c. fol.—Grammatica Linguae Ethiopicæ, folio, and other learned publications.

LUDOLPH, Henry William, nephew to the preceding, was born at Erfurt, 1655. He was secretary to the Danish envoy in London, and afterwards filled the same office near the person of George of Denmark, who married queen Anne. He visited Russia, and was presented to the Czar, who expressed astonishment at his great knowledge of music and of various languages, and in gratitude for the civilities which he had received, he wrote a grammar of the Russian language, which was printed at Oxford, 1696. In 1698 he determined to travel into the East to see the state of the Christian church in those remote regions. He visited Smyrna, Jaffa, Jerusalem, Cairo, and Alexandria, and returned well acquainted with the laws, manners, and religion of those countries. He wished the establishment of a Christian college at Jerusalem, and, to disseminate the knowledge of pure Christianity, he zealously undertook the impression of the New Testament into modern Greek, which was happily completed by the assistance of the bishop of Worcester, and other learned and charitable persons. This benevolent man died 25th Jan. 1710, aged 54. His other works are, Meditations on Retirement from the World—Reflections on the Present State of the Church, &c.

LUDWELL, Philip, governor of the Carolinas, succeeded Sothel in South Carolina in 1692, but incurring the displeasure of the proprietors, Thomas Smith succeeded him in 1693, when Ludwell returned to Virginia, where he continued to reside during most of his administration in Carolina. In North Carolina he was four years governor, although he continued but a short time in the colony. He was succeeded by Thomas Harvey, as deputy governor.

LUDWIG, John Peter, professor of law, chancellor of Magdeburg, and privy counsellor to the king of Prussia, died 1743, aged 73. He wrote Scriptor. Rerum Germanicarum, 2 vols.—Manuscripta Omnis Evi, Diplomata et Monumenta inedita, 12 vols. 8vo.—Lives of Justinian and Tribonian—Miscellaneous Works, 2 vols. &c.

LUGO, John, a Spanish Jesuit, born at Madrid, 28th Nov. 1533. He studied at Pampeluna, Salamanca, and Seville, and taught divinity at Valladolid. He afterwards went to Rome, where he filled the theological chair for 20 years with great popularity, and was, in 1643, made a cardinal by pope Urban VIII. This honour he was willing to decline; he regarded the coach sent for him as his coffin, and consented at last in submission to the pope's commands. In this new dignity he did not display the pomp or pride of a cardinal, he was meek in his conduct, and charitable in the highest degree. He died at Rome, 20th Aug. 1660, and was buried at the feet of Loyola, the founder of his order. He was the first who introduced bark into general use in France, in 1650. He was not only an able divine, but an expert philosopher and mathematician. His works are on theological subjects, and fill up 7 vols. folio.

LUGO, Francis, elder brother to the preceding, was born at Madrid, 1580, and became a Jesuit at Salamanca, 1600. He went as missionary to the Indies, and was promoted to the divinity chair at Mexico and Santa Fe. He returned to Spain, and was afterwards employed on ecclesiastical affairs at Rome. He was made rector of two colleges in Spain, and died 1652. He wrote commentaries on Thomas Aquinas, 2 vols. folio—On the Sacraments, &c.

LUISINO, or LUISINI, Francis, an eminent scholar of Udino in the Venetian states. He taught Greek and Latin at Reggio, and was afterwards secretary to the duke of Parma, and died 1568, aged 45. He wrote Illustrations of Obscure Passages in Ancient Authors, found also in Gruter's Fax Artium—a Commentary on Horace's Art of Poetry—a treatise de Componendis Animi Affectibus, Svo.

LUSINUS, Aloysius, a Venetian physician, who published “de Morbo Gallico,” &c. 1566, republished by Boerhaave, 1728, folio.—the Aphorisms of Hippocrates in Latin verse, Svo.

LUITPRAND, a king of Lombardy after his father Ansprand, 712. He is known for his conquests in Italy, and for the code of laws which he digested for his kingdom. He died 744.

LUITPRANDUS, a Lombard historian, born at Pavia. He was bred up at the court of the Italian kings, and was in 948 sent by Berengarius II. as ambassador to Constantine Porphyrogenitus. He was afterwards disgraced by his master, and fled to the emperor Otho, who avenged his cause by dethroning Berengarius, and making him bishop of Cremona. In 968 he went again as ambassador to Constantinople from Otho, but he was rudely treated by Nicephorus Phocas, the emperor of the East, and thrown into prison because he defended the right of his master to the title of emperor of the West. The time of his death is unknown. He wrote, in a harsh but vehement style, the History of his own Times, in six books, printed Antwerp, fol. 1640, a valuable work, found among Muratori's Rerum Italicarum Scriptores.

LUKE, St. the evangelist, was a physician of Antioch in Syria, converted to the Christian faith by Paul, of whom he afterwards became the faithful associate. Besides his gospel which is composed in very pure language, he wrote the Acts of the Apostles. He lived according to Jerome to his 83d year. Some have called him falsely a painter.

LULLE, Raymond, a learned native of Majorca, called, on account of his great abilities, Doctor Illuminatus. After excelling as a divine, he applied himself to physic and chymistry, that he might be enabled to cure the cancer of a young woman, of whom he was enamoured. He afterwards went as a missionary to Mauritania, where the barbarian natives stoned him to death, March, 1315, at the age of 80. His remains were brought back to Majorca, where he was regarded as a martyr. His works on theology, history, medicine, law, philosophy, were collected together, and lately published at Mentz, but they are very obscure and in a barbarous style.

LULLI, John Baptist, an eminent musician, born at Florence, 1634. At the age of 10 he became page to Mad. de Montpensier, niece to Louis XIV. but from the meanness of his appearance he was removed to be under scullion in the kitchen. His fondness for music, however, soon distinguished him; he received instructions from a master, and was soon so great a proficient on the violin that the king noticed him, and made him superintendent of music in the royal chamber. He became now eminent as a composer, and was employed, on the recovery of Louis from his indisposition, to compose a Te Deum, which in the performance proved fatal to him, as he struck the end of his foot, and thus produced a gangrene, of which he died 22d March, 1687. He is deservedly esteemed as the master who brought French music to perfection. His great operas, in five acts, such as Cadmus, Alceste, Theseus, Psyche, &c. are highly admired, as well as his pastorals, ballets, &c. He composed also the music for Moliere's plays, and was in his private character a witty and facetious companion.

LUMLEY, Joanna lady, eldest daughter of Henry Fitz-Allan, earl Arundel, married John lord Lumley. She was very learned, and translated into Latin, from the Greek, three of the orations of Isocrates, of which the MS. is still preserved in Westminster library. She also translated into English Euripides' Iphigenia, and died 1620, about 11 years after her husband.

LUNEAU DE BOISJERMAIN, Peter Joseph Francis, a voluminous French writer, who died suddenly at the end of 1802. He wrote a course of History and Geography, 2 vols. 12mo.—True Principles of Reading and Orthography, 4 vols. Svo.—Course of the Italian Language—Course of the English Language, 2 vols. Svo.—Racine's Works, edited 7 vols. Svo.—Musical Almanac, &c.

LUSIGNAN, Guy, a celebrated French warrior, during the crusades. He espoused, in the Holy Land, Sibylla, daughter of Amaury king of Jerusalem, whom he succeeded in the kingdom. He afterwards resigned his regal honours to Richard I. of England, and assumed in return the title of king of Cyprus. He died 1194.

LUSSAN, Margaret de, a female writer, born 1682. Her father was coachman to cardinal Fleury. Her abilities were early seen and improved by bishop Huet, and she in consequence excelled as a writer of history and of romances. She wrote for her support, and therefore wrote much, yet though often in want, her character was charitable, virtuous, and benevolent. She died 1758, aged 75. Her works are very numerous. The best known are Anecdotes of the Court of Philip Augustus, 6 vols. 12mo.—les Veillées de la Thessalie, 4 vols. &c.

LUTHER, Martin, the celebrated reformer, was born at Isleben in Saxony, 10th Nov. 1483. Though but the son of a miner, he rose from obscurity, and received a good education at Magdeburg, and at Eysenach in Thuringia, which he quitted in 1501, for the university of Erfurt, where he studied logic and philosophy, and paid particular attention to the writings of Cicero, Virgil, Livy, and other illustrious classics. His parents wished him to devote himself to the labours of the bar, but an extraordinary accident diverted his purpose. As he walked one day in the fields with a fellow student he was struck down by lightning, and his companion killed by his side, and this had such effect upon his mind that without consulting his friends he retired from the world, into the order of the Augustines. In this seclusion he found by accident a Latin Bible, which he never before had seen, and in perusing it he was astonished at the little knowledge of Scripture and of Christianity which the clergy then imparted to the people. From the convent of Erfurt he was removed to Wittenberg university, just founded by Frederic the elector of Saxony, and here he read lectures on philosophy for three years to numerous and applauding audiences. In 1512, he went to Rome to settle some disputes which seven convents of his order had with their vicar general, and on his return he was created D.D. at the request of the elector of Saxony. Employed as professor of divinity, he explained with clearness and ease the Psalms and the epistles to the Romans, and supported his celebrity by the most rigid morality, and the most exemplary conduct. The completion of St. Peter's church at Rome at this time required extraordinary sums, and the pope, Leo X. to fill his coffers with greater facility, published general indulgences for the forgiveness of sins to such as would contribute to the pious work. The Dominicans were intrusted with the selling of these indulgences in Germany, and in paying their money the good friar Tetzel informed the superstitious people that they might release themselves not only from past, but also future sins. This pious imposition did not escape the discerning eye of Luther, he published in 1517 a thesis, containing 95 propositions on indulgences, and challenged opposition. Tetzel was not silent on the occasion, but while he with the voice of authority called his opponent a damnable heretic, and whilst he burnt the thesis with all possible ignominy, Luther asserted boldly the inefficacy of indulgences, and regarded penitence and works of mercy and charity alone capable of forming a reconciliation with heaven. This seemingly trifling dispute between two obscure monks led to great events, and created a revolution in the religious opinions of mankind. Though attacked by numbers, Luther had the satisfaction to see his sentiments embraced with eagerness by the body of the people; and when summoned by the pope to appear at Rome to answer for his conduct, he had the firmness to refuse, though he at the same time in the most submissive manner exculpated himself, and deprecated the resentment of the supreme pontiff. Maximilian the emperor was anxious to support the cause of Rome, but Luther happily found a protector and friend in the elector of Saxony, and upon an assurance of personal safety, he did not refuse to appear at Augsburg before the papal legate Cajetan. Here when exhorted in three propositions to retract his errors, and to submit to the authority of the pope, he declared that he was not guilty of any errors, and that while he paid deference to the head of the church, he yet asserted that he had advanced nothing which was contrary to the Scriptures, or to the doctrines of the fathers. The conference thus ended by the refusal of Luther to submit implicitly to the pleasure of the papal see; but when the pope in a brief declared himself as the vicar of Christ, authorized to forgive sins by the power of indulgences, and that whosoever opposed this doctrine was excommunicated as a heretic, the reformer published an appeal from the prejudiced pontiff to a general council. The pope, however, finding that violence could not destroy the obstinacy of Luther, had recourse to milder means, and his agent Miltitius was employed to visit the reformer, to argue with him, and to offer terms of reconciliation. Luther was struck with the civilities and the temper of the papal missionary, but instead of making submission, he was roused to greater opposition by the exhortations of the Bohemians, and the able support of Malancthon, Carolostadius, and other learned men. In 1519 he was engaged in a personal controversy at Leipsic with Eccius, divinity professor at Ingolstadt, but it tended only to sow greater enmity and deeper variance between the disputants. The same year his book against indulgences was censured by the divines of Louvain and Cologne, but Luther disregarded their opinions, and appealed for protection to the new emperor Charles V. Though he had written, at the suggestion of Miltitius, a letter to the pope, not indeed of submission, but rather of exculpation, in language bold and energetic, he was in 1520 formally condemned by a bull from Rome, which after enumerating 41 of his heretical opinions, denounces against him the vengeance of the church, and excommunication, if within sixty days he did not make a due submission. This violent conduct Luther answered by "the captivity of Babylon," a book in which he inveighed bitterly against the abuses of Rome, and then calling the students of Wittenberg together, he flung into the fire the offensive decree which he called the execrable bull of antichrist. In 1521 he was summoned to appear before the emperor at the diet of Worms, with a promise of protection, and though his friends dissuaded him, and told him that as his opponents had burned his writings, so they would treat him, after the manner of Huss, he declared with fearless voice, If I knew there were as many devils at Worms as tiles on the houses, I would go. At Worms he was required by Eccius to retract his opinions, but he declared that except what he advanced could be proved contrary to Scripture he neither could nor would recant. His obstinacy proved offensive to the emperor, but as he had promised him his protection, he permitted him to depart. On his return to Wittemberg, however, the reformer was attacked in a wood by a number of horsemen, and violently taken away, and what became of him remained unknown to the public. In the mean time Charles published his edict against him and his adherents, and placed him under the ban of the empire. Luther, however, remained secure under the protection of the elector, who had thus effected his deliverance, and in the castle of Wittemberg which he denominated his hermitage and his Patmos, he held a secret correspondence with his friends, or composed books in defence of his opinions. At the end of ten months, when the emperor was departed for Flanders he again appeared publicly at Wittemberg, and had the satisfaction to find that instead of being checked, his doctrines had gained ground, and were universally embraced through Germany. He next attacked Henry VIII. who had defended the seven sacraments, and he treated his book and his person with such contempt, that the monarch complained of it to the princes of Germany. In 1522 he published in conjunction with Melancthon, a Latin translation of the New Testament, and the work was read with avidity by the German nation. In 1524 he had to contend with Erasmus, a man who had apparently adopted his sentiments, though he had not the manliness to acknowledge them, and he now found in him an able antagonist enlisted in defence of the pope. The subject of their dispute was free will, and it is to be lamented that it was attended with great asperity of language, between men who respected and admired each other. In 1524 Luther threw aside the monastic habit, and the next year he married Catherine de Bore, a nun who had escaped from a convent, and though he was ridiculed by his enemies, and censured as incontinent for taking a young wife of 26, when he himself had reached his 42d year, he defended his conduct by Scriptural texts, and again set at nought the authority of Rome and the cavils of her advocates. In 1525 the emperor called a diet at Spires, in consequence of the war with the Turks, as well as the troubled state of Germany in consequence of religious disputes, and in the sitting of the next year he proposed that the edict of Worms should be duly enforced, the catholic religion supported, and heretics punished. The new doctrines though thus openly attacked by the head of the empire were ably defended by the electors of Saxony, and Brandenburg, the landgrave of Hesse, the prince of Anhalt, and others; and in another diet held again at Spires, these dissentient princes protested against the measures of the empire, and were consequently called Protestants. This celebrated union, published 19th April, 1529, was joined by 14 cities, Strasburg, Ulm, Constance, Nuremberg, Retlingen, &c. In the midst of the confusion of Germany, a Confession of Faith was drawn up by Melancthon, the mildest and most moderate of Luther's followers, and as it was presented to the emperor at Augsburg, it has been called the Augsburg Confession. Thus the opposition raised against the mighty empire of spiritual Rome by an obscure monk, was supported by intelligent princes and powerful nations, and Luther, now regarded as the champion of the faith through Germany, had nothing to apprehend from his persecutors, but had only to labour earnestly to confirm what had been so happily established. His German translation of the Bible appeared in 1535, and was received with grateful raptures by the Germans. In 1537 he and Melancthon were present at the assembly held at Smalkald on religious matters, and it was here that he was attacked with a severe disorder and a stoppage of urine, which seemed for 11 days to threaten his life; but by travelling he recovered. He was again attacked in 1546, as he was visiting his native country, where he was received with much honour, and he died at Isleben, 18th Feb. 1546, aged 63, and his body, which his friends wished to deposit in his native town, was conveyed by order of the elector of Saxony to Wittemberg, and interred with great ceremony. This illustrious man engaged, as Atterbury has observed, against the united forces of the papal world, stood the shock with bravery and success. He was a man of high endowments of mind, and great virtues: he had a vast understanding which raised him to a pitch of learning unknown in the age in which he lived. His knowledge of Scripture was admirable, his elocution manly, and his way of reasoning was argumentative, powerful, and convincing. He had no ambition but in the service of God; he was of a temper averse to covetousness, or any base sin, and charitable even to a fault. When religion was concerned, he regarded not whose love or hatred he incurred. He treated the pope's bulls and the emperor's edicts with equal harshness, and while he laboured to restore religion to its original purity, he spared neither friends nor foes. His works collected after his death appeared at Wittemberg, in 7 vols. fol. By his wife who survived him till 20th Dec. 1552, and was buried at Torgau, he had three sons, whose descendants are still respected in Germany.

LUTTI, Bendetto, an Italian painter, born at Florence 1666. He studied at Rome and acquired such celebrity that the emperor knighted him, and the elector of Mentz sent him a cross set with diamonds. He was slow in his work, but his touch was tender and delicate, and his pieces exhibited harmony and correctness in the highest degree. The best of his paintings is his miracle of St. Pio, in the Albani palace at Rome. His Magdalen, at Naples, his Isaiah, and his Anthony of Padua, at Rome, are also much admired. He died at Rome 1724, aged 58, of chagrin in consequence of a dispute about finishing a picture of Eusebius bishop of Vercelli, for the people of Turin.

LUXEMBOURG, Francis Henry de Montmorency duke of, a famous general and marshal of France, the posthumous son of Montmorency count of Bouteville, who was beheaded for fighting a duel under Lewis XIII. He was, though but 15, at the battle of Rocroi, 1643, under the famous Condé, whose fortunes he followed, and whose genius, abilities, coolness and ardour he seemed to possess. He distinguished himself at the conquest of Franche Comté, 1668, and in the Dutch campaigns of 1672, and completed the expedition by a bold and unprecedented retreat with 20,000 men, in face of an army of 70,000. In 1675, he was raised to the dignity of marshal, and in the war against the allied powers, again rendered his name illustrious by the battle of Fleurus, over prince Waldeck, 1690. In 1691 he gained the battles of Leusen, Steinkirk, and Nerwinde, and continued to distinguish himself in the field though opposed by William III. He performed another famous retreat to Tournay, 1694, and died the next year, aged 67.

LUYKEN, John, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam. His plates illustrative of the Scriptures, and a theatre of martyrs are among the rest of his works particularly admired. He died 1712, aged 63.

LUYTS, John, a native of North Holland, professor of mathematics and philosophy at Utrecht, where he died 1721, aged 66. His works are Astronomica Institutio, 4to. in which he refused to admit the Copernican System—Introductio ad Geographiam Novam et Veterem, 4to.

LYCOPHRON, son of Periander of Corinth, B. C. 628, resented the fate of his mother Melissa, who had been cruelly put to death by his father, and he refused to speak to him. The father afterwards wished to be reconciled to his son, whom he had banished into Corcyra, and offered to resign his crown to him; but the Corcyreans afraid of changing masters murdered the young prince.

LYCOPHRON, a Greek poet of Chalcis in Eubœa, author of Alexandra, a very obscure poem, which has been rendered more intelligible by the learned notes of Tzetzes. Lycophron was slain by an arrow, B. C. 304.

LYCURGUS, a celebrated lawgiver of Sparta. He refused to take possession of the kingdom, at the invitation of his sister-in-law, and preferred the character of a faithful guardian to his nephew the young king. During the popular tumults which agitated his country where the monarchs and the people each aspired to unlimited power, he was called upon by the general voice to establish a system of laws to restrain the violence of each order of the state. After the institution of his salutary but severe laws, Lycurgus retired from Sparta, and is supposed to have died in Crete in a good old age, B. C. 870.

LYCURGUS, an Athenian orator, B. C. 408. He studied under Plato and Isocrates, and was the friend of Demosthenes. One of his orations is preserved.

LYDE. Vid. JOINER.

LYDGATE, John, an Augustine monk of St. Edmundsbury, Suffolk, in the reign of Henry VI. He was the disciple of Chaucer, whom he excelled, according to some, in the graces of versification. He travelled abroad, and died 1440, aged 60, and was buried in his convent, Bury. He was also a philosopher and divine; but he is chiefly known as a poet, and his eclogues, odes, satires, &c. are said to possess merit, and to have been written in such smooth style that his wit as his contemporaries observed, was fashioned by the muses.

LYDIAT, Thomas, an English chronologer, born at Okerton, Oxfordshire, 1572, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, where he became fellow, 1591. He devoted himself early to literature, and was cosmographer and chronologer to Henry, son of James I. and in 1609, went to Ireland, and was two years at the college of Dublin, under the patronage Usher. On his return to England, he accepted, in 1612 the rectory of Okerton, which some years before he had refused in consequence of his difficulty of utterance. His engagement to pay the debts of a near relation brought him afterwards into great difficulties, and he was for some time imprisoned at Oxford, and in the king's bench, till liberated by the contributions of his friends. He petitioned the king to be permitted to travel into Turkey, Ethiopia, and Abyssinia, in search of MSS. but was unsuccessful; and in the civil wars which desolated the country, he was a severe sufferer for his loyalty. He died very poor, 3d April, 1646, and was buried in his church, Okerton. He was an able scholar and deservedly esteemed by the learned of the times, Usher, Newton, Briggs, Turner, &c. He wrote de Variis Annorum Formis, 1605, 8vo. which he afterwards defended against Scaliger and Clavius—On the Origin of Fountains, 8vo.—Various treatises on philosophical and astronomical subjects, &c.

LYE, Edward, a learned linguist, born at Totness, Devonshire, 1704, and educated under his father, and afterwards at Hart-hall, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. 1732. He devoted himself to the study of antiquities, and published the Etymologicum Anglicanum of Francis Junius from the MS. in the Bodleian. He afterwards employed himself in the compilation of his great work, the Anglo-Saxon and Gothic Dictionary, which received the finishing hand of its author before his death, but was published in 1772, by the Rev. Owen Manning, 2 vols. folio, with a grammar of the two languages. Lye was in 1750, presented by lord Northampton, to the living of Yardley Hastings, where he died 1767.

LYLLY, or LILLY, John. Vid. LILLY.

LYNDE, sir Humphry, an English writer, born in Dorsetshire 1579. He was educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford. In 1613 he was knighted by James I. and was member of the house of commons in several parliaments. He died 14th June, 1636, and was buried in Cobham church, Surrey. He wrote various books against popery, the best known of which is "Via Tuta," often reprinted, and translated into Dutch, French, and Latin.

LYNDE, Benjamin, chief justice of Massachusetts, was descended from an ancient family in Dorsetshire, England, and was born at Salem in 1666. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1681, and after completing his studies in law, during which he resided several years at the Temple, returned to America, and settled in his native town. In 1712, he was appointed a judge of the superior court, and in 1729, chief justice. He was also a member of the council from 1723 to 1737, a period of fourteen years, when he resigned. He died March 28th, 1745.  L.

LYNDE, Benjamin, chief justice of Massachusetts, was the son of the preceding, and graduated at Harvard college in 1718. He was elected into the council in 1737, and continued in it for many years. In 1739 he was appointed a justice of the Essex county court, and subsequently chief justice of the province, but resigned the office in 1772.  L.

LYNDON, Josias, governor of Rhode-Island, in 1768, was a member of the Baptist society in Providence, to which he left his mansion house and other property at his death in 1778, aged 74.  L.

LYONNET, Peter, a native of Maestricht, born 22d July, 1707. He possessed great abilities, and was not only acquainted with nine languages, but well skilled in music, in painting, in sculpture, and engraving. He quitted the study of divinity for the law, and was appointed secretary to the States of Holland, and also interpreter for the French and Latin languages. He afterwards turned his attention to natural History, and examined the insects in the neighbourhood of the Hague, and made a collection of curious shells. His abilities and reputation procured him admission to the learned academies of London, Rouen, Berlin, Vienna, Petersburg, &c. After a life devoted to science, this learned man, equally respectable in private life, died at the Hague, 10th Jan. 1789, aged 81. He wrote Observations on Insects—Theologie des Insectes, &c.

LYONS, Israel, son of a Polish Jew, who was a silversmith, and taught Hebrew at Cambridge, was born at Cambridge 1739. He early displayed great abilities, and distinguished himself as a mathematician and botanist. In 1758 he published a treatise on Fluxions, inscribed to his friend and patron, Dr. Smith, master of Trinity college, and in 1763, appeared his Fasciculus Plantarum circa Cantabrigiam Nascentium, 8vo. About 1762 he read lectures on botany, at Oxford, at the request of Mr. Banks, and afterwards received a salary of 100*l.* per ann. for calculating the Nautical almanac. In 1773 he was sent by the board of longitude with captain Phipps, now lord Mulgrave, to the north Pole and after his return he married, but died about 1775, of the measles. His father was the author of a Hebrew Grammar—and of Observations and Inquiries on Various Parts of Scripture History, 1761.

LYSANDER, a famous Spartan general, who made an alliance with Cyrus the younger, and defeated the Athenian fleet at the battle of Ægospotamos, which put an end to the Peloponnesian war, after a duration of 27 years. He aimed at the sovereignty at home and became unpopular. He fell in battle at Haliartus, B. C. 396.

LYSERUS, Polycarp, an able theologian, born at Winendeen in Wittemberg, 1552. He was educated at Tubingen, and became minister of Wittemberg 1577. He died minister of Dresden 1601. He is author of several learned Commentaries on the Scriptures, &c.

LYSERUS, John, a protestant divine of the same family as the preceding. He was a man of great learning, but deformed in his person, thin and pale. He wrote some books under fictitious names, and was fainous for his works in defence of polygamy. He died at Paris, 1684.

LYSIAS, an Athenian orator, known for his eloquence and integrity. He died B.C. 378, aged 81. Of his orations 34 are extant, best edited by Taylor, 8vo. 1740.

LYSIMACHUS, one of Alexander's generals, who, after his master's death obtained Thrace, and afterwards Macedonia. He was killed in battle by Seleucus, 281 B.C.

LYSIPPUS, a Grecian sculptor of Sicyon, who alone had the privilege of making a statue of Alexander. His best piece was the representation of a man wiping himself after bathing.

LYSIS, a Pythagorean philosopher, the master of Epaminondas. The golden verses of Pythagoras are attributed to him, B.C. 388.

LYSONS, Daniel, gentleman commoner of Magdalen college, Oxford, became fellow of All-Souls, and took his degree of LL.B. 1755, and that of doctor four years after. He afterwards studied medicine and took his doctor's degree 1764. He settled at Gloucester, and afterwards went to Bath, where he acquired considerable eminence, and where he died 1800. He was author of an Essay on the Effects of Camphire and Calomel in Fevers, 8vo.—Practical Essays on Intermitting Fevers, Dropsies, Diseases of the Liver, Epilepsies, Cholic, Dysenteric Fluxes, and the Operation of Calomel, 8vo.—Further Considerations on Camphire and Calomel, 8vo. &c.

LYSONS, Samuel, an antiquary, was the son of a clergyman, and born at Rodmanton, in Gloucestershire, in 1763. He was educated at Bath, and afterwards entered as a student of the Middle Temple, where he was called to the bar. On the death of Mr. Astle, he was appointed keeper of the records in the Tower. He died April 10th, 1819. His works are—1. The Antiquities of Gloucestershire, fol. 2. The Roman Remains discovered by him at Woodchester. 3. Collection of Roman Remains. 4. Magna Britannia; in conjunction with his brother.—W. B.

LYTE, Henry, a native of Somersetshire, educated at Oxford. He travelled abroad to improve his knowledge of botany, and at his return he settled on his estate and established one of the most valuable and best arranged gardens of botany in England. He was author of a translation of Dodoen's Herbage, Antwerp, 4to. 1578, with additions and figures, afterwards reprinted in England, but without plates. He died 1607, aged 78. His son formed a genealogy for James I. with which the king was so pleased that he presented him his picture in gold set with diamonds.

LYTTELTON, Edward, keeper of the great seal under Charles I. was the descendant of judge Littleton, by a collateral branch.—Vid. LITTLETON.

LYTTELTON, George lord, an able writer, eldest son of Sir Thomas Lyttleton, of Hagley, Worcestershire, was born 1709. He was educated at Eton and Christ church, Oxford, where he distinguished himself as a polite scholar and a good poet. In 1728 he began his travels, and visited Italy and France. On his return home he obtained a seat in parliament, and became a popular opponent of Sir Robert Walpole. In 1737 he was made secretary to the prince of Wales, who now extended his patronage to opposition, and by his means the heir apparent acquired popularity in his protection of Pope, Mallet, Thomson, and other learned men. In 1741 he married Lucy, sister of lord Fortescue, whom after a few years of connubial felicity, he lost in child-bed 1747. He lamented her loss in a pathetic "Monody," and in 1749 sought again the happiness which he had lost, but it is said unsuccessfully, by marrying the daughter of Sir Robert Rich. In 1744, on the fall of Walpole, he was made one of the lords of the treasury, in 1754 was appointed cofferer and privy counsellor, and the next year chancellor of the exchequer, a responsible situation for which his abilities were not fully calculated. In 1757, when his friends were turned out of power, he was raised to the peerage, and thus retired from political turbulence. In his honourable retirement his time was usefully employed. In 1764, he published his elaborate History of Henry II. which had engaged his attention for 20 years. The work came from the press with the character of great accuracy, so that the whole was printed twice, some of the sheets four or five times, and for this affectation of correctness his lordship lost above 1000*l.* as the printer paid only for the first impression which was destroyed. The work was begun 1755; 3 vols. appeared 1764, a second edition 1767, a third next year, and the conclusion 1771. When the third edition appeared, Reid, who corrected and printed the first, was dead, and his place was so ill supplied by Dr. Saunders, originally a comb-maker, that a list of errata of 19 pages was annexed to the work. Lyttleton in the former part of life had been a skeptic, but his mature age viewed with concern the levities and dangerous tenets of dissolute companions, and after a studious application, he produced in 1747, Observations on the Conversion and Apostleship of St. Paul, a valuable book, which infidelity will never be able to answer. His father whom he succeeded in 1751, read the book, and in the overflowings of a pious heart called down for blessings on his head, and thanking God that he had given him so good a son, prayed that he might but be found worthy to be eye-witness of that happiness no doubt reserved for so able an advocate for Christianity. His lordship died Aug. 22d, 1773, aged 64. On his death-bed he displayed all the calmness and resignation of a great mind. He again reminded his physician, Dr. Johnson, that he died a sincere Christian, and with composure giving his blessings to those around him, he told lord Valentia, who with his lady was at his bedside, with a voice of solemn affection, "be good, be virtuous, my lord, you must come to this." He was buried at Hagley by the remains of his lady. This great and worthy peer wrote besides, "Dialogues of the Dead,"—Persian Letters—poems, &c. By his first wife he had a son and two daughters.

LYTTELTON, Thomas lord, son of the preceding, was remarkable for his dissipated conduct, which unhappily obscured his great powers of mind. His death, which happened in 1779, when he was 35 years old, is said to have been very extraordinary. He supposed that he saw in a dream a vision of a young woman dressed in white, who told him that his dissolution would take place in three days. The third day arrived, and his lordship engaged in a convivial party of friends, observed jocularly that he thought he should jockey the ghost, a few minutes after which he was seized with a sudden faintness, and being removed to his bed, never rose again.

LYTTELTON, Charles, an English prelate, third son of Sir Thomas, and brother to George lord Lyttelton. He was educated at Eton and University college, and afterwards went to the Inner Temple, where he became a barrister. He soon, however, relinquished law for divinity, and was collated to Alve-church rectory, Worcester-shire, by bishop Hough. In 1745 he took the degree of LL.D. in 1747 became king's chaplain, the next year dean of Exeter, and in 1762 he was raised to the see of Carlisle. In 1765 he succeeded lord Willoughby of Parham as president of the Antiquarian society, to whose learned memoirs he made some valuable contributions, and whose useful labours in historical research he in some degree rewarded by the bequest of choice printed books and of MSS. This good man, much respected in private life, and deservedly praised by his learned successor dean Milles, died unmarried 22d December, 1768.

MAB

MAAS, Dirk, a Dutch painter, whose battles and landscapes were much admired. He was born at Haerlem, 1656.

MAAS, Arnold, a Dutch painter, whose abilities were displayed in the happiest representation of conversations.

MAAS, Nicholas, a Dutch portrait painter of eminence, who died 1693, aged 61.

MABILLON, John, a learned Frenchman, born 23d Nov. 1632, at Pierre-mont on the frontiers of Champagne. He was educated at Rheims, and took the Benedictine habit at St. Remi, 1653. He was for one year employed in showing to the public the treasures and the monuments of the king of France at St. Dennis, and afterwards assisted father d'Acheri, in the completion of his "Spicilegium." He next was engaged by the congregation of St. Maur in publishing the works of St. Bernard which appeared in 1667, 2 vols. fol. and nine 8vo. and afterwards he undertook an edition of the "Acta Sanctorum" of the Benedictine order, 9 vols. fol. a work which displayed great merit in learned notes and valuable disquisitions. In 1682 he went, by the direction of Colbert, into Burgundy, and the year following to Germany, to make researches about the history of the church, and of the French monarchy. Of this employment he published an interesting account. In 1685 he visited Italy in the same historical research, and enriched the king's library with above 3000 valuable and rare books, printed and in MS. This truly learned but very modest man, to whom, says Du Pin, it would be difficult to give all the praises he deserves, died 1707, of a suppression of urine. His other works were Analecta, 4 vols. 8vo.—de Re Diplomatica, 2 vols. folio, a most valuable work—Musæum Italicum, 2 vols. 4to.

MABLY, Bonnot de, a French ecclesiastic, born 1709 at Grenoble. He lived chiefly at Paris, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. He died 1785 much respected. He wrote a Parallel between the Romans and the French, 2 vols. 12mo.—the Public Rights of Europe, 2 vols.—Entertainments of Phocion, &c. 2 vols. a work which obtained a prize at Berne; Observations on the Greeks; on the Romans; on the History of France, &c.; Discourses on History, translated into English.

MABOUL, James, a native of Paris, who distinguished himself as an eloquent preacher, and on account of his merit was raised to the see of Aeth, where he died 21st May, 1723. His Oraisons Funèbres have been published in 12mo. and display his powers of oratory to great advantage.

MABUSE, John, a Hungarian painter, so called from the place of his birth. He travelled into Italy, and died 1562. He was in the latter part of life much addicted to wine. Some of his pictures are preserved at Amsterdam, the best of which is said to be the decapitation of St. John.

MAC ARDELL, James, an English mezzotinto engraver. His portraits exhibit great correctness, ease, and expression. He also executed some fine prints after Rembrandt, and other masters, and died 1765.

MACARIUS, St. the elder, a native of Alexandria, who from a baker became a hermit, and passed sixty years of his life in a monastery on mount Sceta. He died 391. Fifty of his homilies in Greek were published, 2 vols. 8vo. Leipsic, 1698.

MACARIUS, St. the younger, a friend of the former, born also at Alexandria. He presided over 5000 monks, and died 394. He was banished by the Arians to a heathen island, all whose inhabitants he converted to Christianity.

MACARTNEY, George, earl, only son of George Cartney, of Auchinleck, in Scotland, was born in Ireland, 1737. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, where he took the degree of M.A. 1759, and afterwards he attended the two sons of the late lord Holland in their European travels. He went in 1764 as envoy extraordinary to the empress of Russia, and three years after he was named ambassador extraordinary, and in 1766 he was made knight of the white eagle by the king of Poland. In 1769 he was secretary to lord Townshend, in Ireland, in 1772, he was made knight of the bath, and three years after appointed governor of Grenada, Tobago, and their dependencies. On the capture of those islands by the French, in 1779, he was taken prisoner, and conveyed to France; but the next year he was nominated governor of fort St. George, and in 1785 declared governor-general of Bengal, a high office, which he modestly declined, though he accepted from the company a pension of 1500*l.* per annum, in reward for his meritorious services. In 1792 he was selected as the ambassador extraordinary of Great Britain to the emperor of China, and this mission, which engaged much of the attention of the world, was completed in about three years, but brought little advantage to the commercial interests of the country. Sir George sat in the English parliament in 1767, for Cokermonth, and in the Irish for Armagh, and again in the English for Ayr, &c. 1774, and in 1776 he was created an Irish baron, and in 1792 advanced to the dignity of an earl. He married in 1768 lord Bute's daughter, and died 31st March, 1806, leaving no issue. His remains were interred privately at Chiswick, and a cenotaph, with an elegant Latin epitaph, by the pen of Mr. Glasse, perpetuates his memory in Lissanoure church, in the county of Leitrim. An interesting account of his embassy was published in 1797, in 3 vols. 4to. with plates, by Sir George Staunton. For the distinction which he held in the world lord Macartney was principally indebted to his connexion with the family of lord Holland, though it must be acknowledged that he possessed virtues which qualified him for the most eminent situation in the service of his country.

MACAULAY, Catherine, a female historian, and political writer, daughter of John Sawbridge, Esq. of Ollantigh, in Kent. In 1760 she married Dr. George Macaulay, a physician of some reputation, and after his death she took for her second husband, 1778, the Rev. Mr. Graham, brother to the celebrated empiric of that name. Her conduct was often romantic, so that in 1785 she passed over to America to become acquainted with the great Washington, who continued one of her regular correspondents. She died 23d June, 1791. She published the history of England from James I. to the Brunswick line, 8 vols. 8vo. once a popular work, but now acknowledged a virulent attack on the Stuarts, and sinking fast into oblivion—Remarks on Hobbes' Rudiments of Government, &c. 8vo.—Thoughts on the Causes of the present Discontents, 1770—a Modest Plea for the Property of Copy Right, 8vo. 1774—History of England from the Revolution to the present Time, in a series of letters to Dr. Wilson, prebendary of Westminster, 8vo.—Address to the People of England—Letters on Education, 8vo.—Observations on Mr. Burke's Pamphlet on the French Revolution—a Treatise on the Immutability of Moral Truth, 8vo. &c. Her friend Dr. Wilson so much admired her enthusiasm in favour of liberty, that he set up a statue to her in that character, in the chancel of his parish church of Walbrook, which unbecoming mark of homage was properly removed by the next incumbent.

MACBETH, a tyrannical usurper of Scotland in the 11th century, who obtained the kingdom by the murder of his relation Duncan, at Inverness. Banquo and Mac Gill shared the fate of their sovereign, and Mac Duff, another powerful baron, escaped only by flying into England; but his wife and children suffered all the vengeance of the tyrant, and were murdered. Macbeth afterwards retired into the Highlands upon the invasion of the English, headed by Malcolm, son of the murdered Duncan, and at last fell in battle by the hand of Mac Duff. His history is become very familiar and interesting to Englishmen, by the sublime delineations of Shakspeare's tragic muse.

MACBRIDE, David, a native of Ballymony, in Ireland, descended from an ancient Scotch family. He studied medicine at Glasgow, and for some years was employed as a surgeon in the navy. He settled in 1749 in Dublin, and acquired celebrity as a practitioner, and as a man of letters, and of general information. He turned his thoughts also to chymical and philosophical subjects, and regardless of private emolument, he nobly communicated to the public the result of his important discoveries. He published a valuable Treatise on the Sea Scurvy, and a Methodical Introduction to the Theory and Practice of Medicine, a work of singular merit; and he made some ingenious improvements in the mode of tanning leather. This respectable man, amiable in his private character, and deservedly beloved by his relatives and friends, fell a prey to a nervous fever, which proved fatal, Dec. 1788, in his 62d year.

MACCABEES, seven brothers, Jews, who were cruelly put to death one after the other, with their mother and the aged Eleazer, at Antioch, during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, B.C. 168. There were chief men among the Jews of the same name who bravely supported the honour of their country. Their names were Judas, Simon, Matthias Maccabaus.

MACDIARMID, John, an ingenious writer, was born in 1779, at Weem, in the county of Perth, of which parish his father was minister. He was educated for the church, but relinquished that pursuit; and, on coming to London, became editor of the St. James's Chronicle. In 1083 he published "An Inquiry into the System of Military Defence," 2 vols. 8vo.; which was followed by "An Inquiry into the Nature of Civil and Military Subordination." His last work was entitled "Lives of British Statesmen," 4to. He died in 1808.—W. B.

MACE, Francis, a writer of the Sorbonne, who died at Paris, 1721. His best works are Chronological Abridgment of the Old and New Testament, 2 vols. 4to.—a Moral History, called Melania—the History of the Four Ciceros, 12mo. a curious work—an analysis of St. Augustine's works.

MACE, Thomas, an English musician, born 1613. He was one of the clerks of Trinity college, Cambridge, and is known by his work called "Music's Monument," or a Remembrancer of the best practical Music, &c. The book was printed 1676, when he was 63. The time of his death is unknown. He had a wife and children.

MACEDO, Francis, a Jesuit, born at Coimbra, in Portugal, 1596. He quitted his order for that of the Cordeliers, and went in the employment of his patron, the duke of Braganza, to Rome, where he gained the friendship of Alexander VII. After being promoted to offices of trust and importance he fell out with the pope and retired to Venice, and afterwards became professor of moral philosophy at Padua. By his interference in the state affairs of Venice, he offended the magistrates, and was thrown into prison, where he died 1681, aged 85. It is said in the "Bibliothèque Portugaise," that he published 109 different works, most of which are now forgotten. He possessed abilities and a very great memory, as he boasts some where that he had written or pronounced 150,000 verses extemporaneously. His brother Anthony was also a Jesuit, in the confidence of Christina queen of Sweden, as to him were intrusted her intentions of renouncing the protestant faith. Among other things he wrote Lusitania Insulata et Purpurata, 4to.

MACEDONIUS, Arian, bishop of Constantinople, in 341, in opposition to Paul. He was deposed by a council 359, after causing great troubles in his diocese by his ambition, as well as his opinions. In consequence of his disgrace he became the founder of a new sect, which supported that the Holy Ghost was a mere creature, only a little superior to the angels.

MACER, Æmilius, a Latin poet of Verona, in the age of Augustus. He wrote poems on birds, herbs, serpents—on the ruin of Troy, &c. now lost.

MACER, Lucius Claudius, a proprætor of Africa, who declared himself emperor on Nero's death. He was put to death by Galba's order, A.D. 68.

MACFARLANE, Henry, a Scotch writer, educated at Edinburgh. He came to London early in life, and acquired some celebrity as an accurate reporter of the parliamentary speeches. He was afterwards engaged in the care of a school at Walthamstow, and died 1804. He wrote a History of the Reign of George III. in 4 vols. 8vo. and also published a Translation of Ossian's Poems into Latin.

MACHAM, Robert, an Englishman, in the age of Edward III. It is said that he eloped for France with his mistress, Anne Dorset, a lady of quality, against the consent of her parents, and that the ship in which they were, long driven out by unfavourable winds, stopped at an island, which was called Madeira. The crew escaped to the coast of Morocco, where in a state of slavery they related their adventures to Morales, a Spaniard, and after his return to Europe, ships were sent to the newly discovered island, where the remains of the unfortunate Macham and his mistress were found buried at the foot of a tree.

MACHAULT, John de, a Jesuit, rector of the Jesuits' college at Rouen, and afterwards of that of Clermont at Paris. He died 1619, aged 58. He wrote Latin notes on the History of Thuanus, which were pronounced seditious, and burned by the hands of the hangman. Two other Jesuits bore his name, and were able writers, John Baptist, who died 1640, and James, who died 1680, and was author of de Missionibus Paraguaviæ et Americ. &c.—de Rebus Japonicis—de Provinciis Goannæ—de Regno Cochinchin—de Missione Religiosorum, &c.

MACHET, Gerard, a native of Blois, distinguished as an ecclesiastic. He became principal of the college of Navarre, confessor to Charles VII. and bishop of Castres. He died at Tours, 1448, aged 68. He was one of those who revised the trial of the maid of Orleans, and declared in favour of that unfortunate heroine.

MACHIAVEL, Nicholas, a celebrated writer, born of a noble family at Florence, 1469. His first efforts were a comedy called Nicias, which proved so popular on account of its satire at Florence, that Leo X. sent for the actors to exhibit it to a Roman audience. Machiavel acquired, however, greater fame by his political writings. By the influence of the Medicis, and to recompense the sufferings which he endured on the rack, on suspicion of conspiracy with the Soderini, against Julius, afterwards Clement VII. he was made secretary and historiographer to the republic of Florence. He died in 1530, of a medicine which he had taken by way of prevention. The latter part of his life, it is said, was spent in poverty in the character of a profane scoffer and atheist. He declared, it is said, that he would rather be sent into hell after death than to paradise, because he should find nothing in heaven but beggars, poor monks, hermits, and apostles; but in hell he should live with popes, cardinals, kings, and princes. Besides Nicias, he wrote Mandragola and Clitia, two plays—the Golden Ass, in imitation of Apuleius and Lucian—a History of Florence, 4to.—a Discourse on the first Decade of Livy—a Treatise on the Military Art—the Life of Castruccio Castracani—a Treatise on the Emigration of the Northern Nations—but of all his works his treatise called “the Prince,” is the most famous. This book, which describes the arts of government, as usually exercised by wicked governors and by tyrants, is still a cause of dispute, and while some suppose that he merely exposed the arts of politicians to excite abhorrence of tyranny, and a love for genuine liberty, others imagine that he prescribed rules for governing, and the only method by which mankind could be managed, so that Machiavelism and tyranny are synonymous expressions. It is remarkable, however, that among those who commend him, he has Bacon, Clarendon, and Harrington, who consider him as an able and ingenious writer, and an enemy to tyranny and injustice, and as frankly warning us against what men do, that we may be the better able to guard against their insidious conduct. The book, first published 1515, and long patronised by popes and great men, to whom it was dedicated, was at last censured under the pontificate of Clement VIII. by the insinuations of the Jesuit Possevin, and of Bozius. His works were translated into English, with notes, &c. by Mr. Farnsworth, 1761, 2 vols. 4to. and republished, 1775, 8vo.

M'KEAN, Thomas, LL.D. governor of Pennsylvania, was born in Delaware, of an Irish family, and educated at Philadelphia, under Dr. Allison. As early as 1762 he was a representative from the county of Newcastle, and previous to the revolution, speaker of the assembly of Delaware, and in 1765 was a delegate to the congress which met at New-York. On the approach of the revolution, he appeared among the first to espouse the cause of his country, and held, during the whole period of the important struggle, a high rank in the public councils. In 1773 he was a member of the committee of correspondence of Pennsylvania and Delaware, and of the congress which convened in May, 1775. When the question was proposed to be decided respecting the declaration of independence, Mr. Reed, one of the delegates from Delaware, opposed the measure, Mr. Rodney was absent, but through the exertions of Mr. M'Kean, his casting vote was procured in its favour. During a short time, he commanded a regiment in the army, but the various important civil offices to which he was called led to the relinquishment of his military command. In 1776 he was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of Delaware. That instrument was drawn up by him, and under it he was appointed the first governor of the state. In 1778 he was one of the convention which framed the articles of confederation, and from July to October, 1781, was president of congress. In 1789 he was a member of the convention of Pennsylvania which ratified the constitution of the United States, and of that which framed the constitution of Pennsylvania. In addition to these offices, he held that of chief justice of Pennsylvania from 1776 to 1799, a period of 23 years, at the close of which he was elected governor of that state, as the successor of general Mifflin, and held the office till 1808. The character of governor M'Kean was marked by great energy and decision, and a warmth of feeling which sometimes betrayed him into acts of rashness and eccentricity, but not less often led to those of benevolence. He was a profound lawyer, attached to the system and forms of proceeding established in England, and undevatingly upright. The independence he maintained during the party animosities which prevailed towards the close of his administration as governor, created him many enemies, and led the legislature to threaten his impeachment, but the design was relinquished, and when from his removal from office passion subsided, he again became the object of esteem and veneration. He died June 24th, 1817, aged 84.  L.

M'KEAN, Joseph, D.D. LL.D., Boylston, Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory in Harvard University, Massachusetts, succeeded Mr. John Quincy Adams in that office, and was inaugurated Oct. 31, 1809. He was born at Ipswich, Massachusetts, April 19, 1776. His father was a native of Glasgow, and came to America in 1763. Dr. M'Kean was educated at Cambridge, and graduated in 1794. His studies in divinity were commenced under Dr. Dana, of Ipswich, and completed under Dr. Eliot, of Boston. He was settled over the church at Milton, in November, 1797. In 1804 in consequence of ill health, he obtained a dismission. After six years assiduous attention to his duties as professor of rhetoric, his health began rapidly to decline. He went to Havanna and there died, March 17, 1818. He held a high rank among the learned men of his country, was one of the most active members of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and also a member of the Historical Society of New-York, and one of the American academy. He wrote a continuation of Goldsmith and Wood's History of England, from the treaty of Amiens to that of Ghent, published in Boston in 1815.  L.

M'KEEN, Joseph, D.D. first president of Bowdoin college, Maine, was a native of Londonderry, New-Hampshire, and born in 1757. He received his education at Dartmouth, where he was graduated in 1774. After spending several years as a school teacher, he studied theology, and was settled at Beverley, in May, 1785, where he remained seventeen years, highly respected. He then received his appointment to the presidency of the college, and was inaugurated September 2d, 1802. He retained the office till his death, July 15, 1807. He possessed a strong mind, amiable manners, and respectable learning; and was much esteemed and highly useful.  L.

MACKENZIE, Sir George, a Scotch advocate of eminence, born at Dundee, 1636, and educated at the universities of St. Andrews and Aberdeen. He travelled abroad, and studied at Bourges; and in 1656 was called to the bar, where he soon acquired celebrity. In 1661 he was reprimanded by the court for dropping some unwary expressions while defending the cause of the marquis of Argyle, impeached for high treason, upon which he quickly and smartly replied that, "it was impossible to plead for a traitor without speaking treason." He was afterwards made a judge in the criminal court, king's advocate in 1674, and one of the lords of the privy council for Scotland. On the abrogation of the penal laws by James II. sir George resigned his office, but was soon after reinstated by the king. At the revolution, however, he again quitted his situation, and unable to approve public measures, he retired to Oxford, 1689, where he proposed to end his days in literary ease and tranquillity. He died in London, May 2d, 1691, and was carried to Edinburgh, where he was buried with great pomp and solemnity. As a writer, sir George was very respectable. He wrote, Aretino, a serious romance—Religio Stoici—Moral Essays, &c.—a Defence of the Antiquity of the Royal Race of Scotland—Cælia's Country-House and Closet, a poem—some pieces on the laws of Scotland, &c. Though censured by Burnet as a superficial man, and though blamed by some as a severe judge, sir George is represented by Wood as a man of great abilities, of unshaken integrity, the friend of his country, and of religion and virtue. He founded the advocates' library in Edinburgh.

MACKAY, John, an Englishman, who followed the fortunes of James II. in his exile. He proved, however, unworthy of his master's confidence, as he dishonourably betrayed all his secrets to William III. He wrote, Picture of the court of St. Germain, 1691—Memoirs of the Court of England in the reigns of William and Anne, published at the Hague, 1733, works curious and interesting, and he died at Rotterdam, 1726.

MACKLIN, Charles, a dramatic writer and comedian, born in the north of Ireland. May, 1690. He altered his name of Mac Laughlin to the more agreeable sound of Macklin; and after various adventures in Ireland, appeared on the Lincoln's Inn theatre, 1725, as Alcander in Edipus. Nature, it seems, had been unfriendly to the actor, as Quin, with his usual humour, observed at the sight of his harsh forbidding features, "if God writes a legible hand, that fellow is a villain." He was unfortunately engaged in a quarrel with a fellow comedian, whom he killed in the heat of passion, for which he was tried and found guilty of manslaughter. He became, by degrees, a popular actor; but his chief character was Shylock, which he performed to such advantage, that Pope honoured his exertions with these two quaint lines;

This is the Jew That Shakspeare drew.

Macklin, long a favourite with the public, at last retired from the stage; but to improve a little more his narrow income, and to take a last farewell of the public, he was prevailed upon to appear once more, for his benefit, 10th Jan. 1790, at Covent-Garden. The character was his favourite Shylock, but the efforts required were too great for the powers of an exhausted old man. He found his memory fail him, and unable to support his part, he retired amid the plaudits of a commiserating audience. He died in a very great age, 11th July, 1797. He is author of two comedies, Love-a-la-Mode, and the Man of the World, which are still favourites with the town, but which reflect with severity upon the conduct of courtiers, and particularly of Scotch sycophants.

M'KNIGHT, Charles, physician, was born at Cranbury, New-Jersey, October 10th, 1750, and graduated at Princeton, in 1771. He studied Medicine under Doctor Shippen of Philadelphia, and entered the army, where his abilities soon attracted the attention of the commander-in-chief, and procured his appointment to the office of senior surgeon of the flying hospital of the middle department, the duties of which he discharged with distinguished ability. At the conclusion of the war, he settled in New-York, and became one of the most eminent of the profession in that city, particularly as a surgeon. He, for some time, delivered a course of lectures to a class on anatomy and surgery. He died in his forty-first year.

MACKNIGHT, James, a learned divine, was born at Irvine, in Argyleshire, in 1721, and educated at Glasgow, after which he went to Leyden. In 1753, he was ordained minister of Maybole, where he continued sixteen years, and produced his "Harmony of the Gospels;" and "A new Translation of the Epistles." In 1763 he published "The truth of the Gospel History;" for which the university of Edinburgh conferred on him the degree of doctor in divinity. In 1769 he removed to the living of Jedburgh, and three years afterwards he became one of the ministers of Edinburgh, where he died in 1800.—W. B.

MACLAINE, Archibald, an able divine, born at Monaghan, where his father was a dissenting minister. He was intended for his father's profession, and was, therefore, sent to Glasgow university, after which he went to Holland, as assistant minister to his uncle, Milling, the pastor of the English church at the Hague. He succeeded his uncle, and married at the Hague the daughter of Mr. Chais, the minister of the French protestant church, by whom he had four children. He continued the zealous and active pastor of his church, till the troubles of 1796, when he came over to England, and retired to Bath, where he died, 1804. He is known not only as an exemplary and pious minister, but as the intelligent author of Letters to Soame Jenyns, on his View of the Internal Evidence of Christianity. He also published some sermons, and gave to the public a valuable translation of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History.

MACLAURIN, Colin, an able mathematician and philosopher, born at Kilmoddan, in Scotland, Feb. 1698. He was educated at Glasgow, where he early distinguished himself by his genius, and by his great application: and in 1717 he honourably obtained the professorship of mathematics in the Mareschal college of Aberdeen. In 1719 he came to London, where he became acquainted with the great literary characters of the age, Bishop Hoadley, Newton, Clarke, and sir Martin Folkes; and in 1722 he went abroad as tutor to the eldest son of lord Polwarth. On the death of his pupil at Montpellier, he returned to his professorship at Aberdeen, and was soon after, by the interest of his friends, and the recommendation of sir Isaac Newton, elected assistant professor of mathematics in Edinburgh, to James Gregory, whose infirmities rendered him incapable of lecturing. In 1745 he was very active in fortifying Edinburgh against the rebels, and this rendered him, for some time, unpopular, so that he fled to England, and found an honourable asylum with Herring, archbishop of York. The fatigues, the troubles, and uneasiness which he had endured, however, proved too strong for his delicate constitution, and laid the foundation of a dropsy in the abdomen, of which he died 14th June, 1746, aged 48. The best known of his works are, System of Fluxions, 2 vols. 4to. 1742—Geometria Organica, or the Per-cussion of Bodies, which obtained the prize of the Royal Academy of Sciences, 1724—a treatise of Algebra—an Account of sir Isaac Newton's Philosophical Discoveries, 4to. and 8vo.—and various valuable communications, published in the philosophical transactions. His abilities were very great and universal, and in the perfecting of machines, the working of mines, the improving of manufactures, and in hydraulic experiments, and in all public works of utility and science, he was ever willing to lend his ingenious and powerful assistance. If his life had been longer he would have favoured the world with a course of practical mathematics. Of seven children, two sons and three daughters, with his widow, survived him.

MACLEAN, John, M.D. was the son of an eminent surgeon of the same name, in the city of Glasgow, Scotland, where he was born in March, 1771. After pursuing his literary, philosophical, and medical studies successively at Glasgow, Edinburgh, London and Paris, he commenced the practice of surgery at Glasgow, in 1791. In 1795 he came to America; and in the same year was appointed professor of chymistry and natural history in the college of New-Jersey, at Princeton. Two years afterwards, he was chosen professor of natural philosophy and mathematics in the same institution, the duties of which office he continued to discharge with great reputation to himself, and advantage to the college until the year 1812, when he resigned his office at Princeton, in consequence of being appointed professor of natural philosophy and chymistry in the college of William and Mary in Virginia. Here, however, he remained but a few months. His health declining, he returned to Princeton, where he died in February, 1814, in the forty-third year of his age. As a physician, a surgeon, a natural philosopher, a mathematician, and above all, as a chymist, Doctor Maclean was very eminent. As a college officer he was uncommonly popular and useful. He received the degree of M.D. from the university of Aberdeen, in 1797. His principal publication bore the title of "Lectures on Combustion," intended to support the Lavosierian system of chymistry, in opposition to Doctor Priestley. Besides this he wrote several other papers in controversy with Dr. Priestley, which were published in the New-York Medical Repository.

MACON, Anthony le, a native of Dauphiny, who translated the Decameron of Boccace, to please Margaret of Valois, queen of Naples, to whom he was private secretary. He wrote also the Loves of Phydias and Gelasine.

MACPHERSON, James, a Scotch writer, born in 1738. He first claimed general notice 1762, by the publication of some poems, attributed to Ossian, the son of Fingal, which, though beautiful and deservedly admired, soon excited a violent controversy about their authenticity. Dr. Johnson, with forcible arguments, attacked them, and when censured in an angry and menacing letter by Macpherson, he returned that celebrated reply preserved by Boswell. The poems, however, were ably defended by Dr. Hugh Blair, and though for some time it appeared rather a national question, in favour of Scotland, Mr. Whitaker, among the English writers, has warmly espoused the cause of their authenticity. In 1773 Macpherson published a translation of the Iliad, in heroic prose, which is no longer held in esteem. His introduction to the History of Great Britain and Ireland appeared in 1771, and his History of Great Britain from the Restoration to the accession of the house of Hanover, was published 1773, in 2 vols. 4to. In 1775 he supported the measures of lord North, by his "Rights of Great Britain over her Colonies asserted," and was rewarded by the ministers with a seat in the House of Commons, in 1780, and the lucrative office of agent to the nabob of Arcot. He died in Scotland, 17th Feb. 1796, and was buried in Westminster-abbey.

MACPHERSON, sir John, bart. governor-general of India, was born in the Isle of Sky, about the year 1767, and was educated at Aberdeen. He embarked in the service of the East India company, and signalized himself at the capture of Mongaloon. In 1781 he was appointed a member of the supreme council of Bengal, and in 1785, the charge of the office of governor-general of India was devolved on him as the senior member of that body, and he discharged its duties two years. He spent the latter part of his life in England, and died Jan. 12, 1821.

MACQUART, James Henry, a native of Rheims, eminent as a physician. He translated into French, Haller's Medical Thesis, 5 vols. 12mo. and died universally respected, at Paris, 1768, aged 46.

MACQUER, Philip, a French lawyer, descended from a Scotch family, who followed the fortunes of the house of Stuart. He wrote an abridgment of Ecclesiastical History, 3 vols. Svo.—Roman Annals, 8vo.—Abridgment of the History of Spain and Portugal, 2 vols 8vo. all after the manner of Henault. He died at Paris, 27th Jan. 1770, aged 50.

MACQUER, Peter Joseph, brother to the preceding, was born at Paris, 9th Oct. 1718, and was made professor of physic in the royal gardens, and member of the Academy of Sciences. He published Elements of Chymistry, Theoretical and Practical, 3 vols.—a Dictionary of Chymistry, 2 vols.—Formulæ Medicament. Magistral.—and other works, and died at Paris, 16th Feb. 1784.

MACRET, Charles Francis Adrian, an engraver of eminence, born at Abbeville. He died of a slow fever, Dec. 1783, aged 33, in consequence of the lamented death of an amiable wife. His engravings are highly esteemed.

MACRIANUS, Titus Fulvius Julius, an Egyptian, who, from a private soldier, became a general; and on the captivity of Valerian, declared himself emperor, 258. He was defeated and put to death by Gallienus, 262.

MACRINUS, Marcus Opilius Severus, an African, who rose from the obscurest situation to the dignity of Emperor on the death of Caracalla, 217. He was put to death by his soldiers, 218.

MACRINUS, John, a Latin poet, whose real name was Salmon. He died 1557, at an advanced age, at Loudon, his native place. His hymns, Næniæ, and other pieces, were much admired; so that he was called the French Horace. His son Charles, was equally eminent as a poet. After assisting in the education of Catherine of Navarre, sister to Henry IV. he was sacrificed at the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

MACROBIUS, Ambrosius Aurel. Theodos. a Latin writer in the fourth century, author of a Commentary on Cicero's Somnium Scipionis—and of Saturnalia, or Miscellanies, best edited 1694, 8vo.

MACWHORTER, Alexander, D.D. presbyterian minister of Newark, New-Jersey, was a native of Delaware, and born in 1734. He received his collegial education at Princeton, where he was graduated in 1757; and having studied theology with the reverend William Tennent, was settled in the ministry at Newark in 1759. He left his people in 1778, and became chaplain to general Knox's brigade, and in the following year removed to North Carolina, and settled at Charlotte, but in 1781 returned to Newark, where he continued till his death in 1807. He was highly respectable for the vigour and soundness of his mind, and the extent of his learning, and was very successful in his ministry. ¶ L.

MADAN, Martin, an eminent preacher, born about 1726. He was brought up to the bar, but through the conversation of Jones and Romaine, two ministers of influence among the Methodists, he took orders. He had the care of the patients of the Lock hospital, and by his strenuous exertions, a chapel was built for the institution, and opened in 1761, with a sermon from him. In 1767 he exposed himself to much obloquy by advising his friend Mr. Haweis, to retain the rectory of Aldwinckle, against his solemn engagements. He was, in his opinions, a strong Calvinist, and published some occasional sermons—a Comment on the 39 Articles—Letters to Dr. Priestley—a translation of Juvenal and Persius, 2 vols. 8vo.—Thoughts on Executive Justice. His work, however, in 3 vols. 8vo. 1781, called Thelyphthora, excited universal attention, and drew upon him severe animadversions. In this book the author, by some acute argumentation, supports polygamy; and considering the first cohabitation with a woman a virtual marriage, he thus wishes to remove or lessen the causes of seduction. He died after a short illness, May, 1790, aged 64.

MADDEN, Samuel, D.D. a name which, according to Dr. Johnson, "Ireland ought to honour," was of French extraction, and was educated at Dublin. In 1731 he appeared as a benefactor to Dublin college, by offering premiums for the promotion of learning; and in 1740 he appropriated the yearly sum of 100*l.* as a proffered premium to such natives of Ireland as improved arts and manufactures, or excelled in painting and in sculpture; a noble example, which was copied by the English nation in the establishment of the society for the encouragement of arts and sciences in London. This truly worthy, benevolent, and virtuous man, after thus proving himself the benefactor of Ireland, died there 30th Dec. 1765. He had some valuable church preferment, and was a man of property. He wrote 1732, Memoirs of the twentieth century, being original letters of state under George VI. 8c. 6 vols. 8vo. which it appears was printed with great despatch by three printers, and four days after the publication, of the 1000 copies issued out, 890 were recalled and suppressed by the author. He published also in 1743 or 4, a long poem, called, Boulter's Monument.

MADDERSTEG, Michael, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a painter. He was the pupil of Ludolph Backhuysen, and his sea pieces were deservedly admired. He died 1709, aged 50.

MADDOX, Isaac, an English prelate, born in London, 27th July, 1697. His parents were very humble, and he lost them both early, upon which he was placed by an aunt with a pastry-cook, who refused to keep him because he paid more attention to his books than his business. He afterwards was sent to a Scotch university, but disliking their tenets, he entered Queen's college, Cambridge, under the patronage of bishop Gibson, and obtained a doctor's degree at Lambeth. He obtained the rectory of St. Vedast, Foster-lane, London, and in 1729 was appointed clerk of the closet to the queen, in 1733 dean of Wales, bishop of St. Asaph 1736, and translated to Worcester 1743. In 1733 he published a Vindication of the Church of England, against Neal's history of the Puritans; and published besides, 14 single sermons, preached on various occasions. He was a great benefactor to several hospitals; he encouraged the British fisheries, and promoted the erection of the Worcester infirmary. He died 27th September, 1759, and of one son and two daughters, only one daughter survived him.

MADISON, James, D.D. president of the college of William and Mary, and bishop of the episcopal church in Virginia, was born about the year 1749. He enjoyed the advantages of a fine education, and early became distinguished for talents and learning. He was appointed a professor in the college of William and Mary about the commencement of the revolution, and not long after president of that institution, in which office he continued till his death, and was highly useful and popular. As a minister he was enlightened, candid, courteous to other sects, devout, and a rich blessing to the church over which he presided. He died March 6th, 1812, in his 63d year. ☞ L.

MADISON, George, governor of Kentucky, was the son of bishop Madison. At the age of seventeen he volunteered as a soldier, and accompanied the Green-Briar militia to the defence of the western frontier. He was engaged in several battles with the Indians, and was wounded in St. Clair's defeat. In the war of 1812 he was an officer in the battle of Raisin. He had been twenty years auditor of the public accounts, when he was called to the office of governor, in 1816. His death took place soon after at Paris, Kentucky, and he was buried at Frankfort. ☞ L.

MADOG, son of Owen Gwynedd, a Welsh prince, who is said to have sailed with 10 ships and 300 men, about the year 1170, and never to have returned. Some authors imagine that he went to the American continent, as they report that a tribe of White Indians, speaking the Welsh language, now inhabit the country about the northern branches of the Mississippi.

MADOX, Thomas, a famous antiquarian, and historiographer-royal. He was most indefatigable in the study of the laws and constitutions of the country, and in 1702 distinguished himself under the patronage of lord Somers, by the publication of his "Collection of Antique Charters and Instruments of divers kinds, taken from the originals, from the Norman conquest, to the end of the reign of Henry VIII." In 1711 he published the History and Antiquities of the Exchequer, from the Norman conquest to the end of the reign of Edward II. folio, dedicated to queen Anne, and reprinted 1769, 4to. His last work was, Firma Burgi, or Historical Essay concerning the cities, towns, and boroughs of England, inscribed to George I. This most active and laborious historian was prevented by death from completing other valuable works. His Collection of Transcripts in 94 folio and quarto volumes, the labour of 30 years, was presented by his widow, to the British Museum.

MÆCENAS, Caius Cilnius, the friend of Augustus, is particularly known as the patron of Virgil and Horace, and of the other learned men of his age. From this liberal protection afforded to learning, all patrons of literature have deservedly received the name of Mæcenas. This illustrious Roman was distinguished at the battles of Mutina and Philippi, and in the civil government of Rome; but his chief pleasure was literary retirement, in the company of his learned friends. He died eight years B.C.

MAES, Godfrey, a native of Antwerp, 1660, eminent as a historical painter. He was director of the academy of painting at Antwerp.

MÆSTLINUS, Michael, a German astronomer, born in the duchy of Wirtenburg, and educated in Italy. He became professor of mathematics at Tübingen, and had among his pupils the great Kepler. He published several very valuable works in astronomy and mathematics, and deserved for his learning and genius, the unreserved commendations of Tycho Brahe and Kepler. He died 1590, aged 48.

MAFFEI, Vegio, a Latin poet, born at Lodi, in Lombardy, 1407. He studied jurisprudence, and was professor of law at Pavia, after which he went to Rome, where he was made chancellor under Martin V. where he died 1459. His prose works are, Dialogus de Miseria et Felicitate—de Educatione Liberorum, 4to.—Disputatio inter Solem, Terram, &c.—de Perseverentia Religionis—besides many admired poetical pieces, and epigrams, and the 13th book, or continuation of the Æneid, translated into English burlesque by Mr. John Ellis. Jul. Scaliger and Ger. Vossius highly commend him.

MAFFEI, Bernardin, author of a Commentary on Cicero's Epistles—and a treatise on Medals and Inscriptions, was a cardinal, and died at Rome, 1558, aged 40.

MAFFEI, Raphael, a learned author, who died at Volaterra, 1521, very old.

MAFFEI, John Peter, a Jesuit, born at Bergamo, 1536. He wrote, the Life of Ignatius Loyola—History of the Indies—translation of some letters, &c. in Latin, and died at Tivoli, 1603, much esteemed by the pope.

MAFFEI, Francis Scipio, marquis, an Italian nobleman, born at Verona, 1675. He distinguished himself at Verona, on a thesis on love, where the umpires were ladies, and afterwards displayed great valour in the army at the battle of Donawert, 1704. He returned, however, to literature; wrote an able treatise "on Duelling," and then produced "Merope," a tragedy, and "Ceremonia," a comedy, which were represented with applause, and by their delicacy, and purified language, seemed to correct and reform the licentious extravagance of the stage. In 1732 he travelled through France, and after visiting England, Holland, and Germany, and receiving every where the respect and attentions due to his rank, his merits, and his virtues, he returned to Italy, to the cultivation of his favourite studies. He died 1755, and carried with him the regret and the affections of the Veronese, who honoured his remains with the most solemn obsequies, and pronounced an oration over him in their cathedral. This amiable writer published besides, History of the Diplomatic Science—Musæum Veronense, folio—Verona Illustrata, folio—a translation of the first book of the Iliad—a selection of Italian tragedies, 3 vols. 8vo. and other works.

MAGALOTTI, Lorenzo, count, a native of Florence, member of the academies of Crusca and Cimento. He was an elegant poet, and possessed merit as a curious naturalist. He died 1712, aged 75. The best known of his works is, Canzonette Anacreontiche, Svo. published under his Arcadian name of Lindoro Elateo.

MAGANZA, John Baptist, a historical painter of Vicenza, in Italy, who died 1617, aged 40.

MAGELHAENS, John Hyacinth de, a Portuguese ecclesiastic, member of the royal London society, and other learned bodies. He was author of some valuable works in natural and experimental philosophy, and died 1790, in London, where he had been settled for many years.

MAGELLAN, Ferdinand, a celebrated Portuguese navigator, who served with distinction under Albuquerque, in the conquest of the Indies. On his return home, his services were neglected, and his active mind therefore sought protection and employment at the court of Charles V. who sent him in 1519, with a fleet, on a voyage of discovery. Magellan passed, in his expedition, through those straits at the southern extremity of America which still bear his name, and advanced through the south seas to the Ladrone islands, of which he took possession in the name of the Spanish monarch. Here he was slain in 1520, either by the natives, or, as some accounts say, by his own rebellious crew. One of his ships only, with 18 men, escaped, and after sailing round the world, reached Seville, 8th Sept. 1521.

MAGGI, Charles Maria, an Italian poet, born at Milan, 1630. He was secretary to the senate of his native town, and died there 1699. He may be styled one of the most active restorers of elegant taste in Italy, after the frivolities and barbarisms of the school of Marini. His works have been published, with an account of his life, by Muratori, 4 vols. 12mo. Milan, 1700.

MAGINUS, John Anthony, a native of Padua, mathematical professor at Bologna, and author of Astronomical tables—Ephemerides—and other works. He died 1617, and it is reported that he ascertained the time of his death by the accuracy of his astronomical calculations.

MAGISTRIS, Simon de, a native of Serra, who died at Rome, 6th Oct. 1802, aged 75. He was well known for his deep acquaintance with the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and his services to literature were liberally rewarded by Pius VI. who made him bishop of Cyrene. He published a Greek edition of Daniel, folio, 1772—and also edited Acta Martyrum, &c.—and Dionysii Alexandr. quæ supersunt, &c.

MAGIUS, or MAGGI, Jerome, a learned

Italian, born at Anghiari, in Tuscany. He was eminent in the circle of the sciences, and was sent by the Venetians as judgemartial to the isle of Cyprus, where he distinguished himself as an active engineer, in the defence of the town of Famagusta against the Turks. When at last his efforts failed, he was in 1571 thrown ignominiously into prison, where, however, his mental resources soothed his sufferings, and enabled him to write two treatises, upon bells, and upon the wooden horse, which he dedicated to the ambassadors of the emperor, and of the French king. These learned labours, however, hastened his end; for no sooner did the ambassadors interfere for his release, than the bashaw Mahomet ordered him to be strangled in prison, 1572 or 3. Magius wrote besides, de Mundi Exitio per Exustionem, Libri quinque, 1562, folio—Vitæ Illustrum Virorum, Æmilio Auctore, cum Commentariis—Com-mantarii in quatuor Institutionem Civilium Libros, Svo.—Miscellaneous, &c.

MAGIUS, Bartholomew, brother to the above, was a physician, and died at Bologna, 1552. He was author of a treatise on Gunshot Wounds, 4to.

MAGLIABECCHI, Antony, a learned Italian, born at Florence, 1636. He was bound apprentice to a goldsmith at Florence, but his fondness for books prevailed over the attentions of manual labour, and at the death of his mother, he, as his own master, devoted himself totally to learning. He soon distinguished himself among the learned, by a strong, and incredibly astonishing memory; and became known to Cosmo III. duke of Florence, who appointed him his librarian. Simple in his manners of life, he disregarded the luxuries and conveniences provided for him by his patron, and remained satisfied with an humble habitation, containing a straw chair for his table, and another for his bed, while an old cloak served him for a gown by day, and for a covering by night. The liberal offers of preferment made by the pope, and by the emperor, were rejected with similar indifference, and he showed that the company of his books to him was greater gratification than the most elevated situation. Though leading a sedentary life, he lived to the great age of 81, and at his death left the valuable library which he had collected, for the public use, with a decent fund for its maintenance. Though he published no work himself, he encouraged the publication of others, and to him we are indebted for the Latin poems of Settimmello—the dialogue of Benedict Aretin, and other works. A collection of letters, written to him by various learned men was published at Florence, 1745, Svo.

MAGENTIUS, a German, who, from a private soldier, became emperor of Rome, after the murder of his benefactor Constans, 350. He was defeated by Constans, the brother of the murdered Constans, and was put to death at Lyons, 353.

MAGNI, Valerian, a native of Milan, employed in the service of Urban VIII. as a missionary in the north of Europe. The Jesuits, with whom he was engaged in controversial disputes, prevented his obtaining a cardinal's hat. He died at Saltzburg, 1661, aged 75. He wrote some controversial works, and was a zealous defender of Des Cartes's philosophy.

MAGNON, John, a French poet, who for some time was an advocate at Lyons, and then became a dramatic writer. His pieces were very indifferent; the best is Artaxerxes, a tragedy. He formed the plan of writing an Encyclopedia, in verse, but was prevented, as he was murdered by thieves in the streets of Paris, 1662. He was the friend of Moliere.

MAGNUS, John, archbishop of Upsal, was born at Lincoping, 1488. He warmly opposed the reformation in Sweden, and when he found himself exposed to persecution in consequence, he retired to Rome, where he died, 1544. He wrote a History of Sweden, in 24 books, folio—a History of the Archbishops of Upsal to 1544, folio.

MAGNUS, Olaus, brother of the preceding, and his successor as archbishop. He was at the council of Trent, and distinguished himself also by his opposition to the protestants. He died at Rome, 1560. He is author of a History of the Manners, Customs, and Wars of the People of the North, folio, 1555.

MAHMED, Aga, a noble Persian, made eunuch by Kouli-Khan, who had murdered his father and his brothers. He became a warrior of renown, and waged successful war against the Russians. He made himself master of the best part of Persia, and already prepared to seize Astracon, and to shut the Caspian sea against the Russian commerce, when death stopped the progress of his conquests, 1788.

MAHOMET, or MOHAMMED, the celebrated impostor, was born 571 A.D. at Mecca, in Arabia, and was of the tribe of the Korashites, and the noblest and the most powerful of the country. He lost his father before he was two years old, and his mother before he was eight; but their affectionate attention was supplied by the care of his uncle, Abu Taleb, a merchant. In the family of this friendly protector, he was employed to travel with his camels between Mecca and Syria, till his twenty-fifth year, when he entered into the service of Cadiga, a rich widow, whom though 12 years older than himself, he married three years after. Thus suddenly raised to affluence and consequence above his countrymen, he formed the secret plan of obtaining for himself the sovereign power. In his frequent journeys through the deserts of Arabia, he had observed the various sects which divided the opinions of the Eastern Christians; and in the ardent pursuits of ambition, he considered that nothing could so firmly secure to him the respect and the attachment of the world as laying the foundation of a new religion. The plan was bold, but it was pursued with vigour, and executed with slow and cautious steps. Withdrawing himself, therefore, from the society of the dissipated and licentious, he assumed the imposing character of superior sanctity, and every morning retiring to a solitary cave near Mecca, he devoted the day to prayer, abstemiousness, and holy meditation. Well tutored in the arts of imposture and hypocrisy, he, in his 40th year, assumed the title of the apostle of God, and gradually increased his fame and his followers by perseverance, and by the aid of pretended visions. Though his doctrines were embraced at first only by his wife Cadiga, and eight other dependents, yet in the fifth year of his assumed mission, he found his followers increased to the number of 39, among whom were men of rank and of consequence. Enemies, however, were not wanting to oppose the self-delegated prophet of God; and while some heaped on him the odious appellations of an impostor, a liar, and magician, others suspected his designs, and foresaw his bold and rapid strides to the sovereign power. Mahomet, notwithstanding, overcame all opposition: in proclaiming himself the favourite prophet appointed by God to propagate a new religion, he flattered the passions and prejudices of his nation; and among a people whose climate is exposed to the dry heats of a scorching sun, he allured the imagination by painting rivers of cooling waters, shaded retreats, luxurious fruits, and all the sensual delights of the immaculate houris, for the happy proselytes of his doctrine; while he denounced against his enemies not only temporal punishments, and dreadful visitations in the present life, and exclusion from paradise, but the most excruciating torments, a habitation in a continual fire, surrounded with a black, hot, salt smoke, without the ability of breathing any but the most noxious heated air, and of drinking the most foul and nauseous water. These promises and threatenings were not announced as the figurative language of an impostor, but the prophet delivered them as the command of God, and produced occasionally various chapters, which had been copied from the archives of heaven, and were brought down to him by the angel Gabriel. Whatever difficulties arose, either from the doubts or the suspicion of the new converts, were quickly removed by the condescension of the obedient angel, and a fresh revelation was sent down from heaven on every trying occasion, to support the character and maintain the sanctity of Mahomet. When the wavering proselytes seemed to demand miracles from a prophet who called himself superior to Moses and to Christ, the impostor, with an air of authority, declared that God had sent Moses and Jesus with miracles, and yet that men would not be obedient to their word, and that therefore he had sent Mahomet in the last place, without miracles, to force them by the power of the sword to do his will. Thus commissioned by heaven to enforce his religion by the sword, he refused longer to answer questions, and to indulge disputes, and when he found himself exposed to danger at Mecca, he left the city, and retired to Medina, where his doctrines had found a more friendly reception. This event, which happened about the 16th July, 622, forms the celebrated era of the Mahometans, called the Hegira, or flight from Mecca. At Medina the prophet erected his standard; and, as for the preceding 13 years he had endeavoured to spread his doctrines by persuasion, he now determined to propagate them by the sword. The two first years after his flight were employed in predatory excursions against the travelling caravans, and those of his neighbours who refused to embrace his tenets; but after subduing and exterminating several of the tribes of Arabia, he at last marched against Mecca, and, after fighting a battle, granted a truce to his enemies, by which he not only confirmed his power as a prophet, but established his authority in assuming the title of independent sovereign over his nation. Thus formidable by his conquests, and dreaded for his cruelty, he next turned his arms against Caibar, a city inhabited by Jewish Arabs; and after he had taken it by storm, he fixed his abode in the house of one of the principal men of the place, whose daughter placed before him a poisoned shoulder of mutton, which she had prepared for his supper. The poison was so powerful that Basher, one of the attendants on the prophet, died immediately; but the impostor himself, though he only tasted the meat, never fully recovered his strength, and perished three years after in consequence of the fatal food. The accident might have shaken the faith of his followers, as the woman declared, that if he were a prophet, he would have known that the meat was poisoned: but Mahomet enforced the tenets of predestination in his favour, and converted even his misfortunes into an engine of punishment against his enemies. His next expedition was against Mecca, which, as he pretended, had broken the truce, and though defeated in one battle, he had the good fortune to secure the victory; and at last, so to exert his power over the neighbouring tribes, that in the 10th year of the Hegira, his empire and his religion had enslaved the whole of Arabia. As he had recommended to his followers a pilgrimage to Mecca, he himself performed it, while his lieutenants and officers were employed around in the destruction of heathen temples, and the abolition of idolatry; and after instructing the various devotees which flocked to him from all parts of Arabia, he returned to Medina. It was his last journey; he soon after fell sick, the poison which three years before he had taken, began to operate more powerfully, and, after a confinement of 13 days, the prophet died, A.D. 632, aged 62. He was buried in the same place where he died, in the chamber of the most beloved of his wives at Medina, where his remains are still preserved, and not in an iron coffin suspended in the air, between two loadstones, as is vulgarly reported. By Cadiga, Mahomet had six children, one of whom only grew up, Fatima, but survived him only 60 days. After the death of Cadiga, the prophet, who had hitherto been satisfied with one wife, married several, and kept besides a great number of concubines. By none of his wives, who, according to some, were 15, and according to others, 21, he left no issue; but of the ten who survived him, Ayesha, the daughter of Abubeker, his successor, was the most beloved. So great was the influence of this celebrated female among the faithful, that she prevented Ali, the husband of Fatima, from succeeding to the throne of his father-in-law, because he had revealed her incontinence to the prophet. The success of Mahomet's imposture during his life time, is not more astonishing than the permanent establishment which his doctrines have maintained over one of the fairest portions of the globe, during nearly 1200 years. The Koran, in which are contained the tenets of his religion, is a compound of sublime truths, of incredible tales, and ludicrous events, but the whole is delivered in a pleasing, elegant, and nervous style. That Mahomet, who was rude and illiterate, should compose a book, deservedly esteemed the standard of elegance among the Arabians, without divine assistance, was considered as impossible among his followers, and therefore they believed the sublime composition to be the work of God, as the prophet informed them. Those, however, who were acquainted with the retreat of Mahomet before he assumed his prophetic character, know that he was assisted in the framing of his work by a Persian Jew, who was well versed in the learning of his country, and the laws of Moses; and by a Christian Monk of the Nestorian sect. To the labours of these two men the prophet was indebted for the composition of the Koran, and hence we trace the frequent allusions to the Mosaical institutions, and the history of Christ. By the help of these associates, the artful Arabian was enabled to impose upon his followers, by interpreting various passages of the Scriptures in his own favour, and by accusing the Jews and Christians of mutilation and interpolation, where he thought he found his character obscurely delineated. By calling himself the comforter, whom Christ, at his ascension, had promised to his disciples, he mightily prevailed with the credulous; and every true Musulman believes, that several copies of the New Testament still contain an original text, which expressly foretells the future coming of a prophet of the name of Mahomet. As Mahomet was subject to the falling sickness, he had the art to persuade his disciples, that in those moments of suspended animation, he accompanied the angel Gabriel in various journeys; and that borne by the celestial beast Alborak, he ascended up into the highest heavens where he conversed familiarly with the Almighty, and received friendly communications with respect to the laws and the religion with which he was to bless the earth. In these spiritual conferences, he saw the most renowned prophets of old; he spoke to Elijah, Moses, and Christ, and was honoured by the Creator himself, with privileges above the rest of mankind. The Koran has been elegantly translated into English, by Sale, in 2 vols. 4to. and 2 vols. 8vo. There are also French translations by Du Ruyter, and by Savary. The best edition of the original, in Arabic and Latin, is by Maracci, at Padua, 2 vols. folio, 1698.

MAHOMET I. emperor of the Turks, was son of Bajazet I. and succeeded his brother Moses, whom he put to death, 1413. He was a brave, just, and politic monarch. He restored to its ancient glory, the power of the Ottomans, which civil war, and the ravages of Tamerlane, had enfeebled and disgraced, and he conquered Cappadocia, Servia, Wallachia, and other provinces, and fixed his residence at Adrianople. He was at peace with the emperor Manuel Palæologus, to whom he restored some of his provinces. He died at Adrianople, of a bloody-flux, 1421, aged 47.

MAHOMET II. emperor of the Turks, was born at Adrianople, 24th March, 1430, and succeeded his father Amurath, 1451. His reign was begun with the most active preparations for war, Constantinople was besieged, and the indefatigable Turk, not satisfied to insult the walls with his numerous soldiery, conveyed at great expense and labour over the land, some of his galleys into the harbour, which the Greeks had shut up by strong iron chains against the attacks of their invaders. Constantinople yielded to the conqueror, 1453, and in her fall poured forth her fugitive philosophers and learned men to propagate and to revive literature in the western world. Afterwards Mahomet extended his arms against the neighbouring nations, and by his victories, deserved the name of great, and the appellation of grand signior, which he assumed, and which has descended to his less worthy successors. Greece and Asia had already submitted to the conqueror, who after subduing two empires, 12 tributary kingdoms, and 200 towns, was preparing the subjugation of Italy, and the destruction of the papal throne, when a colic proved fatal to this formidable hero, 3d May, 1481, after a reign of 31 years. His death was the cause of universal rejoicing over the Christian world, whose religion he had sworn to exterminate, to enforce the tenets of Mahomet. Though a great warrior, Mahomet was cruel and tyrannical, and that he might glut his rage, his lust, and his ambition, neither rank, nor sex, nor age were spared. Though by habit and religion hostile to the Christians, he yet admired the arts and the languages of polished Europe, and read with great rapture the history of her heroes. Some of his letters were collected by a knight of Rhodes, and translated into Latin, from the Syriac, Greek, and Turkish originals.

MAHOMET III. succeeded his father Amurath III. 1595. He began his reign by ordering 19 of his brothers to be strangled, and 10 of his father's wives to be drowned. He made war against Rodolphus II. and invaded Hungary with an army of 200,000 men, and after taking Agria, he basely murdered the garrison which he had pledged himself to spare. His progress was checked by the opposition of Maximilian, the emperor's brother, who would have obtained a most decisive victory had not his troops abandoned themselves to pillage, and thus given the Turks the opportunity to rally and to overwhelm their whole army. Other battles proved less favourable to Mahomet, who was obliged to retire from Hungary, Moldavia, and the neighbouring provinces, and after suing in vain for peace from the Christian princes, he buried himself in the indolence, and the licentiousness of his seraglio, regardless of the murmurs of his people, and the threats of his enemies. He died of the plague, 20th Dec. 1603, aged 39.

MAHOMET IV. succeeded to the throne at the age of seven, 1649, on the death of his father Ibrahim I. who had been strangled by his janissaries. He pursued with vigour the war with the Venetians, and after reducing Candia, with the loss of 200,000 men, he invaded Poland. His arms proved here victorious, he not only subdued the provinces, 1672, but imposed on the kingdom an annual tribute of 20,000 crowns. This disgrace, however, was wiped off by the valour of Sobieski, who the next year pursued his enemies, and totally routed them at the fatal battle of Choczim. Though peace was re-established in 1676, the restless ambition of the Turks again invaded the Austrian dominions, and Vienna would have fallen 1683, if the great Sobieski had not hastened to its relief, and destroyed the numerous army of Mustapha, the Turkish general. The decisive blow was followed by the union of the emperor, the king of Poland, and the Venetians, and Mahomet every where defeated, found his people dissatisfied, and his soldiers rebellious. The calamities of the state were attributed to him by his janissaries, who deposed him 8th Oct. 1687, and sent him to the prison, from which they drew his brother Solyman III. to place him on the throne. He died in his confinement, 22d June, 1691.

MAHOMET V. son of Mustapha II. succeeded in 1730, on the deposition of his uncle, Achmet III. His janissaries expected from his exertions, the recovery of the provinces conquered by the imperialists, but the insurrections in the east, and the war with Persia, prevented his success against the European powers. He lost Georgia and Armenia, which were conquered by the arms of Kouli-Khan. Mahomet was more respectable for his pacific disposition, than his military exploits. He died after a mild reign, in 1754.

MAHUDEL, Nicholas, a native of Langres, who from a Jesuit became a monk of La Trappe, and then a physician. He was author of a Historical Dissertation on the ancient Spanish Money—a Letter on a Medal of the city of Carthage, &c. He practised physic at Paris, but was for some time confined in the Bastille. He died 1747, aged 74.

MAIER, Michael, a celebrated German alchemist, and rosycrucian of the 17th century, who ruined his health and his fortune in the pursuits of absurdities. He wrote ten different treatises on his profession, and on his favourite pursuits.

MAIGNAN, Emanuel, a philosopher and ecclesiastic, born at Toulouse, 1601. He was educated among the Jesuits, and from his early youth showed great fondness for learning, and at the age of 18 he took the habit of a Minim. He warmly opposed the doctrines of Aristotle, and his reputation as a philosopher and mathematician was so widely extended, that he was called, in 1636, to fill a professor's chair at Rome. In 1650 he returned to Toulouse, from Rome, and was honourably received by his countrymen; but when the French king and his minister Mazarine, admiring his learning, and the various machines and curiosities contained in his cell, expressed a desire to draw him out of his obscurity, and patronise him in Paris, he modestly, but firmly declined their offer. This worthy man, so much above the temptations of the world, whose sole employment was to be useful to mankind, died at Toulouse, much respected, 1676. Father Sagueni published, in 1697, an account of his life and writings. He published "De Perspectivâ Hororariâ," 1648—a Course of Philosophy, 4 vols. 8vo. 1652, republished in folio, 1673, &c.

MAIGROT, Charles, a learned doctor of the Sorbonne, bishop of Conon, and vicar apostolic. He went as Missionary to China, where he opposed the jesuits, who permitted the Chinese converts to pay homage and adoration before the sepulchres of their forefathers. He wrote an Examination of the Chinese worship, &c. and died at Rome, 1720, universally respected.

MAILLA, Joseph Anne Maria de Moyrice de, a jesuit, born in the province of Bugey, on the borders of Savoy, 1670. He applied himself so assiduously to the Chinese, that his great knowledge of the language recommended him as a missionary to China, in 1703. The emperor Kam-Hi esteemed him so much, that he employed his abilities in the construction of a map of China, and of Chinese Tartary, which was engraved in France, 1732. He also translated the Great Annals of China, which he transmitted to Europe, and which were to comprehend 12 vols. 4to. the first of which was published in 1777, under the care of Grosier. This amiable man died at Pekin, 1748, after a residence of 45 years there.

MAILLARD, Oliver, a French cordelier, and doctor in divinity, eminent as a preacher. He was in the service of Innocent VIII. Charles VIII. and Ferdinand of Arragon. He died at Toulouse, June 13th, 1502. His Latin sermons, in 3 vols. 8vo. were published 1730.

MAILLE DE BREZE, Simon de, bishop of Viviers, and archbishop of Tours, was at the council of Trent, and distinguished himself by his learning and devotion. He translated some of Basil's homilies into Latin, and died 1597, aged 82.

MAILLE, Urban de, marquis de Brezé, was known as a warrior. He gained the battle of Avein, 1635, and was afterwards ambassador of France, to Sweden, and Holland. He died 1650, aged 53. His son Armand was duke of Fronsac and Caumont, and distinguished himself as a naval officer in the service of France. He defeated the Spanish fleet near Cadiz, 1640, but after some other important advantages at sea, in the following years, he suffered a defeat before Tarragona. He was killed by a cannon shot, 14th June, 1646, at the siege of Orbitello, aged 27.

MAILLE, Francis, a native of Pontevéz.

in Provence, celebrated for his longevity, and his gallantries in old age. He died 1709, aged 119.

MAILLEBOIS, N. count de, lieutenant-general in the French armies, distinguished himself in the German wars, and was in 1784 sent to Holland, to resist the attempts of Prussia against the Dutch patriots. At the revolution he left France, and died at Maestricht, 1792.

MAILLEBOIS, John Baptist Desmarets, marquis of, son of Nicholas Desmarets, the comptroller-general, first distinguished himself in the wars of the Spanish succession, and in Italy, and by the conquest of Corsica, for which he was made marshal of France. In the war of 1741 he again signalized himself, but was defeated by count Brown, at the battle of Placentia, 1746. He died Feb. 1762, aged 80. His Campaigns in Italy were published, 3 vols. 4to. 1775, by marquis de Pezay.

MAILLET, Benedict de, a learned Frenchman, born in Lorraine, 1659. He was sixteen years consul general in Egypt, and was removed to the same honourable appointment at Leghorn. He retired on a pension in 1716, and died at Marseilles, 1738, aged 79. From his papers were afterwards published, a Description of Egypt, in 4to. 1743, and also in 2 vols. 12mo. and a work on the origin of the Globe, in the form of a Dialogue, 1 vol. 8vo. by Telliamed, the name of De Maillet reversed.

MAIMBOURG, Lewis, a learned native of Nancy, in Lorraine, born 1610. He became a jesuit, 1626, but was expelled from the society by Innocent XI. for his bold opposition to Rome in favour of the Gallican church. The French king comforted him in his disgrace by an honourable pension, and he retired to the abbey of St. Victor at Paris, where he died 1686. He was eminent as a preacher, but more as a writer. He published Histories of Arianism, of the Iconoclasts, of the Crusades, of the Schism of the West, of the Schism of the Greeks, of the Decay of the Empire, of the League, of Lutheranism, of Calvinism, of the Pontificate of St. Leo. He had many enemies as a writer, but Bayle commends him as a candid, learned, and well-informed historian.

MAIMONIDES, Moses, or Moses son of Maimon, commonly called Moses Egyptian, because physician to the sultan of Egypt, was a Jewish rabbi, born at Cordova, in Spain, 1131. He opened a school in Egypt, and as his skill, not only in languages, but in all branches of science and of philosophy, was very great, his instructions were attended by numerous and respectable pupils. Thus eminently distinguished as a scholar, as a physician, and also as a divine, so as to be called inferior only to the legislator Moses; he beheld with indifference, and even contempt, the fables and traditions of his countrymen, and applied all the powers of learning, and the vast resources of his mind, in the cause of truth, virtue, and philosophy. Some of his works were written in Arabic, but are extant now in Hebrew only. The most famous of these are his Commentaries on the Misna---Jad, a complete pandect of the Jewish law---More Nevochim, a valuable work, explaining the difficult passages, phrases, parables and allegories in scripture, and several other works. This great and learned man died in Egypt at the age of 70, and was buried with his nation in the land of Upper Galilee. His death was mourned for three whole days by Jews and Egyptians, and the year in which he died, in respect of his great virtues and learning, was called Lamentum Lamentabile.

MAINFROY, prince of Tarento, was natural son of the emperor Frederic II. After the death of Conrad IV. of Sicily, in 1254, he was made guardian of the minority of his son Conradin; but his ambition soon prompted him to ascend the throne, and he was crowned king of Sicily, at Palermo. A quarrel with Innocent IV. kindled a war, in which the papal troops were defeated, and Rome besieged; but the next successor, Urban IV. undismayed, excommunicated his enemy, and bestowed his crown of Naples and Sicily, on Charles of Anjou, the brother of Lewis of France. The new king attacked the usurper, and in a battle at Benevento, 26th Feb. 1266, Mainfroy was defeated and slain, and his body was cast indignantly into a ditch, as he was excommunicated. Though an usurper, Mainfroy possessed many virtues, he patronised literature and the arts, and was an able warrior. His "Chasse aux Oiseaux," appeared 1696.

MAINTENON, Frances d' Aubigné, Madame de, a famous French lady, was born November 27th, 1635, in the prison of Niort, where her father was confined for some ill conduct against Richelieu. The father, after his enlargement took all his family, 1639, to America, and settled at Martiniquo, where he might have become respectable and independent, had he not ruined himself by gaming. On his death, in 1646, the widow returned to France, leaving her daughter as a pledge in the hands of her creditors, but the child was soon after sent after the mother, and taken under the hospitable protection of her aunt, Madame Villette, at Poieton. As, however, she was brought up in the principles of the protestants, an order from the court was obtained to remove her, and by artifice and persuasion, she was converted to the Roman catholic religion, by her bigoted relation, Madame de Neuillant. In 1651 she preferred, to this irksome confinement, an union with the abbé Scarron, who was old and deformed, but witty, and the favourite of the court. On the death of her husband, 1660, her distresses returned, and though for a while supported at the Hospitaler's convent at Paris, she solicited in vain for a small pension from the court. In 1671, however, she had the good fortune to be appointed over the education of the young duke De Maine, the king's son, by his mistress, Madame de Montespan, and from this situation arose her greatness. The king saw her, and was captivated with her manners and person, and in 1679 he purchased for her the estate of Maintenon, ten leagues from Versailles, from which she derived her new title. In this dangerous elevation, Madame Maintenon conducted herself with great propriety; she never interfered with the politics or intrigues of the court, her sole wish was to please and amuse the king, and in this she so happily succeeded, that though she was two years older than himself, he married her privately, 1685. Now raised from a mistress to the honourable rank of a wife, a secret, however, which was never revealed, she applied herself more frequently to acts of religion and of piety, and she founded an abbey for women of quality, afterwards called St. Cyr, of which she called herself the superior, and for the government of which, she, together with Desmarets, bishop of Chartres, formed good and strict regulations. She also prevailed upon Racine, who was now become a courtier, to write a tragedy upon some striking subject from the bible, and in consequence of this he produced his Esther, and also his Athaliah, which were originally acted by the religious devotees of St. Cyr. Upon the king's death, in 1715, she retired to privacy at St. Cyr, and long fatigued with the splendour of intolerable greatness, she acknowledged the emptiness of human distinction, and ended her days in penitence and devotion. Though the king had made no particular provision for her, yet she refused to accept from the bounty of the duke of Orleans, more than 80,000 livres. She died 15th April, 1719. Some have accused her of causing the revocation of the edict of Nantes, but it is certain that she extended her protection and liberality, to those who suffered persecution for their religion. She was generally the friend of virtue and merit, and she treated with particular attention and favour, Madame de Guyon, and also the great Fenelon, though afterwards she was weak enough to join his persecutors. The happiest part of her life was spent, says Voltaire, in the company of the buffoon Scarron, and in a letter to her friend, Madame de la Maisonfort, she declares that her grandeur was productive only of melancholy, and that though courted, flattered, and admired, she felt in her mind a dismal vacuity. Some of her letters have been published.

MAJOR, John, a divine, born 1469, at Gleghorn, near North Berwick, and not at Haddington. He studied at Oxford, and Cambridge, and also at Paris, under Boulac and Standouk, and on his return to Scotland, became divinity professor at St. Andrews, and afterwards provost of the university. He died about 1550. He was a very learned man, and wrote in a barbarous style, "De Historia Gentis Scotorum," 4to.—Commentarius in Physica Aristotelis, &c.—Literalis in Matthæum Expositio, &c.

MAJOR, John Daniel, a native of Breslaw, was medical professor at Kiel, where he founded a botanical garden. He wrote Lithologia Curiosa, sive de Animal, et Plantis in Lapidem conversis, 4to.—De Caneris et Serpent. Petrifact. 4to.—Historia Anatomæ, fol. &c. and died at Stockholm, 1693, aged 59.

MAJORAGIUS, Mark Anthony, so named from a village near Milan, where he was born, 1514, taught belles lettres at Milan with great reputation, and died 1555. He was author of learned Commentaries on Aristotle's Rhetoric—on Cicero's Oratory—on Virgil, fol. besides some other tracts.

MAJORIANUS, Julius Valerius, emperor of the West, was successful in his war against the Vandals. He was murdered by his general Ricimer, 461, universally respected for his virtues.

MAIRAN, John James d' Ortons de, a French philosopher, born at Beziers, 1678. He succeeded, in 1741, Fontenelle, as secretary to the academy of sciences, and displayed in that situation, great abilities. He died at Paris, 20th Feb. 1771. He wrote Dissertation on the cause of Phosphoric Light—on the Aurora Borealis—on Ice—Letters concerning China, and other things, published in the memoirs of the academy, &c.

MAIRE, John le, a French poet, born at Bavai, in Hainault, 1473. He wrote an allegorical poem, called Three Tales of Cupid and of Atropos, and other poems, in which he too often offended against delicacy. He died 1524, or according to others, 1548.

MAIRE, James le, a Dutch navigator. With two vessels he sailed 14th June, in 1615, from the Texel, and discovered in 1616, the straits to which he gave his name, in South America, and after touching at New Guinea, he reached Batavia. Here, though among his countrymen, he was seized as a spy, as violating the rights of the Dutch East India company, and his ship was confiscated. He died in his return to Europe, 22d January, 1617. His voyage is published in a Latin collection, Amsterdam. 1622. folio.

MAIRE, N. le, a surgeon of Lyons, who acquired eminence by his Treatises on the Nervous Fluid, and on Magnetism. He died at Lyons, Aug. 1787.

MAIRET, John, a French poet, born at Besançon, 1604. He was page to the duke of Montmorency, and distinguished himself against the Huguenots, and as a negotiator. He received a pension from the duke, and was patronised by cardinals Richelieu, and La Valette, and the count of Soissons. He died 1686. He wrote some poems and miscellanies, besides twelve tragedies of no great merit.

MAISIERES, Philip de, a native of Maisieres, in the diocese of Amiens. He served in the army in Sicily and Arragon, and afterwards he went to the Holy Land, and was among the forces of the infidels, that he might ascertain their number and discipline. After being employed by Peter, king of Cyprus, he returned to France, in 1372, and was made by Charles V. counsellor of state, and governor to the dauphin. Disgusted with the world, he retired among the Celestines, in 1380, and died 1405. He wrote some devotional tracts, &c.

MAISTRE, Anthony le, born at Paris, 1608, from a pleader became a member of the Port Royal Society, and led a life of austerity. He died 1658. He wrote a Life of St. Bernard—a Translation of Chrysostom de Sacerdotio, &c. and other works.

MAISTRE, Lewis Isaac le, better known by the name of Sacy, was brother to the preceding, and was born at Paris, 1613. He took orders, but on suspicion of Jansenism, he was in 1666 thrown into the Bastille. During his confinement of two years he composed several works, and translated the Bible, with annotations, in 32 vols. 8vo. He translated besides, some of Chrysostom's Homilies, three of Terence's Plays—Kempis, on the Imitation of Christ—an Attack on the Jesuits—Letters of Piety, 2 vols. &c. He died at Pompona, 1684, aged 71.

MAITLAND, John, lord of Thyrlstane, was born 1545. He was educated in Scotland, and studied the law afterwards in France, and practised with such success that James VI. made him his secretary of state, 1584, and the next year lord chancellor of the kingdom. He attended his master to Denmark in 1589, where the princess, his bride, was detained by contrary winds. He died much regretted, 1595. He wrote Epigrammata Latina, published in the Delicia Scotorum Poetarum, Amst. 1637.

MAITLAND, William, a Scotch antiquarian, born at Brechin, Forfarshire, 1693. From a hair merchant he became a man of letters, and settled in London, where he published his History of London, folio, 1739. In 1753 appeared his History of Edinburgh, folio, and in 1757 his History and Antiquities of Scotland, 3 vols. fol. He died at Montrose, aged 64, and left behind him a fortune, it is said, of 10,000*l*.

MAITTAIRE, Michael, a learned writer, born in London, 1668. He was educated at Westminster school and Christ church, Oxford, where he was made student, by the friendship of Dr. South, the canon. He was appointed second master of Westminster school, 1695, and continued four years in that office. He distinguished himself as a writer by two pamphlets against Whiston, in 1711, and by his Stephanorum Historia, &c.—Annales Typographici, 5 vols. 1719-1741—Opera Veterum Poetarum, 2 vols. folio—the Greek Testament, edited, 2 vols. 1714—Editions of Justin, Lucretius, Paterculus, Catullus, Terence, Virgil, Ovid, Martial, and other Latin classics—Græcæ Linguae Dialecti, 8vo.—Anacreon—Miscellanea Græcorum, &c. He was patronised by the first and second lords Oxford, and was Latin tutor to lord Chesterfield's favourite son. He died greatly respected, 7th Aug. 1747. His valuable library, the collection of 50 years, was sold after his death, during 44 nights, by auction, by Cock and Langford.

MAIUS, John Henry, or MAY, a Lutheran divine, born 1653, at Pfortzheim, in Baden-Dourlach. He was professor of oriental languages in several universities, and lastly at Giessen where he died 1719. He wrote Historia Animalium Scripturæ Sacræ, 8vo.—Vita Johannis Reuchlini, 8vo.—Synopsis Theologiæ Symbolicæ, 4to.—Historia Reformationis Lutheri, 4to. &c.

MAKIN, Thomas, a poet, and one of the earliest settlers of Pennsylvania, who employed himself a number of years in teaching a public grammar school in that colony, and for some time held the office of clerk of the provincial assembly. He published two Latin poems in 1728 and 1729, entitled "Encomium," and "Discriptio Pennsylvaniae."

MALACHI, the last of the 12 minor prophets, prophesied after Haggai and Zechariah, under Nehemiah. Some doubt whether there was such a prophet. He was supposed to have died young. He foretold chiefly the coming of John the Baptist.

MALACHY, St. a native of Armagh, successively abbot of Benetor, bishop of Connor, and archbishop of Armagh, which he resigned 1135. He died at Clairvaux, in the arms of his friend St. Bernard, 1148. He was a very learned man, and introduced some wise regulations in his diocese. The predictions attributed to him are properly considered as impositions.

MALAGRIDA, Gabriel, an Italian Jesuit, sent by his superiors into Portugal as a missionary. His zeal and his eloquence soon rendered him popular, and he became so ambitious that, it is said, he, with Alexander and Mathos, joined the duke d'Aveiro in his conspiracy against the king of Portugal. When the Jesuits were banished, he and his two companions were permitted to continue to reside in the kingdom, and there he became soon known as a violent enthusiast; he declared himself the ambassador and immediate prophet of God, and even pretended to work miracles. His extravagant conduct and his writings were at last noticed by the inquisition, and when he declared that the king's death had been revealed to him, he was condemned by the arbitrary tribunal, and was burnt alive, 21st Sept. 1761, aged 75, as a false prophet.

MALAYAL, Francis, a native of Marseilles, who though he lost his sight at the age of nine months, acquired some celebrity as a mystical writer on quietism. He published Spiritual Poetry re-edited Amsterdam, 1714—Lives of Saints—Life of Philip Benizzi. He died at Marseilles, 15th May, 1719, aged 92.

MALAYAL, John, a native of Pezan, near Nismes, who came early to Paris, and gained eminence as a surgeon. He contributed some valuable observations to the memoirs of the academy of surgery, and died 1758, aged 89, after surviving for some years the sound use of his faculties.

MALBONE, Edward G. miniature painter, was born in Newport, Rhode-Island, and educated at a common school. He early discovered a taste for painting, and employed himself in drawing likenesses, in which he at length became highly skilful. In 1800 he visited London, and improved his knowledge of his profession by intercourse with Mr. West, and other distinguished artists. He returned to the United States in 1801, and continued in his profession chiefly in New-York and Charleston until his death. He was one of the best in that branch of the art among his contemporaries. His taste was fine, and he excelled in the expression of character. He died at Savannah, May 7th, 1807, aged 31.

L.

MALCOLM, James Peller, an artist and antiquary, was a native of America, from whence he came when young to study painting at the Royal Academy. But failing in that line, he had recourse to engraving, and executed a number of topographical plates, chiefly for the works of Mr. Gough and Mr. Nichols. He also became a member of the Society of Antiquaries, and published—1. "Londinum Redivivum; or an ancient and modern Description of London," 4 vols. 4to.—2. Letters between the Rev. James Granger and many eminent men, 8vo.—3. First Impressions, or Sketches from Art and Nature, 8vo.—4. Anecdotes of the Manners and Customs of London, 4to.—5. Miscellaneous Anecdotes, 8vo.—6. A historical Sketch of the Art of Carriacaturing, 4to. He died in indigent circumstances in 1815.—W.B.

MALCOLM IV. grandson of David, king of Scotland, 1153. He was a liberal and benevolent prince, and founded several monasteries, and died 1165.

MALDONAT, John, a Spanish Jesuit, born at Fuente del Maestro, in Estramadura, 1534. He was an able scholar, and distinguished himself at the universities of Salamanca and Rome, and became a popular professor in 1563 at Paris, and afterwards in 1570 at Poitiers. He was also in the Jesuits' college at Bourges, and then went to Rome, by order of Gregory XIII. to superintend the publication of the Septuagint. He there finished his Commentary on the Gospels, and died 1583. He wrote besides Commentaries on Jeremiah, Baruch, Ezekiel, and Daniel—Various treatises on Grace—on Justice—Original Sin, &c. He is deservedly respected as an acute critic, an excellent theologian, well skilled in the learned languages, and he possessed moreover, says Thuanus, singular piety, and purity of manners.

MALEBRANCHE, Nicholas, a French philosopher, born at Paris, 6th Aug. 1638. He studied at the colleges of la Marche, and Sorbonne, and in 1660 was admitted into the congregation of the oratory. He applied himself at first to ecclesiastical history, and afterwards to rabbinical learning, but found these pursuits not congenial to his mind, till in the perusal of Des Cartes's treatise upon Man, he discovered that philosophy was the science in which he was destined to be illustrious. He now devoted himself to serious meditation, and even closed his windows not to be interrupted by the light. His first and greatest work is "de la Recherche de la Verité," or Search after Truth, printed at Paris, 1674. In this celebrated work the author proves that our senses and passions lead us to error, and that truth can be discovered only by thinking in God. Of human knowledge he speaks with contempt, but pays adoration to that sublime light which proceeds from the ideal world. In this, and in his other works, he shows himself, says Locke, an acute and ingenious author, abounding in fine thoughts, judicious reasonings, and uncommon reflections. His other works are all on the same metaphysical subjects, and are nothing but explanations of the principles laid down in his "search," with much depth of reasoning, and force of genius. He died 1715, aged 55.

MALEGUZZI-VALERI, Veronica, a learned lady, born at Reggio. She supported in public in a very satisfactory manner two theses on the liberal arts, which have been published, besides Innocence Recognised, a drama, and she died 1690, in the convent of Modena, where she had retired.

MALELAS, John, author of a chronicle from the creation, to the reign of Justinian, taught rhetoric at Antioch about 900. His works appeared at Oxford, 1691.

MALERMI, or MALERBI, Nicholas, a Venetian monk, who translated into Italian the Bible, printed at Venice, 2 vols. fol. 1471. He also wrote "the Legends of the Saints," 1474, fol.

MALESHERBES, Christian William Lamignon, a celebrated Frenchman, son of the chancellor of France. He was born at Paris 16th Dec. 1721, and brought up to the bar. He gradually rose to the office of first president of the court of Aides, 1750, and for 25 years was thus zealously engaged in the service of his country, in supporting and invigorating the industry of her inhabitants. After he had retired from this laborious duty to his estate, he was recalled in 1775, by Louis XVI. to become the minister of the interior, and in this high situation he conducted himself with the humanity and attention of a great and a good man. The prisons were visited, and no longer contained any but criminals who had violated the law; various employments were introduced to recommend habits of industry, and the apartments were rendered more commodious for the unfortunate captives. The retirement of Turgot from office was attended by that of his friend Malesherbes, who now employed himself in travelling under an assumed name and in a plain dress over France, Switzerland, and Holland, and in examining the various manufactures, curiosities, and arts of each province. He hailed the revolution as the forerunner of blessings to France, but soon saw his hopes vanish; yet while others fled from the field of danger, he boldly appeared before the convention; and actuated by gratitude and humanity, he no sooner saw his sovereign dragged as a criminal before his subjects, than he demanded the privilege and the honour of being his defender. The heroic conduct of this venerable man, while it drew admiration from all, had no effect on the bloody convention. His appeals in favour of Louis and of virtue were of no avail, and he was the first to announce to the unfortunate monarch the ill success of his defence. So much goodness it might have been expected ought to have met respect among a civilized nation, but it proved otherwise. No sooner was his daughter, the wife of the president Rosambo, accused of treason and hurried to prison, than the aged father requested he might accompany his beloved child. The request was granted, and in a few days, alas, he appeared with her and her child before the revolutionary tribunal, and with her and her innocent child he ascended the scaffold. These illustrious victims suffered 22d April, 1793. He was author of a treatise on Rural Economy; Thoughts and Maxims; Two Memoirs on the Civil State of the Protestants.

MALEZIEU, Nicolas de, a French author, born at Paris 1650. He was tutor to the dukes of Maine and Burgundy, and the distinguished friend of Bossuet, and of Montausier. He was involved in the disgrace of his patron the duke of Orleans, and died 4th March, 1727, aged 77. He published Elements of Geography, 8vo.; several pieces in prose, &c. He was member of the French academy, and of that of sciences.

MALFILLASTRE, James Charles Lewis, a French poet, born 8th Oct. 1732, at St. John de Caen. He died at Paris 6th March 1767. He was patronised by count Lauraguais, and his poem on Narcissus in the isle of Venus, acquired him celebrity. He wrote besides, odes, sonnets, &c. and in the midst of that retirement which he preferred to public life, he rendered himself amiable and respected by the benevolence of his heart, and the innocence and simplicity of his manners.

MALHERBE, Francis de, a French poet, who according to Bayle, Balzac, and Boileau formed the taste and judgment of his countrymen in matters of polite literature, and introduced, with purity of language, harmonious numbers and a just cadence. He was born at Caen, about 1555, and died at Paris 1628. He was patronised by Henry the Great, and Mary de Medicis, and the particulars of his life were written by his friend and companion Racan. Though an elegant writer, he composed verses with great labour. His poetical works, divided into six books, consist of paraphrases on the psalms, odes, sonnets, and epigrams, published 1666, with the notes of Menage, and 1757, 8vo. He also translated some of Seneca's works, and some of Livy's decades.

MALINGRE, Claude, a French historian, born at Sens. His best work is said to be the History of the Honorary Dignities of France, 8vo. His other compositions, which are numerous on historical subjects, are far from respectable. He died 1655.

MALIPIERRA, Olympia, a Venitian lady of noble birth, who wrote poems of some merit, inserted in Bulifon's collection, published at Naples, and died 1559.

MALLEMANS, Claude, a native of Beaune, member of the congregation of the oratory, and professor of Philosophy at Paris, where he died 1723, aged 77. He is author of a New Philosophical System of the World, 12mo,—the Famous Problem of the Quadrature of the Circle, 12mo. &c.

MALLEMANS, John, brother to the preceding, took orders after being captain of dragoons. Besides a translation of Virgil into French, he wrote a History of Religion from the Creation to the Reign of Jovian—Dissertations on Difficult Passages in the Scriptures, &c. He died 1740, aged 91.

MALLET, David, or MALLOCH, an English poet, born in Scotland about 1700, and educated at Edinburgh. He was recommended by his college to become tutor to the sons of the duke of Montrose, and after travelling with his pupils, he settled in London, where he was the companion of the great, the learned, and the witty. In 1724, he commenced author, and in 1733, paid his court to Pope in his "Verbal Criticism," a work of little merit. In 1740, appeared his life of lord Bacon, displaying more knowledge of history than of sciences, and soon after he undertook the life of the duke of Marlborough, at the request of the Duchess; but, says his biographer, many were apprehensive that as he had forgotten Bacon was a philosopher, he might not recollect that Marlborough was a general. The work never appeared. Mallet afterwards became secretary to the prince of Wales with a salary of 200*l.* a year, and assisted Thompson in the composition of his Masque of Alfred, which was repeatedly acted before the prince at Cliefden, 1740, and also at Drury-lane, 1751. The poet died 1765. His works have been collected in 3 vols. 12mo. but possess little poetical merit. He published lord Bolingbroke's works, 5 vols. 4to. as his lordship had left the care of them to him as his property.

MALLET, Edmund, a French divine, born at Melun, 1713. He was in 1751, made professor of divinity in the college of Navarre, at Paris, where he died, 1755. He was one of the writers of the Encyclopedia, on the articles of divinity and belles lettres, and composed besides several works on the principles of poetry and eloquence—Essay on the best Orators—a History of the civil Wars under Francis II. Charles IX. &c. from the Italian of Davila.

MALLET, Paul Henry, an historian, was born at Geneva, in 1730. He became professor of the belles lettres, at Copenhagen, and was a member of several learned societies. He died in 1807. His works are—1. Histoire de Danemark. 2. Histoire de Hesse, 3 vols. 8vo. 3. Histoire de la Maison de Brunswick, 3 vols. 4. Histoire des Suisses, 4 vols. 5. Histoire de la Ligue Anscatique, 2 vols. 8vo. Bishop Percy translated Mallet's Introduction to his History of Denmark, with the title of "Northern Antiquities," 2 vols.—W. B.

MALLET DU PAN, James, a native of Geneva, educated under the patronage of Voltaire, at Cassel, where he became professor of belles lettres. Afterwards as the continuator of the annals of Linguet, and the conductor of the Mercure de France, he acquired celebrity, but when the French revolution broke out, his attachment to the royal cause exposed him to the severest persecutions of the republicans. After being 115 times denounced as a dangerous man, and finding no safe asylum either in France, or in Switzerland, or at Geneva, he came to London, where he conducted the Mercure Britannique. In this periodical work, by wishing to please every party he offended all: the jacobins were disgusted with the details which recalled to mind their cruel excesses, and the emigrants were displeased that opinions were entertained which discouraged the introduction of the ancient government of France. Notwithstanding these jarring opinions it was evident that he possessed great powers of mind, independence of sentiment, and integrity of character. This learned but persecuted man died at Richmond, 15th May, 1800, in the house of his friend Lallitollendal, leaving a wife and five children, for whose maintenance a handsome subscription was raised. He wrote besides, the Influence of Philosophy on Literature, 8vo.—Discourse on Eloquence and Political Systems, 12mo.—Considerations on the French Revolution, 8vo.—Correspondence for an History of French Republicanism, 8vo. &c.

MALLINKROTT, Bernard, dean of the cathedral of Munster, was very learned but very turbulent. He was nominated to two bishoprics, but his ambition was to be bishop of Munster; yet he was defeated in his intrigues, and 1650, in consequence of his seditious conduct he was degraded, and afterwards imprisoned by his rival in the castle of Ottingheim, where he died 1664. He wrote de Natura et Usu Literarum, 4to. de Orto et Progressu Artis Typographicae, 4to.—Paralipomenon de Historicis Græcis, 4to. and other works.

MALONE, Edmund, the son of an Irish judge, was born at Dublin, in 1741. He was educated at the university of his native city, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple, and in 1767 was called to the bar; but being possessed of an independent fortune, he retired from the profession, and devoted himself to literature. In 1780 he published two supplementary volumes to Steevens's Shakspeare, and a detection of Chatterton's forgeries. In 1790 appeared his edition of Shakspeare; and in 1795 he exposed the imposture of the Irelands. In 1797 he published the life of Sir Joshua Reynolds; in 1800 that of Dryden, prefixed to an edition of his prose works; and in 1808 he printed the Life and Tracts of William Gerard Hamilton; and in 1811 a Biographical Sketch of the right Hon. William Windham. Mr. Malone died May 25, 1812.—W. B.

MALOUIN, Paul James, a native of Caen, professor of Medicine in the royal college at Paris, and physician to the queen. He wrote a treatise on Chymistry—on Medical Chymistry—and the Chemical Articles in the Encyclopedic. He died at Paris 1777, aged 76. Another of the same name and family was author of a Treatise on Solid and Fluid bodies, and practised as a physician. He died 1718.

MALPIGHI, Marcello, an Italian physician, born 10th March, 1628, at Crevalcuore, near Bologna. He studied anatomy and physic at Bologna, under Massari and Mariano, and took there his doctor's degree 1653. In 1656, he was appointed professor, by the senate of Bologna, but soon left it by the invitation of the grand duke of Tuscany, to settle at Pisa, where his curious experiments were assisted by his friend Borelli. In 1659, as the air of Pisa did not agree with him, he returned to Bologna, where he practised with great popularity. In 1662, he was prevailed upon to go to Messina as professor, and in 1691, the new pope Innocent XII. sent for him to Rome, and made him his physician. He died 29th Nov. 1694, in consequence of a paralytic stroke. His discoveries in anatomy were curious and important. By his delicate dissections he found out the lobules of the liver, and the nature of the formation and mechanism of the kidneys, and of the reins, and of the heart. His works were printed together, London, 1697, folio, and reprinted more correctly, Amst. 1698, in 4to.

MALUS, Stephen Louis, a mathematician, was born at Paris in 1775. He became a professor in the military school at Metz; after which he served as an engineer in the army, and went to Egypt, where he discovered a new branch of the Nile. He also drew a map of the country, on which he wrote a memoir, inserted in the "Decade Egyptienne." After distinguishing himself in several actions, he returned to Europe, and in 1811 obtained the Copleyan medal from the Royal Society, for his discoveries and experiments on double refraction. He was director of the Polytechnic school, a major of engineers, and superintendent of the fortifications. He died in 1812.—W. B.

MALVASIA, Charles Cæsar, a native of Bologna, author of an Italian History of the Painters of Bologna, 2 vols.—and Marmora Felsinea, 4to. 1660. He was canon of Bologna cathedral.

MALVEZZI, Virgilio, marquis of, an Italian writer, born at Bologna, 1599. He studied the law and took his doctor's degree, 1616, but afterwards he applied himself to arms, and was employed by Philip IV. of Spain, and admitted into his council of war. He died at Bologna 11th Aug. 1654. He wrote various works in Spanish and Italian, and was author of a discourse on Tacitus' first book of Annals, translated into English.

MAMBRUN, Peter, a French Jesuit, born at Clermont, 1581. He has written some elegant Latin eclogues and georgics in the style of Virgil, besides a heroic poem in 12 books, called Constantine, and a valuable "Peripatetic Dissertation." He died 1661.

MAMMEA, Julia, mother of the emperor Severus, is known for her virtues, and the judicious conduct which she displayed during the minority of her son. She was assassinated by the rebellious soldiers with her son, at Mayence, 235.

MAN, Cornelius de, a native of Delft, who, after studying painting in Italy and France nine years, returned to his country where he settled, and acquired celebrity by his representation of historical pieces, conversations, &c. He died 1706, aged 85.

MANARA, Prosper, an Italian poet and marquis, was born in the duchy of Parma, in 1714. He became chamberlain to the duke, and was intrusted with the education of the young prince Ferdinand, which office he discharged with such satisfaction, that he was advanced to several places of distinction. He died in 1800. His works were published by Bodoni, in 4 vols. 12mo. 1801, with his life prefixed.—W. B.

MANASSEH, succeeded his father Hezekiah, at the age of 12. Disgraced by his ill conduct, he was, 677 B. C. carried by Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, a captive to Babylon. His misfortunes and his captivity produced reflection and repentance, and when restored to his kingdom he became an exemplary monarch, and re-established the worship of the God of his fathers. There is an excellent prayer by him preserved in the Apocrypha. He died B. C. 643.

MANCINELLI, Antonio, an Italian poet and orator, born at Velitri, 1452. He published a poem, "Silva Vitæ Suæ," and other pieces, and died 1506.

MANCO-CAPAC, founder of the Peruvian empire, declared himself to be the descendant of the sun. After civilizing his subjects, and uniting their scattered tribes under one monarchy, he was regarded and worshipped as a deity after his death.

MANDEVILLE, Sir John, a famous English traveller, born at St. Alban's, 1300. He left England 1332, and during an absence of 34 years he visited the various countries of Scythia, Armenia, Egypt, Arabia, Media, Persia, Chaldea, Greece, &c. and made himself well acquainted with their language and manners. At his return he wrote an "Itinerary," or account of his travels, in English, French, and Latin, which is interesting and curious, but abounds with the marvellous and the fictitious. He died at Liege, 17th Nov. 1372.

MANDEVILLE, Bernard de, M. D. a Dutch physician, born at Dort, 1670. After studying in Holland, he came over to England in the beginning of the eighteenth century, where he wrote several books. His "Virgin Unmasked," a most licentious performance, was published 1709, and in 1711, his "Treatise of the Hypochondria and Hysteric Passions," a work of some merit. In 1723, he published his poem with notes, called "the Fables of the Bees, or Private Vices made Public Benefits," a work which was reprehended by the grand jury of Middlesex, and attacked from various quarters. The author took no notice of his opponents till 1728, when he published another volume called the second part of the Fables of the Bees. It has been observed that he improperly confounds superfluities and faults, and by representing human nature as low and vicious, and men as knaves and libertines, he destroys all the noble incentives to virtue. In 1720, he published "Free Thoughts on Religion," and in 1732, an Inquiry into the Origin of Honour, &c. He died Jan. 1733. The literary opponents of Dr. Mandeville, were Dr. Fiddes, J. Dennis, W. Law, Bluet, Hutcheson, A. Campbell, and Berkeley, bishop of Cloyne.

MANDRILLON, I. a native of Bourg-en-Bresse, who embraced the mercantile profession, and travelled in America and Holland. He settled in Holland, but his opposition to the Stadtholder made him unpopular, and he returned to France, where the independence of his character rendered him suspected to Robespierre, who ordered him to the guillotine, 1793. He wrote the American Spectator, 8vo. a work of merit, and other things.

MANES, the founder of a sect of the Manichees. He began to propagate about the year 277, his doctrines which indeed he had derived from others, especially one Scythianus, whose works had fallen into his hands. Mingling the pure doctrines of Christianity with the fables of paganism, he taught that there were two principles of all things, co-eternal and coeval, that is, God and the devil, that from the former all good, and from the latter all evil proceeded. The good being he called the author of the New Testament, the bad of the Old. God, he added, created the soul, the devil the body. The followers of these superstitious and incongruous notions were at one time very numerous. Manes pretended also to work miracles, and he was therefore sent for by Sapor king of Persia to cure his son, but his pretended power failed him, the child died in his arms, and the disappointed father ordered the prophet to be flayed alive, and his skin stuffed with chaff, to be hung up at the gates of the capital, where Epiphanius who refuted his doctrines and exposed his follies, saw it.

MANETHO, an Egyptian historian, author of a Greek history of his country, B.C. 304. His works are lost, except a poem on the influence of the stars, published Leyden, 1698.

MANETTI, Gianozzo, a native of Florence, illustrious as one of those active men to whom the revival of literature may be attributed. He studied under Chrysoloras, and read lectures at Florence, on the philosophy of Aristotle, and assisted in the affairs of the government. He afterwards retired to Rome, where he became secretary to pope Nicholas V. and next went into the service of Alphonso king of Naples, where he died 1459, aged 63. Besides a Latin translation of the Greek Testament, he wrote the lives of Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Nicholas V.; a treatise against the Jews; on the Dignity of Man; on the Works of Aristotle, &c.

MANETTI, Rutilio, a native of Siena, eminent as a painter. His works adorn the palaces of Florence and Pisa. He died 1639, aged 68.

MANETTI, Xavier, professor of botany and medicine at Florence, was keeper of the imperial garden, and author of Catalogus Horti Academiae Florent—Viridarium Florent, 8vo.—Ornithologiae Tomus Quintus et Ultimus, fol. 1775. He died 1785, at Florence.

MANFREDI, Eustachio, an Italian mathematician, born 1674, at Bologna, where he became mathematical professor. He was member of several learned societies, and died 1739. He wrote Ephemerides, 4 vols. 4to.—de Transitu Mercurii per Solem, 1723—de Annis Stellarum Aberrationibus, 4to. and also sonnets and canzonets, edited 1713.

MANFREDI, Bartholomew, a painter, born at Mantua 1574. He successfully imitated his master Michael Angelo, of Caravaggio, and in his representation of soldiers, sailors, peasants, and drunken scenes, &c. was much admired.

MANGEART, Thomas, a learned Benedictine, greatly honoured by the duke of Lorraine, to whom he was antiquary, librarian and counsellor. He died 1763. His great work is "Introduction to the Science of Medals," folio, besides sermons, &c.

MANGENOT, Lewis, a native of Paris, author of eclogues, fables, tales, and madrigals, &c. published Amsterdam 1776. He was an ecclesiastic, and died at Paris 1768, aged 74.

MANGET, John James, an eminent physician, born at Geneva 1652. He was physician to the elector of Brandenburg, and died at Geneva 1742, aged 90. He published Bibliotheca Anatomica-Pharmaceutica-Medica—Chirurgica—Scriptorum Medicorum; Chymica et Pharmacopeia, works of more labour than genius, and comprehended in 14 folio vols.

MANGEY, Thomas, fellow of St. John's college, Cambridge, and D.D. became rector of St. Mildred's Bread-street, vicar of Yealing, and prebendary of London. He published an edition of Philo-Judæus, 2 vols. folio; Remarks upon Nazareus, against Toland, 8vo.; and Practical Discourses on the Lord's Prayer, preached at Lincoln's Inn, of which the third edition appeared 1721. He died 11th March, 1755.

MANILIUS, Marcus, a poet in the reign of Tiberius. His Astronomicum, which was discovered by the learned Poggio in the 16th century, is best edited 1787, at Strasburg, 8vo.

MANLEY, Mary, an English writer, born at Guernsey, where her father Sir Roger was governor. She lost, when very young, her mother, and her father some time after, and in this distressing situation she was enticed into a marriage with a relation of the same name, to whose care her unprotected innocence had been intrusted by her dying parents. The new husband, who had already another wife, took his bride to London, and soon after cruelly deserted her. She afterwards became acquainted with the dutchess of Cleveland, one of the king's mistresses, but upon being dismissed by her, she determined to spend the rest of her life in retirement and obscurity. This might have succeeded, but her "Royal Mischief," a tragedy, when represented at Lincoln's-Inn-fields theatre, proved so popular that she was now courted and flattered by men of wit and gallantry, and she in an evil hour yielded her virtue to the lure of temptation. But though engaged in intrigues, she still continued to be an author, and her "Memoirs of the New Atalantis," a romance in 4 vols. in which she described in wanton language the amours of some distinguished characters, but in feigned names, drew upon her a prosecution. Her printer and publisher were apprehended, but she nobly appeared before the king's bench to take the blame upon herself, and after answering with spirit various interrogatories before the privy council, and being held in strict confinement, she was at last admitted to bail, and finally liberated. She afterwards wrote in favour of queen Anne's ministry, and died the mistress of alderman Barber of London, 11th June, 1724. She was author of Lucius king of Britain, a tragedy, acted 1717; Lost Lover, or the Jealous Husband, acted 1696, besides letters, &c.

MANLIUS, a famous Roman, who derived the name of Torquatus from his conquest, in single combat, of a gigantic Gaul whose collar, torquis, he carried away in triumph. When dictator he cruelly put his son to death for fighting without his orders, a circumstance which rendered him odious to his countrymen, B.C. 340.

MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS, Marcus, a Roman consul, who being suddenly awakened by the cackling of geese, preserved the capitol when besieged by the Gauls. He afterwards aspired to the sovereignty of Rome, and was thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, 384 B.C.

MANLY, John, captain in the navy of the United States, was a native of Massachusetts, and born in 1733. He became a mariner in early life, and in 1775 at the recommendation of Washington, was appointed a captain in the navy, and given the command of the schooner Lee, in which he performed a hazardous cruise in Massachusetts bay during a whole winter, and rendered essential service to the colonies by his numerous captures, particularly by taking a brig laden with munitions of war, the possession of which enabled the American army to drive the British from Boston. In reward for these services he was promoted to the command of the frigate Hancock, in which he captured the British frigate "Fox," but before he could return to port, fell with his prize into the hands of a superior British force, and was carried to Halifax, where he was long held a prisoner. On returning, in 1782, he was intrusted with the frigate Hague, with which he sailed to the West Indies, and to avoid capture by a vessel which was pursuing him, ran onto a sand bank in the rear of Guadaloupe, where he was for four days fought by four line of battle ships, from which he however escaped, and returned to Boston. He was there impeached before a court martial for improper conduct, and failed of accomplishing his entire justification. He then retired from public employment, and died in 1793.  L.

MANNERS, John, marquis of Granby, son of the duke of Rutland, was born, Jan. 1721. He distinguished himself as a soldier, and went to the German wars under Ferdinand of Brunswick, as general of the British forces; and during the campaigns on the continent obtained great and deserved popularity by his conduct in the battles of Minden, Warburg, Kirk-Denkern, Gräbstein, and Homburgh. He died 1770, highly respected by the nation and by the government.

MANNING, James, D.D. first president of the college of Rhode-Island, was born in New-Jersey in 1738, and graduated at Princeton in 1762. He entered the ministry and became highly popular. On the organization of a college by the Baptists in Rhode-Island, to which sect he belonged, he was selected to be its president, and removed in 1765 to Warren, in that state, where it was at first placed. Soon after the removal of the institution to Providence, in 1770, he was chosen pastor of a congregation there, and discharged the duties of both offices, with great ability and acceptance. In 1786 he was chosen a member of congress, but soon resigned the appointment. He died in July, 1791.

☞ L.

MANNINGHAM, Thomas, D.D. a learned prelate, educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He became rector of East Tystead, Hants, preacher of the Rolls, 1684, rector of St. Andrews, Holborn, 1691, the next year canon, and afterwards dean of Windsor, and 1709, bishop of Chester. He published some occasional sermons, and died 25th Aug. 1722, and was buried in St. Andrew's church.

MANNORI, Lewis, author of Memoirs and Pleadings, in 18 vols. 12mo. a work curious and interesting, was an advocate of the parliament of Paris, and died in that city, 1778, aged 82. He exposed himself to the satire of Voltaire, for being engaged in a cause against him.

MANNOZZI, John, a painter, born at St. John, a village near Florence. He was patronised by Lorenzo de Medicis, whose palace he adorned by the labours of his art, particularly in fresco. He was a man of capricious and irascible character. He died 1636, aged 46.

MANSARD, Francis, a French architect, born 1598. His genius was displayed in the erection of the gate of the church of the Feuillans, of the church of les Fillers Ste. Marie, the hotels de Bouillon, Toulouse, and Jars, and other edifices in Paris, and in the provinces. He was first architect to the king, and superintendent of the royal buildings, in which he was succeeded by his nephew, of the same name, also an ingenious man, who was honoured with the order of St. Michael. He died 1666, and his nephew 1708, aged 69.

MANSFELD, Peter Ernest, count de, an able statesman in the service of the emperor of Germany. He was made prisoner at Ivoy, 1552, and when restored to liberty, he obtained the government of Luxembourg, where his administration was conducted with prudence and ability, to the maintenance of tranquillity, in the midst of the troubles of Brabant. His services were considered as so meritorious that he was appointed governor of the whole country. He died 1604, aged 87.

MANSFELD, Ernest de, natural son of count Mansfeld, distinguished himself so much that he was legitimated by the emperor Rodolphus II. He was refused the succession of his father's honours and possessions, in consequence of which he joined the protestants in 1610, and showed himself a vigorous enemy of the house of Austria. He died at a village in the territory of Venice, Nov. 1626, aged 46.

MANSFIELD, earl of. See MURRAY.

MANSTEIN, Christopher Herman de, a Russian writer, born at Petersburg, 1711. He was a brave officer, and distinguished in the service of the Russian and Prussian monarchs. He was shot in the war of 1757, while serving as major-general at the head of a Prussian regiment, leaving two sons and four daughters. He wrote a valuable work, Memoirs of Russia, 2 vols. 8vo. printed at Lyons, 1772, and Leipzig, 1781, and published in English in 2 vols. 4to. under the care of Mr. Hume.

MANTEGNA, Andrea, an Italian painter, born at a village near Padua, 1451. He was originally a shepherd, but the rough drawings which he made for his amusement, were seen and admired: he was placed under a master, and improved so much, that at the age of 17 he painted the altar piece of the church of St. Sophia, in Padua. He painted also another celebrated piece for the duke of Mantua, the triumphs of Julius Cæsar, which have been placed in the collection of Hampton-court. He died at Mantua, 1517.

MANTICA, Francis, a native of Udina, professor of law at Padua. He afterwards went to Rome under the patronage of Sixtus VI. and of Clement VIII. who made him a cardinal. He wrote de Conjunctionis Ultimorum Voluntatum, folio—Lucubrations Vaticinæ—Decisiones Rotæ Rom. &c. and died 1614, aged 80.

MANTINUS, James, author of a book on the Republic of Plato, and translator of the works of Avicenna, and Averroes into Latin, was a Spanish physician in the 16th century, who practised with great reputation at Venice.

MANTON, Thomas, D.D. a native of Lawrence Lydiard, Somersetshire, educated at Wadham college, Oxford. He was ordained by bishop Hall, and had first the cure of Colyton, Devonshire, after which he settled at Stoke Newington, and became a popular preacher in London, and before the parliament. He was, at the restoration, chaplain to the king, but lost his preferment in 1662, for non-conformity, and in 1671 was imprisoned for officiating in a conventicle. He died 1677, aged 57, and was buried in Stoke Newington church. His works, consisting of Sermons, and other Calvinic tracts, were edited in 5 vols. folio.

MANTUAN, Baptist, an Italian poet, born at Mantua, 1448, the natural son of Peter Spagnolo, a man of distinction. He was affectionately educated by his father, and afterwards entered among the Carmelites, of whose order he became general. He, however, quitted them in disgust, 1515, and devoted himself to literature. He died the next year. His works, which possess not much animation, were printed at Paris, 1513, 3 vols. folio. A more perfect edition appeared at Antwerp, 1576, in 4 vols. 8vo.

MANUEL, Commenus, emperor of the east, after his father John, 114, and to the prejudice of his elder brother Isaac, whom his father had disinherited. After repelling the invasion of Roger, king of Sicily, he made war against Dalmatia, Hungary, and Egypt, which he might have conquered, if not perfidiously abandoned by Amoury, king of Jerusalem, on whose assistance he too strongly relied. He died 1180.

MANUEL, Palæologus, son and successor of John on the throne of Constantinople, took the monastic habit, and retired to a monastery, after resigning his dignity to his son, John VII. whom he considered as more capable than himself to repel the invasion of the Turks. He died 1425, aged 75.

MANUTIUS, Aldus, a celebrated printer, born at Bassano. He was the first who printed Greek with correctness and elegance; and he introduced that form of letters, still in use, called Italics. His editions of the classics were held in high estimation. He died at Venice, where he had long exercised his profession with much success, 1516. One copy of his capital works was always printed on vellum.

MANUTIUS, Paul, son of Aldus, was of the same profession. He was librarian to Pius IV. and seconded his attempts to print all the Fathers in a new and elegant manner. He was far more learned than his father, and acquired, by the frequent reading of Cicero, such facility of elegant composition, that Scaliger says, a Roman could not have written better. He wrote epistles, very laboured—and Commentaries on Cicero, 4 vols. folio. He wrote, besides, other works, the best of which is perhaps his book de Legibus Romanorum. He died 1574; and it is said his days were shortened in consequence of youthful follies, and of domestic calamities.

MANUTIUS, Aldus, the younger son of Paul, was also a printer. He promised in his youth to obtain greater celebrity than his father and grandfather; but he proved unfortunate. Negligence produced distress, and he at last became so indigent, that he sold the excellent library of 80,000 volumes, collected by his ancestors, to maintain himself. Pope Clement VIII. made him director of the Vatican press. He died very poor, 1597, at Rome. He wrote Commentaries on Cicero—a treatise on Orthography—Notes on Ancient Writers—three books of Epistles—the Lives of Cosmo de Medicis, and of Castruccio Castruciani, &c.

MANZO, John Baptist, marquis de Villa, an Italian, who after serving with credit in the Spanish army, devoted himself to literature at Naples, where he assisted in the foundation of the Degli Otiosi academy. He wrote a Life of Tasso, 12mo.—Del Amore Dialogi, 8vo.—Rime, 12mo. and died at Naples, 1645, aged 84.

MANZOULI, Tomaso, an Italian painter, whose historical pieces, landscapes, &c. were much admired. He died 1570, aged 39.

MAPES, Walter, a poet, chaplain to Henry II. Under John he was made canon of Salisbury, precentor of Lincoln, and archdeacon of Oxford. He wrote in Latin, in a satirical style, and some of his verses are still read and admired. He was a facetious companion.

MAPLETOFT, John, M. D. an English divine, born June, 1631, at Margate-Inge, in Huntingdonshire, and educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He travelled with the sons of the earl of Northumberland, and at his return he took his degrees in medicine, and settled as a practitioner in London. Here he was distinguished as the friend of Willis, Sydenham, and Locke: of Tillotson, Patrick, Sherlock, and other learned men, and in 1670 he went with lord Essex, the ambassador, to the court of Denmark. In 1675 he was chosen professor of physic of Gresham college, and in 1676 attended the ambassador Montague to France. He married in 1679, and then abandoning medicine, applied himself to divinity; took orders, 1682, and obtained the rectory of Braybrook, Northamptonshire, and some other preferment. When William was at Cambridge, 1689, he took his degree of D.D. and in 1707 was president of Sion college. He continued to preach in his church of St. Lawrence, Jewry, till he was turned of 80, and died 1721, at Westminster, aged 91. He translated Sydenham's Medical Observations into Latin, and wrote besides the Principles and Duties of the Christian Religion, 8vo.—and other things.

MARACCI, Lewis, vid. MARRACCI.

MARACCI, John, a painter, born at Lucca. His historical pieces exhibited great taste and judgment. He died 1704, aged 67.

MARAI, Marin, a celebrated musician, born at Paris, 1636. He composed some admired pieces for the theatres, especially Alcides—Ariadne and Bacchus—Semcle and Aleyone, the last of which is his best performance. He died 15th Aug. 1728, aged 72, leaving nine children, some of whom inherited part of his great musical talents.

MARALDI, James Philip, a mathematician, born at Perinaldo, near Nice, 1665. He studied in France, and was engaged with Cassini, in constructing the great meridian line through France. He died 1729, aged 64, leaving behind him a catalogue of the fixed stars, and curious observations, printed in the memoirs of the academy of sciences, and pieces on bees, and petrifications.

MARANA, John Paul, author of the Turkish Spy, a work once read with great avidity, and considered as authentic, but now regarded as half fictitious, was born at Genoa. He resided for some time at Paris, and again returned to his own country, where he died 1693, aged 51. The Turkish Spy was first published in 6 vols. 12mo. and in 1742, when the last edition appeared, another volume was added.

MARAT, John Paul, one of the atrocious leaders of the French revolution, was born at Beaudry, near Neufchatel, in Switzerland, 1744. He studied medicine, but with little knowledge of it, he acquired public notice by passing as an empiric, and by selling at a high price a water which he pretended could cure all diseases. After visiting England he returned to Paris, at the time that the revolution broke out, and with all the ardour of a man who wishes to profit by the miseries of the public, he began to attack the character of the ministers, especially Necker, in his Publiciste Parisien. To this vile but popular publication succeeded L'Ami du Peuple, in which he recommended in seditious language, revolt, pillage, and murder; he excited the soldiers to assassinate their generals, the poor to seize the property of the rich, and the profligate to cut off their enemies. Though the assembly viewed his conduct with detestation, and seized his papers, he continued his periodical labours, under the patronage of the Jacobins, and when elected deputy to the convention, he appeared in the hall, armed with pistols. Delighting in blood, he promoted the murders of September, and never satisfied with carnage, he, by repeated accusations, carried the most virtuous of the citizens, and the bravest of the generals, to the guillotine, and declared with exultation, that the happiness of France required for its consolidation the sacrifice of 300,000 more lives. This execrable wretch might still have added to the number of his victims, but a heroine arose to rid the world of the blood-thirsty tyrant. Charlotte Corday obtained access to him while he was in his bath, and with a blow of a dagger she laid the monster dead at her feet, 14th July, 1793. His remains were honoured by his sanguinary accomplices, with all the distinction due only to a hero, and were deposited in great pomp, in the pantheon. But though prejudice or fear exalted this monster to the rank of a god, and dedicated busts, pyramids, and temples to his honour, the public opinion soon changed, his memory was insulted, and his very body dug up, and thrown into a common sink. This worthless tyrant was, in his person, disagreeable and ferocious; he spoke with animation, but his looks betrayed the black purposes of his heart, and the words of an acient author have been properly applied to him;

*Corpore cum fædo, species est fædior oris,
Fædum pectus habet, fædus ingenium.*

He wrote Man, or the principles of the Influence of the Soul on the Body, and of the Body on the Soul, 1775, 2 vols. 12mo. a work severely criticised by Voltaire—Discoveries on Fire, Electricity, and Light, 8vo. 1779—Discovery on Light, 8vo. in which he attacks Newton's System—Memoirs on Electricity, &c.

MARATTI, Carlo, an Italian painter, born 1625, at Camerino, in the march of Ancona. His fondness for painting was early discovered, and he was sent to Rome, where he became pupil to Andrea Sacchi, and soon acquired celebrity by the grace and beauty of his figures. He was knighted, and received a pension from Clement XI. and was appointed painter in ordinary to Lewis XIV. He studied the pieces of Raphael, the Caraccis, and Guido, with astonishing success, and chiefly excelled as the painter of female saints and madonnas. He died at Rome, loaded with honours and opulence, 1713, aged 88.

MARBACH, John, a protestant divine, a native of Lindau, author of a curious book, called Fides Jesu et Jesuitarum, in which he compared the doctrines of Jesus with those of the Jesuits. He died at Strasburg, 1581, aged 60.

MARBODUS, or MARBODÆUS, surnamed Galus, a monk of Angers, bishop of Rennes, an honour which he resigned some time before his death. He wrote a book, "De Gemmis"—the Life of Magnoboldus, bishop of Angers—some sacred poems, &c. and died 1123.

MARCA, Peter de, an eminent French writer and prelate, born 1594, at Gart, in Bearn. He studied the law, and in 1621 was made president of the parliament of Bearn, and in 1639 counsellor of state at Paris. He published in 1640 "the History of Bearn," which widely established his reputation as an elegant writer, and a good politician, and was then engaged to defend and explain the liberties of the Gallican church, which some enemies of cardinal Richelieu represented as desirous of separating in an independent patriarchate from the see of Rome. His book, "De Concordiâ Sacerdotii et Imperii," 1641, though written with moderation, and at the command of the French king, gave some offence to the pope, and when the author in consequence of his services was nominated to the see of Conserans, his consecration was delayed till he had made his peace with his ecclesiastical master, by the publication of another treatise, De Singulari Primatu Petri, in which he asserted the supremacy of the pope. He was sent in 1644 as visitor general to Catalonia, and executed his office with such popularity, that when ill, the public prayers of the province were offered for his recovery. He took possession of his bishopric in 1648, and soon after was raised to the see of Toulouse, where he was admitted in 1655. He afterwards distinguished himself in the general assembly of the clergy in opposition to the Jansenists, and in 1658 was made minister of state. In 1660 he was engaged at Rosillon, on determining the boundaries of the French and Spanish territories in the Pyrenees, in which he was greatly assisted by his classical knowledge. He obtained in 1662 the high dignity of archbishop of Paris, but died there in June, on the same day that the bulls arrived from Rome to confirm his elevation. De Marca was a man of extraordinary talents, which he had assiduously cultivated at Toulouse. He was married, and had seven children, but on the death of his wife, 1632, he became an ecclesiastic, and rose to the dignities we have mentioned.

MARCEL, N. a painter of Frankfort. His vases, filled with fruits and flowers, his shells, &c. were finished in a pleasing style. He died 1683, aged 55.

MARCEL, William, author of a History of the Origin of the French monarchy, 4 vols. 12mo.—Chronological Tables of Ancient History, sacred and profane, was a French advocate, and died commissary at Arles, 1708, aged 61.

MARCELLI, Benedict, the prince of music, according to the flattery of the Italians, was a noble Venetian, who excelled not only in music, but also in philosophy, and in poetry. His "Fashionable Stage," in Italian, in which he ridicules modern operas, is his best prose composition, and his chief poetical work is the comedy Toscanismo, &c. He died 1739, aged 53.

MARCELLINUS, succeeded Caius in the popedom, 296, and died eight years after. He is vindicated by Augustine against the Donatists, who accuse him of offering sacrifices to the idols.

MARCELLUS, a physician of Side, in Pamphylia, whence he is surnamed Sidetes. He flourished under Adrian and the Antonines, and wrote a poem on medicine, now lost. A physician of Bourdeaux, author of some medical works, lived about 331 A.D.

MARCELLUS, I. pope after Marcellinus, 308, was banished by Maxentius, the emperor, for excommunicating a worthless apostate, and he died 310.

MARCELLUS II. pope after Julius III. died a few weeks after his elevation, 1555. He was a native of Montepuleiano, and was secretary to Paul III. who created him a cardinal, and made him president of the council of Trent.

MARCH, Ausias, a poet of Valentia in the 15th century. He wrote amatory verses in praise of his fair country woman, Theresa Bon, as Petrarch celebrated his Laura, and, in consequence of the similarity of their poetry, they have been accused of stealing one from the other, though it is probable that they both borrowed from some earlier poet.

MARCHAND, Prosper, a French writer, who quitted France to profess the protestant religion in Holland. He published there, "the Literary Journal," and died at a great age, 1756. He published besides, "the History of Printing,"—Dictionaire Historique, two small folio vols. and a new edition of the dictionary and letters of Bayle.

MARCHE, Oliver de la, a French writer, gentleman to Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, and afterwards in the service of Charles the Rash, who was slain at the battle of Nancy, 1477, and next in the employment of Maximilian of Austria, and of the arch-duke Philip. He died at Brussels, 1501. His works are "Memoirs or Chronicles," 4to. 1610—a Treatise on Duels, 8vo.—the Triumph of Virtuous Women, 8vo. 1529, &c.

MARCHETTI, Alexander, a physician and poet, born at Pontorno, near Pisa, 1633. He succeeded his friend Borelli as professor of Mathematics at Pisa, and in his lectures preferred reason and experiment to authority, and to Aristotle. He died 1714. He wrote poems in 4to.—treatises on philosophical subjects—a translation of Lucretius, in Italian verse, 4to.—a translation of Anacreon.

MARCHIN, Ferdinand count, a native of Liege, who signalized himself in the French armies at the battles of Fleurus and Nerwinde, and at the siege of Charleroi. He was sent in 1701, as ambassador from Lewis XV. to the king of Spain, and behaved with great disinterestedness in refusing the rank of nobility from the Spanish court. He was afterwards in the army in Germany, and commanded the retreat at the fatal battle of Hockstet. He was wounded at the battle of Turin, which had been fought against his advice, 7th Sept. 1706, and he died soon after the amputation of his thigh.

MARCIANUS, an obscure Thracian, raised to imperial dignity on the death of Theodosius II. His virtues were many, and the expectations of Rome were great, but he unfortunately died while preparing to repel the barbarians, who had invaded Africa, 457, aged 69.

MARCILIUS, Theodore, a learned German critic, born at Arnheim, in Gueldres, 1548. He was educated under his father, a man of learning, and afterwards at Deventer and Louvain. He visited Paris, and taught belles-lettres there, and in 1602 was made royal professor of the Latin tongue. He died 1617. Though abused by Scaliger, he was a learned man, and published Pythagoras' Golden Verses, with Annotations, besides Historia Stenarum, 8vo.—some poems and orations, &c.

MARCION, a heretic of the second century. He was born at Sinope, in Paphlagonia, where his father was bishop, and devoted himself to a life of mortification. Breaking, however, his vows of continence, he was excommunicated by his father, who never would again re-admit him within the pale of the church, in consequence of which he went to Rome, where his disgrace followed him. Unable to be reconciled to the church, he embraced the heretical opinion of Cerdo, to which he afterwards added the wild principles of Manes, with some incoherent doctrines of his own. It is said, that before his death he wished to renounce all his errors. The time of his death is unknown.

MARDONIUS, son-in-law of Darius, was at the head of the army of Xerxes, in his invasion of Greece, and he was killed at the battle of Plataea, B. C. 479.

MARDUEL, John, a native of Lyons, who studied for the ecclesiastical profession at Villefranche, Beaujolois, and Paris. He became minister of St. Roch, where his conduct as a pastor, as a peace-maker, and as a man, was most exemplary. He died universally respected, 1787, aged 88.

MARE, William de la, or MARA, a Latin poet, of noble birth in the Cotentin. Disgusted with the court, where he was secretary to the chancellor, he retired to Caen, where he became rector of the university, and in 1510 treasurer and canon of Coutances. He wrote two poems, Chimæra, 1514, 4to.—De tribus fugiendis, Venere, Vente, et Fluma, 1512, 4to.

MARE, Philibert de la, counsellor in the parliament of Dijon, was an elegant Latin writer, and died 1687. He wrote commentaries, De Bello Burgundico, 4to.—Historicorum Burgund. Conspectus, &c.

MARE, Nicholas de la, principal magistrate of the Chatelet, under Lewis XIV. with whom he was in great favour, died 1723, aged 82. He was author of a valuable Treatise on the Police, 3 vols. folio, to which a fourth was added after his death.

MARECHAL, George, a native of Calais, son of a poor officer. His skill in surgical operations was very great, especially in lithotomy, and his attention to Lewis XIV.

when attacked by an abscess in the neck, 1696, was rewarded with the appointment of surgeon to the royal household, in 1703 he was made maitre d' hotel, and received a patent of nobility. He died at his seat at Bievre, 1736, aged 78. The memoirs of the academy of surgery at Paris were enriched by some of his papers.

MARECHAL, Peter Sylvan, a native of Paris, who studied the law, and afterwards became a periodical writer at the revolution. He wrote nineteen different things, some of which were very profane and indecent, among which were, a book escaped from the Deluge—the Pantheon—Dictionary of Atheists—Voyage of Pythagoras, 6 vols. 8vo. a weak imitation of Barthelemy's Anarcharsis, &c. He died at Paris, 18th Jan. 1803.

MARETS, Roland des, a native of Paris, author of Latin philological letters of great merit. He died 1653, aged 59.

MARETS, John des, a French writer, very debauched in his youth. He afterwards became a great saint, and a fanatic, and prophesied as from divine revelation, that the French king would destroy the Turkish empire, and the religion of Mahomet, after uniting all the princes of Europe in one common cause to profess and support the catholic tenets of the see of Rome. He wrote some dramatic pieces, of which "Les Visionaires," particularly was acted with great applause, besides a Paraphrase of David's Psalms—the Christian Virtues, a poem in eight cantos—Clovis, an epic poem, in 26 books—Les Delices de l'Esprit, a wild performance—some romances, &c. He was a great enemy of the Jansenists, and died 1676, aged 81.

MARETS, Samuel des, a protestant divine, born at Oismond, in Picardy, 1599. He studied belles lettres at Paris, and divinity at Saumur and Geneva. He took orders in 1620, though he was of small stature, and went by the name of the little preacher; but he grew up to his 25th year, and attained nearly the full size. He was minister successively at Laon, Falaise, Sedan, and, in 1642, became professor at Groningen, where his abilities were displayed to the great advantage and celebrity of that university. He was afterwards invited to Lausanne, and, in 1663, to Leyden, but as he prepared to remove to this place, he died at Groningen, May 18th, the same year. In his literary labours he was engaged in controversies for 18 years, with Boetius, and for a little time with Daille. He also attacked Grotius, for his explanations about Antichrist, and also waged a paper war with Comenius and Labadie and Peter Serrarius, among those enthusiasts who in favour of their reveries consider the striking events of human governments as influenced by the position or motion of the stars. His works were very numerous, and on various subjects, and showed astonishing marks of knowledge and erudition. He had formed a plan for their republication, and had collected materials for four folio volumes, when he died. He left two sons, Henry, who published a French edition of the Bible, with notes, 3 vols. folio—Latin Catechism on Grace—and Daniel.

MARGARET, sister of Edgar Atheling, fled to Scotland on the invasion of William the Conqueror, and married Malcolm, king of the country. She was a very amiable and benevolent princess. Her three sons, Edgar, Alexander, and David, successively filled the throne of Scotland, and her daughter Matilda married Henry I. of England. She died 16th Nov. 1093, aged 47.

MARGARET, daughter of Waldemar III. king of Denmark, and wife of Haquin, king of Norway, ascended, in 1387, the throne of Denmark, and that of Norway, on the death of her son, Olaus. When the Swedes, dissatisfied with the conduct of Albert, their king, offered her the crown of the country, she accepted the conditions, and after a bloody war of seven years, she placed it on her own head, 1394, and by her valour and heroic deeds deserved and obtained the surname of the Semiramis of the North. Thus mistress of three kingdoms, she took measures to render their connection indissoluble, by the celebrated law called the union of Calmar, but unfortunately for herself and her successors, she regarded little the solemnity of her agreements, and by violating the laws which she had enacted, and by oppressing her subjects, she rendered herself unpopular, and her government odious. She died little lamented, 1412, aged 59, after a reign of 26 years. She was succeeded by her nephew, Eric, duke of Pomerania.

MARGARET, daughter of Raymond Benger, count of Provence, married St. Louis, 1254, and attended him in his wars in the Holy Land, against the Saracens, where, on his captivity, she behaved with heroic intrepidity in the defence of Damietta. She died at Paris, 1285, aged 76.

MARGARET, daughter of Robert, duke of Burgundy, married Lewis Hutin, king of France, 1305. She possessed great personal charms, but unfortunately disgraced herself by the grossest sensuality. Her lover was condemned to be flayed alive, and she herself was strangled to death, 1315.

MARGARET, daughter of the emperor Maximilian I. was betrothed to the dauphin of France, afterwards Charles VIII. but did not marry him. She was afterwards married to the infant of Spain, and after his death she took for her next husband, Philibert, duke of Savoy. She was governess of the Netherlands, and displayed her religious zeal against the Lutherans. She died 1st Dec. 1530, aged 50.

MARGARET of Valois, sister of Francis I. married, 1509, the duke of Alençon, and afterwards, in 1526, Henry d'Albert, king of Navarre, by whom she had Jane, mother of the celebrated Henry IV. She was a great princess, and paid particular attention to the encouragement of commerce, of agriculture, and of the arts, among her subjects. Her partiality for the protestants was so great, that she wrote the Mirror of a Sinful Soul, which was censured and condemned by the Sorbonne. She died at the castle of Odos, 2d Dec. 1549, aged 57, of a catarrh, which it is said she caught in making observations on a comet. She was not only the patroness of learning, but herself learned. She wrote Heptameron, after the manner of Boccace, a work which, however, though in a pleasing style, is dangerous, from the licentious sentiments and indelicate expressions with which it occasionally abounds. She wrote besides, poetical pieces, called Les Marguerite de la Marguerite des Princesses, published 1547, &c. the Triumph of the Lamb, &c.

MARGARET, daughter of Francis I. of France, married Emanuel Philibert, duke of Savoy, and died highly respected, 14th Sept. 1574, aged 51.

MARGARET of France, daughter of Henry II. married Henry IV. but unhappily disgraced herself by the levity and licentiousness of her character, which the inconstancy of her husband, perhaps, tended to increase. She was afterwards divorced, 1599, and devoted the rest of her life to literary pursuits and religious exercises. She died at Paris, 27th March, 1613, aged 65. She wrote poetical pieces—Memoirs from 1565 to 1582, &c.

MARGARET, daughter of Florent, count of Holland, is reported to have refused alms to a beggar, who implored the punishment of heaven upon her head, in consequence of which, it is said, she gave birth to 365 children, all of which were baptized. This ridiculous story has been gravely related by some authors.

MARGARET of Anjou, daughter of René, king of Sicily, married Henry VI. of England. She was a woman of masculine character, but her heroism was unhappily tainted with cruelty, as she inhumanly caused to be strangled the duke of Gloucester, who had opposed her marriage. More calculated to govern than to obey, she guided the counsels of her weak and pusillanimous husband during the wars of York and Lancaster, and when he fell a captive into the hands of the duke of York, in 1455, she levied an army to rescue him, and after defeating her enemies, entered triumphantly into the submissive capital. In 1460 she had the mortification to see her troops routed by Warwick, at Northampton, and her husband again a captive; but undismayed, she traversed the kingdom, and every where collecting her adherents, gave battle to her opponents at Wakefield, and left the duke of York dead in the field. Warwick was next defeated near St. Alban's, but another battle at Stanton, in Yorkshire, proved fatal to her cause, and she fled from the kingdom to implore the assistance of her brother, Lewis XI. Though unsuccessful in her request, she returned to England again, to lose the battle of Hexham. Other encounters proved equally unfortunate, and at last Margaret was taken prisoner in the field of battle, 1471, but recovered her liberty, four years after, by paying a ransom of 50,000 crowns. After thus defending the cause of her husband in 12 battles, she retired to France, where she died 25th Aug. 1482, aged 59.

MARGARET of York, sister of Edward IV. married Charles the Rash, duke of Burgundy. She rendered herself known by the opposition which she made to the elevation of Henry VII. to the throne of England, and the impostures which she supported to disturb the government, and undermine the popularity of that respectable monarch.

MARGARET, countess of Richmond and Derby, was born at Bletsoe, Bedfordshire, 1441. She married Edmund, earl of Richmond, half brother to Henry VI. and by him had Henry VII. After her husband's death she married sir Henry Stafford, and for her third husband, in 1482, took Thomas Stanley, created earl of Derby, who died 1504. To all the virtues of private and domestic life, she united great intelligence, and a deep regard for learning. She not only founded two colleges at Cambridge, St. John's and Christ's, but also established there, and at Oxford, a theological professorship. She also endowed a school at Torrington, and at Wymborn. She died at Westminster, 29th June, 1509, surviving only three months, her son, the king. She is described by bishop Fisher, who preached her funeral sermon, as allied to 30 kings and queens, &c. Her will, which is very curious, is preserved in the collection of noble works, 1780, 4to. She translated from the French, the Mirror of Gold for the Sinful Soul, besides the fourth book of Gerson's or Kempis' Treatise on imitating the Life of Christ, printed 1504, &c.

MARGARITONE, a native of Arezzo, eminent as a painter. It is said that he invented the mode of gilding with gold leaf on Armenian bole, and he displayed great taste in his representation of historical subjects, in fresco and in distemper. He died 1275, aged 77.

MARGON, William Plantavit de la Pause

de, a French author and journalist, born at Languedoc. He published, at Paris, such severe reflections in favour of the Jesuits, against the Jansenists, that the court banished him to the isle of Lerins, but restored him to liberty, 1740, provided he removed to the monastery of the Bernardines, where he died, 1760. He wrote Memoirs of Marshal Villars, 3 vols. 12mo.—Memoirs of the duke of Berwick, 2 vols. 12mo.—Memoirs of Tourville, 3 vols.—Letters of Fitz Moritz, and other Tracts.

MARGRAAF, Andrew Sigismund, a native of Berlin, who studied chymistry under Newman, Juncker, and Henckel, and acquired celebrity by his many ingenious experiments. In his mineralogical researches he discovered that semi-metal, called manganese, and by his assiduity and labours, he rendered more easy and plain, the various operations of the chymical system. This able and indefatigable man died in his native city of Berlin, director of the academy, 1782, aged 73.

MARGUNIO, Massineo, son of a marshal of Candia, established, in 1747, a printing-office at Venice, and devoted himself to the printing of Greek books. When his house and property were destroyed by the villany of an incendiary, he returned to Candia, and became an ecclesiastic and bishop of Cerigo. He died 1602, aged 80. He wrote Greek Anacreontic Odes, Augsburg, 1592, 8vo.—poems preserved in the Corpus Poetarum Græcorum, Geneva, 2 vols. fol. 1606.

MARIA THERESA, empress, queen of Hungary and Bohemia, daughter of the emperor Charles VI. and Elizabeth Christina of Brunswick Wolfenbuttel, was born 13th May, 1717. On the death of her brother she was destined by her father to succeed to all his honours, as the famous pragmatic sanction in 1713 had declared that in failure of issue male the eldest of his daughters was to ascend the throne. In 1736 Maria Theresa married Francis Stephen, of Lorraine, and on her father's death, in 1740, she was raised to the throne. Her elevation was attended with the most disastrous effects of war, the king of Prussia immediately seized Silesia, and subdued Moravia, and on the other side, Charles Albert, duke of Bavaria, supported by France, made rapid conquests in the imperial dominions, and was crowned king of Bohemia at Prague, and emperor by the title of Charles VII. at Frankfort, 1742. Maria, in the midst of these disasters, quitted Vienna, and throwing herself with her infant son in her arms in the midst of the assembled states of the Hungarian nation, she addressed them in these pathetic words, in Latin: "Abandoned by my friends, persecuted by my enemies, attacked by my nearest relations, I have no resource left but in your fidelity, courage, and constancy."

I intrust into your hands the children of your kings, they depend on you for life and safety." The appeal was received with shouts of applause. Let us die for our queen Maria Theresa was the general reply, and soon after, Maria, who had lately scarce a town where to give birth in security to her child, saw her faithful Hungarians headed by the brave Kevenhuller, advance to her aid. Lintz, Passau, Munich, opened their gates to the conqueror, and by a treaty with England, Maria obtained succours in money and in troops, and was enabled to defeat the king of Sardinia, and to detach the king of Prussia from the general alliance, by ceding to him the provinces of Silesia and Glatz. Flushed with success, Maria was crowned queen of Bohemia, at Prague, on 11th May, 1743, and the following 11th of June she had the happiness to see the king of England in person obtain in her cause the famous victory of Dettingen, over the allied forces. But though she gained to her side the king of Sardinia, she had the mortification to see the king of Prussia again in arms, and while she cemented an alliance with the king of Poland, she was informed that Bohemia, and the Low Countries were invaded by her powerful enemies. The battles of Fontenoy, Rocoux, and la Feldt, were fought; but though victory might seem doubtful, she had the satisfaction to place the imperial crown on the head of her husband, at Frankfort, 4th Oct. 1745, and she again detached from the number of her enemies the king of Prussia, by the treaty of Dresden. At last, after a war of eight years, the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 18th Oct. 1748, settled the dissensions of the continent, and Maria Theresa, now delivered from the enemies who had once meditated her destruction, devoted herself to repair the ravages of war among her oppressed subjects. But while the ports of the Mediterranean and of the North were open to commerce, and while arts were every where munificently encouraged, the empress did not forget that power is best protected by vigilance, and therefore her armies continued to be well disciplined, and military institutions encouraged with particular attention. Not only fortifications were built in the most impregnable places, but observatories for the encouragement of science and astronomy were erected at Vienna, Gratz, and Tyrnau. Hospitals were opened for the friendly reception of those brave men who had fought and bled for their country, and the relations of the infirm and meritorious soldier were rewarded with all the munificence which became a great, a patriotic, and humane princess. These days of happiness were unfortunately eluded by the irruption of the king of Prussia into Saxony. 1756. Brown checked his career by the undecided battle of Lozowitz; but the following year Frederic renewed his attack, and under the walls of Prague obtained some advantage over Brown, who was wounded in the fight. Daun succeeded to the command, and by the successful battle of Chotzemitz, obliged the Prussians to retreat, and delivered Bohemia from her invaders in so masterly a manner, that Maria Theresa, to commemorate the heroic exploit, established the military order of her name, 1757. The battles of Hock-kirchen, Kunnersdorf, Maxen, Landshut, and Siplitz, were favourable to the cause of the empress, and though her forces were defeated at Lissa, and Breslaw, she maintained her superiority, and at the peace of Hubertsburg, in 1763, she kept possession of the same territories which she held before the war. In 1764 she caused her son Joseph to be crowned king of the Romans; but the death of her husband, the next year, plunged her into the deepest sorrow. In 1772 she joined Prussia and Russia in the dismemberment of Poland, and made Lemberg the capital of these new dominions. The death of Maximilian Joseph, elector of Bavaria, rekindled war between her and Prussia; but the peace of Teschchen, two years after, restored tranquillity to the empire, and gave her a small portion of the Bavarian dominions. After a long reign, checked by prosperity and adversity, Maria Theresa met the approach of death with the same fortitude with which she had viewed the accidents of life. She died at Vienna, 29th Nov. 1780, aged 63. She had the singular felicity, if it deserve the name of felicity, of seeing all her children, at her decease, placed on thrones, or allied to crowned heads. Of her daughters, Antoinette was queen of France; Charlotte, queen of Naples; Mary Amelia, allied to the duke of Parma; Joseph, her son, was king of the Romans, and of Hungary; Leopold was grand duke of Tuscany; Ferdinand was governor of Lombardy; Maximilian, grand master of the Teutonic order, and coadjutor of Cologne and Munster; and Maria Christina, the wife of the duke of Saxe-Teschchen, was governor of the Low Countries. Such was the glorious situation of this illustrious character when she died. She deserved and received the appellation of mother of her country, and the purest virtues of charity and benevolence, profusely exercised, rendered her dear and esteemed among all ranks of her subjects.

MARIA ANTOINETTE, queen of France, arch-dutchess of Austria, daughter of the emperor Francis I. and of Maria Theresa, was born at Vienna 2d Nov. 1755. On the 16th May 1770 she married the dauphin of France, afterwards Lewis XVI. and her arrival in France was celebrated with every demonstration of public joy. On that remarkable occasion, however, it was observed by those who seek for calamitous events in the fortuitous accidents of time, that the two tempestuous storms of thunder and rain which prevailed, forebode her future misfortunes, and on the festivities of the city of Paris, on the 30th of the same month, more than 1200 persons were crushed to death by the falling of a temporary building erected on the occasion, and numbers perished in the waters of the Seine by being precipitated from the Pont royal. These melancholy accidents were alleviated as much as possible by the humanity of the foreign princess, who sent all her money to the lieutenant of police, for the relief of the unfortunate sufferers, and every where conciliated the affection and the esteem of the people. Other acts of charity have been recorded to her honour, and form some of the most pleasing subjects which employed the pencil of Dagoti, and on the death of Lewis XV., when according to ancient usage a tax is contributed by the people for the girle of the new queen, as it is called, Maria nobly declined the compliment. In the severe frost of 1788 she contributed much to the relief of the suffering poor, and her munificence was acknowledged by the gratitude of the Parisians who erected a pyramid of snow in the street of St. Honoré to her honour. These marks of respect were nearly as transitory as the snowy pyramid; Antoinette, unfortunately surrounded by flatterers who fanned her pleasures, and gratified her inclinations, was represented as voluptuous and criminal, and the celebrated trial concerning the necklace, served in some degree to raise the indignation of the public against her conduct. The poverty of the treasury was invidiously attributed to her extravagance; but though she was too liberal in her expenses, nothing criminal could be proved against her. As if foreseeing the calamities of the state, she opposed with all her influence the convocation of the states which were to lead her and her husband to the scaffold; but though calumniated and insulted, she maintained her dignity, and made the happiness of her husband the first wish of her heart. The ferocious events of the revolution, brought on the 6th of October, when the sanguinary cannibals of Paris, appeared at Versailles, threatening aloud that they would tear her to pieces. The doors of her apartment were battered down, and the bed from which she had just escaped was pierced through with a thousand stabs; yet in the midst of this dreadful attack Antoinette exhibited her usual serenity, and presenting herself alone on the balcony, she changed by her noble demeanour, the fury of the populace into admiration and shouts of applause. Forced to accompany the king to Paris, in a journey of six hours, while the heads of two of her murdered body-guards were raised on pikes by the side of her carriage, and while insults, threats, and blasphemies every moment rent the air, she preserved the same undaunted courage. After the flight to Varennes her magnanimity did not desert her, and when questioned by the insidious deputies, she replied with becoming dignity. On the 20th June, and the 10th August, 1792, those days of horror and anarchy, she again saw herself insulted, and with difficulty saved from the hands of assassins, and in the assembly she heard, unmoved, the decrees which robbed the monarch of his throne, and which called on the most worthless of his subjects to try him as a criminal. She no sooner heard of the condemnation of her husband, than she congratulated him on the termination of his sufferings, and after parting from him in an agony of grief, her only request to his murderers was to give her a suit of mourning, which she wore till her own fate was decided. That she might not feel the comforts of the afflicted, in sharing her sorrows with her family, she was torn from her son, 4th July, 1793, and a month after, an armed force entered her cell in the middle of the night, and forced her from her bed of straw to a low and damp dungeon. On the 3d of October she was carried before the revolutionary tribunal, and accused of squandering the public money, and of exhausting the treasury to enrich her brother the emperor, and of holding a traitorous correspondence with the enemies of her country; but the crimination could not be proved, and her sufferings failed not to excite interest in her favour even among her prejudiced judges. It was then that the miscreants charged the unhappy queen with attempts to corrupt the morals of her own son; a scandalous imputation, which roused all her feelings; I appeal, exclaimed she, in a burst of noble indignation, I appeal to all mothers, whether an action so odious is possible. Nothing, however, could avail, she retired fatigued to her dungeon, after being detained 18 hours before her cruel judges, and the following morning, at 11, she was summoned to ascend the cart which was to conduct her to the scaffold. She obeyed with dignity, and in profound silence, and after viewing with unusual attention, as she passed the palace of the Thuilleries, the former scene of her greatness and of her pleasures, she mounted the scaffold with precipitation, and falling on her knees, prayed for forgiveness on her murderers, and bidding adieu to her absent children, to whose father she was again to be united, she laid down her head on the fatal machine, and lifting up her eyes to heaven, closed them in death, 16th Oct. 1793. She was then near 38, but it is remarkable that her misfortunes had changed the colour of her hair to a silvery white, and her countenance, which, with every feature of beauty, once beamed benignity and love, had assumed an aspect of dejection and settled melancholy, and she had nearly lost the use of one of her eyes from the damp and unwholesome air to which she was exposed. Her body was thrown into the Magdalen church-yard and immediately consumed with quick lime. In the powers of her mind, Antoinette had been carefully cultivated, she spoke French with purity, and the Italian as her native tongue, and she was so well acquainted with Latin, that when twice addressed in that language, she made an immediate extemporaneous reply in the same language, and with elegance. She was well versed in geography, and had bestowed also much time on the reading of history. She had four children, Maria Theresa Charlotte, born 1778, who married her cousin the duke of Angouleme; Louis, born 1781, who died 1789; Charles Louis, born 1785, who died 1793; and a daughter who died an infant. Her life has been published by various authors, but that of Mad. Guenard, 3 vols. 12mo. is recommended by the French biographers.

MARIAMNE, wife of Herod the Great, and mother of Alexander and Aristobulus, and of two daughters, was cruelly put to death by her husband, B.C. 28.

MARIANA, John, a Spanish historian, born at Talavera, in Castile, 1537. He entered into the society of the Jesuits, and was a most able divine; he was professor of divinity four years at Rome, two in Sicily, and five at Paris, after which he returned to Spain, and spent the remainder of his life at Toledo. He made himself particularly known by his tract, "de Rege et de Regis Institutione," in which he defended the assassination of Henry III. of France, and supported, that the authority of the people was superior to that of the prince. This work, which, it is said, inspired Ravallac with the diabolical scheme of murdering Henry IV. was burnt at Paris by order of the parliament, and drew upon the author and the Jesuits very severe censures. His greatest performance is the History of Spain, in 30 books, originally written by him in Latin, but also published in Spanish. In this work he brought the history to the end of Ferdinand's reign, as he dreaded to treat about more modern times. He, however, afterwards wrote a supplement, and came down to the year 1621, when Philip IV. succeeded to the crown; and the work was, after his death, continued by Salcedo, and after him, by Voren de Soto, to the year 1669. This excellent history, commended by Rapin, and by others, for the greatness of the design, and the nobleness of the style, every where sublime and interesting, has, like all other works of genius, met with cavillers. Mariana died at Toledo, 1624, aged 87. He wrote also, a treatise on Weights and Measures—Notes on the Old Testament, a very valuable work, and after his death appeared in Latin, French, and Italian—a Treatise on the Faults of the Government of the society of the Jesuits. The best edition of his "History," in Spanish, is that of Ibarra, Madrid, 1780, 2 vols. folio; and in Latin, that of the Hague, 1722, 4 vols. folio.

MARIANUS, Scotus, a Scotch monk, related to the venerable Bede, and author of a Chronicle from Jesus Christ to 1083, continued by some other author to 1200. He died 1086, aged 58.

MARIETTE, Peter John, son of a Paris bookseller and engraver, was secretary to the French king, and chancery comptroller, and died 1774. He wrote, Traité des Pierres Gravées, 2 vols. folio—Lettres sur la Fontaine de la Rue Grenelle—Lettres à Caylus—besides a catalogue of M. Basan's Plates, 8vo—and an account of the Engravings from M. Crozat's pictures, 2 vols. folio. His collection of engravings was said to be very valuable.

MARIGNAN, John James Medichino, marquis de, a native of Milan, who by his valour was recommended to the favour of Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, Sforza prevailed upon him, and upon another of his officers, to become the murderers of Visconti, a Milanese noble, and after this horrid deed, took measures to destroy both of them, that the suspicion might never attach to him. One fell, but Marignan escaped, and was made governor of Musso, on the lake Como, which he in 1528 exchanged for the service of the emperor, and the command of Marignan, of which he assumed the title. He was successful in 1554 against the French troops under Strozzi, whom he defeated in Tuscany, and he took Sienna, where he permitted his troops to commit horrid cruelties. He died at Milan, 1555, aged 60.

MARIGNY, James Carpentier de, an ecclesiastic, born at Marigny, near Nevers. He became the friend of cardinal de Retz, and severely satirical against Mazarin. He died of an apoplexy, 1670, distinguished more for his wit, than the purity of his morals. His letters appeared at the Hague, 1678. He wrote also some poems, and according to some, he is author of "Alley's book," in which the killing of a tyrant, after the example of Moses, is defended as lawful. The author of the History of the 12th Century—and of the History of the Arabs, and their revolutions, in 8 vols. was an ecclesiastic, who bore this name, and died at Paris 1762.

MARIKOWSKY, Martin, a native of Rosenau in Hungary, eminent as a physician. He was actively employed in examining the causes and the progress of the epidemic diseases which proved so fatal to the Hungarian and Turkish armies; in consequence of which he published his Observations in the Ephemerides Sirmicensis, 1763. He translated Tissot's Advice on Health, into the Hungarian language; and died at Sirmich in Sclavonia, 1772, aged 44.

MARILLAC, Louis de, a French officer, patronised by Henry IV. and raised under Louis XIII. to the rank of marshal of France. Though he owed much of his good fortune to the favour of Richelieu, it is said, that he conspired with his brother Michael, against that powerful minister. The cardinal was informed of the machinations of his enemies, and the two brothers were brought to a severe trial, and on pretence of being guilty of various acts of extortion and peculation, they were condemned. Louis was beheaded at Paris, 10th May, 1632, and the other died in a dungeon soon after.

MARIN, Michael Angelo, a novel writer, born at Marseilles. He became an ecclesiastic, and obtained the confidence and patronage of pope Clement XIII. by whose advice he began to publish the Acts of Martyrs, which, however, he did not finish. His romances are esteemed, and they greatly promote the cause of virtue and religion. This amiable character died of a dropsy in the heart, April, 1767, in his 70th year.

MARINARI, Honorio, an Italian painter, the pupil and happy imitator of Carlo Dolce. His portraits and historical pieces were much admired. He died 1715, aged 88.

MARINELLA, Lucretia, a Venetian lady, who in 1601, wrote a book, in which she asserted the superiority of the female sex above the male. She also published, "La Colomba Sacra"—the Life of the Holy Virgin—and of St. Francis, &c.

MARINI, John Ambrose, a native of Genoa, author of il Caloandre Fidelle, 1641, 8vo. a romance, translated by Scuderi and Caylus into French—Nuova Gare de Disperati, ten times edited, also translated into French. These romances were popular, and were the first to describe the manners, dangers, and heroic deeds of ancient chivalry.

MARINO, John Baptist, an Italian poet, born at Naples, 1569. His father, who was a lawyer, intended him for his own profession, but the youth had imbibed such fondness for literature, that he sold his law books to purchase poetry. This so exasperated his father, that he turned him away from his protection; but he found, by the brilliancy of his genius, patronage with the duke of Bovino, the prince of Conca and Crescentio, and at last with cardinal Aldobrandini, nephew to the pope. With this patron he visited Turin, and gained there the friendship of the duke, Charles Emanuel; but in the midst of his prosperity he excited the jealousy of Murtola, the duke's secretary, who, as a poet, viewed with envy the honours heaped on him. From abusive language and satirical sonnets, little mischief could be expected, but Murtola at last discharged a pistol at his rival, and nearly killed him. After this Marino went to Paris, at the invitation of queen Margaret, and found after her death a liberal patroness in Mary de Medicis. He returned to Rome 1622, and went afterwards to Naples, where he died of a retention of urine, 1625. His works are numerous. He wrote, Strage degli Innocenti, a poem, 1533—Rime, in three parts—la Murtoleide, 4to.—Letters—but the best of his works is, "Adone," a heroic poem, which ranks with the Aminto of Tasso, and the Pastor Fido of Guarini. The best edition is the Elzevir, 4 vols. 16mo. 1678.

MARIO NUZZI, or MARIO DE FIORI, an eminent painter, whose flowers and landscapes were deservedly admired. He died at Rome, 1673, aged 70.

MARION, Francis, a distinguished officer in the American army, was born near Charleston, South Carolina, in 1732. He first served in the expedition in 1761, against the Cherokees, as a lieutenant. On the commencement of the revolution he was appointed captain in the regiment of colonel Moultrie. He soon after received a major's commission, and assisted at the defence of Sullivan's Island in 1776. Being promoted to a lieutenant colonelcy, he was intrusted with a small corps employed in harassing the British and Tories, and gained a number of important advantages, which procured him in 1780, the commission of brigadier general. He continually surprised and captured parties of the British and their friends, by the secrecy and rapidity of his movements. In 1781, his troops which had amounted to only a few hundred, and often to only a few dozens, were reinforced by the legion of general Lee, and he soon after captured a number of forts, and forced the British to retire to Charleston. He joined the main army under general Green a short time before the battle of Eutaw springs, and received the thanks of Congress for his intrepid conduct in that action. After the British evacuated Charleston, he retired to his plantation, and resided there till his death in 1795. He was one of the ablest partisan officers of the revolution, and one of the most successful. He seldom failed of capturing his enemy, and almost always did it by surprise. His courage was the boldest, his movements the most rapid, his discipline severe, and his humanity most exemplary.

MARJOTTE, Edme, a native of Dijon, member of the Paris academy of sciences, and known as an able mathematician, and a learned ecclesiastic. He wrote a treatise on the motion of Waters—on the movement of Pendulums—on Philosophy—on Levels—Experiments on Colours, &c. published together at Leyden, 1717, 2 vols. 4to. His experiments on Hydraulics were very ingenious. He died 1684.

MARIVAUX, Peter Carlet de Chamblain de, a learned dramatic writer, born at Paris, 1688. He was very successful in his theatrical pieces, as well as his romances; and as he conveyed an useful moral under the veil of wit and sentiment, he wished, as he said, to make men more just and more humane. He joined de la Motte in the well-known dispute about the superiority of the ancients over the moderns. This amiable author, so strenuously the advocate of religion and virtue, died at Paris, 11th of Feb. 1763, aged 75. His works are, Pieces de Theatre, 5 vols. 12mo.—Honnere Travesti, an indifferent performance—the French Spectator, 2 vols. 12mo.—Vie de Marianne, 4 vols. 12mo. left unfinished, but one of the best French romances—le Paysan Parvenu, 12mo. a much admired composition—New Don Quixote—the Poor Philosopher, 2 vols. 12mo. &c.

MARIUS CAIUS, a celebrated Roman, seven times consul. He first distinguished himself in Africa against Jugurtha, and by a series of heroic exploits against the Cimbri and Teutones, and the other enemies of his country, he became the most popular commander of Rome. His disputes with Sylla proved fatal to the Roman people. He died 86 B. C. His son inherited his ferocious character, and at last slew himself when defeated at Præneste, 82 B. C.

MARIUS, Marcus Aurelius, a common soldier, who rose to the imperial purple after Victorinus. He was a man of astonishing strength. He was slain by a soldier soon after his elevation.

MARK, St. an evangelist, the disciple of Peter, by whose directions he is supposed to have written his gospel for the use of the Roman Christians, A. D. 72. Some imagine that he is the person to whose mother's house Peter, when released from prison by an angel, went. The foundation of the church of Alexandria is attributed to him.

MARK, pope, after Silvester I. 335, died the same year, 7th Oct. An epistle, addressed to Athanasius, is ascribed to him.

MARKHAM, Gervase, an English author, in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. born at Gotham, Nottinghamshire. He was captain under Charles in the civil wars, and distinguished himself for his valour as well as learning. He wrote, "Herod and Antipater," a tragedy—some books on Husbandry—on Horsemanship—on Military Discipline—on the Art of Fowling, &c. and was well skilled in French, Italian, and Spanish.

MARKHAM, William, was appointed secretary of Pennsylvania in 1684, and was deputy governor from June 1693 to December 1699. He was a nephew of William Penn, and died June 12th, 1704. 47 L.

MARKLAND, Jeremiah, a learned critic, born 29th Oct. 1693, one of the 12 children of the Rev. Ralph M. the author of the Art of Shooting flying. He was educated at Christ's hospital, London, and Peterhouse, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was first distinguished by his Epistola Critica, 1723, addressed to bishop Hare; and his literary fame was afterwards supported by the Publication of Statius' Sylvæ—and of Remarks on the Epistles of Cicero to Brutus, and of Brutus to Cicero—and a Dissertation on the Four Orations ascribed to Cicero. In 1761 he published his excellent little Treatise de Gracorum quinta Declinatione Impari Syllabicâ et Inde Formata Latinorum Tertiâ Quæstio Grammatica, of which only 40 copies were printed; but it appeared at the end of Euripides' Supplices Mulieres, 1763. After being an active tutor at Cambridge, Markland retired to Twyford; but though his finances were scanty, he refused to take orders, and thus lost the preferment which his friend, bishop Hare, was ready to bestow upon him. From the year 1744 to 52, he resided at Uckfield Sussex, and afterwards boarded in a farm-house, at Milton, near Dorking, in Surrey, where he died of a severe attack of the gout, attended with fever, 7th July, 1776, in his 83d year. He was buried in Dorking church. Some of his learned notes on the two Iphigenia, were printed by Dr. Heberden, his friend, 1771. He wrote some other things, and was very liberal of his assistance to his literary friends, especially Dr. Taylor, in his Lysias and Demosthenes, Dr. Musgrave in Hippolytus, Bowyer in Sophocles, and Arnold in the Commentary on the book of Wisdom, &c.

MARLOE, Christopher, a dramatic writer, in the reign of Edward VI. educated at Cambridge. He afterwards became a player, and trod the stage with Shakspeare. In his opinions and conduct he was an atheist, therefore deservedly exposed to the satirical reflections and abhorrence of the world. It is said by Wood, that he was fond of some vulgar female, but that he found a rival in his footman, and when full of jealousy, he attempted to stab him, his opponent wrested the dagger from his hand, and plunged it into his heart. He died of the wound, 1693. His plays were seven in number, and he wrote besides, some poetical pieces, &c.

MARLORAT, Augustin, an Augustine monk of Lorraine. He embraced the tenets of the protestants, and distinguished himself at the conference of Poissy, 1561. He was murdered at Rouen, when the place was taken by the king, 1562. His works, which possess great merit, are, Thesaurus Locorum Commun. S. Scripturæ, 1574, London, folio, Geneva, 1624—Commentaries on the Bible.

MARMION, Shakerley, a dramatic writer, born at Aynhoe, Northamptonshire, Jan. 1602. He was educated at Thame school, and Wadham college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He squandered his property, which amounted, says Wood, to 700*l.* a year; and afterwards served in the army in the Netherlands, and against Scotland under Charles I. He died in London, 1639. He wrote four comedies much esteemed in his time; Holland's Leaguer—a Fine Companion—the Antiquary—the Crafty Merchant, or the Soldiered Citizen—besides Cupid and Psyche, an epic poem, &c.

MARMOL, Lewis, a native of Grenada, taken prisoner at the siege of Tunis, and detained in slavery for eight years. He wrote, a General Description of Africa, Grenada, 1573, 3 vols. folio, &c.

MARMONTEL, John Francis, an eminent French writer, born at Bort, in Limousin, in 1719. Though but the son of a tailor, he was well educated at the college of Toulouse, where he obtained some poetical prizes, and afterwards in 1745, he came to Paris in the habit of an abbé. The friendship of Voltaire, and his own merits, soon procured him the favour of the great; he was rewarded with a small pension, and obtained the place of historiographer to the king's buildings, and was for two years conductor of the periodical journal, called Mercury. A severe parody from one of Cinna's scenes, in which he satirized a courtier of influence, drew upon him the displeasure of the government, and he was sent to the Bastille. His literary fame was established by his tragedies and his operas, but his Contes Moraux procured him greater celebrity, and more advantage. He was honoured for his meritorious labours, with the place of perpetual secretary to the French academy; but the revolution, which proved fatal to so many men of character and of merit spared his life. He retired into obscurity from the observations of the world; and though reduced by the national bankruptcy to indigence, he bore his misfortunes with great composure, and in the enjoyment of undisturbed domestic tranquillity. He was in 1797, elected to be a member of the council of ancients, and as a politician he showed himself firm, correct in his opinions, and the friend of virtue and religion. He died of an apoplexy, 1798, at Abbeville, near Gaillon, where he had retired, when his colleagues in the assembly had disputed the regularity of his election. His other works are, Bellisarius, a romance—the Charms of Study—the Literary Observer—Lucan's Pharsalia translated—the Incas, or Destruction of Peru, 2 vols.—Poétique Française, 3 vols. 8vo.—Essay on the Revolutions of Music, 8vo.—Elements of Literature, 6 vols.—besides some articles in the French Encyclopedie. His literary character chiefly depends on his Contes Moraux, 3 vols. 12mo. which have been translated into every European language, and are known to every reader as full of agreeable and pleasing delineations of character, but too often artfully fascinating and immoral in their tendency. His works have been published altogether, in 17 vols. 8vo.

MARNEZIA, N. de Lezia, a native of Besançon, who, from a soldier became a statesman during the revolution. As a member of the national assembly, he reprobated the violent measures of his colleagues, and retired in disgust to America. On his return in 1793, he fell under the displeasure of the ruling tyrants, and was sent to prison; but though he had the good fortune to survive the fall of Robespierre, he never recovered his health. He died 1797. He wrote, le Bonheur dans les Campagnes—la Nature Champêtre, a poem—Plan of Education for a young Lady—Essay on the Mineralogy of Orgelet in Franche Comté—the Virtuous family, a romance, &c.

MARNIX, Philip de, a native of Brussels, who warmly embraced the tenets of Calvin. He became consul of Antwerp, and ably defended that city against the attacks of the duke of Parma, 1584. He died at Leyden, 1598, aged 60. He wrote Controversial Theses—Apiarium Romanum—and other tracts.

MAROLLES, Michael de, a French writer, born 1600. He employed his learning chiefly in translations from the classics; and Terence, Plautus, Lucretius, Horace, Virgil, Juvenal, Persius, &c. appeared in a French dress under his hands, but not always with success. He also collected prints, one hundred thousand of which afterwards adorned the king's cabinet. He wrote also Memoirs of his own Life, edited by Goujet, 1775, 3 vols. 12mo. besides some indifferent poetry. He died 1681.

MAROT, John, a French poet, born near Caen, in Normandy, 1463. His abilities recommended him to Anne of Bretagne, queen of France, and he attended Lewis XII. to Genoa, and was in the service of Francis I. He died 1523. His poems are preserved with those of his son Clement.

MAROT, Clement, son of the above, was born at Cahors, in Querci. 1496. and bevalet-de-chambre to Francis I. He was wounded at the battle of Pavia, where his master was taken prisoner; and as he had embraced the opinions of the protestants, he found his residence at the court of Francis not very safe. He therefore retired to Geneva, where it is said by Cayet, that his licentious conduct exposed him to much danger, and even drew upon him the punishment of public whipping in all the crossways of the city. From Geneva, Marot went to Picdmont, and died at Turin, 1544, aged 49, very poor. His poetical powers were so highly esteemed, that he was called in France the poet of princes, and the prince of poets. To his fertile invention the French poets are indebted for the rondeau, and also for the modern form of the sonnet, the madrigal, &c. Though licentious in his character and opinions, Marot undertook to translate the Psalms of David into French verse, dedicated to Francis I. The version, though elegantly and faithfully completed, met with much censure and abuse, as the work of a libertine poet; but it was recommended by a preface written by Calvin himself, at Geneva, 1543. His works, consisting of epigrams, sonnets, elegies, and ballads, were published with those of his father, and those of his son Michael, who was also a poet, but of inferior merit, at the Hague, 1731, 6 vols. 12mo.

MAROT, Francis, a French painter, the pupil of la Fosse. He was associate and professor in the French academy of painting, and died at Paris, 1719, aged 52. There was also an architect of that name, whose designs have appeared engraved, in 4to.

MARQUARD-FREHER, a native of Augsburg, who studied law and belles lettres under Cujas, at Bourges, and became counsellor of state to the elector palatine, and professor of civil law at Heidelberg. He died at Heidelberg, universally respected, 13th May, 1614, aged 49. He wrote Origines Palatinæ, folio—de Inquisitionis Processus—de Re Monetariâ Romanæ, &c.—Rerum Bohemiæ Scriptores—Rerum German. Scriptores, 3 vols. folio. &c.

MARQUET, Francis Nicholas, a native of Nancy, eminent as a physician and a botanist. He wrote an Account of Plants in Lorraine, 10 vols. 8vo.—Observations on the Cure of several Diseases, 2 vols. 12mo.—Method to learn the state of the Pulse by the Musical Notes, 12mo. He died 1759, aged 72.

MARRIER, D. Martin, an ecclesiastic of Cluni, who died at Paris, his native town, 1644, aged 72. He made a curious collection of ancient ecclesiastical writers, which he published under the title of Bibliotheca Cluniacensis.

MARRACCI, Luigi, a learned Italian, born at Lucca, 1612. He was professor of rhetoric, and applied himself to the study of ancient and eastern languages. He was confessor to pope Innocent XI. and died at Rome, 1700. He became known as the editor of the Koran, printed at Padua, in Latin and Arabic, 2 vols. folio, 1698, with learned notes. He also assisted in the publication of the Arabic Bible, 3 vols. folio, Rome, 1671.

MARSAIS, Cæsar Chesneau du, a French grammarian, born at Marseilles, 1676. He was of the congregation of the oratory, which he quitted and went to Paris, where he practised as an advocate. He afterwards maintained himself by being tutor in noble families, and by keeping a school, till, after many adverse accidents, he received from the count de Lauragais, an annuity of 1000 livres. He was engaged in the Encyclopedie, and his Articles on Grammar, &c. are drawn up with great precision, correctness, and judgment. He was at first a sceptic, but in the latter part of life became strictly religious. He died 1756, aged 80. He wrote an explanation of the Doctrines of the Gallician Church, with respect to the Pretences of the Court of Rome, 12mo.—a Rational Method of learning the Latin Language, 12mo.—a Treatise on Tropes, 8vo.—the True Principles of Grammar, 4to.—Logic, or Reflections on the Operations of the Mind, 12mo.—Abridgment of Jouvenci's Mythology, 12mo.

MARSH, Narcissus, an Irish prelate, born at Hannington, Wiltshire, 1638. He was admitted at Magdalen hall, Oxford, 1654, was elected fellow of Exeter, 1658, took his degree of D.D. 1671, and in 1673 was made principal of St. Alban's hall. His patron the duke of Ormond, in 1678, appointed him provost of Dublin college, and in 1682, he was made bishop of Leighlin and Ferns, in 1690 translated to Cashel, to Dublin 1699, and in 1703 to Armagh. In the midst of these high promotions, the bishop was very charitable. He built a noble library at Dublin, which he enriched with valuable books; he repaired several churches and alms-houses in his dioceses, and erected and endowed an alms-house for 12 clergymen's widows, at Drogheda. He died 2d Nov. 1713, aged 75, and was buried in a vault in St. Patrick's churchyard. He was an able scholar, a good orientalist, and a well-informed philosopher. He published Institutiones Logicæ in Usum Juventutis Academicæ, Dublin, 1681—an Introduction to the Doctrine of Sounds, with Proposals for the Improvement of Acoustics—Manuductio ad Logicam, &c.

MARSH, Ebenezer Grant, professor of languages and ecclesiastical history in Yale college, Connecticut, was the son of the Rev. Dr. Marsh of Wethersfield, and graduated at New-Haven in 1795. In 1798 he was appointed teacher of Hebrew, and the following year tutor. In 1802 he received his appointment to the professorship, but died in November of the next year, in the twenty-seventh year of his age. His talents were of a very superior order, and his literary acquisitions uncommonly great. He published a catalogue of the historians of this country, and had made considerable progress in collecting materials for an American Biography. ¶ L.

MARSHAL, Walter, an English divine, educated at Winchester and New college, of which he was made fellow, and also of Winchester. He was ejected from his living at Hursley, Hants, for non-conformity, 1662, and afterwards took the care of a dissenting congregation at Gosport, where he died 1690. He wrote the Gospel Mystery of Sanctification, 1692, 8vo. reprinted by Hervey, the author of Meditations, in 12mo.

MARSHAL, Andrew, a physician, was born in Fifehire, in 1742. After studying at Glasgow, and Edinburgh, he visited London, where he attended the lectures of the Hunters, and then became surgeon to a regiment. At the conclusion of the peace he took his doctor's degree, and commenced lecturer in anatomy, in which line he was very successful. He died in London in 1813. After his death was published his treatise on "The Morbid Anatomy of the Brain," with his life prefixed.

MARSHALL, Thomas, D.D. an English divine, born at Barkly, Leicestershire, 1621. He was admitted of Lincoln college, Oxford, and bore arms in the defence of king Charles, but afterwards he left the university, and went to Rotterdam, where he became minister to the merchants there and at Dordt. He returned to England in 1661, and in 1668 was chosen fellow, and in 1672, rector of his college. In 1681 he was made dean of Gloucester, and died at Lincoln college, 1685. He was a learned man, well skilled in the Saxon, and in the Oriental languages. He published Observationes in Evangeliorum Versiones per Antiquas duas, scilicet Gothicas et Anglo-Saxonicas—an Explanation of the Catechism—Epistle prefixed to Dr. Hyde's translation into the Malayan language, of the four Gospels and the Acts—besides which he completed archbishop Usher's life, published by Dr. Parr.

MARSHALL, Nathanael, D.D. an English divine, appointed chaplain to George II. at the recommendation of the princess of Wales. He held some preferment in London, and was canon of Windsor. He published the works of St. Cyprian, folio, 1717—a Defence of our constitution in church and State, 8vo. 1717—Sermons on several occasions, 3 vols. 8vo. 1730. These were posthumous, and inscribed to queen Caroline, by his widow, who was left with eight children.

MARSHAM, Sir John, a learned author, born 1602, in London, and educated at Westminster school, and St. John's college, Oxford. In 1625 he went to France, and afterwards again visited that kingdom, Italy, and Germany, and was in 1629, at the siege of Boileduc. He studied the law at the Middle Temple, and in 1638 was one of the six clerks in chancery. During the civil wars he followed the king to Oxford, and was a great sufferer by the plunder of the republicans; but in 1660, after leading a life of retirement and solitude under the usurpation, he was elected member for the city of Rochester, and was knighted, and made a baronet by Charles II. He died at Bushy hall, Herts, May, 1685, and was buried at Cuckstone, near Rochester. He is celebrated in literature for his excellent work, called Diatriba Chronologica, or a Chronological Dissertation, wherein he examines the principal difficulties which occur in the chronology of the Old Testament, 4to. 1649. The work was afterwards altered in his Canon Chronicus Ægyptiacus, Ebraicus, Græcus, et Disquisitiones, London, 1652, folio, reprinted Leipsic, 1676, and at Franeker, 1696, 4to. Sir John left two sons, John, his successor in the title, who collected materials for a History of England, never published, and wrote a History of English Boroughs; and Robert, created a baronet by queen Anne, also a learned man, whose son was made lord Romney, 1716.

MARSIGLI, Lewis Ferdinand, an Italian author, born of a noble family at Bologna, 1658. He was carefully educated, and then visited Constantinople, 1679, with the eyes of a philosopher and of a military man, and at his return, offered his services to the emperor of Germany against the Turks. He distinguished himself greatly in the field, but in 1683 he was taken by the Tartars, who sold him to the Turks. The next year he obtained his ransom, and immediately repaired to Vienna, where the emperor made him a colonel, and afterwards advanced him to the rank of marshal. In the war about the Spanish succession, he was, however, unfortunate. Brisac surrendered in 1703, after a siege of 13 days, when a longer and more effectual resistance was expected, and the count D'Arco, the governor, was condemned to lose his head, and Marsigli the next in command, was stripped of his honours, and had his sword broke over him. He attempted in vain to justify his conduct before the emperor, and even published a memorial to defend himself; but finding the tide of unpopularity against him, he returned to privacy. He went to Paris and Marseilles, and then retired to Bologna, where he founded 1712, with the consent of the senate, as patrons, an academy of arts and sciences, with a museum for the advancement of knowledge, and of the arts. He also erected a printing-house, where the memoirs and writings of the academy were to be published, which he intrusted to the care of the Dominicans. He died 1st Nov. 1730. His learning recommended him to the academies of Paris, Montpellier, and London, of which he was elected a member. He wrote a Philosophical Essay on the Sea, translated into French by Le Clerc, published folio, Amst. 1725—a Description of the Danube, 6 vols. fol.—a Latin Treatise on Coffee, 12mo.—on Mushrooms, folio—on the Bosphorus. 4to.—on the Ottoman Forces, fol.

MARSOLLIER, James, a French historian, born at Paris, 1647. He was archdeacon of Usez, and died there, 1724. His works, though occasionally incorrect, are still read with applause. He is author of a History of Cardinal Ximenes, 2 vols. 12mo.—History of Henry VII. of England, 2 vols 12mo.—History of the Inquisition, 12mo.—Life of Sir Francis de Sales, 2 vols. 12mo.—Life of Madame de Chantel, 2 vols.—Life of Dom Ranceé of La Trappe, 2 vols.—Dialogues on the Duties of Civil Life—History of Henry de la Tour D'Auvergne—an Apology for Erasmus, to prove that he was a good Catholic—a History of the Tenth and Goods of the Church.

MARSTON, John, an English dramatic author. He wrote eight plays, which were acted with applause at the Black-friars theatre. He was of Corpus Christi college, Oxford, and was the friend of Ben Jonson, but the time of his death is unknown, though he was living in 1633. He wrote besides three books of satires, called the Scourge of Villany, and reprinted 1764.

MARSY, Francis Marie de, distinguished among the Jesuits, from whose society he was expelled, was born at Paris. His "Analysis of Bayle," 4 vols. 12mo. was proscribed by the parliament of Paris, and produced his confinement in the Bastille. He died suddenly, December, 1763. He is author of the History of Mary Stuart, 3 vols. 12mo.—Memoirs de Melville, from the English, 3 vols. 12mo.—Abridged Dictionary of Painting and Architecture, 2 vols. 12mo.—The Rabelais Moderne, 8 vols. 12mo.—the Prince, from Father Paul—Pictura, an elegant poem—Modern History, as a continuation of Rollin, 26 vols. 12mo.

MARSY, Balthasar, a native of Cambrai, eminent as a sculptor. He died 1674, aged 54. His brother Gaspar, who died 1681, aged 56, was also an able sculptor. The vase, with a representation of Lantona and her children, in the gardens of Versailles, is by the chisel of these two brothers.

MARTEL, Francis, surgeon in the service of Henry IV. of France, was author of an Apology for Surgeons—of Paradoxes on the Practice of Surgery, and other works, printed at Paris, together, 1635, 12mo.

MARTELIERE, Peter de la, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, who distinguished himself in the celebrated trial between the university of Paris and the Jesuits. The speech which he made on the occasion, was published, and much applauded. He died 1631.

MARTELLI, Lewis, an Italian, whose poems, serious and grotesque, and dramatic pieces, were published at Florence, he was born at Florence, and died at Salerno, 1527, aged 28. His brother Vincent was also a poet, whose pieces appeared at Florence, 1607, 8vo.

MARTELLI, Peter James, author of seven volumes of prose and verse, was secretary to the senate of Bologna, and professor of belles lettres there. He died 1729. His poems, according to Maffei, possessed great merit.

MARTENNE, Edmund, a Benedictine monk of St. Maur, born 1654, at St. Jean de Laune, Langres. He was author of a Commentary on the Rules of St. Benedict—de Antiquis Monachorum Ritibus, 2 vols. 4to.—Thesaurus Anecdotorum Novus, and other works, he died of an apoplexy, 1739.

MARTIAL, D'Auvergne, a French poet, author of Arrets de L'Amour—a Historical Poem on Charles VII.—L'Amant Rendu Cordelier—Devotes Louanges à la Vierge Marie, &c. reprinted at Paris, 2 vols. 8vo. 1724. He was procurator of the parliament, and notary of the chatelet at Paris, and died there 1508, much beloved.

MARTIALIS, Marcus Valerius, a Spaniard celebrated as a great Latin epigrammatist, in the reign of the emperor Domitian. He died in his native country, 104 A.D. His epigrams are severe, and often licentious, best edited 1701, Amst. 8vo.

MARTIANAY, John, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, who ably edited the works of Jerome, 5 vols. folio, with a life of that father, 4to. 1706, and published also other works. He was born at St. Sever, in Gascony, and read lectures at Arles, Avignon, and Bourdeaux. He died of an apoplexy, 1717, aged 70.

MARTIGNAC, Stephen Algai lord of, a French writer, who published the Lives of the Bishops of Paris, in the 17th century, 4to. and translated besides into prose, Horace, Terence, Juvenal, Persius, Ovid, Virgil, in 9 vols. 12mo. He died 1698, aged 70.

MARTIN, St. a native of Sabaria, in Pannonia, who, from a soldier, became a convert to Christianity at Amiens, and in 374 was made bishop of Tours. He founded the monastery of Marmontier, and is regarded as the apostle of Gaul. His confession of faith with respect to the Trinity is still extant. He died 397.

MARTIN I. pope after Theodorc, 649, caused the doctrines of the Monothelites to be condemned in a synod at Rome. He was sent by Constantius to the Crimea, where he died through ill treatment, 16th Sept. 655.

MARTIN II. pope after John VIII. 882, died two years after, in Feb. 884. Under him Photius, patriarch of Constantinople was condemned.

MARTIN III. a native of Rome, pope after Stephen VIII. 942. He was a benevolent pontiff, and founded several churches, &c. He died 4th August, 946.

MARTIN IV. a Frenchman, made pope after Nicholas III. 1281. He passed a sentence of excommunication against the emperor Michael Palæologus, and against Peter III. of Arragon, whose kingdom he bestowed on Charles Valois son of Philip the Hardy of France. He died at Pezou, 28th March, 1285.

MARTIN V. Otho Colonna, an illustrious Roman, made pope after the abdication of Gregory XII. 1417. The emperor and the elector palatine, with the deference of subjects attended upon him at his inauguration, and he knew well how to improve the submissive conduct of catholic potentates. He persecuted the adherents of Huss, in Bohemia, and presided in person at the council of Constance, 1418. He died of an apoplexy, 20th Feb. 1431, aged 63.

MARTIN, David, a protestant divine, born at Revel, in Languedoc, 1639. He left his country at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and settled at Utrecht, where he gave lectures, and acted as pastor. On the second edition of the dictionary of the French academy he communicated to the publishers, some valuable remarks, and died at Utrecht, of a violent fever, 1721. He was a most amiable character. He published a History of the Old and New Testament, 2 vols. folio, with 424 plates—Eight Sermons, 8vo.—a Treatise on Natural Religion—Two Dissertations, which have been translated into English, one on the disputed passage of St. John 1, c. 5. v. 7. and the other on the testimony of Josephus to the character of Christ—a Treatise on Revealed Religion, 2 vols. 8vo.—a Bible, with notes.

MARTIN, Dom James, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, born at Tanjaux, Upper Languedoc. After teaching the languages in his native province, he removed to Paris where he died a martyr to agonizing sufferings from the gout and gravel, 1751, in his 70th year. He wrote a Treatise on the Religion of the Ancient Gauls, 2 vols.—a History of the Gauls, 2 vols.—Explication of difficult Texts of Scripture, 2 vols. 4to.—Explanation of Ancient Monuments—a project for an Alphabetical Library.

MARTIN, Thomas, an antiquarian, born at Thetford, 8th March, 1697, the seventh of nine children. He was for some time with his brother as an attorney, but disliked the employment, and wished for a Cambridge education, in which, however, he was not gratified, as he in 1722 married at Thetford. By his wife who died 1731, he had eight children, and by the widow of Peter le Neve, Norroy king at arms, whom he soon after took for his second wife, he had as many children, nine of all whom reached the years of manhood. By his second marriage he obtained a large collection of English antiquities, pictures, &c. which have since his death passed into the hands of private families. He died 7th March, 1771, and was buried in Palgrave church, where many of his family were interred before him. He wrote Monumenta Anglicana—the History of his Native Town, 4to.—and contributed much to the Fasti of Le Neve.

MARTIN, Benjamin, an optician and globe maker of Fleet-street, and the publisher of a Scientific Magazine, was originally a schoolmaster of Chichester, and was born in 1704. He acquired afterwards some reputation as a travelling lecturer in experimental philosophy, and then settled in London, where he made some improvements in philosophical and mathematical experiments. In his old age he was afflicted with domestic losses in consequence of trusting too much to false friends, and though he had more than sufficient to discharge his debts, he became a bankrupt. In a fit of delirious despair he attempted his life; the wound, though not mortal, hastened his death. He died 9th Feb. 1782. His fossils and curiosities were sold for little after his death. He published a Philosophical Grammar—Young Gentleman and Lady's Philosophy, 2 vols. 8vo.—Philosophia Britannica, 3 vols. 8vo.—Treatises on Decimal Arithmetic, 8vo.—on Optics, 8vo.—on Trigonometry, 2 vols. 8vo.—Mathematical Institutes, 2 vols.—Natural History of England, 2 vols.—Biographia Philosophica, 8vo. and other miscellanies, all useful and ingenious.

MARTIN, Claude, a native of Lyons, of mean parentage. He had happily the advantage of a good mathematical education, and at the age of 20 he embraced the profession of arms, and embarked for India with his brother under general Lally. In the war of 1756 he conducted himself with great valour, but ill treatment disgusted him with the service, and he at the siege of Pondicherry deserted to the English, in whose forces he obtained the rank of colonel. Assiduous and intelligent, he was now employed to make a map of the territories of the Nabob of Oude, and under his patronage he introduced the arts and commercial institutions of Europe, and opened a bank, which proved highly productive. He afterwards settled at Lucknow, where he built a magnificent edifice for his residence, and another also on the banks of the Ganges, and then devoting his time to the natural productions of the country, he formed in his museum a very curious and valuable collection. His garden was also enriched with all the beautiful productions and varieties of the climate; his observatory was provided with the most useful and the best instruments for making observations on the heavens, and he exhibited the first balloon that ever floated in the atmosphere of Asia. This remarkable character died in 1799, and with the most benevolent intentions divided his immense property among his children, and for charitable purposes in the towns of Lyons, of Calcutta, and of Lucknow.

MARTIN, Alexander, LL.D. governor of North Carolina from 1782 to 1785, was previously speaker of the senate of the state, and afterwards a delegate to the convention which framed the constitution of the United States. He was a second time governor on the appointment of Mr. Johnson to the senate in 1789. In 1792 Mr. Martin, was elected a senator from North Carolina. He died November, 1807.

MARTINDALE, Adam, a mathematician and divine, master of a mathematical school at Warrington, and then at Dunham, was ejected from the living of Rosthorn, Cheshire, for non-conformity, 1662. He afterwards lived as chaplain in the family of lord Delaware, and died 1700. He is author of the Land Meter's Vade Mecum, 12mo.—two County Almanacks—12 Problems about Interest—Divinity Knots Unloosed 1649, 8vo.—Truth and Peace promoted, 1682, &c.

MARTINEAU, Isaac, a Jesuit of Angers, who died 1720, aged 80. He was patronised by the court, and became confessor and friend to the duke of Burgundy. He wrote Psalms of Penitence—Meditations on Retirement, &c.

MARTINI, Raymond, a Dominican friar, born at Sobirat, in Catalonia. He was one of those who were laboriously engaged in the study of Arabic and Hebrew to confute the Jews and Mahometans in their own language on religious subjects, and he was sent by the king of Arragon as a missionary to Tunis in 1268. He died 1286. His excellent treatise against the Jews, called Pugio Fidei Christianæ was brought to light by Bosquet, bishop of Montpellier, and published 1651 at Paris, and the best edition at Leipsic, 1687.

MARTINI, Martin, a Jesuit, long resident in China, where he wrote some valuable books. He returned to Europe in 1651, and again, as some suppose, revisited China, where he died, aged 74. He published "Sinicæ Historiæ Decas prima a gentis Origine ad Christum Natum, 4to.—China Illustrata, fol.—a Latin History of the Wars of the Tartars against China, 8vo.—a Relation of the Number and Quality of the Chinese Christians.

MARTINIÈRE, vid. BRUZEN.

MARTINIUS, Matthias, a native of Waldeck, the disciple of Piscator, became a respectable divinity professor at Paderborn and Bremen, and distinguished himself at the synod of Dordt. He wrote Lexicon Philologicum, 2 vols. fol. and died 1630, aged 55.

MARTINUSIUS, George, or VTISINOVISCH, a native of Croatia, who from a lighter of stoves became a learned ecclesiastic, bishop of Great Waradin, and at last the minister and friend of John Zapol, king of Hungary. At his death, 1540, the king left him guardian of his son John Sigismund, but a quarrel with Isabella the queen mother obliged him to leave the kingdom, and he retired to the court of the emperor Ferdinand I. who obtained for him a cardinal's hat from pope Julius III. He was afterwards suspected of plotting with the Turks against his benefactor, and in consequence of this probably false accusation he was meanly assassinated in his castle of Vints, 1551.

MARTIRELLI, a landscape painter of great eminence, born at Naples, where he died 1720, aged 50.

MARTYN, John, an English botanist, born in London, 1699. He early showed a fondness for botanical pursuits, and by the friendship of Dr. Sherard, his attention was directed to literary and not to mercantile concerns. By publishing, in 1720, Tournefort's History of the Plants in the neighbourhood of Paris, he formed the plan of composing a catalogue of those near London. The society of botanists in London, which continued in its original form till 1726, was established by him and Dillenius; but afterwards he left the metropolis, where he had given some lectures, to succeed Bradley as botanical professor of Cambridge. He acquired some reputation as a physician in London and Chelsea, but retiring to Streatham, in 1752, he abandoned the more laborious parts of his profession. He resigned, in 1761, his Cambridge professorship, in which he was succeeded by his son Thomas Martyn, B.D. and he died at Chelsea, 1768. Dr. Martyn had been elected member of the royal society in 1727, and was so useful in the regulations made to complete the library and the museum, that his bond for annual payment was honourably cancelled by the council of that learned body. His works are Tabulæ Synopticæ Plantarum Officinal. ad method. Ray. fol.—Methodus Plantarum circa Cantabrig. Nascent. 12mo.—Historia Plantarum Rariorum, Decad. 5 fol.—first Lecture of a Course of Botany, Introductory, 8vo.—Virgil's Bucolics and Georgics translated with notes, 2 vols. 8vo. and 4to. a valuable and entertaining work—Dissertations on the Æneid, 12mo.—Abridgment of Philosophical Transactions—Translation of Harris on the Diseases of Infants—do. of Boerhaave's Treatise on the powers of Medicine—Philosophical Papers of the Memoirs of the Paris Academy of Sciences, abridged, 5 vols. 8vo.—Various Curious Papers in the Philosophical Transactions—some Articles in the General Dictionary, &c.

MARTYR, Peter, a native of Anghierra in the Milanese, employed as an able negotiator by Ferdinand V. of Castile and Aragon, and also engaged in the education of the princes his children. In consequence of his services he obtained some ecclesiastical honours, and died 1525, aged 70. He was author of a History of the Discovery of America, under the name of de Navigazione et Terris de Novo Repertis, 1587—Letters respecting the History of Spain, Amsterdam, 1670, fol.—an interesting Relation of his Embassy to Egypt, 1500, in fol.

MARTYR, Peter, a most eminent divine, born at Florence, 1500. His family name was Hermilius, but he received from his parents that of Martyr, from Peter, a martyr, whose church was near the house in which he was born. He became an Augustine monk at Fiesoli, and afterwards studied at Padua, and at the age of 26 was admitted public preacher. He distinguished himself by his eloquence in the pulpit, and as a professor of philosophy and divinity, at Brixia, Rome, Venice, Mantua, and other cities; but the writings of Zuinglius and of Bucer, and the conversation of Valdes shook his faith in the papal infallibility, and after preaching the doctrines of the protestants in secret, he found it dangerous to continue south of the Alps, and therefore removed to Zurich. He next visited Basil, and then Strasburg where he married a nun who, like himself, had escaped from the superstitions of a convent. From Strasburg, Martyr was invited by Crammer to England, and honourably appointed divinity professor at Oxford by Edward VI. in 1549. Though insulted and ridiculed by the papists, he boldly continued his lectures, and, in approbation of his zeal, the king made him canon of Christ church. At the accession of Mary, however, the learned professor found it unsafe to remain at Oxford, and he therefore privately retired to Strasburg, and to Zurich, where, for seven years, he became a popular divinity professor. He had liberal offers afterwards to settle at Geneva, and his friend Jewel solicited him with zealous affection to return to England after Mary's death, but he declined those honourable testimonies of respect, and continued at Zurich, where he died 1562, aged 63. His wife died at Oxford during his residence there. On Mary's accession, such was the impotent virulence of the papists, her bones were dug up and buried in a dunghill by cardinal Pole, till the happier days of Elizabeth restored them to consecrated ground in the cathedral. On his return to Zurich, Martyr took a second wife, by whom he had three children, the youngest of which only survived him. Martyr, as a writer, was learned and well informed; as a disputant he was acute, sensible, and penetrating, as much admired by the protestants as he was dreaded by the papists. He was zealous as a reformer, but sincere, and in his greatest triumphs over superstition and error, wisely moderate and humble. He wrote several books against the papists, or in explanation of the Scriptures, but his "Defence of the Orthodox Doctrine of the Lord's Supper," against Gardiner, is particularly famous. He is, however, accused by father Simon, of making a vain and unnecessary display of his learning in his commentaries, though it must be confessed, in the words of bishop Jewel, that he is a man never to be named without the highest respect and honour.

MARUCELLI, John Stephen, an Italian painter of eminence, who died 1706, aged 60. One of his best pieces is Abraham entertaining the Angels.

MARVELL, Andrew, an ingenious writer, born 1620, at Kingston upon Hull, where his father was minister and master of the school. The strong powers of his mind were so early displayed, that at 13 he was sent to Trinity college, Cambridge, but here unexperienced and thoughtless he fell into the hands of the Jesuits, till his father interfered and restored him to the wholesome tenets of the university. He took his bachelor's degree, 1638, and about that time lost his father, who was drowned in crossing the Humber, while attending a female friend's daughter. The afflicted mother being now childless, bestowed all her property on the son of her deceased friend, and Marvell was thus enabled to travel and improve himself in visiting foreign countries. He passed through France, visited Rome, and extended his travels to

Constantinople. About 1653 he returned home, and was made assistant to Milton, the Latin secretary of Cromwell. He was chosen member of parliament for his native town in 1660, and continued to represent it, and with the honourable grant of a pension from his approving electors, till his death, and though he seldom spoke in the house, his opinion was respected out of doors, and often influenced prince Rupert, and other independent members. He claimed the public attention as a writer, by a severe anonymous attack on Dr. Parker, who was virulent in favour of arbitrary government, and by another pamphlet against bishop Croft's "Naked Truth," but his most violent composition was "an Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England, &c." for the discovery of the author of which the offended ministry offered a reward. These tracts were written not only with severity, but in a strain of humour and sarcasm, which rendered them very popular, and exposed to derision those against whom the satire was directed. Though an enemy to the ministry, Marvell was courted and admired, and even the king himself was pleased with his conversation and conduct, and endeavoured by all means in his power to gain him to espouse the measures of the court. After enjoying the company of this facetious subject, Charles the next morning sent to him his minister Danby, who with difficulty found his obscure lodging, up two pair of stairs, in one of the courts of the Strand. Marvell supposed his visiter had lost his way, but when informed that Danby came from the king, who wished to know what he could do to serve him, he answered that it was not in his majesty's power to serve him. When pressed farther to accept any office the court could give, Marvell answered, that he could not with honour accept the offer, since if he did, he must prove either ungrateful to the king in voting against him, or false to his country in giving into the measures of the court. To conquer this obstinate integrity Danby declared that he was the bearer to him of 1000*l.* from the king as a mark of his respect, but this the unshaken patriot rejected, though after the courtier was gone he was obliged to borrow a guinea of a friend. This great man died 1678, aged 58, not without strong suspicions of being poisoned, and he was buried in St. Giles's church, in the fields. His friends afterwards wished to erect a monument to his memory in the church of his native town, but the minister of the parish refused his consent. Some papers were afterwards imposed upon the public as his, by a woman with whom he lodged, and who imprudently asserted those papers to have been in the handwriting of her late dear husband. His poems and letters were published, London, 1726, in 2 vols. 12mo. with an account of his life, by Mr. Cooke, and since, a handsome edition has appeared by captain Thompson, 3 vols. 4to. Some of his recommendatory verses generally appear before the great work of his friend Milton.

MARVIELLES, N. de, a French officer, better known as the author of some poetical pieces of merit, in Latin and in French, consisting of stories well told, epigrams, &c. He died about 1775.

MARULLUS, Tacitus, a poet of the fifth century, who wrote a panegyric on Attila, king of the Huns, and waited upon him at Padua in expectation of a liberal reward. The fierce barbarian rewarded his flattery by throwing the poem and the writer into the flames.

MARULLUS, Michael Tarchanistis, a learned Greek who left his native town, Constantinople, when it fell under the power of the Turks. He distinguished himself as a soldier, as well as a poet in Italy, but in his principles he was an impious blasphemous and atheist. He was drowned on horseback in the river Cæcina near Volaterra, 1500. His poems and epigrams both in Greek and Latin were printed at Florence 1497, 4to. and Paris, 1561. They are elegant, but very licentious. He was a great admirer of Lucretius, and used to say that other poets were to be read, but Lucretius and Virgil to be got by heart.

MARY, the mother of our blessed Saviour, was of the tribe of Judah, and of the royal race of David. She was betrothed to Joseph, and her miraculous conception was announced to her by the angel Gabriel. From Bethlehem where the Saviour was born, she went to Egypt, and afterwards returned to Nazareth where she saw her son grow up in stature and in wisdom. Little is mentioned of her in the gospels, but that she was present at the crucifixion, when Jesus recommended her to his favourite disciple, John, who took her to his own house. The papists assert, that she continued immaculate, and on the supposition that she was taken up to heaven, without dying, they celebrate a feast called the assumption of the virgin.

MARY, wife of Cleophas, is called in scripture the sister of the virgin, and the mother of the apostles, James the less, Simon, and Jude, and Joseph. She early believed in the miracles, and the mission of our Saviour, she attended his crucifixion, and the burial of his body, and she was one of the women to whom his resurrection was announced at the sepulchre by a vision of angels, and she immediately after met him, and falling at his feet paid him adoration.

MARY, queen of England, eldest daughter ter of Henry VIII. by Catharine of Arragon, was born at Greenwich, 18th Feb. 1517. She was educated under the care of the celebrated Linacer and Vives, and she acquired so perfect a knowledge of Latin that she undertook to translate Erasmus's Paraphrase of St John's Gospel, which was finished by her chaplain Mallet. The treatment of her mother by her father totally alienated her heart from filial duties, and so exasperated was the monarch at her violent and obstinate conduct, that he would have publicly put her to death had not the virtuous Cranmer interfered. Bred up in the bigoted principles of the Romish church, she refused to join the protestant communion, as well under her brother as under her father, and in consequence of this obstinacy the young king, at the persuasion of the duke of Northumberland, set her aside in the succession, and appointed the lady Jane Gray for his successor. Though Jane was proclaimed on Edward's death, yet Mary's interest prevailed, and in a few days she entered London in triumph. The partialities which she had shown for the popish tenets in a private station, now displayed themselves on the throne, and guided by the counsels of the sanguinary Gardiner, she assented to those horrible excesses which have so deservedly fixed upon her the appellation of the bloody Mary. The faggot and the stake were the instruments used to make converts to the church of Rome, and not only the innocent lady Jane and her husband were sacrificed to the mean jealousy of the queen, but the great Cranmer who had saved her from destruction was condemned to the flames. In 1554 she married Philip of Spain, son of Charles V. but the happiness which she expected from this union was destroyed by the coldness of her phlegmatic husband, and her disappointment in child-bearing added to the studied absence of Philip, and the disgraceful loss of Calais, so preyed upon her spirits, that she fell a sacrifice to the attacks of a fever, 7th Nov. 1558. In her character, Mary was violent, superstitious, and bigoted, she thought it her duty to sacrifice the calls of humanity to her zeal for what she considered the interests of true religion, and from the influence of her popish advisers, she was often prevailed to commit what was dishonourable, flagitious, and oppressive. Three books of devotion are mentioned by Strype as written by her.

MARY, queen of England, wife of William III. was daughter of the second James, by the daughter of lord Clarendon. She married at the age of 15 William, prince of Orange, and at the revolution, when her father had abdicated the throne, she accompanied her husband, and was crowned queen. Mary is represented as of a meek inoffensive character, little inclined to meddle with public affairs except when party influenced her, or the absence of her husband rendered it necessary. She died 28th Dec. in 1694, at the age of 32, of the small-pox, leaving no issue. She was, in her character, benevolent and humane, exhibiting in her conduct great gravity, and little attachment to the feminine trifles and levities which fashion or caprice too often recommend.

MARY, daughter of Henry III duke of Brabant, married Philip the Bold of France, 1274. She was accused of poisoning the eldest of her husband's sons by a former marriage, but her innocence was proved by a knight sent by her brother, in those days of chivalry, to challenge her accusers. She died 1321, 36 years after the death of her husband.

MARY, of Anjou, daughter of Lewis II. and wife of Charles VII. of France. She was a woman of a very heroic character, and though insulted and despised by her husband, she applied all the powers of her great mind to secure the crown to him. She died 1463, aged 59.

MARY, daughter of Henry VII. of England, married Lewis XII. of France. After his death she took for her second husband, Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, by whom she had a daughter, who was the mother of the unfortunate lady Jane Gray. She died 1534, aged 37.

MARY DE MEDICIS, daughter of Francis II. duke of Tuscany, was born 1573, and married, in 1600, Henry IV. of France. After her husband's death she was declared regent of the kingdom, but weakness marked her administration, and her partiality for the worthless marshal D'Ancre, excited against her the indignation of the people, and the opposition of her son Lewis XIII. Though a reconciliation was effected between her and her son, by the means of Cardinal Richelieu, she afterwards conceived so great a hatred against this her former favourite, that all her powers and influence were directed to seek revenge. Lewis at last supported the cardinal, as the best means of consolidating his government, and Mary was banished, and her attendants and favourites, and even her physician, were sent out of the kingdom, or confined in the bastille. From Compiègne, where she was exiled, she retired to Brussels, and died in poverty at Cologne, 3d July, 1642, aged 69. Though obstinate and revengeful, Mary was, on some occasions, very humane and benevolent, she patronised the arts, and by her munificence Paris was adorned by the splendid palace of Luxemburg, and some religious establishments.

MARY THERESA, of Austria, daughter of Philip IV. of Spain, married, in 1660, Lewis XIV. of France, and died 1683, aged 45.

MARY LECZINSKA, daughter of Stanislaus, of Poland, married Lewis XV. king of France, 1725. She is represented as a very amiable and virtuous princess. She bore to Lewis XV. two sons and eight daughters. She died universally regretted, 24th June, 1768, aged 65.

MARY of Cleves, married Henry I. prince of Condé. She was loved with such ardour by the duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III. that when called to the throne of Poland, he wrote to her with all the warmth of affection, and signed his name with his blood. When raised to the French throne, he formed the design of annulling Mary's marriage with his rival, but Catharine de Medicis opposed it, and the sudden death of Mary, 30th Oct. 1574, at the age of 18, as is supposed by poison, left him disconsolate and wretched.

MARY, of Arragon, daughter of Sancho III. wife of Otho, is said to have been put to death, 998, for causing the destruction of the count of Modena, whom she falsely accused of attempts on her virtue.

MARY, daughter of Charles, duke of Burgundy, married Maximilian, son of the emperor Frederic, and thus transferred the dominions of Burgundy to the house of Austria. She died at Bruges, 1482, in consequence of a fall from her horse.

MARY, of Austria, daughter of Philip, king of Spain, married, 1521, Lewis, king of Hungary, who was slain five years after, at the battle of Mohats. She was made governess of the Netherlands, by her brother, Charles V. where she behaved with great courage, and opposed with success the arms of Henry II. of France. She was the friend of the protestants, and a great patroness of literature. Her fondness for the sports of the field procured her the name of Diana, and from her military prowess she was called by the Spaniards the mother of the camp. She left her government in 1555, and died three years after, in Spain.

MARY STUART, queen of Scots, daughter of James V. of Scotland and Mary of Lorraine, was born 1552, and eight days after her birth inherited the throne by the death of her father. Henry VIII. of England solicited her hand for his son Edward, and when refused he invaded Scotland and plundered Edinburgh. Uninfluenced by the momentary successes of the English, the Scotch regency betrothed their young queen, in 1558, to Francis, the dauphin of France, and she was educated there, and imbibed those principles of bigotry and foolish levity which afterwards embittered her life. The marriage was celebrated in 1558, but two years after, the youthful widowed queen left, with tears of regret, that country where some of the happiest of her days had been passed. Returned to Scotland, she found her subjects agitated by party zeal and civil dissension, and she discovered a powerful rival and secret enemy in her neighbour Elizabeth of England, whom she had seriously offended by assuming in France the empty title of queen of England, on an ill-founded pretence of Elizabeth's illegitimacy. To distracted councils was added religious animosity, and by publicly celebrating the mass in her chapel, Mary offended the feelings of her subjects, who were stern and rigid presbyterians, and who, in their zeal in favour of the reformation, had spared neither cathedrals nor abbeys, nor monuments which bore the marks of popish superstition. Thus exposed to fanatical violence, and even insulted by the followers of Knox, the celebrated reformer, Mary could pursue no better step than to call to share her throne, a man of sagacity, firmness, and virtue. In this she was unfortunate; in marrying Henry, lord Darnley, son of the earl of Lennox, a youth of engaging appearance, but of weak intellects, and impetuous passions, she is accused of consulting her licentious desires. Fondness and rapture soon gave way to indifference and disgust. Darnley became disagreeable in the eyes of the queen, and their mutual discontents were kindled and increased by the insidious arts of their respective flatterers. As Mary had placed her confidence on an Italian musician, of the name of David Rizzio, whom she had appointed her secretary, Darnley was easily persuaded that her attachment was criminal. Determined on revenge, he abruptly entered her apartments with some assassins, and seizing the terrified favourite, plunged a dagger into his heart, though the queen, then far advanced in her pregnancy, implored in vain for mercy. Mary felt the indignity offered to her person and dignity, and instead of reconciliation, she looked with horror on the murderer, and failed not on every occasion to manifest her displeasure and abhorrence. Darnley, despised at court, retired to his country house near Edinburgh, where his life was terminated by a most fatal catastrophe. The house was blown up in the night by gunpowder, and the unfortunate monarch's body was found in the garden adjoining, but without any marks of violence upon it. This foul deed was fixed, with some degree of truth, upon James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, who had succeeded Rizzio in the favour of the queen, and Mary herself escaped not the imputation of accessory guilt. Bothwell was tried and acquitted, but as if rejoicing in the iniquity of his conduct, he seized the person of the queen, 24th April, 1567, and prevailed upon her, at the castle of Dunbar, to marry him. This violent proceeding, which some historians assert, but with little probability of truth, to have been with the consent of Mary, roused the indignation of the Scotch nobles, and Bothwell, unable to stem the torrent of popular fury, left the kingdom, and fled to Denmark, where he died, wretched and destitute. Mary, in the mean time, had fallen into the hands of her enemies, and was compelled by Murray, the regent, her greatest enemy, to resign the crown in favour of her infant son, James VI. who was crowned king, at Dunbar. To render these measures agreeable to the nation, and to make the unfortunate Mary odious, she was now publicly accused of being the murderer of her husband, and letters were produced, which, if true, would have proved most fully her guilt. Time, however, has shown these to be gross forgeries, in the hands of those who had suffered the real murderer, Bothwell, to escape, and had punished with death some inferior characters, who were arraigned as accessories. Mary, a prisoner in Lochleven island, under the care of Murray's mother, who had been the concubine of James V. found means to escape to Hamilton, where she declared the acts extorted from her to be illegal. Though here joined by above 6000 men, she found herself unable to cope with the regent, who dispersed her raw troops, and obliged her to fly. Unknowing where to retire, she came towards England, and landed at Workington, in Cumberland, 17th May, 1568, and implored the friendship and protection of Elizabeth of England. Elizabeth, with hypocritical condolence, welcomed her on her escape, but after drawing her to Carlisle for greater security, she refused to see her till she had cleared herself of the imputations cast upon her character. Mary, who expected to be respected as a sovereign, found, unfortunately too late, she was to be treated as a criminal; but after she had submitted to a trial which was to investigate her innocence, and had heard Elizabeth declare, that nothing had appeared which could impeach the good character of her sister, she still felt that she was a prisoner in England. Her innocence and misfortunes roused the generous feelings of the nation towards her, but while she hoped for deliverance, from the offers of the duke of Norfolk to marry her, she had the mortification to know that Elizabeth not only wantonly opposed the union, but imprisoned her suitor, and afterwards, on some trifling accusation, put him to death. Not satisfied with the degradation of her rival, Elizabeth assumed now the part of a tyrant, and had her arraigned on pretence of conspiring against her life. Forty-two members of parliament and five judges were sent to Fotheringay castle, Northamptonshire, where the unhappy princess was immured, and though she refused to acknowledge the authority of her judges, and asserted her innocence, the matter was removed to Westminster, where she was declared guilty. Mary, who had lingered more than eighteen years in confinement, heard of the sentence with pleasure, and rejoiced at an event which was to terminate her sufferings and her misfortunes. Though some foreign powers interfered, and though James, with noble and ardent indignation, protested against the tyranny of Elizabeth's conduct, the bloody sentence was carried into execution. Mary, in her last moments, behaved with great dignity and becoming composure, and though her persecutors wished to insult her attachment to the popish faith, she asserted her devotion to the church in whose tenets she had been educated. She suffered in Fotheringay castle, 8th February, 1587, imploring forgiveness on her murderers. Her remains were interred in Peterborough cathedral, but afterwards removed to Westminster abbey, by her son, when raised to the English throne. Mary, distinguished by all those superior charms of person which command and secure admiration, possessed high qualities of mind. She was well acquainted with Latin, French, and Italian, and besides her letters, many of which are still extant, she wrote some poems not devoid of merit. Her character has been attacked by various writers, but ably vindicated by Whitaker and others, who recommend her to the notice of posterity more as unfortunate than guilty, and more the victim of dangerous times than the licentious and profligate culprit.

MARY, a French poetess, who resided in England in the 13th century. Her poems on chivalry, &c. are still preserved in the British museum. She wrote besides, in French verse, a tale on St. Patrick's purgatory, and fables in French prose, published by le Grand.

MAS, Lewis du. Vid. DUMAS.

MASACCIO, Thomas, an eminent Italian painter. He was regarded as the chief artist of the second age of modern painting, since the revival of the art by Cimabue. He died 1443, aged 26.

MASCARDI, Augustine, a learned Italian, born at Sarzane, in the city of Genoa, 1591. He was early connected with the Jesuits, and became chamberlain to Urban VIII. who founded a professorship of rhetoric in the college of Sapienza, for the exercise of his great talents. He was author of the History of the Conspiracy of de Fiesque—and of an able work, called "Dell' Arte Historica," besides some poems, &c. He was so fond of studious pursuits, and so negligent of his affairs, that he was always poor and in debt. He died in his native town, 1640.

MASCARON, Julius, a French bishop, born at Marseilles, 1634. He was member of the oratory, and, in his ecclesiastical duties as preacher, displayed so much eloquence, that the court, in admiration of his abilities, gave him the bishopric of Tulle, 1671, from which he was translated to Agen. He died in his diocese, of a dropsy in the chest, 16th December, 1703. His eloquence was so powerful, that, it is said, he converted 28,000 out of 30,000, of the Huguenots whom he found in his diocese. His funeral orations on the queen mother—on Turenne—Seguier, &c. were published, and are admired.

MASCHERONI, Laurent, a native of Bergamo, eminent as a mathematician, and the well-known author of Geometria del Compasso, or Compass Geometry. He assisted in the various experiments made by the academy of Bologna, to ascertain the figure of the earth by the descent of bodies. He published also, some notes on the Calculus Integer of Euler, and died at Paris, 1800, aged 50.

MASCLEF, Francis, a French theologian, made canon of Amiens by bishop de Bron. He was removed from this office by the next bishop, who accused him of being a Jansenist. He died Nov. 1728, aged 66. He wrote a Hebrew Grammar, improved by de la Bletterie, 1730, 2 vols. 12mo.—the Catechism of Amiens—Conferences of the Diocese of the Amiens, &c.

MASCRIER, John Baptist de, a French writer. He was born at Caen, and died at Paris, 1760, aged 63. He wrote a description of Egypt, from Mallet's Memoirs, 4to.—an Idea of the Ancient and Modern Government of Egypt, 12mo.—Christian Reflections on the Truths of Faith—Cæsar's Commentaries translated, &c.

MASENIUS, James, a Jesuit, born at Dalen, dutchy of Juliers, 1606. He was professor of eloquence and poetry at Cologne, and wrote good poetry. He was author of Sarcothea, a Latin poem, on the Fall of Man, from which Lauder supposed that Milton had drawn the subject of his celebrated poem—Palæstra Eloquentiæ Ligatæ, 4 vols. 12mo.—Palæstra Styli Romani—Anima Historiæ, seu Vita Caroli V. et Ferdinandi, 4to.—Notes, &c. on the Annales Trevirensium, folio—and Epitome Annal. Trevirensium, 8vo. He died 1681.

MASHAM, lady Damaris, daughter of Dr. Ralph Cudworth, and second wife of sir Francis Masham, of Oates, bart. was a most learned lady, born at Cambridge, 18th Jan. 1658. Her knowledge of history, geography, and philosophy, was greatly enlarged by the attention of Mr. Locke, who lived several years in her family, and died in her house, at Oates. She wrote a Discourse concerning the Love of God, 8vo.—Occasional Thoughts in reference to a Virtuous and Christian Life, 8vo. and was deservedly respected not only for learning, but for every virtue. Much of her time and attention was employed in the education of her only son. She died at Bath, 20th April, 1708, and was buried in the abbey church, where a monument records her virtues.

MASIUS, Andrew, counsellor to the duke of Cleves, was born at Linnich, near Brussels, and died, April, 1753, aged 57. He wrote, a collection of various pieces, translated from the Syriac—a Syriac Lexicon—Grammatica Linguae Syriacæ, folio—a Commentary on the Book of Joshua, and on some Chapters of Deuteronomy—Disputatio de Cœnâ Domini, &c. He was a most learned orientalist.

MASO, Thomas, or FINIGUERRA, a goldsmith of Florence, who is said to have invented, by accident, the art of taking impressions from engravings on copper. He flourished about 1480.

MASON, Francis, a native of Durham, educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of Merton. In 1599, he obtained the living of Oxford, Suffolk, and was afterwards made chaplain to James I. and archdeacon of Norwich. He died on his living, 1621, aged 55. His Vindiciæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, a work of great merit and authenticity, has been translated by Lindsay, with valuable notes.

MASON, sir John, a statesman of eminence in the reign of Henry VIII. and of his successors. Though but of obscure origin at Abingdon, in Berkshire, he received a good education under his uncle, who was one of the monks of the Abingdon abbey; and after being at All-Souls, Oxford, he rose in the service of the king, who employed him in several embassies abroad, and made him a privy counsellor. He maintained his influence at court under Edward and Mary, and Elizabeth appointed him treasurer of her chamber. He was also made chancellor of the university of Oxford, and died 1566. His favourite maxim was, do, and say nothing. In gratitude for the blessings of the education which he had received at Abingdon, he was a munificent benefactor to this his native town, and left a handsome estate for the endowment of an hospital, which still shelters under its roof, the infirm, the aged, and the indigent.

MASON, John, a dissenting minister, author of some works of merit. He was honoured with the degree of M. A. from a Scotch university, and died 1763. He wrote Self-Knowledge, a valuable ethical work—Essay on Elocution, 8vo.—Fifty-two Practical Discourses for the Use of Families, 2 vols. 8vo.—the Power of Poetical and Prosæic Numbers, 8vo.—Plain and Modest Plea for Christianity, 8vo.—Student and Pastor, or directions to attain to eminence in those characters, 12mo. &c. There was a fanatic of that name, of Water Stratford, near Buckingham, who, in the wildness of his Calvinistical reveries, believed himself to be Elias, the forerunner of Christ, &c. He died 1695.

MASON, William, an English poet of eminence. He was son of a Yorkshire clergyman, and was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and in 1749, by the interest of his friend Gray he was elected fellow of Pembroke-hall. He was admitted into orders in 1754, and became chaplain to the king, and obtained the valuable living of Aston, in Yorkshire, and afterwards the precentorship of York cathedral. During the American war, he showed himself a zealous advocate for the liberties of the subject, and his conduct was so offensive to the government, that his name was erased from the list of king's chaplains. The censure was too severe; Mason was the friend of political freedom and rational government; but that he was the enemy of fanciful and violent innovations, is abundantly proved by the abhorrence which he expressed against the wild theories of the supporters of the French revolution. He died in 1797, in consequence of a wound which he had accidentally received in getting out of his carriage, and which, from being neglected, became gangrenous and fatal. The abilities of Mason as a poet, are highly respectable. He first attracted the public attention in 1748, by his Isis, a poem, which the Oxonians considered as an attack on their Alma Mater, and which therefore was answered in a very spirited and beautiful poem, by Thomas Wharton, called the Triumphs of Isis. His Elfrida, and Caractacus, on the model of the Greeks, possess great merit, for boldness of conception, nervous language, and sublime description. He wrote besides, the English Garden, a poem—Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting, translated into English verse, with learned notes from sir Joshua Reynolds—a Book on Psalmody, &c. As the friend of Gray, Mason was one of his executors, and he evinced his respect for the departed bard, by publishing his letters, with his life, and by writing the epitaph which records his virtues in Westminster Abbey.

MASON, George, an English writer, known as the author of an Essay on Designs in Gardening, 1796, with appendix—Answer to T. Paine.—Supplement to Johnson's English Dictionary, 4to.—Life of lord Howe, 1803, &c. He made a valuable collection of English and foreign literature, and died at Aldenham lodge, Herts, of a fit of apoplexy, 4th Nov. 1806, aged 71.

MASON, John, who commanded the expedition against the Pequot Indians, and published a history of that war, was born in England, about the year 1600, and was bred to arms in the Netherlands. He came to Massachusetts in 1630, and settled at Dorchester. He removed thence to Windsor, Connecticut, in 1636, and the next year was appointed captain of the forces employed to subdue the Pequots. Descending Connecticut river with his troops, amounting only to 90 men, with a few friendly Indians, he sailed to Narraganset, and marching thence by land, surprised the Pequot fort near New-London, and completely vanquished that nation, which before threatened to destroy the colony. Soon after the close of the war, he was appointed major-general of the forces of Connecticut, and held the appointment till his death. He was a magistrate for near 20 years, and from 1660 to 1670 deputy-governor. He resided during the latter part of his life at Norwich, where he died about the year 1673, in the seventy-third year of his age. At the request of the general court, he published a history of the Pequot war, which was afterwards republished both by Doctor Mather, and Mr. Prince.  L.

MASON, John, D.D. was a native of Scotland, and born in 1734. He was connected with that branch of the secession from the established church of North Britain, known by the name of Antiburghers. By a presbytery in that connexion he was licensed, and not long afterwards ordained, with a view to his taking the pastoral charge of a congregation in the city of New-York, where he arrived in 1761, and resided greatly respected and eminently useful until his death in 1792. Doctor Mason was a man of a sound strong mind, extensive learning, and fervent piety; and his scholarship was uncommonly accurate and mature. At the age of twenty he spoke the Latin language, on all the higher subjects of discourse, with equal ease, and greater elegance than his mother tongue. In Greek his proficiency was but little inferior; and he was familiar with the Hebrew. At the age of twenty-four he taught logic and moral philosophy with reputation in the theological seminary of the Antiburghers at Abernethy. His lectures were in Latin. As a preacher he was uncommonly judicious and instructive; as a pastor, faithful and diligent; and as a friend and companion amiable, benevolent, and generous.  L.

MASON, George, of Virginia, a statesman of distinction, was a member of the general convention which formed the Constitution of the United States, and refused his signature to that instrument. The next year, in union with Henry, he opposed its adoption by the Virginia convention, on the ground that the government of the States would be consolidated, instead of federal, and be liable to conversion into a monarchy. He also opposed with great zeal the section allowing a continuance of the slave-trade. He held a high rank among the great men of that state with whom he was cotemporary, in intellectual energy, delicacy of wit, extent of political knowledge, and eloquence. He died at his seat at Gunston Hall, in the autumn of 1792, aged sixty-seven years.

MASQUE DE FER, or IRON MASK, a person confined in the castle of Pignerol, and afterwards in the isles of St. Margaret, and always disguised in a mask with steel springs, which concealed his features, without incommoding him in receiving his nourishment. He died in the Bastille, 1703, and was privately buried under the name of Marchiali. Though no person ever could discover who he was, it is certain that he was a man of high birth, as he was treated with singular respect by his keepers, and as infinite pains were taken to prevent his holding communication with any other person.

MASSAC, John Baptist, an eminent French painter, born at Paris, Dec. 1687. He died, Sept. 1767. He was a protestant, and a man of great integrity. The pictures of Le Brun at Versailles, were copied by him, and the engravings published, 1753.

MASSANIELLO, or ANELLO, Thomas, a Neapolitan fisherman. Vid. ANELLO.

MASSARI, Lucio, a native of Bologna, eminent as a historical painter. He studied under Ludov. Caracci, and at Rome, and died 1633, aged 64.

MASSARIA, Alexander, a physician, born at Vicenza. He wrote Latin treatises—on the Plague, 4to.—on Bleeding in Fevers—on Purging in the Beginning of Diseases, 4to.—Practica Medica, folio. He died very old, at Padua, 1598.

MASSE, John Baptiste, a Parisian, miniature painter to the French king. He died at Paris, 1767, aged 80. Some engravings were published 1753, from the copies which he took of Le Brun's famous pictures at Versailles.

MASSEI, Raymond, author of Pæan Aurelianus, 4to.—Pugeæ, sive de Lymphis Pugiæciis, lib. 2, 1599, &c. was a physician of Orleans.

MASSEVILLE, Louis le Vasseur de, a native of Montebourg, who died at Valogne, 1733, aged 66. He was an able topographical writer, and composed a History and Geography of Normandy, 8 vols. 12mo.

MASSIEU, William, a French writer, born at Caen, and educated by the Jesuits, whose society he left to apply himself more intensely to belles lettres. He became tutor to M. de Sacy's children, and afterwards was made pensionary of the academy of inscriptions, professor royal of the Greek language, and member of the French academy. He was afflicted in the latter part of life, with two cataracts, which deprived him of his sight, and he died of a paralytic stroke, Sept. 26th, 1722. He published, an edition of the Greek Testament—History of French Poetry—a translation of Pindar—a Latin poem on Coffee—Dissertations in the Memoirs of the Academy. His Lectures on Pindar, Homer, Theocritus, and Demosthenes, were much admired.

MASSILLON, John Baptiste, a famous French preacher, born at Hieres, in Provence, 1663. He was admitted into the congregation of the oratory in 1681, and distinguished himself so much at Vienna, by his funeral oration on Villars, the archbishop of that city, that he was called to Paris, where his eloquence charmed and astonished crowded audiences. His mode of preaching was peculiarly his own; interesting, natural, and simple, his appeals were directed to the heart, and succeeded far above the efforts of all other competitors. The court heard him with applause, and Louis XIV. paid him this sincere compliment, "Father," said the king, "when I hear other preachers, I go away much pleased with them, but whenever I hear you, I go away much displeas'd with myself." On one occasion, when discoursing on the small number of the elect, his eloquence was so awfully striking, that an involuntary murmur of applause arose in the congregation, and assisted the preacher more forcibly to convey his pathetic appeal. Uninfluenced by popularity, he followed his duty with modesty, but conscious dignity, and in 1717 was appointed by the regent, bishop of Clermont. In 1719 he was admitted member of the French academy; and after pronouncing his last oration in Paris, on the dutchess of Orleans, in 1723, he retired to his diocese, where he presided with mildness, piety, and benevolence. He died Sept. 1742, aged 79, and his name is almost become proverbial as a powerful master of eloquence. His works were published by his nephew, 1745, 14 vols. 12mo.

MASSINGER, Philip, a dramatic poet, born at Salisbury, 1585. He entered at St. Alban's hall, Oxford, which he left without a degree, and then came to London, where he wrote for the stage. He was courted by the wits and the learned men of the times, and was assisted in some of his plays by Fletcher, Middleton, Rowley, Field, and Decker. He died suddenly at his house, Bankside, Southwark, and was buried March, 1639, at St. Mary Overy, or St. Saviour's church, Southwark, in the same grave which also received the remains of his friend Fletcher. He wrote 14 plays of his own, besides those in which he was assisted by his friends. His works appeared in 4 vols. Svo. by Henry Dell, 1761, and by Mason and T. Davies in 1779.

MASSINISSA, king of part of Africa, from the enemy, became the most faithful ally, of Rome, when Scipio had sent him back, without ransom, his nephew, taken prisoner in battle. At his death, he left Scipio Æmilianus the guardian of his kingdom, B. C. 149.

MASSOLINO, de Panicale, a native of Florence, admired as a painter. He died 1450, aged 37. His best piece is a large representation of St. Peter's History.

MASSON, Anthony, a French engraver, whose plates of Turenne---of the duke d'Harcourt---of the disciples at Emmaus, are his best performances. His portraits were also admired. He died at Paris, 1702, aged 66.

MASSON, Innocent le, general of the Carthusian order, rebuilt the Grande Chartreuse when destroyed by fire, and died 1703, aged 75. He made a collection of the statutes of his order, enriched with notes, and printed at Paris 1703, folio.

MASSON, Anthony, a Minim, who died at Vincennes, 1700, was author of a History of the Deluge, and of Noah, 12mo.---History of Abraham, &c.

MASSON DES GRANGES, Daniel, author of the Modern Philosopher, or the Unbeliever condemned at the Tribunal of Reason, 1765, 12mo. was a French ecclesiastic, who died 1760, aged 60.

MASSON, Francis, a gardener and botanist, was born at Aberdeen in 1741. He was sent, in 1771, to the Cape of Good Hope, to collect plants for the royal gardens; after which he went to the Canary Islands and the West Indies with the same object. He next visited Portugal and Madeira, and returned to the Cape in 1786, where he remained till 1795; and, on his return, made a voyage to North America. He died at Montreal, in 1805. He published a splendid volume on the genus "Staphelia," 1796, folio.—W. B.

MASSON, Papius, a French writer, born at Forez, May, 1544. He was educated by the Jesuits, and entered into their society, but after some time left it, and applied himself to the law. He became librarian to the duke of Anjou's chancellor, and in 1576, was made advocate of parliament, though he never pleaded but one cause, and that successfully. He died 9th June, 1611. He wrote, four books of French Annals, from Pharamond to Henry II. 1598, 4to.---and Elegia Virorum Clarissimorum, much admired, and other works.

MASSON, John, a reformed minister, who quitted France to enjoy liberty of opinion in England, and died in Holland about 1750. He wrote, in French, a Critical History of the Republic of Letters, 15 vols. 12mo.—Vita Horatii, Ovidii, et Plinii, jun. 3 vols. 8vo.—History of Bayle, and of his works, 12mo.

MASSUET, Réne, a learned Benedictine of St. Maur, born at St. Ouen de Macelles, 1665. He is known by his edition of Irænaus, 1710, folio, with learned dissertations—a fifth volume of the Acts of the Saints of St. Benedict—and other works. He died 19th Jan. 1716, aged 50.

MASTELLETA, John Andrew, a painter, born at Bologna, 1577, who after studying under the Caraccis, improved himself further by copying the works of Parmesan. He is blamed for employing too much black in his paintings. He died in a monastery, where under a fit of melancholy, he had retired.

MATANI, Anthony, a physician, born at Pistoia, in Italy, 2<sup>d</sup> July, 1730. He became professor of medicine at Pisa, where he took his degrees, and died universally respected at Pistoia, June, 1769. He published de Aneurismaticis Præcordiorum Morbis Animadversiones—Heliodori Larissæi Capita Opticorum e Græco Latinè conversa—Account of the Natural Productions of Pistoia—de Nosocomiorum Regimine—de Remediis Tractatus, and left some MSS. besides.

MATERNUS DE CILANO, George Christian, a native of Presburgh, who died at Altena, in Lower Saxony, 1773. He was author of treatises of Terræ Concussionibus—de Causis Lucis Boreal.—de Motu Humorum progress. Veteribus non Ignoti.—de Saturnalium Origine et celebrandi Ritu apud Romanos, &c.

MATHER, Richard, minister of Dorchester, Massachusetts, was a native of Lancashire, and born in 1596. He was educated at Oxford, and entered the ministry at an early age. Being suspended for non-conformity he came to New-England in 1635, and was the next year settled at Dorchester, where he continued to labour with ability and acceptance till his death in 1699. He assisted in making the New-England version of the Psalms. He was a member of the several synods which met during his ministry at Dorchester, and was greatly respected for his piety, knowledge, and good sense. He was the principal author of the plan of church discipline adopted by the synod of 1648, and he published several controversial and practical works, which were esteemed.  L.

MATHER, Samuel, son of the preceding, was born in Lancashire, in 1626, and coming to America with his father, was educated at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1643. He was appointed the first fellow of that institution. He engaged in the ministry, and after preaching a short time in Boston, went to England in 1650, and was soon appointed chaplain of Magdalen college. He afterwards preached two years at Leith, in Scotland. In 1655 he went to Dublin, and became a senior fellow of Trinity college. He was settled in the ministry, but suspended at the restoration for nonconformity. He afterwards preached at Burtonwood, but returning to Dublin, died in 1671. He was a preacher of the first rank in force and perspicuity of mind, learning, and piety. ☞ L.

MATHER, Increase, D.D. president of Harvard college, was a brother of the preceding, and born at Dorchester, June 21st, 1639. He was graduated at the college, over which he afterwards presided, in 1656. The next year he went to England, and returned in 1661. He was settled in the North church, Boston, in which he had before preached several years, in 1664, and continued there in the labours of the ministry sixty-two years, with great reputation for talents and piety. He exerted a great and useful influence both in ecclesiastical and civil affairs. He was in 1688 agent to the court of England, and rendered important services by procuring the redress of grievances. He returned in 1692. He opposed the violent measures pursued against those who were accused of witchcraft. He was appointed to the presidency of the college in 1685, and held the office till 1701, when he resigned in consequence of an act of the legislature, requiring the president to reside at Cambridge. He died in 1723. Doctor Mather was eminent for the superiority of his talents, the extent of his learning, the excellence of his character, and great usefulness. He was an indefatigable student, and gave to the world a great number of useful publications on religion, politics, history, and philosophy. ☞ L.

MATHER, Cotton, D.D. F.R.S. minister in Boston, Massachusetts, and son of the preceding, was born 12th February, 1663. He became pious at an early age, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1678. He displayed at that age the superiority of his genius by an almost unequalled proficiency in his studies. In 1684 he was ordained colleague with his father, and laboured with the most exemplary diligence, till his death in 1728. He is justly reputed the most distinguished minister of New-England. He acquired knowledge with extraordinary facility, had a most retentive recollection and luxuriant fancy, and was unexampled in industry, and the extent and variety of his learning. The value of his endowments was, however, greatly abated by a mixture of extraordinary credulity, pedantry, and false taste. His eccentricities made him the object of ridicule to the profane, but he enjoyed the high respect of his acquaintance and countrymen at large, on account of his great benevolence and unfeigned piety, as well as superior genius and learning. He was a most voluminous writer, having given to the world 382 publications, several of which, as his Magnalia, or the Ecclesiastical History of New-England, were large. ☞ L.

MATHIAS, St. one of the 12 apostles in the room of the traitor Judas. He suffered martyrdom where he preached the gospel. A gospel was preserved among some sects, said to have been written by him.

MATHIAS, son of Maximilian II. was emperor of Germany after his brother Rodolphus II. 1612. He made peace with the Turks 1615, but a new war arose which continued for 30 years till the peace of Westphalia. Mathias died at Vienna, 10th March, 1616, aged 63.

MATHIAS CORVINUS, king of Hungary and Bohemia, was the second son of John Huniades, and obtained the kingdom, 1458, after escaping from the confinement where his enemies detained him. He broke the conspiracy of Hungarian lords who invited Frederic III. to take possession of the crown, in opposition to him, and he bravely defeated the Turks, who, invited by the dissensions of the country, had invaded the kingdom. He obliged also his rival to resign the consecrated crown of Stephen, which he had seized, and in a new war he attacked the Austrian dominions and penetrated to Vienna, which he took, and also Neustadt. The emperor, terrified and subdued, made peace agreeable to the terms dictated by the conqueror, 1487. After establishing wise regulations, reforming abuses, and checking duels and litigious quarrels, this great man was seized with an apoplexy, which carried him off 16th April, 1490, at Vienna, as he was preparing to make war against the Turks.

MATHIAS, Christian, a native of Mel-dorp, in Holstein, professor of philosophy and divinity in various universities, died at Utrecht, 1655, aged 71. He wrote Historia Patriarcharum, 4to.—Theatrum Historicum, 4to.

MATHON DE LA COUR, James, a mathematician, born at Lyons, 28th Oct. 1712, and died there 1770. He was an active member of the academy of Lyons, and wrote a memoir on the best method of supplying the Action of Wind on large Vessels—Elements of Dynamics and Mechanics, 3 vols. 12mo.—Essay on Calculating the Movements of Machines by the Reaction of Water.

MATHON DE LA COUR, Charles Joseph, son of the preceding, was born at Lyons, 1738. He came early to Paris, and there distinguished himself by his literary labours, and the prizes which he obtained in various learned academies, and on his return to his native city he gained universal esteem by the benevolence, hospitality, and the amiable virtues of his character. The revolution at last came to embitter his days; after the siege of Lyons, in 1793, he was condemned to death by the bloody tribunal, and shared with several others the fatal blow which hurried so many unhappy victims to an untimely grave. Among his elegant and ingenious pieces these rank high, Dissertation on the Causes which altered the Laws of Lycurgus, at Lacedæmon, a prize essay, 1771—Discourse on the Danger of reading Books hostile to Religion, a prize composition—Testament de Fortuné Ricard, in 1781, long ascribed to Franklin—Idylles in prose—Eloges—Letters on the Public Pictures exhibited in 1763, 5, and 7, &c.

MATIGNON, James de, prince of Montagne, count of Thorigni, was born at Lonray, in Normandy, 1526, and early became eminent as a soldier. He was distinguished at the battles of Jarnac, Roche-abeille, and Moncontour, and was commander-in-chief in Normandy, 1572, and made a marshal by Henry III. 1579. He assisted at the coronation of Henry IV. as constable, and died July, 1597, aged 73.

MATILDA, or MAUD, daughter of Henry I. king of England, married Henry IV. emperor of Germany, and was in 1135 publicly announced as her father's heir and successor on the English throne, after the death of his favourite son Henry. On her father's decease, Stephen, who was on the spot, seized the kingdom, and Matilda came at last with an army to conquer her father's inheritance, Stephen was defeated, and Matilda was in 1141 acknowledged queen, but her pride offended the nobles, and Stephen, who had conciliated the affection of all parties by his courteous behaviour, and by the arts which an usurper can occasionally employ, was taken from his dungeon to be restored to the throne, and the queen fled from the kingdom. After Stephen's death, Henry II. the son of Matilda by Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, whom she had married after her first husband's death, was appointed king of England. Matilda died 1167, aged 67.

MATYS, Quintin, a native of Antwerp, who from a blacksmith became an eminent painter. His works were chiefly portraits and historical pieces, and in a very masterly style. The best of his pieces is a Descent from the Cross, preserved in Antwerp cathedral. He died 1529, aged 69. His son John was also a good artist, though inferior to his father.

MATEI, Paolo da, a native of Naples, who studied painting under Luka Giordano, and excelled by the correctness of his pieces, and the accuracy with which he copied the works of the ablest masters. He died 1728, aged 67.

MATHEW or LEVI, son of Alpheus, a tax gatherer, who was called by our Saviour to become a disciple. He wrote his gospel about 64, and some imagine it was originally written in Hebrew or Syriac, and afterwards translated into Greek. He preached the gospel in Persia, and in Parthia, and is there supposed to have suffered martyrdom.

MATTHEW CANTACUZENUS, son of John, emperor of Constantinople, was partner on the throne with him 1354. On the father's abdication Matthew took for his associate John Palæologus, but the divided power produced quarrels; a battle was fought in Thrace, and Matthew being defeated, resigned the crown to his opponent and retired to the monastery of Mount Athos, where he composed some commentaries on Solomon's Song.

MATTHEW, of Westminster, a Benedictine of the abbey of Westminster, known as a historian. His work called "Flores Historiarum," &c. treats of English affairs from the beginning of the world to the year 1307, and was published in London, 1567, and at Frankfort, 1601, folio. The work is divided into three books, the first extends from the creation to the Christian era, the second to the Norman conquest, the third to the beginning of the second Edward's reign, afterwards continued to the death of Edward III. 1377. The author, though occasionally credulous, is universally respected as a faithful, accurate, regular, and candid historian.

MATTHEWS, Tobias, an able and eloquent Oxford divine in the reign of James I. made bishop of Durham, and in 1606 translated to York, where he died 1628, aged 82. A Latin sermon of his, against Campian, has been published. His son Tobias, after receiving his education at Christ church, Oxford, became a catholic, and entered among the Jesuits. He disgraced his name, and abused his talents by being the intriguer and spy of the court of Rome in England. He died 1655.

MATTHEWS, Thomas, a native of Glamorganshire, eminent as a naval commander. He fought in the Mediterranean in 1744, a most obstinate battle off Toulon, but as he was unfortunately not ably supported by his second in command, Lestock, instead of obtaining a glorious victory, as he expected, he had only an indecisive action. Though he had done his duty, he was dismissed from the service by a court-martial, and Lestock was acquitted. He died on his estates in Glamorganshire, 1751.

MATTHEWS, Samuel, governor of Virginia, was one of the counsellors of that colony, appointed in 1624. He was elected governor in 1656, but soon after went to England as agent of the province, and died there. He was succeeded by Berkley.

MATTHEWS, John, governor of South Carolina, was one of the most active and influential individuals of that state in promoting the revolution. He was the first speaker of the house of representatives after the dissolution of the royal government, in 1776, and was appointed the same year an associate justice of the supreme court. In 1780 he was elected a delegate to congress, and was one of the committee of that body appointed to visit the army, and to report what defects existed in the system adopted for its support, and the alterations necessary for its improvement. He was also a member of the committee sent by congress to effect an accommodation with the troops of Pennsylvania, which had mutinied, when at the suggestion of the French ambassador, as was alleged, a proposition was contemplated to be brought forward in congress to purchase the independence of the other portion of the union, by sacrificing to Great Britain Georgia and the Carolinas, Mr. Matthews repaired to Philadelphia, and in conjunction with Mr. Bee and Colonel Eveleigh, adopted such precautions relative to the subject that the intrigue, if it really existed, was abandoned. In 1782 he succeeded Mr. Rutledge as governor of the state. Mr. Guerard succeeded him in the following year. In 1784, on the first establishment of the court of equity, Mr. Matthews was appointed one of the judges. He died at Charleston, Nov. 1802, aged 58.  L.

MATHEU, Peter, a French historian, principal of the college of Verceil. He favoured the league and the Guises, and afterwards became historiographer to Henry IV. and attended Lewis XIII. at the siege of Montauban. He died at Toulouse, 12th Oct. 1621, aged 58. He wrote a History of Memorable Events in the Reign of Henry the Great, 8vo.—the History of Henry's Death, folio—the History of St. Lewis, 8vo.—the History of France from Francis I. to Lewis XIII. 2 vols. folio—la Guisiade, a tragedy, &c.

MATHIOLUS, Peter Andrew, an able physician, born at Sienna. He published some valuable commentaries in Italian on Dioscorides, Lyons, 1548, 4to. translated into Latin by Desmoulins, 1572, folio. His works were collected and appeared at Basil, 1598, folio, enriched with the notes of Gaspard Bartholin. He died of the plague at Trent, 1577, aged about 77. There was another physician of the same name, professor of medicine at Padua, where he died, 1498. He wrote Ars Memorativa, 4to. a curious book.

MATTI, Don Emanuel, a Spanish poet of eminence, born at Oropesa, New Castile, 1663. He was member of the Arcadia at Rome, and Innocent XII. pleased with his poetry, made him dean of Alicant, where he died 18th Dec. 1737. His letters and poetry were published at Madrid, 2 vols. 12mo. 1735.

MATURINO, a native of Florence, eminent as a painter. He assisted his master Raphael in several of his designs, and afterwards offered his services to Polidoro de Carravaggio, whose works he rivalled in correctness and execution. He died 1527, aged 37.

MATY, Matthew, an eminent physician, born in Holland 1718. He took his doctor's degree at Leyden, and in 1740, came to settle in England. He introduced himself to public notice 1759, by his "Journal Britannique," a periodical paper printed at the Hague, and giving an account of English publications. In 1758, he was chosen fellow, and 1765, secretary of the Royal society, and in 1772, he became chief librarian of the British museum. He unfortunately fell a victim to a languishing disorder 1776, after a life devoted to the offices of humanity, and the labours of science. He was a great advocate for the inoculation of the small-pox, when it was considered as dangerous. His memoirs of the earl of Chesterfield, nearly finished before his death, were prefixed by his son-in-law Justamond to the works of that nobleman, 1777, 2 vols. 4to.

MATY, Paul Henry, son of the above, was born 1745, and educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He obtained there a travelling fellowship, which enabled him to go abroad, and in 1774, he went as chaplain to lord Stormont ambassador to the court of France. His rise in the church might have now been enforced by the influence of his powerful friends, but he expressed some conscientious scruples about those articles of faith, to which before he had subscribed, and in 1776, he totally withdrew himself from the duties of a minister of the church of England. The rest of his life was devoted to literary pursuits. He became assistant librarian to the British museum, and in 1778, succeeded Dr. Horsley as secretary to the Royal society. He began Jan. 1782, a monthly review of new publications, which from ill health he discontinued in 1786. In the disputes which unfortunately prevailed in the Royal society in 1784, about the re-admission of Dr. Hutton, he took a warm part, and resigned his office in disgust, when good sense would have dictated a more moderate and prudent conduct. A sedentary life had weakened his constitution, and he fell a martyr to an asthmatic complaint, 16th Jan. 1787, aged 42. He translated Riesbach's Travels through Germany, and after his death a volume of his sermons appeared, in which were those of Secker and other authors which his editors suspected not to have been transcribed by him.

MAUCHARD, Burchard David, a native of Marbach, professor of physic and anatomy in Tubingen university, and physician to the duke of Wirtemberg. He wrote various tracts on his profession, and died at Tübingen 1751, aged 55.

MAUCROIX, Francis de, a French translator, born at Noyon, 1619. He died canon of Rheims, 1708. He translated the Philippics of Demosthenes—the Euthydemus, and the greater Hippias of Plato—some Orations of Cicero—the Rationarium Temporum of Petau, 3 vols. &c. He was intimate with Boileau and Racine, and published, in conjunction with la Fontaine, miscellaneous and poetical works, 2 vols. 12mo.

MAUDUIT, Michael, an eminent divine, born at Vire, in Normandy, 1634. He died at Paris 1709. He wrote some useful works—a Treatise on Religion against Atheists, Deists, &c. 1698—a Translation of the Psalms into French Verse, not very respectable—Analyses of some of the Books of the New Testament, 8 vols. 12mo.—Disquisitions on the Gout, &c.

MAUDUIT, Israel, a political writer, born at Exeter 1708. He was educated for the ministry among the dissenters, but soon after quitted his clerical employment, and became partner with his brother Jasper, a London merchant. In 1760 he excited the public attention by his "Considerations on the German War," and he was afterwards appointed agent for the province of Massachusetts, and consequently became a warm partisan in the disputes with the mother country. In 1769, he wrote his Short View of the History of the New-England Colonies, and in 1774, he espoused the cause of the dissenters by his pamphlet "on the Case of the Dissenting Ministers," &c. He published various other pamphlets which are now deservedly forgotten, and died 14th June, 1787, aged 79.

MAUGIN, John, surnamed Angevin, or of Anjou, where he was born, translated Machiavel's Discourses on Livy into French. He published his new Tristan Prince of Leonnois, &c. 1554, which he dedicated to M. Maupas, who is the hero of the book.

MAUPERTUIS, Peter Lewis Moreau de, an able philosopher, born of a good family at St. Malo's 1698. He was for three years engaged in a military life, but quitted it for the labour of science. He was admitted member of the French academy 1723, and some years after, when visiting London, he was honoured with the title of fellow of the Royal society. In 1736, he was at the head of the French academicians, sent by the king of France, to the North, to ascertain the figure of the earth. He was afterwards invited by the prince of Prussia to Berlin, to become president of the learned society there, and with a spirit of adventure he accompanied his royal friend to the war against the Germans. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Molwitz, and conveyed to Vienna, but soon honourably set at liberty by the emperor, and permitted to return to Berlin. He returned to Paris, but instead of quietly settling in his country, in the pursuit of science and philosophy, he went back to Berlin, and was soon after unfortunately engaged in some literary quarrels with Koenig, professor of philosophy at Franeker, and with Voltaire. The roving and unsettled disposition of Maupertuis was not indeed calculated to conciliate esteem and affection; but Voltaire was so severely satirical on him whom he had long called his friend and mathematical instructor, that even the king of Prussia thought it his duty to interfere and arrest the malevolent poet at Frankfort. Maupertuis went afterwards on a visit to his philosophical friends the Bernouillis at Basil, and died at their house, July, 1759. His works are very valuable and display every where a great, well-informed, and penetrating mind. They have been collected into 4 vols. 8vo. 1756, consisting of the Figure of the Earth determined—the Measurement of a Degree of the Meridian—Discourse on the Figure of the Stars—Elements of Geography—Nautical Astronomy—Elements of Astronomy—Physical Dissertation on a White Negro—Essay on Cosmography—Reflections on the Origin of Languages—Essay on Moral Philosophy, and various other dissertations, &c. inserted in the Berlin Memoirs.

MAUPERTUY, John Baptist Drouet de, a native of Paris, who studied the law, and afterwards held a place under government, and then entered into orders and obtained a canonry. He wrote the History of the Holy Church at Vienne—a Christian's Sentiments on the True Love of God—the Dangerous Commerce between the two Sexes—Veneration due to Relics, &c. He died 1736, aged 86.

MAUPIN, N. Aubigny, a celebrated singer at the Paris opera. She possessed great personal courage, and she on some occasions assumed a man's dress to avenge boldly on her opponents those insults which her sex forbade her openly to resent. Her best character was Medea in the opera of Medus by la Grange. She left the stage in 1705, and died two years after, aged 33.

MAUR, St. a disciple of St. Benedict, who died about 584, abbot of Glauseuil in Anjou. A congregation bearing his name was formed in France in the seventeenth century, which was approved by the pope, and has produced some learned men.

MAUR, Don Charles de, an eminent mathematician and engineer, whose abilities were employed not only in the Spanish army, but in the construction of canals, of public roads, and other great national works. He wrote a Treatise on Dynamics, and Elements of Mathematics, and died 25th Nov. 1785.

MAURAN, Peter, a leading man among the Albigenses in Languedoc in the 13th century, who, because he denied transubstantiation, was stripped of his property, and condemned, after severe trials, to make a pilgrimage to the holy land, and there to administer to the relief of the indigent.

MAUREPAS, John Frederic Philippeaux, count of, a French statesman, born 1701. In 1715 he was made secretary at court, and was afterwards appointed superintendent of the king's household, and of the marine, 1723, and minister of state, 1733. Though he evinced sagacity and genius in his master's service, he was exiled to Bourges by the intrigues of Madame Pompadour, and continued in disgrace till Lewis XVI. in 1774, recalled him to enjoy his confidence, and to direct public affairs. The spirited measures, however, which he recommended in favour of the Americans against their parent country were very imprudent, and have since produced the ruin of his master. He died Nov. 1781, aged 80. His correspondence, which was very precise and correct, together with his memoirs, which are very negligently written, appeared at Paris 1792, 2 vols. Svo.

MAURICE, of Nassau, prince of Orange, succeeded though only 18 on his father's murder, 1584, to the government of the Low Countries. Treading in the glorious steps of his father, he as captain general of the United States strengthened and confirmed the newly established republic, supported its liberties and privileges, and enlarged its provinces by the conquest of Breda, in 1590, and of Zutphen, Deventer, Hulst, Nimeguen, Gertruydenburg, &c. His successes were rapidly continued, the archduke Albert was defeated in 1597, and the Spaniards were forced to evacuate Holland, and though obliged to raise the siege of Dunkirk in 1600, Maurice avenged this trifling disaster by the total defeat of Albert, near Nieuport. The conquest of Rhinberg, Grave, and other places followed these glorious labours; but while Maurice, respected by the soldiery for his valour and services, aimed at the sovereignty of his country, his views were vigorously opposed by the unyielding integrity of Barneveldt, who, unhappily for the memory of his rival, was sacrificed in an unguarded moment. The Dutch mourned the loss of their virtuous pensionary, and Maurice, sensible of his cruelty, and still more displeased by the loss of Breda, which after a siege of six months fell into the hands of the Spaniards, became the prey of sudden grief, and died of a broken heart 1625, aged 55, leaving behind him the character of being the ablest general of the age.

MAURICEAU, Francis, a French surgeon, chiefly eminent in midwifery, and in an extensive knowledge of female diseases. He wrote a treatise on the Disorders of Pregnant Women—on Midwifery—Diseases of Mothers and New Born Infants, 4to. 1694, a very useful work, translated into several languages. He died at Paris 1709.

MAURITIUS TIBERIUS, a Cappadocian, who distinguished himself at the head of the Roman armies, and received in marriage the daughter of the emperor Tiberius Constantine. He was made emperor 582, but though valiant and successful against the Persians and Arabs, he was unfortunately defeated by Phocas his general, who had proclaimed himself emperor, and he was put to death with his five sons, A. D. 602, aged 63.

MAUROLICO, Francis, abbé of Santa Maria del Porto, in Sicily, and professor of mathematics, was born at Messina, 1494, and died 1575. He is author of an edition of the Spherics of Theodosius—Emendatio et Restitutio Conicorum Apollonii Pergæi—Archimedis Momenta Omnia—Euclidis Phænomena—Martyrologium, &c.

MAVRUS, Terentianus, a Latin poet under Trajan. His poem De Literis, Syllabus, &c. is preserved in Maittaire's Corpus Poet. Lat.

MAURY, Jean Siffrein, a French cardinal, was born in 1746 at Vabees, in the ancient comté at Venaission. He studied at Lyons, and, on entering into orders, became a celebrated preacher at Paris, where he obtained a place in the academy, and obtained an abbey. When the revolution broke out, he became one of the representatives of the clergy in the States-general, where he distinguished himself by his eloquence in behalf of his order, as he afterwards did in defence of royalty. On the dissolution of the constituent assembly, he went to Italy, where he was nominated bishop of Nicæa, and a cardinal. In 1807 he made his submission to Buonaparte, who in 1810 appointed him archbishop of Paris; but when the usurper fell, the cardinal was obliged to leave France. He died at Rome, in 1817. He published several works, the best of which is, "An Essay on Eloquence."—W. B.

MAUSSAC, Philip James, a counsellor in the parliament of Toulouse, president of the court of aids at Montpellier, and a most elegant Greek scholar, died 1650, aged 70. He published notes on Harpocration, Paris, 1614, 4to.—Remarks on Plutarch's Treatise on Mountains and Rivers, &c.

MAUTOUR, Philibert Bernard Moreau de, auditor of the Paris chamber of accounts, and member of the academy of inscriptions, was born at Beaune, 1654, and died, 1737. He published a translation of Petau's Rationarium Temporum, 4 vols. 12mo. and wrote some poems and some dissertations, inserted in the memoirs of the belles lettres' academy.

MAXENTIUS, Marcus Aurelius Valerius, son of Maximianus Hercules, declared himself emperor, 306. Though opposed by Galerius, he established his power, but becoming odious by his cruelty, he was at last attacked and defeated by Constantine, and was drowned as he crossed the Tiber in his flight, 312.

MAXCY, Jonathan, D.D. president of the college of South Carolina, was born at Attleborough, Massachusetts, in 1763, and was ordained pastor of the baptist church in Providence, September 8th, 1791. He was the same year elected professor of divinity in the college of Rhode Island, of which he was afterwards president. He resigned this office in 1802, and was president of Union college at Schenectady until the appointment of Dr. Nott in 1804. On the organization of the college at Columbia, South Carolina, he was elected president of that institution, and continued there until his death, June 4th, 1820. He was a very useful college officer, and much esteemed in the various institutions over which he presided. He married a daughter of commodore Hopkins, of Providence. Several of his occasional sermons and orations were published.

MAXIMIANUS, Marcus Aurel. Valer. Herkul. a Roman emperor, who rose to that dignity from the rank of a common soldier. He possessed valour and prudence, but as the associate of Diocletian, he was induced to lay down the ensigns of his office, 304, though afterwards he had the ambition to resume his power. His troops, however, rebelled against him, and he was put to death at last by order of Constantine, his son-in-law, 310, aged 60.

MAXIMIANUS, Galer. Valer. a shepherd of Dacia, distinguished by his valour, and at last raised to the throne by Diocletian, who gave him his daughter in marriage. After conquering the Goths, Dalmatians, and Persians, it is supposed that he obliged his father-in-law Diocletian to abdicate the crown. He died 311, in a miserable manner, calling upon the God of the Christians, whose religion he had hitherto persecuted.

MAXIMILIAN I. archduke of Austria, son of Frederic IV. was born 1459. By his marriage with Mary daughter of Charles, last duke of Burgundy, he rose to consequence as an independent prince, and in 1486, he was elected king of the Romans, and in 1493, emperor. He was successful in his war against France, but his forces were defeated in Italy and Switzerland. In his eagerness to enlarge his dominions he expressed a wish to be the coadjutor of Julius II. on the papal throne, and like some of the Roman emperors, he assumed the title of pontifex maximus. He afterwards made an alliance with Henry VIII. against France, and even served as a private individual in the English army on the continent. He was unsteady in his attachments, and though possessed of good sense and great qualities, little to be depended on in political affairs. He died at Inspruck, 15th January, 1519, in consequence of eating melons to excess. He was author of some poems, and of memoirs of his own life.

MAXIMILIAN II. son of Ferdinand I. was elected king of the Romans, 1562, and succeeded his father two years after as king of Hungary and Bohemia, and emperor of Germany. He was of a peaceful disposition, and therefore suffered from the inroads of the Turks upon his dominions. He died at Ratisbon, 12th October, 1576, aged 50. By his wife, Mary of Austria, sister of Philip II. of Spain, he had several children.

MAXIMILIAN, duke of Bavaria, deserved by his courage the title of defender of Germany, and by his wisdom that of Solomon. He gained the battle of Prague, 1620, and for his services as a warrior and as the supporter of the Catholic faith, he was raised to the dignity of an elector of the German empire. He died 1651, aged 70.

MAXIMILIAN, Emmanuel, elector of Bavaria, distinguished himself by his many services in the cause of the emperor Leopold. He was at the siege of Neuheusel, in 1685, when the Turkish forces were defeated, and the next year he was at the siege of Buda, and the year after at the battle of Mohatz. His merits placed him at the head of the Hungarian army, and in 1689 he took from the Turks the city of Belgrade, and afterwards commanded the imperial troops at the siege of Mentz, and on the banks of the Rhine. In 1692 he was made governor of the Low Countries by the king of Spain; but during the war of the Spanish succession he sided with France, and exposed himself to the resentment of the emperor, who deprived him of his electoral honours, to which he was restored at the general peace. He died at Munich, 26th Feb. 1726.

MAXIMILIAN, Leopold, elector of Bavaria, son of the emperor Charles VII. succeeded to the electorate of Bavaria, 1746. He died 30th December, 1777, and as he left no issue, the succession to his dominions occasioned a war between the empire and Prussia, which was terminated by the peace of Teschen, 1779.

MAXIMINUS, Caius Jul. Verus, son of a Thracian peasant, rose by his valour in the Roman armies, and on the death of Alexander Severus, was proclaimed emperor, 235. He was of gigantic size and proportionable strength, but a great tyrant. He was at last assassinated by his soldiers, near Aquileia, 256.

MAXIMUS, Magnus, a Spaniard, proclaimed emperor of Rome, by his troops in Britain, 383. Though opposed by Gratian, he proved victorious, and at last marching into Italy, he was besieged in Aquileia, and defeated by Theodosius, who caused his head to be cut off, 388.

MAXIMUS, of Tyre, a Platonic philosopher, who was at Rome, 146, A. D. His Discourses, 41 in number, have been edited by Reiske, 1774, and translated into French by Formey.

MAXIMUS, the Cynic, a native of Ephesus, tutor to the apostate Julian, whom he encouraged in his opposition to Christianity, and flattered by his magic arts, assuring him, when going on his Persian expedition, that he would prove victorious, and that he was animated by the soul of Alexander. He was put to death by the emperor Valens, 366.

MAY, Thomas, an English writer, born at Mayfield, in Sussex, 1594. He was of Sidney college, Cambridge, where he took, 1612, his bachelor's degree, and afterwards entered at Gray's Inn. His genius recommended him to the notice of the great of those times. He was the friend of Sir Kenelm Digby, Sir R. Fanshaw, Thomas Carew, Ben Jonson, Sir John Suckling, and others, and became the favourite of Charles I. and of his queen. Under the sunshine of royal patronage he wrote "The Heir," a comedy, acted 1620—Cleopatra, a tragedy, acted 1626—Antigone, a tragedy—Agrippina, a tragedy—the Old Couple, a comedy, &c. and also by the king's command, "the Reign of Henry II." a poem in 7 books, and "the Reign of Edward III." a poem in 7 books. As a translator, May acquired some reputation. Virgil's Georgics appeared 1622, with notes, and his Lucan's Pharsalia, 1627. This last work is a very respectable performance, and the poet greatly increased his literary fame by a continuation of the poem to the death of Julius Cæsar, in verses which were much admired, and which Dr. Johnson preferred to the Latin of Cowley or of Milton. May, respected as the friend of the monarch, to whom he dedicated the best part of his publications, became despicable in the civil wars. He embraced the party of the parliament, was made their secretary and historiographer, and as such published the "History of the Parliament of England," which began Nov. 3d, 1640, to the first battle of Newbury, 1643. He wrote also a "Breviary of the History of the Parliament of England," a few months after the publication of which he died suddenly, 13th November, 1650, aged 55. He was buried in Westminster abbey, but at the restoration his body was dug up, and deposited in a pit in St. Margaret's churchyard.

MAY, Lewis du, a protestant French historian, who spent the best part of his life in Germany. He died 1681. His works are "State of the Empire, or Abridgment of the Public Law of Germany"—Science des Princes, 8vo.—the Prudent Voyager, 12mo.

MAYENNE, Charles of Lorraine, duke of, son of Francis, duke of Guise, was born 26th March, 1554. He distinguished himself as a heroic soldier at the sieges of Poitiers and Rochelle, and at the battle of Moncontour, and defeated the protestants in Guienne, Dauphiné, and Saintonge. When his brothers were assassinated at the council of Blois, he proclaimed himself chief of the league, declared Cardinal Bourbon king, under the name of Charles X. and prepared to support his power by the force of arms. He opposed, with an army of 30,000 men, Henry IV. but was defeated at the battle of Arques, and again at Ivry, and after many losses, he was at last reconciled to his victorious enemy, who in the goodness of his heart made him his friend, and added the government of the Isle of France. He died at Soissons, 3d Oct. 1611, and his family was extinct in his son, who died 1621.

MAYER, John Frederic, a Lutheran divine, born at Leipsic, 1650. He was successively professor at Wittenberg, Hamburg, and Stettin, and became superintendent of the churches of Pomerania. He died 1712. He wrote a Treatise on the method of studying Holy Scripture—Dissertations on Particular Parts of the Bible—Tractatus de Osculo Pedum Pontificis Romani, 4to. but his great work is Bibliotheca Biblica, 4to. 1713, in which he examines the character of the various commentators on the Bible.

MAYER, Tobias, an eminent astronomer, born at Maspach, in the dutchy of Wirtemberg, 1723. He was self-instructed, and in the formation of machines and instruments, displayed wonderful ingenuity. He also applied himself to the Latin language and belles lettres, and in 1750 was appointed professor of mathematics in Göttingen university. He died 1762, exhausted by his uncommon application. He studied the nature of the moon, and its influence upon the earth with such ability, and approached so nearly the problem of longitude, that his widow obtained an honourable reward of 3000*l.* from the British parliament. His discoveries in astronomy and geometry were very great and important. He published Tables of Refractions—Theory of the Moon—Astronomical Tables—a Mathematical Atlas, &c. There was also a Jesuit of the same name in Moravia, professor of philosophy at Heidelberg, for whom an observatory was built at Mannheim by the elector Palatine. He wrote Basis Palatina—De Transitu Veneris—De Novis in Cælo Phœnomenis, and died 1783.

MAYERNE, Sir Theodore, an eminent physician, born of most respectable parents at Geneva, 28th Sept. 1573. He had Theodore Beza for his godfather. He studied at Heidelberg, and afterwards went to Montpellier, where he took his degree of M.D. 1597. He went to Paris, where he recommended himself to notice by his lectures, and became physician to Henry IV. who promised him his patronage, and endeavoured by the means of cardinal Perron and other priests, to convert him to the catholic faith. He came over in 1616 to settle in England, and was in the service of James I. and of his queen. He died at Chelsea, 15th March, 1655, leaving to inherit his large fortune only one daughter, who married the marquis de Montpouillan, and died at the Hague, 1661, of a child of which she could not be delivered. His works were printed at London, 1700, in one folio volume.

MAYHEW, Thomas, governor of Martha's Vineyard, Massachusetts, obtained a grant of that and the neighbouring islands in 1641, and commenced a settlement at Edgarton. He devoted himself much to the civilizing and Christianizing the Indians who lived within his government, and induced them to adopt the English mode of administering justice. He died in 1681, in the 93d year of his age. ☞ L.

MAYHEW, Thomas, the son of the preceding, accompanied him to Martha's Vineyard in 1642, and became the first minister of that island. He began his labours among the Indians in 1646, and devoted himself to their instruction with unwearied diligence and self-denial. In 1650 one hundred had made profession of faith in the gospel, and during the next year one hundred and eighty more. Encouraged by this success, he embarked for England to solicit aid from the society for propagating the gospel, and was lost at sea, in the 37th year of his age. ☞ L.

MAYHEW, John, minister of Martha's Vineyard, and son of the preceding, was born in 1652, and entered the ministry at the age of twenty-one, at Fisbury. He laboured with great diligence in instructing the Indians. His annual salary was, for a long time, only five pounds. He died in 1689, in the sixteenth year of his ministry, leaving an Indian church of one hundred communicants, and several well-instructed Indian teachers. ☞ L.

MAYHEW, Experience, minister of Martha's Vineyard, was the eldest son of the preceding, and born in 1673. In 1694 he began to preach to the Indians, taking the care of several of their congregations, and devoted a ministry of more than sixty years to their instruction. In 1709 he translated the Psalms and John into the language of the Indians, at the expense of the society for propagating the gospel. In 1727 he published a relation of the success of the gospel among the aborigines, in which he gives the biography of more than thirty Indian ministers, and about eighty other converts, who were worthy of commemoration for their piety. He possessed superior endowments, and exhibited a most exemplary life of zeal, activity, and self-denial in the ministry. ☞ L.

MAYHEW, Jonathan, D.D. minister in Boston, Massachusetts, was the son of the preceding, and born in Martha's Vineyard, 8th October, 1720, and graduated at Harvard college in 1744. He was ordained pastor of the west church, at Boston, in 1747, and continued there till his death in 1766. He possessed a mind of great force and acuteness, was equalled by few of his cotemporaries in the extent of his classical and theological knowledge, and was particularly distinguished for the originality and independence of his investigations, and his love of civil and religious liberty. He published a number of controversial and practical works, characterized by unusual perspicuity and force of reasoning, and liveliness of fancy, and which gave him a high reputation in Great Britain, as well as in his own country, and procured for him a diploma of doctor of divinity, from the university of Aberdeen. ☞ L.

MAYNARD, sir John, an able English lawyer, celebrated for his eloquence, his integrity, and his public spirit. He waited upon William with an address of congratulation, after the abdication of James, and when the new king, observing his age, told him he must have outlived many of the judges, and of the lawyers of the state, of his own standing, yes, replied sir John, and I should have outlived the law too, if your majesty had not come to the throne of this country. He died 1690, aged 88.

MAYNARD, Francis, a poet, one of the 40 of the French academy, born at Toulouse, 1582. He was secretary to queen Margaret, and by his wit and gayety was the delight of the court, who flattered him with compliments, but settled no favour on him. He retired in disgust, and died in his province, 1646. His odes, songs, epigrams, &c. were much admired.

MAYNE, Jasper, an English poet and divine, born at Hatherleigh, Devonshire, 1604, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford, of which he became student. He was presented to the livings of Cassington, and of Pyrton, near Watlington, Oxfordshire, and, in 1646, was created D.D. He distinguished himself as the author of the "City Match," a comedy, and the "Amorous Work," a tragi-comedy, and drew upon himself some severe reflections from Cheynell, in consequence of his sermon against false prophets at Oxford. In 1648 he was deprived of his studentship and of his livings; but at the restoration he was reinstated, and made canon of Christ church, archdeacon of Chichester, and chaplain to the king. He died Dec. 6th, 1672, and was interred at Christ church. In his character he was cheerful, and, in those times of fanatical melancholy, very facetious. In his will he left to his servant, who had long lived with him, and was too fond of drinking, a trunk, with something in it which he said would make him drink. No sooner was his master dead, than the servant ran eagerly to the valuable trunk, but instead of a treasure he found a red herring. He wrote, besides, a poem on the naval victory obtained by the duke of York over the Dutch—sermons—Lucian's Dialogues translated, &c.

MATNWARING, Arthur, a learned Englishman, born at Ightfield, Shropshire, 1668. He was educated at Shrewsbury school, and Christ church, Oxford, and afterwards studied the law in London. An acquaintance with the earls of Dorset and Burlington, and the duke of Somerset, banished his strong prejudices against the revolution, and afterwards he became a commissioner of the customs, and in the beginning of Anne's reign, auditor of the impost, an office worth 2000*l.* per annum. He sat in the parliament of 1705, for Preston, in Lancashire, and died at St. Alban's, 13th Nov. 1712. His executrix was Mrs. Oldfield, the actress, by whom he had one son, and with whom he had lived, before his death, about nine years, much against the representations and wishes of his friends. He wrote various pieces in prose and verse, especially epilogues, &c. which were delivered with particular effect by his favourite actress.

MAYO, Richard, an English divine, ejected from his living of Kingston, Surrey, for nonconformity, 1662. He wrote a Life of Dr. Staunton—Two Conferences between a Jew and a Papist, and between a Protestant and a Jew—Comment on the Epistle to the Romans, in Pool's Annotations—sermons, &c. He died 1695.

MAYO, John, a learned physician, born in Cornwall, 1645. He was of Wadham college, Oxford, and became fellow of All-Souls, where he took his degrees in civil law, after which he practised physic chiefly at Bath. He died in York-street, Covent-garden, Sept. 1679, and was buried in the parish church there. His works were collected and published at Oxford, 1674. He was a man of extensive powers, and well skilled in chymistry, according to the opinion of Dr. Beddoes, who, in a well-written pamphlet, in 1790, proved that the best part of modern discoveries with respect to air, was known to this active experimentalist.

MAZARD, Stephen, a native of Lyons, who greatly improved the manufacture of hats in France. He was in England, to make observations on the genius of the English manufacturers, and he carried back with him several able workmen. He died 1736, aged 76, and left his large property to endow a public charity at Lyons.

MAZARINE, Julius, cardinal, and chief minister of France, was born at Piscina, in the province of Abruzzo, Italy, July 14th, 1602. His abilities were conspicuous even in early life, and under Jerome of Colonna he made great and important progress in literature. He recommended himself to the notice of the pope, and by his negotiations and intrigues, was happily successful in preventing a battle between the French and Spaniards before Cassel, and he effected a reconciliation between them. This gained for him the good opinion of Richelieu, and of Lewis XIII. and from keeper of the seals, and vice legate to Avignon, he was, in 1641, raised to the dignity of cardinal. On the death of Richelieu, Mazarine became the prime minister of Lewis XIII. and continued in that high office during the minority of Lewis XIV. and the regency of Anne of Austria. Though at first popular, the jealousy of the nobles, and the distressed state of the poor, raised a clamour against him, and he at last yielded to the public voice, and retired from the kingdom. But though a price was set upon his head, the general hatred subsided, his abilities were acknowledged and regretted, and by degrees his return to power became the popular wish. Mazarine, restored to greatness, applied himself to consolidate the happiness of France; he effected a peace between his country and Spain, and cemented the union of the two monarchies by the marriage of his master with the infanta of Spain. Excessive application at last produced disorders which proved fatal. He died at Vincennes, 9th March, 1661, aged 59, highly respected by the king and nation. He was buried in the college which he had founded. His letters, 103 in number, were published, 1694, and again by Chatelan, Amsterdam, 1745, 2 vols. 12mo. Mazarine had a brother and two sisters. His niece, Hortensia Mancini, dutchess of Mazarine, married, in 1661, Armand Charles de la Porte de la Meillerie, from whom she was separated, and afterwards settled in England, where she patronised St. Evremond. She died at London, 1699.

MAZEAS, John Mathurin, a native of Landnaui, in Britany, who died at Paris, 1802, aged 88. He wrote Elements of Arithmetic, Algebra, Geometry, with an Introduction to Conic Sections—Institutiones Philosophicæ, 3 vols. 12mo. He was professor in the college of Navarre, and canon of Notre Dame, at Paris; but when the revolution robbed him of his offices, and of his income, he retired into the country, where the kindness of a faithful servant administered to all his wants and infirmities.

MAZELINE, Peter, a sculptor of Rouen, member of the academy of painting and sculpture, died 1708, aged 76. His works were highly esteemed, and are still admired in the gardens of Versailles, especially Europa, a Pythian Apollo, &c.

MAZUCHI, Alexius Symmachus, an Italian antiquary, born at Santa Maria, near Capua. He died at Naples, where he was divinity professor, 1771, aged 87. His works on ancient medals and inscriptions were valuable. His last, and perhaps his best publication, was the Antiquities of the Campagna di Roma.

MAZUIER, Claude Lewis, a native of Bellevre, who became judge of Louhans, and during the French revolution was elected to the convention. His conduct, in this violent assembly, was firm and moderate, and he not only voted for the banishment of the king, but defended the measure as the most salutary for the honour and the happiness of the nation. His boldness in accusing the public plunderers of the state marked him for destruction, and he was dragged to the guillotine, Feb. 1794, aged 34.

MAZZUCHELLI, Grammaria, or John Maria, a nobleman of Brescia, eminent as a philologist and historian. He died Nov. 1765, and left several works, highly esteemed by the Italians.

MAZZUCHELLI, Peter Francis, a native of Rome, eminent as a painter. He was knighted by Charles Emanuel, duke of Savoy, and died 1626, aged 55. Some of the beautiful altar pieces at Milan are by him.

MAZZUOLI, Francesco, better known by the name of Parmegiano, or Parmesan, was an eminent painter, born at Parma, 1604. His application to his art was so great that when Rome was sacked by Charles V. he remained engaged with his pencil, like another Protogenes, unconscious of surrounding dangers. He excelled also in etching, of which he has, by some, been called the inventor. He died of a violent fever, at the early age of 36, 1540. For sweetness of manner, elegance, and grace, he has been regarded by several judges as the rival of Corregio, and in genius and invention, he had few equals. There was another artist of the 16th century, of the same name, and related to him who excelled chiefly in historical painting.

MEAD, Matthew, an English divine, rector of Great Brickhill, Bucks, and afterwards of Stepney, near London, from which he was ejected, in 1662, for non-conformity. His principles rendered him suspected during the Rye-house plot, but after appearing before the council, he was honourably dismissed. He died 1699, at Stepney, where he had continued to preach to a congregation of dissenters. He was author of the Almost Christian tried and cast, 8vo. a work of some merit—Sermons on Ezekiel's Wheels—the Good of Early Obedience, 8vo. &c.

MEAD, Richard, a distinguished physician, son of the preceding, was born at Stepney, 11th Aug. 1673. From a private school, he went, in 1689, to Utrecht, where he studied under Grævius, and three years after, he removed to Leyden, where he attended the medical lectures of Pitcairn and Herman, and contracted a strong intimacy with the celebrated Boerhaave. From Holland he visited Italy, and took his degree of M.D. at Padua, 1695, and then returned to England. The next year he settled in his native place, where he practised with increasing reputation for seven years. His "Mechanical Account of Poisons," 1702, was received by the public with avidity; and he, in 1704, was admitted into the Royal Society, in 1707 chosen one of the council, and, in 1717, appointed vice-president. From Stepney he removed to Crutched Friars, and seven years after, to Austin Friars. In 1707 he was honoured with the diplomatic degree of M.D. by the university of Oxford; and such was his celebrity, that he was one of the physicians who attended queen Anne in her last illness. He was made fellow of the college of physicians in 1716, and, in 1719, he was consulted by government upon the best means of preventing the importation of the plague, which raged with such fatality at Marseilles, and he published, in consequence, his Discourse on Pestilential Contagion, which, in one year, passed through seven editions. In 1727 he was appointed physician to George II. and had the satisfaction of seeing placed in the same situation, his two sons-in-law, Drs. Wilmot and Nicholls. He died 16th Feb. 1754, and was buried in the Temple church, near his brother Samuel, a counsellor; but though no stone is placed over his remains, there is a monument erected to his honour in Westminster abbey, by the gratitude of his son, with an inscription by Dr. Ward. He was twice married; by his first wife he had ten children, three only of whom survived him, a son, and the two daughters whose husbands we have mentioned; and by his second wife he had no family. Dr.

Mead attained high honours and celebrity in his profession, so that in one year he made more than 7000*l.* by his practice. As a man of letters, he was highly respectable, and as the friend and the patron of the learned, universally admired; so that no foreigner of eminence ever came to London without soliciting, as an honour, an introduction to him. His collection of books and prints was very valuable, and sold, after his death, for more than it had cost him. With the most pleasing manners, Dr. Mead united the greatest liberality, and most extensive benevolence; he gave his advice to the poor with pleasure and gratis, and it is remarkable that he never would receive a fee from any clergyman, except one, who disputed with him on the propriety of his prescriptions. His works were, a treatise de Imperio Solis et Lunæ—de Morbis Biblicis—Monita Medica. All his medical works were published together in 1762, 1 vol. 4to.

MEADOWCROFT, Richard, an English divine, born at Staffordshire, and educated at Merton College, Oxford, of which he became fellow. In 1733 he was made canon of Worcester, where he died 1769. He published in 1732, Notes on Milton's Paradise Regained, edited again in 1748, and mentioned with commendation by bishop Newton. He wrote also other small tracts, besides 11 Sermons, &c.

MECHAIN, M. a native of Lyons, whose Observations on the eclipse seen at Versailles, 1774, procured him the applauses of the French academy. His work on the great comet of 1661, whose appearance was again expected in 1790, procured him the prize of the academy in 1782; and in consequence of his great astronomical talents, he was employed by the nation in 1792, to measure a degree of the meridian between Dunkirk and Barcelona. He finished the work in 1798, and then proposed to extend it to the Balears, but he died before the completion of his useful labours, of a fever on the coast of Valencia, 1805. He edited and improved the Connaissance des Temps, and was much respected for the general information which he possessed, and the abilities which he displayed in difficult and intricate calculations for the marine, and other public purposes.

MEDE, Joseph, B.D. a native of Berden, Essex, educated at Christ's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He devoted himself to the study of divinity, and refused the preferment which the kindness of his friends offered him, especially Usher, the primate, who wished him to accept the provostship of Trinity college, Dublin. His works, in 1 vol. fol. are chiefly on divinity; and in his Commentary on the Apocalypse, he has been followed by bishop Newton, and other learned divines. He died 1638 aged 52.

MEDICIS, Cosmo, surnamed the Elder, was the founder of his illustrious family. He was so successful in commerce, that his riches were superior to those of the potentates of his times, and he indulged the noble sentiments of applying the resources of his ample fortune to the patronage of the sciences and of learned men. He collected a most valuable library, which he enriched with rare and curious manuscripts; but while he expected respect and gratitude from his countrymen, he found that his conduct was viewed with jealousy by the arts of his enemies. Yielding to the prevailing ingratitude of his countrymen, he retired in honourable exile to Venice, where he was received with the homage due to a sovereign prince; but the Florentines at last became sensible of their cruelty; Cosmo was recalled, and made for 34 years the arbiter of the destinies of his country. He died Aug. 1464 aged 75, and the gratitude of his fellow-citizens engraved on his tomb these glorious words "the father of his people, the deliverer of his country."

MEDICIS, Lorenzo de, surnamed the Great, and the father of letters, was born 1448. He was son of Peter, and the grandson of Cosmo, and he was brother to Julian de Medicis. The great influence which he and his brother exercised in Florence, was viewed with jealousy by Ferdinand IV. of Naples, and by Pope Sixtus IV. and a dreadful conspiracy was formed against them by the Piazzi, at the base instigation of these two foreign potentates. Julian fell by the dagger of an assassin, while celebrating mass 1478, but Lorenzo, who was then with him, had the good fortune to escape, though wounded, with his life; and such was his popularity, that he was conducted back to his palace by the multitude, in the general acclamations of condolence and of joy. Inheriting the beneficent and honourable qualities of his grandfather, he devoted himself to the patronage of literature, and was regarded as the Mæcenas of the age. The Florentines saw with pride their opulent countryman selling in one hand the products of the East, and with the other supporting and guiding the public concerns of the state; at one time giving audience to ambassadors, at another splendidly entertaining merchants, and now relieving the necessities of the poor, exhibiting public shows to the multitude, or adorning his native city with the most splendid buildings, for the purposes both of magnificence and hospitality. These high and meritorious services were not lost in the gratitude of the Florentines; Lorenzo was named chief of their republic, and so mild and equitable was his government, and so respectable his character, that foreign princes often submitted their disputes to his final and impartial decision. Ardent in the cause of science, Lorenzo was surrounded by the learned, the brave, and the ingenious; and to render Florence the emporium of whatever was rare in literature, John Lascaris, a man of classical taste, was sent, in the most honourable manner, into the East, to collect the choicest manuscripts to enrich the library. Lorenzo was himself a man of learning. He wrote poetry with success, and his sonnets, songs, &c. in Italian, have often been printed, and are deservedly admired. This illustrious character died 9th April 1492, aged 44: but though so universally respected and admired, his glory was obscured by his passion for the female sex, and by his great indifference in religious duties. He left two sons, Peter, who succeeded him at Florence, and who was banished 1494, and died 1504, and John, who filled the papal chair under the name of Leo X. His history has become particularly interesting in the luminous pages of Mr. Roscoe.

MEDICIS, John, surnamed the Invincible, was son of John, and first learnt the art of war under Lorenzo, against the duke of Urbino. He afterwards was in the service of the pope, and of Francis I. of France, and distinguished himself against the armies of the emperor. He died at Mantua, 29th Nov. 1526, aged 28, in consequence of a wound which he had received in the knee, at the siege of Governolo.

MEDICIS, Lorenzo de, descended from the brother of the great Cosmo, aspired to the name of popular. He caused to be assassinated, in 1537, Alexander de Medicis, whom Charles V. had appointed duke of Florence, and he courted popularity by his patronage of literature. He died without posterity.

MEDICIS, Hippolyto de, natural son of Julian, was raised to the rank of cardinal by his cousin, Clement VII. in 1529, and sent as legate to Germany. He possessed great abilities as a negotiator and also as a military man; so that when the pirate Barbarossa threatened the coast of Italy with devastation, Hippolyto was usefully employed against him, and obliged him to retire without even meeting him in the field. He contributed to the elevation of Paul III. to the papal chair, and afterwards formed a plan for the assassination of Alexander de Medicis, the governor of Florence, which failed. He died suddenly at Itri, as some imagine, in consequence of poison, 13th Aug. 1535, aged 64.

MEDICIS, Sebastian de, of the same illustrious family, was distinguished by his learning. He wrote, de Venatione, Piscatione, et Aucupio, 8vo.—de Fortuitis Casibus—de Sepulchris, 1580, &c.

MEDICIS, Peter de, a painter, born at Florence, 1586, of the same illustrious family. He studied under Cigoli, and as a historical painter, possessed celebrity from the strong expression, as well as the grace of his characters, and the correctness of his style, and his judicious colouring.

MEDINA, John Baptiste, a painter of Brussels, who studied the works of Rubens with such effect, that his own pieces possessed all the beauties and correctness of that illustrious master. He was for some years settled in England, and was the last knight created in Scotland by the high commissioner of that kingdom. He died 1711, aged 51.

MEEN, Henry, a learned divine, who was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and took the degree of bachelor of divinity in 1776. He afterwards became minor canon, and lecturer of St. Paul's cathedral, which chapter presented him to the rectory of St. Nicholas Cole-abbey and the prebend of Twyford. He died Jan. 3, 1817, aged 72. Mr. Meen completed Fawkes's translation of the Argonautics of Apollonius Rhodius; and published "Remarks on the Cassandra of Lycophoron." He was also the author of "Successiva Opera; or Selections from ancient Authors, sacred and profane," 8vo.; and a poetical piece entitled "Happiness."—W. B.

MEGASTHENES, a Greek historian, about 292 B. C. His History of Judea, which was once held in high esteem, is now lost.

MEHEGAN, William Alexander, a French historian, of Irish extraction, born at Salle, in the Cevennes, 1721. He was an elegant writer, though perhaps too affected in the attempt of rendering his style graceful and brilliant. He wrote, the Origin of the Guebres—Considerations on the Revolutions of Art—the Origin and Progress of Idolatry—a Picture of Modern History, the best of his works, translated into English. He died 23d Jan. 1766.

MEIBOMIUS, John Henry, a learned professor of physic at Helmstadt, his native place, was afterwards first physician at Lubeck. He wrote, a Latin Life of Mæneas—de Cerevisiis, 4to.—Tractatus de Usu Flagrorum in Re Medica et Venerea, 4to. and 8vo. edited by Th. Bartholin. He died 1655, aged 65.

MEIBOMIUS, Henry, son of John Henry, was born at Lubeck, and studied at Groningen, Francker, and Leyden. He married in 1664, and had 10 children, and died professor of medicine, history, and poetry, at Helmstadt, 1700, aged 62. His publications are, Scriptores Rerum Germanicarum, 3 vols. folio.—ad Saxoniam Inferiorem Historiam Introductio, 4to.—Valent. Hen. Vogleri Introductio Univers. in Notitiam Bonorum Scriptorum, 4to.—Chronicon Bergense—De Vasis Palpebrarum Novis, 4to.

MEIBOMIUS, Marcus, a learned critic, of the same family as the preceding. He published a translation of Greek authors who had written on Music—an edition of the Greek Mythologists—de Fabrica Triremium, 4to.—Corrections for an edition of a Hebrew Bible, &c. He was for some time at the court of Christina, queen of Sweden, but left it in disgust. He died 1711.

MEIBOMIUS, Henry, a native of Helmstadt, celebrated for his knowledge of medicine, as well as for his great learning, and his critical powers. His works, which are valuable, are preserved in the Germanicarum Rerum Scriptores, 4to. He died 1625.

MEIR, George Frederic, a German philosophical writer, born at Ammendorf, in Saxony, 1718. His best works are, a Representation of a Critic—Instructions how any one may become a Modern Philosopher—Introduction to the Elegant Arts and Sciences, &c. He died 1777.

MEISNER, Balthasar, a Lutheran divine, theological professor at Wittemberg, was author of, Anthropologia, 2 vols. 4to.—Moderate Philosophy, 3 vols. 4to.—and died 1628, aged 41.

MEISSONIER, Justus Aurel. a native of Turin, eminent as a painter, sculptor, goldsmith, and architect. His abilities recommended him to the French king, who appointed him his designer and goldsmith, in which employment he exhibited the most beautiful specimens of his ingenuity and of his art. He died at Paris, 1750, aged 55.

MELA, Pomponius, a Latin geographer, born in Spain. His work, de Situ Orbis, is best edited by J. Gronovius, 1655. He flourished A. D. 45.

MELANCHTHON, Philip, a celebrated reformer, born 16th Feb. 1497, at Bretten, in the Palatinate of the Rhine. His father's name was Schwartzardt, which signifies black earth; but the word was changed, according to the affectation of the times, by his friend Reuchlin, into Melancthon, which in Greek expresses the same meaning. He studied at Bretten, Pfortsheim, and Heidelberg, and with such success, that at 13 he wrote a comedy of some merit. He left Heidelberg in 1512, because he was refused a degree on account of his youth, and then passed to Tubingen, where he resided for six years, and gave public lectures on Virgil, Terence, and other classics. In 1518, by the recommendation of his friend Reuchlin, he was appointed by the elector of Saxony, Greek professor at Wittemberg; and here began that intimacy with Luther, which contributed so much to the progress of the reformation. He was in 1527 appointed by his patron, the duke, to visit the churches of the electorate, and afterwards he was employed in the arduous labours of preparing those articles of faith which have received the name of the Augsburg Confession, because presented to the emperor at the diet of that city. In the disputes which he maintained in those days of controversial enmity, he displayed great candour and mildness, which his friend Luther attributed more to a spirit of timidity, than to the meekness of the Christian character. His moderation as well as his learning, where so universally acknowledged, that he received a liberal invitation from Francis I. to come to France, to settle the disputes of the protestants; but through the interference of the duke of Saxony, the offer was declined; as likewise a similar invitation from the king of England. He was engaged in the various conferences which took place on religious subjects at Frankfort, Reinspur, Worms, Spires, and Ratisbon; and every where evinced the deepest learning, the most peaceable temper, and the strongest moderation. The character of the times, and not inclination, rendered him a controversialist, and his answer to his mother, displayed the great and the good man. When asked by the aged woman, who repeated before him her prayers in a simple but pious manner, what she must believe in this great confusion of creeds, he replied, "Go on, mother, to believe and pray as you have done, and never trouble yourself about controversies." He died at Wittemberg, 19th April, 1560, and was buried by the side of his friend Luther, in the church of the castle. Among the reasons which on his death-bed, he assigned for considering dissolution as happiness, he said, that it delivered him from theological persecutions. By his wife, the daughter of a burgo-master of Wittemberg, he had two sons and two daughters. His works were very numerous, and as they were written in the midst of controversy, and ecclesiastical avocations, they were not always so correct in language, as they proved useful in advancing the reformation. A chronological catalogue of these was published in 1582, and they appeared altogether in 4 vols. folio, at Wittemberg, 1601.

MELANIPPIDES, two Greek poets of merit. The one grandfather, B. C. 520, the other his grandson, 460 B. C. Their works are lost.

MELCHISEDECK, high-priest of God, and king of Salem, met Abraham after his defeat of the king of Sodom, and gave him his blessing. As he is represented by St. Paul without father and without mother, some heretics have imagined that he was no other but Jesus Christ; and hence arose the sect called Melchisedecians, in ancient times.

MELCTHAL, Arnold de, one of the founders of Swiss liberty. His father was cruelly deprived of his eyes by the order of Grissler, the Austrian governor; and the son, irritated at the sufferings of his parent, united in 1307, with Stouffacker, Furst, and Tell, to break the chains of their servitude, and after defeating an army of 20,000 men at the pass of Morgarten, with only 500 men, the liberty of Switzerland was established.

MELEAGER, a Greek poet of Syria, 186 B. C. His epigrams, which possess great merit, are preserved in the Anthologia, printed by Brunck, 1789, with notes.

MELETIUS, bishop of Lycopolis, in Egypt, was deposed by an Alexandrian Synod, and became the founder of a new sect which supported the Arians against Athanasius. He died about 346.

MELISSUS, a philosopher of Samos, who maintained that the universe is infinite and immovable, and that the knowledge of a divinity is improper. He flourished about 444 B. C.

MELITO, St. bishop of Sardis in Asia, A. D. 170, was author of several works, which have perished.

MELIUS, an Athenian orator, the chief accuser of Socrates. His conduct appeared afterwards so odious to the Athenians, that they put him to death B. C. 400.

MELLAN, Claude, a French engraver and designer, born at Abbeville, 1601. He died at Paris 1688. Charles II. wished in vain to invite him to settle in England. His mode of engraving was peculiar to himself. His most admired piece is a head of our Saviour, formed of one spiral line, beginning at the top of the nose.

MELMOTH, William, a learned man, born 1666. He was bencher of Lincoln's-inn, and joined Peere Williams to publish Vernon's Reports. He is deservedly celebrated for his treatise of "the great Importance of a Religious Life," a work of infinite merit, and of the most benevolent tendency, of which, besides large editions, not less than 42,000 copies were published in the 18 years preceding 1784. Melmoth died 6th April 1743, and was buried in the cloister of Lincoln's-inn chapel.

MELMOTH, William, son of the preceding, was born 1710. He distinguished himself as the translator of Pliny's and Cicero's epistles, in a very neat and elegant style, and published besides, Memoirs of his Father—some poems in Dodsley's collection—and Letters under the name of Sir Thomas Fitzosborne. This worthy and amiable character died 1799.

MELON, John Francis, a native of Tulle, who settled at Bourdeaux, as secretary to the learned academy which, by his influence with the duke of la Force, had been founded there. He wrote, a Political Essay on Commerce, 12mo. a work of merit—Mahoud, the Gasnevide, an Allegorical History of the duke of Orleans' Regency—Dissertations, &c. This learned and well informed man died at Paris, 1738.

MELOT, John Baptist, a French writer, esteemed for his memoirs inserted in the volumes of the academy of inscriptions, of which he was a member, and for an edition of Joinville's Life of St. Lewis, with a Glossary. He was librarian to the king, and was employed to make a catalogue of the royal collection. He was born at Dijon, 1697, and died at Paris 1760, much respected.

MELVIL, Sir James, third son of lord Keith, was born at Halhill, Fifeshire, 1530. He was page to Mary queen of Scots, when dauphiness of France, and was afterwards in the service of Montmorency, prime minister of France; and after travelling over Italy, Switzerland, and Germany, he returned again to Scotland, to attend his widowed mistress. He became distinguished at the Scotch court, was made a privy counsellor, and intrusted with the most important affairs of the kingdom. He merited this confidence by his loyalty to the unfortunate queen, whom he attended till her confinement at Lochleven, and he held the same rank of trust and of honour in the cabinet of her son. When James succeeded to the English crown, Melvil, too infirm to share in the affairs of state, came to England, to pay a visit of respect and duty to his sovereign, and returned to Scotland, where he devoted himself to the writing of his memoirs for the Information and Instruction of his son. These valuable memoirs were published by his grandson, 1683, in folio, and contain a very interesting detail of the state affairs of Scotland, for several years. Sir James died at Halhill, 1606, aged 76.

MEMMI, Simon, a portrait painter of Sienna, who died 1345, aged 60. He painted Laura, Petrarch's mistress.

MEMNON, a Rhodian, general of Darius, opposed Alexander's invasion of Asia. He ably defended Miletus against the conqueror, and subdued the isles of Chios and Lesbos; but died suddenly, when his valour might perhaps have impeded the rapidity of the Macedonians.

MENAGE, Giles, a learned Frenchman, the Varro of his time, was born at Angers, 15th Aug. 1613. After a rapid progress in belles lettres and philosophy, he applied himself to the law, and becoming an advocate he pleaded with great popularity at Angers, Paris, and other places. But the laborious profession of the law was disagreeable to a man who had a strong inclination to devote himself to polite literature, he therefore quitted it, much against his father's desire, and took orders. He was for some time in the family of cardinal de Retz, but on the death of his father, he converted all his property to an annuity that his literary engagements might be less disturbed with family affairs. He became the companion of the great and the learned, and obtained some ecclesiastical preferment, but the wit of his conversation, and the propensity of uttering a joke even at the expense of a friend, brought upon him many enemies, and among them, d'Aubignac, Boileau, Cotin, Salo, Bouhours, Baillet and others. Mazarine too in the midst of his greatness was jealous of his influence, and a Latin elegy addressed to him by the poetical ecclesiastic was almost considered as a satire, not a compliment to the all-powerful minister. Menage was honoured with a place at the Florentine academy, but when his friends proposed him for the French academy, his name was rejected. He unfortunately, late in life, put his thigh out of joint, by a fall, and died 23d July, 1692, of a defluxion of the stomach, aged 79. This ingenious and learned writer, it is said, possessed a most retentive memory, and from his great storehouse, and the inexhaustible resources of a polished mind, could say, as Bayle observes, a thousand good things in a thousand pleasing ways. His works are numerous, the best known of which are, Origines de la Langue Française, 4to.—Miscellanea, or a collection of some of his poetical and prose pieces in Greek, Latin, and French—la Requete des Dictionnaires, an ingenious satire about the French Academy's Dictionary—Poemata, 12mo. 1656—Origini della Lingua Italiana, 4to.—Observations sur la Langue Française, 2 vols. 12mo.—Juris Civilis Amœnitates, 8vo.—Histoire de Sablé, folio.—an edition of Diogenes Laertius—Menagiana, published after his death, &c.

MENANDER, a celebrated Greek poet, prince of the new comedy. All his plays have perished, and as he was esteemed superior to Aristophanes it is an irreparable loss. Terence is said to have borrowed his six plays from him. He flourished at Athens about 342 B. C.

MENADRINO, Marsilio, or Marsilius of Padua, a learned lawyer of the 14th century. He was excommunicated by the pope 1327, for writing "Defensor Pacis," a work in favour of his master the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, in which he boldly maintained that the imperial power was superior to that of the pope, both in temporal and spiritual affairs. He wrote besides de Translatione Imperii, &c. and died at Montemalto 1328.

MENARD, Claude, a French magistrate at Angers, eminent as an antiquarian. He lost his wife in his old age, and in consequence quitted the world and became an ecclesiastic. He died 20th Jan. 1652, aged 72. He published Joinville's History of St. Lewis, 4to. with learned notes—St. Austin's books against Julian—Researches about the Body of St. James the elder, said to have been buried at Angers—History of Bertrand de Guesclin, 4to.

MENARD, Dom Nicholas Hugues, a Benedictine of St. Maur, born at Paris. He wrote a Martyrology of the Benedictines of his order, and other works, and died 21st Jan. 1644, aged 57.

MENARD, LEO, a counsellor of Nismes, born at Tarascon, 1706. He wrote the History, &c. of Nismes, 7 vols. 4to.—Customs and Manners of the Greeks, 12mo.—the Loves of Calisthenes and Aristoclea, a novel, 12mo.—some fugitive pieces, &c. He died 1767.

MENASSEH-BEN, Israel, a Portuguese rabbi, of the sect of the Pharisees, son of a rich merchant. He was successor to Isaac Urrie, in the care of the synagogue of Amsterdam, and afterwards went to Basil, and attempted in London, against the wish of the presbyterians, to obtain from Cromwell a toleration of the Jews. He died at Middleburg, 1660, aged 56. He published an edition of the Hebrew Bible without points, 2 vols. 4to. Amsterd. with a Latin preface—the Talmud with Notes, 8vo.—El Conciliador, 4to.—de Resurrectione, 8vo. de Fragilitate Humanâ, &c.—Spes Israelis, 12mo.—the Breath of Life, in Hebrew, 12mo.—the End of Life, 12mo. translated into English by Pococke with a life.

MENCKE, Otto, a learned German, born at Oldenburg, Westphalia, 1644. He studied at Rome, and at Bremen, and Leipsic, and afterwards visited the other German universities. He became in 1668 professor of morality at Leipsic, was five times rector of the university, and seven times dean of the faculty, and died there 1707. He published Marsham's Canon Chronicus, 4to.—Camden's Annals of Elizabeth—Jus Majestatis circa Venationem, 4to.—Respublica in Microcosmo conspicua, 4to. and was the first author of the "Acta Eruditorum," of Leipsic, a valuable work which established a correspondence with the learned of Europe, and first appeared 1682, 4to.

MENCKE, John Burchard, son of Otto, was born at Leipsic 1674. After travelling into Holland and England, he settled at Leipsic, where in 1699 he was appointed professor of history, and in this office he acquired great reputation. Frederic Augustus, king of Poland, made him his historiographer and aulic counsellor as a mark of his esteem, and the royal societies of London and Berlin enrolled him among their members. He died April 1, 1732. His works are numerous and learned. He wrote de Charlataneria Eruditorum Declamationes duæ, 8vo.—Scriptores Rerum Germanicarum, 3 vols. folio.—two Latin Discourses on the empiricism of learned men, 12mo. a weak performance. He continued also the "Acta Eruditorum," and had some share in the dictionary of learned men, Leipsic, folio, 1715.

MENAJORS, John Peter de, a native of Alais, in Languedoc, who became member of the academy of inscriptions at Paris, and was known as the author of an history of Gaul Narbonensis, 12mo.—Arlequin, Valet de deux Maitres, &c. He died in his native town 15th Nov. 1747, aged 68.

MENDEZ PINTO, Ferdinand, a Portuguese, who from a menial servant, became celebrated in consequence of his adventures. He embarked for the Indies 1537, and after a residence of 21 years he returned to Portugal. He published an account of his adventures, in which he asserts that he was thirteen times made a slave, and sold 16 times. The work is interesting from the particulars which it communicates of the history of Japan, Brama, Pegu, Siam, Java, Achem, &c.

MENDEZ, Moses, an English writer of Jewish extraction, known as a poet and dramatic writer. He was, on account of his abilities, honoured with the degree of M.A. by the university of Oxford, and he died 1758. He wrote also some poems preserved in Dodsley's collection.

MENDELSON, Moses, a Jew of Berlin, of obscure origin at Dessau. He quitted commerce for literature, and acquired great reputation. He died 1785, aged 56. He published, Jerusalem, 1755, supporting that the Jewish religion is but deism—Phædon, 8vo. in which he maintains the spirituality and immateriality of the soul, in such sensible language and powerful argumentation, that he has been called the Socrates of the Jews—Philosophical works, 2 vols. 8vo.—Letter to Lavater, 8vo.—Translation of Genesis—Commentary on Ecclesiastes—treatise on the Sublime—Letters on Sensations, &c.

MENDOZA, Gonzales Peter le, archbishop of Seville and afterwards of Toledo, chancellor of Castile and Leon, was born at Guadalajara 1428. He early distinguished himself by his progress in literature, and his fidelity in the service of the kings of Castile, by whose interest he obtained a cardinal's hat from pope Sixtus IV. He also ably served Ferdinand and Isabella, and after a life of great virtue, wisdom, and moderation, died 11th Jan. 1495. He translated in his youth Sallust, Homer's Iliad, Virgil, and some parts of Ovid.

MENDOZA, John Gonzales, an Augustine friar of Castile, sent by the king of Spain as his ambassador to China, 1584. He wrote a History of China, 1589, 8vo. in Spanish, which has been translated into other languages. His last preferment was the bishopric of Propajan in the West Indies.

MENEGRATES, a physician of Syracuse, who, proud of the success of his medical prescriptions, assumed the title of Jupiter, in the age of Philip, father of Alexander, who deservedly ridiculed him.

MENEDEMUS, a Greek philosopher of Eubœa, who died in the age of Alexander the Great.

MENEDEMUS, a cynic philosopher who pretended with fanatic zeal, and in all the eccentricity of dress, to have been sent from hell to observe the actions of mankind.

MENESES, Alexis de, a Portuguese Augustine monk, of noble birth at Lisbon. He was sent to Goa as archbishop, and there he held a synod, the acts of which were called Synodus Dianperensis. On his return to Europe he was promoted to the see of Braga, and was made viceroy of Portugal by Philip II. of Spain. He compiled a history of his order in Portugal, and died at Madrid 1617.

MENESTRIER, John Baptist le, a French antiquarian, author of medals, coins, and ancient monuments of the Roman emperors, and of illustrious medals of emperors of Rome. He was born at Dijon, and died 1634, aged 70.

MENESTRIER, Claude Francis, a Jesuit, born at Lyons 1633. He wrote, History of Lewis XIV. by medals, emblems, &c.—Consular History of Lyons—the Art of Heraldry—the Philosophy of Images, &c. He possessed a very astonishing memory, and it is said that to try him Christina of Sweden pronounced in his presence 300 unconnected words, which he immediately repeated in the same order. He died 1705. There was another author born at Dijon, called also Claude. He wrote Symbolica Dianæ Ephesiæ Statuæ exposita, 4to. and died 1657.

MENGOLI, Peter, a learned and popular lecturer on mechanics at Bologna, died about 1690. He was author of Geometria Speciosa, 4to.—Arithmetica Rationalis—Musæa Speculativa—a treatise on the Circle, &c.

MENGIS, Antony Raphael, a famous painter born at Aussig, in Bohemia, 1726. His father, who was painter to Augustus III. king of Poland, saw and encouraged his rising abilities, and after studying at Rome for four years, the young painter returned to Dresden, where his genius soon displayed itself. He was patronised by Charles III. of Spain, who granted him a pension with a house and equipage; but though thus favoured by the monarch he resided not in Spain, but at Rome, where grief for his amiable wife and the ignorance of an empiric put an end to his life 1779. His five daughters and two sons were honourably provided for by the king of Spain. The chief of his paintings are preserved at Madrid and Rome, and in them he successfully united the graces and the beauties of his great masters Raphael, Correggio, and Titian. The altar piece of All-Soul's chapel, Oxford, is also one of his admired pieces. He was also an author. His works were published with notes by d'Azara at Parma 1780, 2 vols. 4to. containing Reflections on Beauty and Taste in Painting; the Life of Correggio; the principal Pictures at Madrid, &c. The works have been translated into French, and also into English, 2 vols. 8vo.

MENINSKI, Franciscus à Mesgnien, or MENIN, an eminent German orientalist, born in Lorraine 1623. He studied at Rome, and learned the Turkish language at Constantinople, and from interpreter to the Polish embassy, became himself ambassador to the Porte, and for his services was honoured with the addition of ski to his name. He was afterwards in the emperor's service, and in 1669 went to Jerusalem. He obtained the dignity of counsellor of war to the emperor, and died at Vienna 1698. His great and very important work "Thesaurus Linguarum Orientalium," appeared at Vienna 1680 in 4 vols. folio, and in 1687 another volume was added. This valuable work was begun to be re-printed in 1780 at the expense of Maria Theresa, who thus favoured the wishes of Sir William Jones, and of the learned, who had expressed a desire to see the scarce volume re-published. Meninski was unfortunately engaged in a controversy with Podesta, oriental secretary to the emperor, and much acrimony was shown on both sides.

MENIPPUS, a cynic philosopher, born at Gadara, in Palestine. He was so severe in his satires, that the epithet of Menippean has been applied to harsh reflections.

MENNO, Simonis, an ecclesiastic of Friesland, who embraced the tenets of the anabaptists, and after being again baptized by Ubbo Philippi, became a powerful leader of his sect. He denied that Jesus Christ received a human shape from his mother the Virgin Mary; and while he maintained the necessity of again baptizing adults, he inveighed against the custom of infant baptism, which he regarded as popish innovation. His eloquence and his learning were so much admired, that he gained a great number of followers in Westphalia, Guelderland, Holland, and Brabant; but though a price was set on his head, he had the good fortune to escape his persecutors. He was, in his opinions, more moderate than the rest of the anabaptists. His followers are still to be found in the Low Countries, under the name of Mennonites, divided into two distinct sects. He died at Oldeslo, between Lubec and Hamburg, 1565. His works were published at Amsterdam, 1681.

MENOCHIUS, James, a civilian of Pavia, possessed of such respectable abilities, that he was called the Baldus and Bartholus of his age. He was professor of law in several universities of Italy, and at last settled at Milan, where he was made president of the council, and where he died 10th Aug. 1607, aged 75. He wrote de recuperandâ Possessione, de adipiscenda Possessione, 8vo.; de Præsumtionibus, 2 vols. folio; de Arbitrariis Judicium Quæstionibus et Causis Conciliorum, folio. His son, John Stephen, was born at Pavia, and became a Jesuit, which profession he adorned by his learning and his virtues. He died 4th Feb. 1656, aged 80. He was author of Political and (Economical) Institutions; a learned treatise on the Republic of the Hebrews; a Commentary on the Scriptures, 2 vols. folio, and 4 vols. 4to. all in Latin, and works of merit.

MENTEL, John, a printer of Strasburg, to whom some authors have attributed the invention of printing, but not on sufficient grounds. He was originally a writer and illuminator of manuscripts in the service of the bishop of Strasburg, and he was the first who introduced the art of printing there. His first publication was a Bible, 1466, in 2 vols. folio, and other works followed. He obtained great celebrity, and equal opulence by his profession, and was ennobled by the emperor Frederic IV. He died at Strasburg, 1478.

MENTZEL, Christian, a native of Furs-tenwal, in Germany, celebrated for his great knowledge of medicine and botany, which he improved by travelling into foreign countries. He wrote, Index Nominum Plantarum, 1696, folio, reprinted and improved, 1715—a Chronology of China, 4to.—Natural History of Brazil, 4 vols. folio—on the Flowers and Plants of Japan, 2 vols. folio, &c. These two last works are preserved in MS. in the Berlin library. He died 1701, aged 79.

MENZIKOFF, Alexander, a Russian prince. His father was a poor peasant, and he himself was apprentice to a pastry-cook, and carried pies about the streets, till the Czar Peter saw and admired his wit and liveliness. From this low situation, or as others say, from the place of groom in the royal stables, young Menzikoff soon became a favourite, and was appointed governor of Ingria; and in reward for his services, his abilities, and his zeal, was raised to the rank of prince and of major-general. He also distinguished himself in Poland 1708, but his enemies accused him of peculation, and he was fined and disgraced, till the favour of his master again restored him to power, and sent him as ambassador to Poland, 1722. He also gained the good graces of the empress Catherine, and after the death of Peter, the imperial heir, afterwards Peter II. was destined to marry the daughter of the favourite. At the accession of the young Czar, Menzikoff conducted himself with imprudence, and instead of securing the marriage of his daughter, he behaved with haughtiness, and even treated the monarch with contempt, so that his enemies, especially the Dolgorucki, took advantage of his folly, and he was soon banished from the court, and sent at last to end his days in the distant deserts of Siberia. He bore his misfortunes with great resignation, and died in his exile, 2d Nov. 1729, a victim to his ambition and the intrigues of a court. In his rise, in his ostentatious display of power, and in his fall, he is not very dissimilar to the favourite of our Henry VIII.

MENZINI, Benedict, an Italian poet, born at Florence 1646. His origin was humble, but his genius rose superior to poverty, and though unnoticed by those to whom he dedicated the efforts of his muse, and obliged to maintain himself occasionally by dictating extempore sermons to various ecclesiastics, he gained the patronage of Christina, queen of Sweden, and afterwards was made canon of St. Angelo, in Piscina, by the pope. He was made member of the society of Arcadi, and of the Della Crusca academy. He died of a dropsy 1704, aged 58, and left nothing behind him but his works. His poetry was much admired, and his satires possessed great spirit. His works, containing elegies, hymns, Art of Poetry—a treatise on the Irregular Construction of the Tuscan Language, &c. have been collected in 4 vols. 4to. 1731, by Fabroni.

MERCADO, Michael de, or MOERCATI, a native of St. Miniato in Tuscany, who became first physician to pope Clement VIII. and his successors, and inspector of the botanical garden of the Vatican, where he formed a valuable cabinet of metals and fossils, of which a description appeared at Rome in fol. 1717, with an appendix in 1719. He was so highly esteemed that Ferdinand, grand duke of Tuscany, as well as the Roman Senate, raised him to the honours of nobility. He wrote some works on botany, besides a learned treatise in Italian on the Obelisks of Rome. He died 1593, aged 53.

MERCATOR, Marius, an ecclesiastical author, the friend and the pupil of St. Augustine. He wrote against the Nestorians and Pelagians, and died about 451. His works have been published by Garnier the Jesuit, in folio, 1673, and again by Baluze, 1684, 8vo.

MERCATOR, Gerard, an eminent geographer, born at Ruremonde 1512. He composed a Chronology; Geographical Tables; Atlas, larger and smaller; Harmonia Evangelistarum, 4to.; a treatise on the Creation, &c. and he engraved and coloured his own maps himself. He died 1594, aged 82.

MERCATOR, Nicolas, a well-known mathematician and astronomer. He was born in Holstein, and settled in England about the restoration, and became a fellow of the Royal Society. He published Cosmographia; Rationes Mathematicæ; de Emendatione Annuâ Diatribæ duæ, &c.; Hypothesis Astronomica; Logarithmo Technia; Institutionum Astronomicæ. &c. With all his learning he was very credulous, and a great friend to Astrology. He died about 1690.

MERCER, Hugh, a brigadier-general in the army of the American revolution, was a native of the north of Scotland, and received his education at the university of Aberdeen. He studied medicine, and served as a surgeon's mate at the battle of Culloden. Soon after he came to America, and settled in Pennsylvania as a physician. He served in the army under Braddock in 1755, and the following year in the expedition under Col. Armstrong. After the peace of 1763, he removed to Fredericksburgh in Virginia. On the opening of the war of the revolution, he entered the army, and soon received the commission of brigadier-general. His brigade formed a part of the left wing of the army at the battle of Trenton in 1776, and commenced the action at Princeton on the 3d of January of the following year, when, in attempting to rally his troops, which had been thrown into disorder, he was mortally wounded, and died a week after at about the 55th year of his age, greatly lamented by the army. He was characterized in private life by amiableness, humanity, and generosity, and as an officer was surpassed by few in talents and education, integrity and patriotism. Congress, in testimony of the respect in which they held the recollection of his services, made in 1795 provision for the education of his youngest son.  L.

MERCIER, John, a philologist, born at Ufez, Languedoc, where he died 1562. He was Hebrew professor at the Royal College of Paris, 1547, after Vatablus, and distinguished himself by his great learning. He wrote Lectures on Genesis, and on the Prophets, Geneva, 1598; Commentaries on Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, 2 vols. folio; Tabulæ in Grammaticam Chaldaicam, 4to. His son Josins published notes on Ancient Authors; and an Edition of Nonius Marcellus, 4to. and died 1626.

MERCIER, Bartholomew, known under the name of abbé de St. Leger, was born at Lyons, 1st April, 1734, and entered into the society of St. Genevieve, where he became librarian. He was noticed in 1764 by Lewis XV. and made abbot of St. Leger in Soissons. He was a very learned and intelligent man, and wrote Letters on the Bibliography of Debure, 1763, 8vo. ; Letter to Caperonier, Letters on the true Author of Richelieu's Political Testament; Supplement to Marchand's History of Printing, 4to. ; Letter on the Maid of Orleans; Dissertation on the Author of the Book of the Imitation of J. C. by Kempis; Notice on the curious Book called Pedis Admirandæ, by J. d'Artis; Letters on the Letters attributed to Pope Ganganelli; Notice on the Tombs of the dukes of Burgundy; Library of Romances from the Greek, 12 vols. ; Letters on Different rare Editions of the 15th century, 8vo. &c. He was also engaged in the Journals de Trevoux and des Savans, and the Magazine Encyclopedique. This worthy man whom the revolution reduced from comfort and independence to poverty and wretchedness, died 13th May, 1799.

MERCURIALIS, Jerome, an Italian physician, born at Forli, 30th September, 1530. He studied and took his doctor's degree at Padua, and practised at Forli, where he became so popular that his countrymen sent him in 1562 as ambassador to pope Pius IV. His abilities rendered him every where respected, and after being courted and patronised by cardinal Farnese, by the emperor Maximilian, and by the Venetians, and after being professor at Padua, Bologna, and Pisa, he retired to Forli, where he died of the stone, 9th November, 1606. His chief works are de Arte Gymnasticâ—de Morbis Mulierum—de Morbis Puero-rum—Consultationes et Responsa Medicinalia—Medicina Practica—de Hydrophobia, &c. collected together and published, Venice, folio, 1644. He also edited Hippocrates' works, Greek and Latin, with notes, 1588.

MERCY, Francis de, a native of Longwy, who became general of the Bavarian army, and distinguished himself in various campaigns. He took Rotwell and Friburg, 1643, but lost the battle near Friburg soon after, and was mortally wounded at the battle of Nordlingen, 3d Aug. 1645. His body was buried on the field of battle, where these words marked the spot:

Sta! Viator, Heroem calcas.

His grandson Florimond, became by his valour marshal of the empire, and obtained the command of the German forces. He took the lines of Psaffenhoven, and afterwards signalized himself in the wars against the Turks. He fell gloriously at the battle of Parma, 29th June, 1734.

MERDDIN, son of Mervyn, a Welsh poet, called with Merdyn Emrys, and Taliessin, one of the three great bards of Wales. He was so unfortunate as to kill his nephew in battle, and this had such an effect upon him that he retired from the society of mankind to conceal himself in a wood, for which circumstance he is called the Wild. He flourished about 560, A.D.

MERE, George Brossin, Chevalier de, a French writer, much admired at court for his rank, and for his learning. He wrote Discourses of Wit and Conservation—the Elegances of Discourse—Treatises on Politeness, Eloquence, and Speech—Letters, &c. but though once applauded, his works are now forgotten. He died at his estate in Poitou, 1690, at an advanced age.

MERIAN, Maria Sibylla, a lady celebrated for her skill in drawing insects, flowers, &c. daughter of an engraver, was born at Frankfort on the Maine, 1647, and married John Andriez Graff, a painter and architect at Nuremberg. The fame which she had acquired before her marriage was not lost in her husband's name, and she has preserved her maiden appellation as her public character. In her zeal for reputation she went on a voyage to Surinam, accompanied by her two daughters, to delineate with greater accuracy the insects, reptiles, and other natural curiosities of that country, and after two years' residence she returned to Holland, and obliged the world with the publication of her Dissertatio de Generatione et de Metamorphosis Insectorum Surinamensium, folio, containing sixty plates, to which her daughters Dorothea and Helena afterwards added twelve. She wrote besides the Origin of Caterpillars, &c. in Dutch, 2 vols. 4to. The two works have appeared united under the title of Histoire des Insectes de l'Europe et de l'Amerique, Amst. 1730, Paris, 1763, 1771. She died at Amsterdam, 1717, aged 70. Her father Matthew Merian, published the Topography of the Universe, 31 vols. folio, and a Florilegium, 2 vols. fol.

MERLIN, Ambrose, a British writer about the year 480. Little but what is fabulous is known of that celebrated character who was and is still regarded as a prophet and magician. Superstitious tales represent him as begotten by an incubus, and it is said that he did not die but fell asleep, and after a certain period he will again rise to life. Some suppose that by the power of magic he placed the stupendous stones of Stone-Henge in Salisbury plain from Ireland. Merlin's ball near Caermarthen is by some considered as his burial-place. His prophecies were printed at Paris, 1530, in folio.

MEROVEUS, king of France after Clodion, 448, defeated Attila, 451, near Mery-sur-Seine, and extended the limits of his kingdom from the Somme to Treves, a town which he took and plundered. He died 456, and was succeeded by his son Childer-

ric. He was the progenitor of the Merovingian race.

MERRET, Christopher, a native of Winchcombe, Gloucestershire, educated at Oxford. He practised physic in London, and became fellow of the college of physicians and of the Royal Society. He wrote Pinax Rerum Natural. Britannic. continens Vegetabil. Anim. Fossil. Svo.—Short View of the Frauds and Abuses practised by Apothecaries, 4to.—Collection of Acts, Charters, &c. belonging to the College of Physicians, 4to.—Neri's Art of Colouring Glass, translated—Papers in the Philosophical Transactions, &c. He died 1695, aged 81.

MERRICK, James, an English poet, born about 1718. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree 1742, and became a fellow 1744. He published a translation of Tryphiodorus, 1739; Prayers, &c.; Poems on Sacred Subjects, &c.; Annotations on John, 1, c. i. 14, &c.; and the Psalms translated and paraphrased with Annotations, a most excellent work, breathing piety in the noblest accents of poetry. This amiable man died at Reading, where he had been educated, Jan. 5th, 1769.

MERRY, Robert, son of a London tradesman, received a good education at Harrow and at Christ church, Oxford, after which he became an officer in the guards and a man of fashion, of wit, and gallantry. He wrote Lorenzo, a tragedy, performed at Covent garden, and various trifling poems in the newspapers under the signature of Della Crusca. He married Miss Brunton the actress, and with her passed to America, where he died 1798.

MERSENNUS, Marin, of the religious order of Minims, and eminent as a mathematician and divine, was born at Oyse, in the province of Maine, Sept. 8th, 1588. He studied at La Fleche with Des Cartes, and afterwards at the Sorbonne, and then taught philosophy at Nevers. He settled at Paris 1620, and there gained great reputation by his learning, so that he had an extensive correspondence with the literati of Europe, and his friend Des Cartes never ventured to publish any thing without his previous approbation. He is chiefly known for his discovery of the curve called a cycloid, to which he gave the name of Roulette, and which excited much admiration among the learned of Europe. He published—Quæstiones in Genesim, in fol. 1623, in which he mentions that there were in his time 50,000 atheists in Paris—Universal Harmony, on the Theory and Practice of Music, 2 vols. fol.—de Sonorâ Naturâ—the Truth of Sciences—Recreations of Learning—the Spherics of Menelaus—Cogitata Physico-mathematica—Impiety of Deists refuted, 2 vols. 8vo. &c. He died of an abscess in his side, 1648, aged about 60.

MERVILLE, Michael Guyot de, a French journalist, born at Versailles, 1696. After travelling through Germany, Italy, Holland, and England, he settled as bookseller at the Hague, and in 1726, began to publish a journal. He afterwards went to Paris, where he wrote for the stage, but finding his circumstances involved, he returned to Switzerland, and, in a fit of melancholy, drowned himself in the lake of Geneva, 1765. He wrote besides his Journal, Histoire Literaire, 6 vols. 12mo.—Voyage Historique, 2 vols. 12mo. several comedies, &c. His dramatic works were published, Paris, 1766, 3 vols. 12mo.

MERULA, George, an Italian, born at Alexandria, in the dutchy of Milan, 1420. He taught youth at Venice and Milan for 40 years, and published Antiquitates Vicecomitum Mediolanensium, fol.—Description of Vesuvius and Montserrat—Commentaries on Martial, Statius, Juvenal, Plautus, Varro, Columella, &c.—Epistles, &c. He died at Milan of a quinsy, 1494, respected by Erasmus, and other learned men.

MERULA, Paul, a learned Hollander, born at Dort, 1558. After travelling to France, Germany, Italy, and England, he settled at Dort as an advocate, and afterwards became professor of history at Leyden, after Justus Lipsius. He died 1607, from excessive application. He published Ennius, 1595, 4to.—Urbis Romæ Delineatio, 1599—Vita D. Erasmi—Cosmographia Generalis, 4to. &c.—Opera Posthuma, 4to.

MERY, John, a native of Vatan in Berry, member of the academy of sciences, and principal surgeon of the hospital of invalids at Paris. He was very eminent in his profession, and wrote Physical Problems on the Fœtus—Observations on the Operation for the Stone, &c.—Dissertations in the Memoirs of the Academy. He died 1700, aged 55.

MESSENGUY, Francis Philip, a French ecclesiastic, born at Beauvais, Aug. 1677. He was for some time professor of belles lettres at Beauvais, and at Paris, and died at the latter place, Feb. 1769. He wrote Exposition of the Christian Doctrine, 6 vols. 12mo. a work disapproved at Rome, and condemned 1761, by Clement XIII.—Abridgment of the History of the Old and New Testament, 10 vols. 12mo.—the New Testament with notes, 3 vols.—Discourses on Religion—the Constitution Unigenitus, with remarks, &c.

MESNAGER, Nicholas, a native of Rouen, of a respectable mercantile family. He was made knight of the order of St. Michael, and raised to the honour of nobility by Lewis XIV. by whom he had been employed as a negotiator on the commercial affairs of India with Spain, and afterwards with Holland. He was one of the plenipotentiaries that signed the treaty of peace between England and France in 1711, and he afterwards was with Polignac at the conferences at Utrecht. He died at Paris 1714, aged 56. His memoirs have been published.

MESNARDIERE, Hippolytus Julius Pillet de la, a French poet, born at Loudun, 1610. He studied medicine, which he quitted for literature, and he was patronised by Richelieu, and became maître d'hôtel to the king. He died 1663. He wrote a treatise on Melancholy, 8vo.—Poétique, 4to.—Alinde, et la Pucelle d'Orleans, two indifferent tragedies—Pliny's three First Books of Letters translated—A Collection of Poems—Relations of War, &c.

MESSALINA, Valeria, daughter of Messala, and wife of the emperor Claudius, is infamously known for her libidinous propensities. She was repudiated by the emperor, and afterwards put to death with her favourite Silius, A. D. 46.—Another, the third wife of Nero, who, after the tyrant's death, devoted herself to studious pursuits.

MESSENIUS, John, a learned Swede, appointed by Gustavus Adolphus professor of law in Upsal university. The celebrity which he acquired, and the abilities which he displayed, excited the envy of his rivals in the public favour, and he was at last cruelly and falsely accused of traitorous correspondence with the enemies of his country. The accusation was believed, he was thrown into prison 1615, and died there 21 years after. He is author of Scandia Illustrata, 14 vols. fol. Stockholm, 1714, a work of merit. His son Arnold was historiographer of Sweden, and wrote a History of the Swedish Nobility, fol. 1616. He wrote some satires, reflecting on the royal family, for which he was beheaded, 1648. His son, though but 17 years old, suffered with him.

MESSIER, Charles, an astronomer, was born at Badonvilliers, in Lorraine, in 1730. At an early age he became a pupil of Delisle, who employed him to watch the return of the comet predicted by Halley; but when Messier discovered it his preceptor took the credit to himself. Messier, however, was not discouraged; and almost all the succeeding comets being first discovered by him, procured him admission into several societies. In 1770 he was chosen member of the French academy; but in the revolution he lost all his property. He was afterwards elected a member of the National Institute, and had a seat at the Board of Longitude. He became blind before his death, which happened in 1817. He communicated numerous papers on astronomical subjects to the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences.—W. B.

MESSIS, Quintin. Vid. MATSYS.

MESTON, William, a Scotch poet, born at Midmar, Aberdeenshire, 1688. He was educated at Aberdeen Marischal college, and by the interest of his friend Marshall Keith, and family, where he had been private tutor, he obtained, in 1714, a professorship of philosophy there. He followed the principles of his patrons in 1715, and consequently was deprived of his professorship, and after concealing himself, escaped by the act of indemnity. He afterwards attempted a school at Elgin, and in other places, but as he was more fond of conviviality than regularity and application, his labours did not succeed, and he subsisted upon the liberality of his friends. He died of a languishing disorder in the spring of 1745. His poetical pieces were chiefly satirical, and possess merit. His works were published, Edinburgh, 1765, in 12mo.

METASTASIO, Pietro Bonaventura, the most illustrious poet of modern Italy, was born at Rome 6th Jan. 1698. His genius early developed itself, and at the age of ten he often collected little audiences in the streets, who listened with attentive admiration to the sweetness of his extemporary verses. The celebrated Gravina witnessed and admired his rising talents, he became his instructor and friend, but while he wished him to follow the law, he found poetry his favourite pursuit. This propensity was indulged, and Metastasio at 14 produced his tragedy of Giustino. He accompanied his patron to Naples, and without forsaking the muses, he again applied himself to the law, and at last assumed the clerical habit, and entered into the minor order of priesthood. The death of his friend left him disconsolate in 1718; he bewailed his misfortune in his elegy "la Strada della Gloria," and found afterwards that he was the heir of his fortune, worth 15,000 crowns, which, in two years disappeared in the midst of cheerful conviviality and hospitable attention. Again reduced to dependence, he wished to study the law, but found poetry more pleasing, and when, by the acquaintance of Bulgarella detta Romanina, the celebrated singer, he prevailed upon to write for the stage, he found himself admired, courted, and flattered as a poet, and more fully devoted to the muses. He now united his establishment with that of Bulgarella and her husband, and lived with them in the closest intimacy, till an invitation from the emperor, in 1729, removed him to Vienna, as assistant imperial laureate, with Apostolo Zeno. He quitted Italy, and his friends with reluctance, and settled at Vienna, where he constantly resided with the greatest regularity, dividing, with punctilious exactness, his hours of study, of recreation, and of repose. In this honourable abode he was deservedly respected; the city of Assisi, where his family had long lived, granted him the honour of nobility, he was affectionately patronised by the emperor Charles VI. and by his successors, Charles VII. and Francis I. and the empress Maria Theresa, and Ferdinand VI. king of Spain, were also among the number of his friends and benefactors. In 1734, his favourite Bulgarella died and left him heir to all her property, which he, with becoming propriety, immediately bestowed on her husband. He died after a short illness, 12th April, 1782, and was buried in the parish church of St. Michael, Vienna. His death was soon after followed by that of Farinelli, the well-known singer, who about 1723 had begun his theatrical career with him, and on such friendly terms, and such continued correspondence, that they called each other Gemelli. His works consist of 26 operas, eight oratorios or sacred dramas, besides masques, sonnets, and other poetical miscellanies. Of his operas he regarded Atilio Regolo, as the best, of the oratorios Betulia Liberata, and Artaserse as the most fortunate of his dramas. Several editions have appeared of his works, and they have been translated into various languages. Metastasio has found in Dr. Burney an able and impartial historian, and it is evident that his character was most amiable as a man and as a writer. The superior excellence of his abilities may in some degree be attributed to his patron and friend Gravina, but for the sublimest flights of his muse, he was indebted to the powers of his genius; and the pictures of virtue and morality so sweetly delineated in his writings were drawn from the goodness of his heart. It has been questioned whether his regard for Bulgarella was purely platonic; but the character of a theatrical heroine, and the manners of Italy forbid the supposition. The heir of his fortune was Joseph Martinetz, at whose house he lived at Vienna; but he reserved 20,000 florins for each of his own sisters, and 3000 for each of his younger brothers.

METELLI, Augustino, a painter, disciple of Gabriello d'Ochiali, born at Bologna, 1609. His excellence was in the perspective, and in architecture; and with Michael Angelo Colonna, he completed several magnificent buildings, especially under the patronage of Philip IV. of Spain. He died at Madrid, 1660.

METELLUS, Q. Cæcilius, a celebrated Roman, called Numidicus, from the war which he carried on against Jugurtha of Numidia. Though superseded in the command of the war by his lieutenant Marius, yet he deserved and obtained the gratitude of the Roman nation.

METEREN, Emanuel Van, a native of Antwerp, who on account of his attachment to the protestant faith fled to England for an asylum, where he died 1612, aged 77. He wrote the History of the Low Countries, from 1500 to 1612, in Latin, fol. a work of merit, translated into various languages.

METEZEAU, Clement, a native of Dreux, in the reign of Lewis XIII. His abilities as an engineer were usefully employed, and he has immortalized his name by the famous dyke or canal which he constructed near Rochelle, 4882 feet long, which he completed in 1628. The labour seemed so difficult that his meritorious services were acknowledged in this elegant distich;

Dicitur Archimedes terram potuisse movere, Æquora quæ potuit sistere non minor est.

His brother Paul was an ecclesiastic of the congregation of the oratory, who died at Calais 1632, aged 50, author of some theological books.

METHOCHITUS, Theodore, an officer at the court of Andronicus, the emperor of Constantinople, where he died 1332. He wrote a Roman History, from Cæsar to Constantine, 4to; Sacred History; History of Constantinople, &c.

METHODIUS, bishop of Patara, in Lycia, and of Tyre, suffered martyrdom at Chalas 311. Only fragments of his works remain edited with notes, Paris, 1644, 4to.

METIUS, James, the inventor of telescopes about 1609, was born at Alcaer in Holland. His brother Adrian was professor of mathematics at Franeker, where he died 1636, author of Doctrina Sphæricæ Astronomiæ Universæ Institutio, 8vo.; Arithmet. et Geometr. Practicæ, 4to.; de Geminis Usu utriusque Globi, 4to.; Geometrices per Usum Circini Nova Praxis, 8vo.

METON, inventor of the golden numbers, was an Athenian mathematician, B. C. 432.

METRODORUS, a physician of Chios, the disciple of Democritus. He supported the doctrine of the eternity of the universe.

METRODORUS, a philosopher and painter of Athens, employed by Paulus the conqueror of Perseus, to instruct his children, and to paint his battles, B. C. 171.

METTRIE, Julian Offray de la, a physician, born at St. Maloes 1709. He studied under Boerhaave, and was patronised by the duke of Grammont. His book "the Natural History of the Soul," in which he maintained the materiality of the soul, was regarded as impious, and when persecution threatened him he wrote against the medical profession in a book called "Penelope, or the Machiavel in Medicine," 3 vols. 12mo. In consequence of this work he was obliged to leave France, and at Leyden he published "l'Homme Machine," a pernicious treatise of Materialism which was publicly burnt, and drove the author to Berlin. At Berlin he was patronised by the skeptical monarch, and he died there in consequence of his violent system of bleeding, 1751, aged 48. His works appeared at Berlin, 1 vol. 4to. or two in 12mo. and Frederic himself wrote his funeral oration.

METZU, Gabriel, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden 1615. He excelled as an imitator of Dow and Micris, and his women selling fish, fowls, and game, his patients and attending physicians, his chymists and their laboratories, his shops, &c. were much admired. He died in consequence of being cut for the stone, 1658.

MEURSIUS, John, a learned Dutchman, born at Losdun near the Hague 1579. He was educated at the Hague and Leiden, and made such rapid progress in classical literature, that at the age of 16 he wrote a commentary on Lycophron. He was afterwards tutor to the children of the famous Barnevelt, and with them for 10 years travelled over the best part of Europe. On his return to Leyden in 1610, he was appointed professor of history and next of Greek, and historiographer to the states of Holland, but the unsettled affairs of the times brought him into trouble, and upon the execution of Barnevelt he was accused as a partisan of that unfortunate remonstrant, and his enemies endeavoured to expel him from the professorial chair. He resigned in 1625, and on the invitation of the king of Denmark accepted a professorship at Sorø. He was there highly respected and beloved, and died Sept. 20th, 1639. In the knowledge of Greek and of antiquity Meursius possessed superior merit, though J. Scaliger has rudely stigmatized him as an ignorant and presumptuous pedant. His works were printed in 12 vols. folio, Florence, 1741. They contain treatises de Populis Atticæ; Archontes Athenienses; Fortuna Attica; de Athenarum Origine; de Festis Græcorum; Historia Danica, &c. His son of the same name who died in Denmark very young, published Arborentum Sacrum, sive de Arborum Conservatione, 1642, 8vo.; De Tibiis Veterum.

MEUSNIER, Philip, a French painter, born at Paris 1655. He studied at Rome, and was patronised by Lewis XIV. and XV. and adorned their palaces at Marly, Louvre, and Versailles. His architecture and views of perspective are much admired. He was of the French academy, and died at Paris 1734.

MEYER, James, a Flemish historian, born 1491, near Bailleul, whence he is called Baliolanus. He died Feb. 5th, 1552, rector of Blankenburg. He wrote Annales Rerum Flandricarum, folio.—Flandricarum Rerum Decas, 4to.

MEYER, Felix, a German painter, born at Winterthur, 1653. He studied in Italy and Switzerland, and in his landscapes of Alpine grandeur exhibited the noblest ideas. He died in Germany 1713, aged 60.

MEZERAI, Francis Eudes de, a French historian, born at Ry, near Argentau, Lower Normandy 1610. He was educated at Caen, where he began to distinguish himself as a poet, but on going to Paris he was persuaded by des Yveteaux to devote himself to history and to politics. He was commissary of war for two or three campaigns, and afterwards determined to employ himself in studious retirement. The narrowness of his circumstances was removed by the publication of some severe but popular satires against the court, and at the age of 26 Mezerai entered upon the laborious character of historian of France. He was encouraged by Richelieu, and when his history appeared, the first volume of which was published 1643, the second in 1646, and the third in 1653, in folio, it was received with universal applause, and was rewarded with a handsome pension from the king. In 1668, he published an abridgment of the History of France, 3 vols. 4to. but as he had spoken in some parts with more boldness than could please the court, Colbert retrenched his pension, and at last totally withdrew it. He was in 1649, admitted member of the French academy in the room of Voiture, and in 1675, chosen perpetual secretary, and he deserved it, as he contributed much to their dictionary. He died 10th July, 1683. He wrote besides a treatise on the Origin of the French; a Continuation of the History of the Turks; History of a Mother and Son, 2 vols. 12mo.—the Vanities of the court; a Translation of Grotius de Veritate Chr. Relig. As a historian Mezerai is deservedly esteemed, and in integrity, candour, and faithfulness he is inferior to none.

MEZIRIAC, Claude Gaspar Bachet, sieur de, known as a poet, in French, Latin, and Italian, as a good Greek scholar, and able critic, was born of a noble family at Bresse. He was of the order of the Jesuits, and was admitted into the French academy. He died at Bourg in Bresse, Feb. 26th, 1638, aged 45. He was universally esteemed and respected, so that at one time it was in agitation to appoint him preceptor to Lewis XIII. an honour from which he shrunk with diffidence and terror. He wrote various poems in Italian, Latin, and French, he also published the six books of Diophantus, with notes; a Life of Æsop, besides several works not printed, and a translation of Plutarch's works, just completed when he died. In arithmetic and in geometry Mezeriac was also respectable.

MICAI, the sixth of the minor prophets, foretold the captivity of his nation, their deliverance, and the coming of the promised Messiah, in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah.

MICAL, N. abbé, a celebrated French mechanic. He constructed two heads of brass which had the power of articulation, and by means of springs could repeat various passages from authors. These curious but useless labours of human ingenuity were disregarded by the government, and the artist in disappointment, broke them to pieces, and died in the greatest indigence, 1789.

MICHAEL I. succeeded Stauracius on the throne of Constantinople, 811. He was a mild and virtuous monarch, and after establishing regularity and promoting happiness at home, he made war against the Saracens, whom he defeated by his general Leo, the Armenian. He was less successful against the Bulgarians, and Leo taking advantage of his distress, declared himself against him. Michael descended without regret from the throne, 813, and retired to a monastery, where he took the religious habit, and ended his days in peace.

MICHAEL II. a Phrygian of obscure origin, raised to consequence and patrician honours by Leo the Armenian. His elevation created him enemies, and Leo was persuaded to send him to prison, and to order him to be burnt. The night preceding the fatal day the emperor was strangled in his bed, and Michael dragged from prison, was seated on the imperial throne, 820. Though hitherto the protector of the Christians he became their persecutor, and obliged them to observe the sabbath and the other holy days of the Jewish law. This and other acts of cruelty and oppression rendered him unpopular, and Euphemius his general, spurred on by personal revenge, proclaimed himself emperor near Syracuse, but was slain soon after. Regardless of the murmurs of his subjects, Michael gave himself up to every extravagance and licentious debauchery, and died 1st Oct. 829.

MICHAEL III. surnamed the Drunkard, succeeded his father Theophilus, 842, though only six years old. His minority was governed by his mother Theodora, a woman of distinguished abilities, but he no sooner arrived to years of maturity than he obliged her to resign the reins of government and retire into a monastery. He next took for his associate Bardas, his mother's brother, who persuaded him to send into exile, St. Ignatius, the patriarch of Constantinople, and to place in his seat Photius, which proved the cause of the separation of the eastern and western churches. Michael afterwards put to death his associate, and created Basil, the Macedonian, Cæsar in his room, but soon after meditated his destruction because he reproved his vicious and profligate habits. Basil, however, averted the blow, and caused the tyrant to be assassinated, 24th Sept. 867.

MICHAEL IV. called the Paphlagonian, from his birth place, ascended the imperial throne, 1034, by the favour of Zoe, the empress, who having fallen in love with him caused her own husband the Emperor Romanus Argyrus to be assassinated, that she might gratify her criminal desires. Though successful in his wars against the Saracens and Bulgarians, he found unhappiness on the throne which he had gained by murder, and at last in 1041, stung by remorse of conscience, he retired to a monastery, where he died soon after.

MICHAEL V. surnamed Calafates, succeeded his uncle Michael IV. in 1041, by the intrigues of Zoe. The great qualities which he had displayed in private life disappeared on the throne. He became suspicious, cruel, and revengeful, and dreading the power of Zoe he sent her into exile. This measure, however, was so offensive to the people that she was recalled, and Michael exposed to the popular fury had his eyes put out, and was in 1042 sent to a monastery, where he ended his days.

MICHAEL VI. or Warrior, was raised to the throne by the empress Theodora. He was old and weak, and though he chose his officers from among the senators he became unpopular, and was obliged to resign the crown in favour of Isaac Comnenus, 1057. He afterwards retired to a monastery, where he died.

MICHAEL VII. Palæologus, son of Constantine Ducas and Eudoxia, was deprived of his throne by the arts of his mother, who soon after his father's death married Romanus Diogenes, whom she proclaimed emperor. The defeat and captivity of Romanus by the Turks in 1071, enabled Michael to re-ascend the throne, but he was so weak and unpopular that Nicephorus revolted against him, and obliged him in 1078 to fly to a monastery. He died archbishop of Ephesus.

MICHAEL VIII. Palæologus, was regent of the eastern empire during the minority of John Lascaris, but taking advantage of the young monarch's weakness and inexperience, he dispossessed him of his throne, and put out his eyes, 1260. In 1261 he retook Constantinople from Baldwin II. after it had been for 58 years under the power of the French, and he laboured earnestly to procure a reconciliation between the eastern and western churches. As the plan was not approved by the Greeks, Martin IV. excommunicated Michael under pretence that he was insincere. He died 11th Dec. 1282.

MICHAEL PALÆOLOGUS, son of Andronicus the elder, was crowned 1214, emperor under his father, and shared the sovereign power with him, and died 1220.

MICHAEL FOEDEROWITZ, was elected Czar of Russia, 1613. Though raised to power in times of great danger, he showed himself brave, prudent, and sagacious, and after making peace with the Poles and the Swedes, he laboured for the happiness of his subjects in the establishment of wise and salutary regulations. He died 1645. He was the son of the daughter of John Basilowitz.

MICHAEL ANGELO, of Battles, a Roman painter, who exchanged his name of Cerquozzi, for that of Battles, as expressive of the subjects which employed his pencil. His pieces were much admired for boldness, spirit, and correctness. He died at Rome, 1660, aged 58.

MICHAEL CERULARIUS, patriarch of Constantinople in 1043, prevented by his writings the union which the emperor Michael VI. wished to effect between the eastern and western churches. He was banished for his intrigues by Isaac Comnenus, 1059, and died of chagrin, in the island of Proconesus.

MICHAEL ANGELO BUANAROTTI. Vid. ANGELO.

MICHAEL ANGELO DU CARAVAGIO. Vid. CARAVAGIO.

MICHAELIS, John David, a celebrated divinity professor in Gottingen university, who died 22d August, 1791, aged 75. His works are 49 in number, and are valuable, as chiefly designed to explain and illustrate the Holy Scriptures. The work most known in England, is his Introduction to the New Testament, published in 1750, and translated into English, 1761. The work has lately been again recommended to the notice of the public in a translation, 3 vols. 8vo. with valuable notes, by the Rev. Herbert Marsh, fellow of St. John's college, Cambridge, for some time resident at Leipsic. The work exhibits great learning and deep research, but doubts and skepticisms are occasionally introduced, which capriciously altering the text or the sense, undermine the authority of Scripture, and lessen the respect which should be paid to inspired writings.

MICHEL, Peter Anthony, an able botanist, born at Florence, of mean parentage. He was at first an errand boy in a bookseller's shop, but showing great zeal in obtaining the Tithymalus Characiis, a plant which it is said intoxicates fish, that he might angle with greater success, he was noticed by the monks of the abbey of Val-lombrossa. Under the care of these benevolent fathers he greatly improved himself, and was enabled to follow his inclinations in the science of botany. By degrees his reputation was spread abroad. Tournefort, Sherard, and other learned men admired his taste and botanical knowledge, which proved so respectable as to recommend him to the grand duke of Florence, who appointed him director with Tilly, of the botanical gardens at Pisa and Florence. Under the patronage of the duke, he also visited Egypt, Greece, and other parts of the world, in pursuit of botanical discoveries, and died 1737, aged 58. He wrote various botanical works, the best known of which are Nova Plantarum Genera, 1729, Florence—Catalogus Plant. Horti Cæsar. Florent. fol. 1748, &c.

MICHEL, James Bartholomew, a Genevese of an ancient respectable family. He served as captain in the French army, but afterwards in 1738, retired to his native country, and devoted himself to philosophical and mathematical pursuits. Though absorbed in literary cares, he felt the troubles of civil dissension, and was for some time imprisoned by the Bernese government. He died March, 1766. Besides Tracts on Meteorology—the Power of the Tides—the Temperature of the Globe—Light—the Comet of 1680—the Deluge—Views of the Glaciers of Switzerland, &c. he constructed some ingenious maps, and invented a new thermometer.

MICKLE, William Julius, a poet known as the translator of the Lusiad, was born at Langholm, in the county of Dumfries, 23th Sept. 1734. He was educated under his father, who had been one of Bayle's translators, and after his death he was placed in the high school of Edinburgh, where, about the age of 13, he accidentally met with Spenser's Faery Queene, and was enchanted with the poetical imagery. He settled at Edinburgh as a brewer, first for his aunt, and then for himself; but his industry proved unsuccessful in trade, and in 1763 he left Scotland, for London. He introduced himself to the notice of lord Lyttleton, but was disappointed in his expectations of going to the East or West Indies in some mercantile occupation, and at last accepted the offer of corrector of the Clarendon press, at Oxford. In this learned employment, so congenial to his taste, he published various things, and, in 1771, after he had acquired a perfect knowledge of the Portuguese, he published the first book of the Lusiad as a specimen. The work was applauded and continued, and in 1775 was favourably received by the public, and again edited in 1778. Mickle afterwards went to Lisbon as secretary to his friend governor Johnstone, and there, in 1781, he wrote his Almada Hill, a poem, 4to. At his return, he married Miss Tomkins, June, 1782, daughter of the person with whom he resided at Forest Hill, after he had retired from Oxford, for the more peaceful completion of his Lusiad, and with her he settled at Wheatley, near Oxford. He here wrote some few things, and made several communications to the European Magazine. He died at Wheatley, 25th Oct. 1789, aged 55, leaving a son, but with scanty resources. By his Lusiad, an elegant and classical work, rivalled only by the Iliad of Pope, Mickle has obtained immortal fame. His poems were published 1794, in one vol. 4to. and appear among the English poets of Dr. Anderson. He wrote, besides, a letter to Dr. Harwood, on the Arian Controversy, 1769—Voltaire in the Shades, or Dialogues on the Deistical Controversy, 1770—a pamphlet on the Affairs of the East India Company. In his private character Mickle was very amiable; he lived without reproach, and wrote nothing but what virtue approved.

MICRELIUS, John, professor of divinity at Stettin, was born at Custin, Pomerania, 1597. He distinguished himself as a theological disputant, and was honourably noticed by Christina of Sweden. He had three wives, and died 3d Dec. 1658. His works are, Lexicon Philosophicum, 4to.—Syntagma Historicum Mundi et Ecclesiæ, 8vo.—Tractatus de Copia Verborum—Ethnophronium contra Gentiles, &c.—Archæologia—Historia Ecclesiastica, 2 vols. 4to.—Orthodoxia Lutherana contra Berigium.

MIDDLETON, Richard, of the order of the Cordeliers, was called the Profound, from his extensive learning. He was distinguished in the universities of Oxford and Paris, and wrote a Commentary on Peter Lombard, and other theological works, and died 1304.

MIDDLETON, sir Hugh, a native of Denbigh, well known for his public spirit. He formed the project of supplying London with water, and though he met with numerous difficulties, from the prejudices and the envy of others, and from the exhausted state of his affairs, he triumphed over all opposition, and brought the united streams of two rivulets in the parishes of Ware and of Amwell, in Hertfordshire, through a course of 20 miles, to the capital. The work was begun 20th Feb. 1603, and on Michaelmas day, 1613, water was brought into the great cistern at Islington. This honourable completion of a useful work was rewarded by king James, who had liberally supported the projector, and erected, by charter, a company of proprietors. He was knighted, and afterwards made a baronet, and under Charles, the moiety of the property, which he had given to the king's father for his assistance, was reconveyed to him for an annual sum, and is now become a source of princely fortune to the proprietors. Sir Hugh gave one share of the property to the company of goldsmiths, to which he belonged, for the benefit of their poor members. He died about 1636.

MIDDLETON, William, a native of Gwynnog, Denbighshire, who served in the army under Elizabeth, and afterwards had the command of a ship of war. He employed his leisure hours at sea in composing a version of the psalms into Welch verse, which he completed, 1595, in the West Indies. He also wrote a grammar, and art of poetry, 1593, &c.

MIDDLETON, Thomas, a dramatic writer in the reign of James I. He joined Jonson, Massinger, and Fletcher, in the composition of some dramatic pieces, and died 1630.

MIDDLETON, Conyers, an eminent critic and able divine. He was the son of the rector of Hindervell, near Whitby, and was born at York, 27th Dec. 1683. At the age of 17 he was sent to Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and in 1707 he took his degree of M.A. In 1709 he joined the other fellows of the society in opposition to Dr. Bentley, the master; but, soon after, he retired from college, by marrying Mrs. Drake, a widow of large property. In 1717 he was, on the visit of George I. to the university, created D.D. by royal mandamus, and on this occasion he resisted the demand of Dr. Bentley for extraordinary fees. This affair engaged much of the public attention, and was at last decided against Dr. Bentley, who behaved with great contumacy towards the university, in consequence of which he was degraded. In this dispute Middleton published some pamphlets, and when Bentley made proposals for a new edition of the Greek Testament, and a Latin version, 1720, he was treated with such severity by his antagonist, in "Remarks, &c." that he totally abandoned the plan. In 1723 Middleton was elected principal librarian at Cambridge, and the following year, in consequence of his wife's death, he visited the continent, where he was received with great respect by men of learning and of rank. Soon after his return, in 1725, he drew upon himself the resentment of the medical world by an attack on Dr. Mead, Spon, and others, and in 1729 he highly offended the catholics by publishing his letters from Rome, showing an exact conformity between popery and paganism. In 1731 he incurred the public displeasure in a high degree, by publishing his letter to Dr. Waterland, who had attacked Tindal's Christianity as old as the Creation, and in his pamphlet he spoke with such freedom of religion, and with such contempt of his respectable antagonist, that he not only was severely censured as an infidel, in an answer by bishop Pearce; but when known to be the author of the obnoxious tract, he was very nearly stripped of his academical honours. In 1731, notwithstanding his unpopularity, he was appointed Woodwardian professor at Cambridge, but as his pursuits were very different from the study of fossils and minerals, he resigned the place in 1734. About this time he married a second wife, after whose death he took a third, who survived him. In 1735 he published a Dissertation on the Origin of Printing in England, and in 1741 appeared his great work, the History of the Life of M. Tullius Cicero, 2 vols. 4to. reprinted in 3 vols. 8vo. This performance is of superior eminence, written in correct and elegant language, and abounding in every thing which can interest the heart, inform the understanding, and polish the taste, though it must be confessed, that with all the partiality of an author, he has drawn the character of the orator with more glittering ornaments than belong to him, and in concealing his defects has magnified his virtues. In 1743 he published Cicero's epistles to Brutus, and those of Brutus to Cicero, in Latin and English, with a vindication of their authenticity in answer to Tunstall's objections. In 1745 appeared his Germana quædam Antiquitates Eruditæ Monumenta, &c. and 1747 his Treatise on the Roman Senate. That same year was also remarkable for the publication of the introduction of his discourse on the miraculous powers supposed to have existed in the Christian church from the earliest ages, &c. 4to. a work which excited in the highest degree the reprehension of the clergy, and drew upon him severe and well directed reflections, two of which procured to the authors, Dodwell and Church, the degree of D.D. honourably conferred by the university of Oxford. While preparing to answer his opponents he made a petulant attack on Sherlock's Discourses, once his friend and companion, 1750, but before his reply to Dodwell, Church, and others, could be completed, he was seized with a hectic fever, and a disorder in his liver, which proved fatal, 28th July, 1750, in his 67th year, at Hildersham, Cambridgeshire. His miscellaneous works, not including the life of Cicero, appeared together in 1752, with several new pieces, in 4 vols. 4to. Dr. Middleton left no children by his three wives. As a writer he ranks high, for elegance of language, animated description, and all the graces of profound learning and extensive information. Though attacked and reviled as an infidel, and an enemy to Christianity, by his opponents, it appears from his letters to his friend and patron lord Hervey, that his opinions were not fully orthodox, and though he speaks with indifference of the preferment which was conferred on others not so well entitled to it for learning and abilities as himself, yet it is plain, that his language is the language of a disappointed man, who affected to despise what his intemperate writings had rendered it impossible for him to obtain.

MIDDLETON, Erasmus, rector of Turvey, Bedfordshire, and author of a dictionary of arts and sciences, of little merit, of sermons on Jackson and Binns, and editor of Biographia Evangelica, 4 vols. 8vo. died 25th May, 1805. He was one of the six young men expelled some years ago from Oxford, in consequence of which Macgowan's Satire, called the Shaver, was published. He was in his principles a strong follower of the Methodists.

MIDDLETON, Arthur, was at the head of the government of South Carolina after the departure of Nicholson, in 1725, until the appointment of governor Johnson in 1730. When the revolution took place in that colony in 1719 he was a member of the legislature which assumed the name of the convention, and was elected president. After the arrival of governor Johnson, he continued a member of the council.

☞ L.

MIDDLETON, Arthur, one of the venerable signers of the declaration of American independence, was a native of South Carolina. He was the son of Henry Middleton, Esq. one of the presidents of the first continental congress, and grandson of Arthur Middleton the first royal governor of South Carolina. He was born in the year 1747; received the principal part of his education in England; and spent several years in travelling over Europe. Soon after returning to his native country, he took an active and promising part in the revolutionary movements, which had then begun to be very serious in their aspect. In 1776 he was chosen one of the delegates from South Carolina to the American congress; and in that capacity had the honour of co-operating with that distinguished band of worthies, who declared the colonies free and independent states. He had a seat in congress again in 1777, and also in 1781, and 1782. In the latter year, on relinquishing his seat in congress, he was solicited to accept the office of governor of his native state, but declining this offer, he retired to his residence in the neighbourhood of Charleston, where he died in 1787, in the fortieth year of his age. The history of Mr. Middleton's life, both private and official, plainly shows that his education, his talents, and his influence were of a very high order.

MIDDLETON, Thomas Fanshaw, bishop of Calcutta, was the only child of the Rev. Thomas Middleton, chaplain of the earl of Scarsdale, and minister of Kettleston, Derbyshire; and was born in the year 1769. He was a descendant of the celebrated Sir Richard Fanshawe, and through that ancestor related to some of the first families in England. He was educated at Christ's hospital, and thence went to Pembroke hall. Cambridge, In 1792 he took the degree of A.B. was ordained, and began to officiate at Gainsboro. He was soon afterwards nominated to the living of Tanor, Northamptonshire. In 1802 he was collated to the rectory of Little Bytham, with Bytham castle annexed, and in 1808 took the degree of D.D. The next year he resigned his two livings on being preferred to St. Pancras, near London. In 1812 he was made archdeacon of Huntington by the bishop of Lincoln. The English ministry having now resolved on establishing a bishopric in India, he received the appointment from the king in 1814, and was consecrated to the holy office by the bishop of Exeter. He was elected at this time fellow of the Royal Society, and embarked immediately for India. For seven years he exercised the functions of his office with distinguished zeal and fidelity. His talents, acquirements, perseverance, and piety, gained him the most unqualified praise. He died at Calcutta on the 8th July, 1822, aged 55 years. A splendid monument by Chantrey is now erecting to his memory in St. Paul's, at the instance of the "Society for promoting Christian Knowledge." His plan of an East India mission college, with an endowment of five scholarships has recently been carried into execution. He was the author of the Country Spectator, a periodical essay. A letter respecting the best method of propagating Christianity in India. Several charges to missionaries. Sermons, and a most learned work on the "Doctrine of the Greek Article," which established his reputation as a scholar. He was also for some time editor of the British Critic.

MIEL, Jan, a Flemish painter, born 1599, near Antwerp. He was the disciple of Ger. Segers, and copied at Rome the works of the Caracci and Corregio. He was patronised by Charles Emanuel, duke of Savoy, and died at Turin, 1664. He excels in his historical, hunting, and conversation pieces, and his animals are particularly admired for spirit, and for all the graces of nature. Several engravings have been made from his works.

MIERIS, Francis, called the Older, was born at Leyden, 1635. He was the disciple of Ger. Douw, whom he is said in some degree to have excelled. His pictures are very scarce and valuable. He died 1681, leaving two sons, both eminent painters.

MIERIS, William, the Younger, son of the above, was also an eminent painter, and born at Leyden, 1662. He also excelled in completing models of clay and wax, and deserved the name of a good sculptor. He died 1747. His son Francis, called the young Francis, was also a painter, but his pieces have not the same excellence as those of his father and grandfather.

MIEFLIN, Thomas, a major-general in the army of the American revolution, was born about the year 1744. His parents were Quakers. He engaged at an early period in opposing the arbitrary measures of the British government, and was in 1775 appointed quarter-master-general of the army. He was elected a member of the congress of 1774, and of the convention which formed the constitution of the United States. In 1788 he became president of the supreme executive council of Pennsylvania, and presided the next year in the convention, which formed the constitution of that state. He was elected the first governor under that constitution, and held the office till 1799. He died on the 20th January, 1800. He was brave, patriotic, and eloquent.

MIGNARD, Nicholas, a French painter, born at Troyes, 1608. He studied in Italy, and married at Avignon, and at last became rector of the Paris academy of painting. His portraits and historical pieces were much admired. He died of a dropsy, 1668.

MIGNARD, Peter, called the Roman, as for 20 years a resident at Rome, was the younger brother of Nicholas, and was also born at Troyes, 1610. He was much esteemed at Rome, and afterwards at Paris, where Lewis XIV. sat ten times to him, ennobled him and made him his chief painter at the death of Le Brun. He died 13th March, 1695.

MIGNON, Abraham, a painter born at Frankfort, 1639. His flowers and insects were much admired, especially the drops of dew on fruit, which displayed all the transparency of real water. He died 1679.

MILBOURNE, Luke, M.A. an English divine, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, became rector of St. Ethelburgh, and lecturer of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch. He published a poetical Translation of the Psalms—some Latin Verses—Notes on Dryden's Virgil—thirty-one single sermons, &c. His name is frequently mentioned with that of Blackmore, by Dryden, and has been introduced by Pope in his Art of Criticism, and in the Dunciad. Dr. Johnson speaks in Dryden's Life, with no great respect of his abilities. He died 15th April, 1720. His father Luke was a non-conformist, and in consequence, ejected from the living of Wroxall, Warwickshire, 1662. He died at Newington, 1667.

MILDMAY, Sir Walter, surveyor of the court of augmentations under Henry VIII. and under Elizabeth, privy counsellor, chancellor, and under treasurer of the exchequer, was a man of great public and private worth, and immortalized his name by the foundation of Emanuel college at Cambridge. He died 1589.

MILL, John, a learned English divine, born at Shap, in Westmoreland, 1645. He entered as servitor at Queen's college, Oxford, of which society he became fellow. In 1681 he took his degree of D.D. and was appointed chaplain to Charles II., and in 1685 made principal of Edmund hall. He was a good preacher, and published some sermons; but the work for which he is deservedly celebrated in his edition of the New Testament. This very valuable work, which was first begun by the advice of Fell, bishop of Oxford, and partly printed at his expense, was the labour of 30 years of application, and was published about a fortnight before his death, which happened 23d June, 1707. It is remarkable that bishop Fell's executors refused to complete the work which his lordship had so honourably begun, and Dr. Mill therefore repaid them what had been expended, and finished the whole at his own charge. These labours so popular and so useful, were not, however, received without censure. Dr. Whitty attacked the notes, and the 30,000 various readings which had been collected by the indefatigable editor, were considered as likely to open the way for cavil and skepticism among free-thinkers and wanton polemics. These arguments were ably refuted by Dr. Bentley, and Dr. Mill's Greek Testament is now deservedly regarded as a most valuable book.

MILL, Henry, an eminent engineer, born about 1680, near, or in Red Lion square, Holborn. He was well educated, and passed some time at one of the universities, and his mechanical abilities became so eminent that he was, when very young, employed as engineer by the new river company. His labours were there so usefully directed in the improvement of the concern, that by gradual increase the original shares of 100*l.* are now sold for upwards of 8000*l.* His abilities were also employed in supplying the town of Northampton with water, for which he was presented with the freedom of the corporation, and he likewise ornamented Houghton, the seat of Sir Robert Walpole, with an excellent stream. This worthy man was seized with a fit on Christmas day, 1770, and expired before the next morning. A monument was erected to him by his sister, in Breemoore church, near Salisbury.

MILLAR, John, a popular professor of law at Glasgow. He practised also at the Scotch bar, and for 40 years maintained the high reputation of an able and intelligent professor. He was author of a Historical View of the English Government, 4to. —and on the Origin of Distinction of Ranks in Society, 1 vol. 8vo. He died 1801.

MILLEDGE, John, governor of Georgia, was elected in 1802. He was a native of that state, and a descendant from one of the early settlers of the colony. In 1780 he was appointed attorney general of the state. He was afterwards a member of the senate, and a representative in congress. On the death of general Jackson in 1806, he was elected a senator. This office he resigned in 1809. He was the principal founder of the university of Georgia, and presented the land which forms its site. He died at his seat at the Sand Hills, Feb. 9th, 1818, aged 61.

MILLER, James, a dramatic poet, born in Dorsetshire, 1703. He was intended for a merchant, but he preferred literature, and was sent to Wadham college, Oxford, where he began his famous comedy, "the Humours of Oxford," performed 1729. He wrote besides some other comedies, occasional pieces, and Mahomet the Impositor, a tragedy, during the popular run of which the author died. Miller was a clergyman, and published some sermons; but he had no preferment till a few weeks before his death he was presented to the living of Uperne, Dorsetshire, which his father had held. He died 1744.

MILLER, Philip, author of the Gardener's Dictionary, was born 1691, in Scotland. He succeeded, in 1722, his father, as gardener of the company of apothecaries' garden at Chelsea, and united the knowledge and information of a botanist to the practice and mechanical drudgery of a gardener. He was well acquainted with the plans of Ray and Tournefort, and by the advice of Sir William Watson and Mr. Hudson, with difficulty adopted the system of Linnæus, with whom he afterwards corresponded as a scientific and experienced botanist. He was made fellow of the Royal Society, member of the Florence botanical society, and honoured with the correspondence of several learned men in Europe, who called him, with flattery but truth, Hortulanorum Princeps. Linnæus said of his dictionary, Non erit Lexicon Hortulanorum, sed Botanicorum. He resigned through infirmity, some time before his death, his place at Chelsea, and died 18th Dec. 1771, aged 80. He published his Gardener's Dictionary, 1731, folio, which has passed through various editions, and has been translated into several languages; the Gardener's Calendar, 8vo.; a Short Introduction to Botany; Figures of Plants, 2 vols. folio, with 300 plates; besides Papers in the Philosophical Transactions, &c. and a large Herbarium of Exotics in MS.

MILLER, lady, a woman of respectable abilities who resided at Bath-Easton, near Bath, and published Letters from Italy, 3 vols. 8vo. A collection of poems appeared in her name, and in the name of some of her literary friends who frequented her house. She died 1781.

MILLER, Edward, doctor of music, was the son of a pavier at Norwich, and bred to the same business; but having a dislike to it, he absconded, and became a pupil of Dr. Burney, who was then resident at Lynn. In 1756 he became organist of the church of Doncaster, where he continued the rest of his life. In 1786 he obtained his degree of doctor of music at Cambridge; and died at Doncaster in 1807. Dr. Miller published—1. Institutes of Music. 2. The Elements of Thorough-Bass and Composition. 3. The Psalms of David, set to music and arranged for every Sunday in the year. 4. The History and Antiquities of Doncaster.—W. B.

MILLER, Edward, M.D. professor of the practice of medicine in the college of physicians of New-York, was born at Dover, Delaware, May 9th, 1760, and received a classical education. He commenced the practice of medicine in 1780, as a surgeon's mate in the service of the United States, and continued in that situation until the close of the war of the revolution, soon after which he established himself in Somerset county, Maryland, but in 1786 returned to his native town, and enjoyed a successful practice there till 1796, when he removed to New-York, and soon became one of the most distinguished physicians of that city. In the following year he in conjunction with several others commenced the publication of the Medical Repository, which he assisted to sustain to the close of his life. He was appointed resident physician in 1805, and in 1809 professor of the practice of medicine in the college of physicians in New-York. The latter station he continued to hold till his death on the 17th of March, 1812, in the fifty-second year of his age. His endowments were excellent, he was an accomplished classical scholar, well versed in several of the modern languages, and in general literature, and held the first rank among his cotemporaries in the knowledge of his profession. He was amiable, polished in his manners, upright, and liberal to the poor, an able lecturer in the department of which he was professor, and, his contributions to the Medical Repository, which were numerous, belong to the most respectable portion of that work. His most important publication is a report on yellow fever.

MILLES, Jeremiah, D.D. a native of Highcleer, Hants, where his father was minister. He was made dean of Exeter after Lyttleton, and became president of the antiquarian society, to whose literary labours he contributed very largely. He was also engaged in the Chattertonian controversy, and warmly supported the authenticity of those ancient poems imposed upon the world as the works of Rowley. His edition of the poems in 4to. with annotations, displayed his abilities as an editor, but exposed him to the severity of criticism. He died 1784, aged 71.

MILLETIERE, Theophilus Brachet, sieur de la, a protestant, who studied law at Heidelberg, and practised as advocate, and afterwards became a divine. He wrote at Rochelle against Tilenus, and asserted that it was lawful for the protestants to resist, by force of arms, the persecutions raised against them. He was, in consequence of this, suspected of disloyalty to the government, and sent as prisoner to Toulouse, where he was put to the rack. He was at last, by the intercession of friends, liberated, and then turned catholic, and endeavoured by his writings to reconcile the Huguenots and his new friends to the same faith. He dedicated one of his books to Charles II. in his exile, and advised him to embrace the catholic tenets, that faith in which he insolently affirmed his father Charles I. had died. Milletiere died 1665, little respected.

MILLOT, Claude Francis Xavier, a French historian, born at Besançon, March, 1726. He was for some time among the Jesuits, but quitted their society, and was afterwards appointed professor of history at Parma, by the interest of the duke of Nivernois. After acquiring reputation as a professor, he returned to France, and was made preceptor to the duke of Enghein, in which situation he died 1785. In his manners he was a very diffident man, though amiable and benevolent. His works are valuable, and written with spirit, and in an elegant style. He published Elements of the History of France, 3 vols. 12mo.—Elements of the History of England, 3 vols.—Elements of Universal History, 9 vols.—History of the Troubadours, 3 vols.—Memoirs for the History of Lewis XIV. and XV. 6 vols.—Translation of Orations from Latin Historians—Discourses on Academic Subjects, &c.

MILLS, Samuel J. agent of the American colonization society, was born at Torrington, Connecticut, April 21st, 1783. He was educated at Williams college, and studied theology at the seminary at Andover, Massachusetts. The great benevolent institutions established in England near the close of the last, and beginning of the present century, having early suggested to him the desirableness of instituting similar ones in the United States, he resolved to make the accomplishment of it the first object of his attention, and was highly successful in his exertions. He employed himself chiefly in exciting persons of wealth and influence to execute his plans, and by that means had an important agency in promoting the establishment of the foreign missionary society of New-England, under the superintendance of the American board of commissioners. and the united foreign missionary society of New-York; the school for the education of heathens at Cornwall, and the African school, in New-Jersey, and also the American Bible Society. On the organization of the American colonization society, he with Mr. Burgess was appointed an agent to visit the coast of Africa, and select a place for the establishment of a colony. They embarked in November, 1817, and proceeded to Africa by the way of England, and having accomplished the object of the mission, commenced their homeward voyage from Sierra Leone in May, 1818, during which Mr. Mills died on the 16th of June, in the thirty-fifth year of his age. He was modest and retiring in his manners, eminently pious, and ardently zealous to meliorate the miseries of mankind, and promote the progress of religion. L. L.

MILNE, Colin, a divine and naturalist, was born at Aberdeen, and educated at the Marischal college there, under his uncle, Dr. Campbell. From thence he removed to Edinburgh; after which, on becoming tutor to lord Algernon Percy, he took orders in the church of England, and was presented to the rectory of North Chapel in Essex. He was also chosen lecturer of Deptford, and obtained the degree of doctor of laws from Aberdeen. He died in 1815. He published—1. "A Botanical Dictionary," 8vo. 2. Linnæi Institutiones Botanica, 4to. 3. Indigenous Botany, or the Habits of English Plants. 4. A volume of sermons. Svo.—W. B.

MILNER, Isaac, was brought up to the weaving business; but even when at the loom his mind was intent upon study, and all the time he could obtain from labour, was devoted to the classics and mathematics. Such was his progress, that his brother took him for an assistant in the grammar-school, and afterwards sent him to Queen's college, Cambridge, where in 1774, he was senior wrangler, and gained the first mathematical prize. He also became a tutor in that science; and, among other pupils, had Mr. Wilberforce and Mr. Pitt, with whom he made a tour on the continent. In 1783 Mr. Milner was appointed professor of natural philosophy; and in 1788 elected master of his college, on which he took his doctor's degree. The same year he was made dean of Carlisle; in 1792 he served the office of vice-chancellor; and in 1798 he succeeded Waring as Lucasian professor of mathematics. He died in 1820. His publications are—1. Animadversions on Hawker's Church History. 2. A continuation of his brother's Ecclesiastical History. 3. Strictures on the publications of Dr. Marsh, respecting the Bible Society. 4. Life of Mr. Joseph Milner, prefixed to his sermons.—W. B.

MILLO, an athlete of Crotona, celebrated for his prodigious strength. He obtained the prize seven times at the Pythian games, and six times at Olympia, and was devoured by wild beasts, 500 B.C.

MILIO, Titus Annius, a Roman, who killed Clodius in the Appian Way, in consequence of a violent rivalry which existed between them in the solicitation of public honours. Though defended by Cicero, he was banished to Marseilles. The oration delivered by Cicero on the occasion is much admired.

MILTIADES, an Athenian general, celebrated for the great victory which he, at the head of 10,000 men, obtained over the numerous forces of the Persians at Marathon, 490 B.C. He was afterwards cruelly imprisoned by his suspicious countrymen, and died in confinement, 489 B.C.

MILTON, John, a celebrated English poet, descended from an ancient family at Milton, Oxfordshire. He was born Dec. 9th, 1608, in Bread-street, where his father, a scrivener, was settled, and after receiving instruction from a private tutor, he went to St. Paul's school, and in 1625 removed to Christ-college, Cambridge. He was intended by his father for the church, and he took his master's degree in 1632; but he expressed an aversion for the ecclesiastical profession, and by degrees grew dissatisfied with the established form of church government. When he left Cambridge he returned to his father, who had settled with a competent fortune at Horton, near Colnbrook in Buckinghamshire, and in this retirement he laboriously devoted himself for five years to reading the purest classics in Greek and Latin. Here likewise he produced his Comus; L'Allegro; Il Penseroso; and Lycidas, poems of such intrinsic merit as would have transmitted his fame to the latest period of time, if he had written nothing besides. On his mother's death he obtained his father's permission to travel abroad, and in 1638 he embarked for the continent, attended by one servant. From Paris, where he was introduced to the great Hugo Grotius, he proceeded to Nice, and by sea to Genoa, Leghorn, Pisa, and then passed to Florence, where he spent two months, respected and beloved by persons of eminence, rank, and learning. His next visit was through Sienna to Rome, where he passed two months, delighted with the vast treasures of the Vatican, and honoured with the kindness and civilities of cardinal Barberini, Holstenius, and other learned men. From Rome he went to Naples, and formed the design of visiting Sicily; but the disturbed state of affairs at home engaged now all his intention, and he determined to hasten back. He passed through Rome, Bologna, Ferrara, Venice, Verona, Milan, Geneva, and France, and reached England after an absence of fifteen months. Instead, however, of returning to live with his father, who had retired to Reading, from Horton, he settled in St. Bride's churchyard, to educate his sister's two sons, Edward and John Phillips. Afterwards, with the intention of taking a greater number of pupils, he removed to a large house in Aldersgate-street, and published his tractate of education, which proved how well qualified he was to instruct others, though from a dislike of university rules, he adopted a mode of education totally the reverse of what was practised in schools. In 1641 he published some pamphlets, in which he vented his virulence against the church, and supported the republican principles of the times. In 1643 he married the daughter of Mr. Powell, a justice of peace in Oxfordshire; but as she had been educated a firm royalist, this union proved unhappy, and after cohabiting with him about a month, she left him and would not return. Disgusted with this conduct, the poet thought that he might be permitted to take another wife; and he not only wrote some strong tracts in favour of divorce, but paid his addresses to another lady, of great wit and beauty. This had due effect; and his wife, after long despising his invitations, relented, and throwing herself at his feet, obtained his forgiveness and reconciliation in 1645. From Aldersgate-street he removed to Barbican, and then to a smaller house in Holborn, where in the midst of his studies, he rejoiced at the prospect of the fall of regal government, and the future establishment of his favourite republic. The momentous events of the times gave full scope for the exertion of his literary abilities; he defended the trial and the execution of the king, and animadverted in severe terms on every measure which might tend to disturb the popular government. His talents were too great to be neglected, and therefore he was appointed Latin secretary to the council of state, and in this office he answered the Icon Basilicon, by his Iconoclastes, 1649, and two years after published his celebrated work against Salmasius, pro Populo Anglicano Defensio, which not only spread his fame through Europe as an elegant Latinist, and able disputant, but procured for him from the government, a present of 1000*l*. About this time he lost his eye-sight, which had been gradually decaying from his severe application to his studies; but he nevertheless continued zealous and active in the support of his principles. In 1652 his wife died soon after the delivery of her fourth child, and some time after he married a second. But though patronised and raised to independence by the favour of Cromwell, and of Richard, Milton saw with terror the dissolution of his favourite republic approaching, and not all the respectable labours of his pen could uphold the crumbling fabric. Anxious to ensure his safety, on the restoration, he concealed himself in a friend's house in Bartholomew close, but though his sentiments and his active conduct had marked him out at first for destruction, yet by the interest and influence of his friends, especially sir Andrew Marvell, Davenant, and others, who respected his learning and his abilities, while they detested his principles, he was included in the act of amnesty, and permitted to appear in public. Removing therefore from Petty France, Westminster, where he had lived since 1652, he took a house in Holborn, and then removed Jewin-street, where he took a third wife, and then settled in a house in the Artillery walk, Bunhill fields. In this place, which was his last stage, and where he lived longer than in any other, he was accustomed, as Phillips observes, to sit at the door in the summer, in a gray coarse cloth coat, and while he enjoyed the fresh air, many persons of rank and of eminence have been known to pay their respect of admiration to the blind but venerable bard. Though reduced in his circumstances by the restoration he refused to accept the Latin secretaryship which was honourably offered him by Charles II. and he devoted himself earnestly to the completion of his great poem, on which he had already bestowed much labour. He was assisted in his literary pursuits by Thomas Ellwood, a quaker, who acted as an amanuensis, and daily visited him. In 1665, during the plague, the poet retired to a small house at St. Giles, Chalfont, Buckinghamshire, and while in this place, he was visited by his friend, into whose hands he put his Paradise Lost, now finished, and modestly requested his opinion. Ellwood read the work with approbation, and in returning it to the poet, told him that he had said much about Paradise Lost, but, added he, what hast thou to say of Paradise Found. The hint was not lost; Paradise Regained was begun, and afterwards, when visited by Ellwood, Milton presented him the poem which originated in his conversation. The poet returned to London, 1666, and the Paradise Lost was first printed the following year, in 10 books, afterwards swelled to 12, and Paradise Regained in 1670, in four books, to which was added, Samson Agonistes, a dramatic poem. Milton received for this great work only 15*l*. and the money was paid by instalments. It is singular that the poet considered Paradise Regained as a superior performance to Paradise Lost, but posterity have decided otherwise; and this matchless poem, which long remained unknown from the prejudices entertained against the author, gradually rose to notice, to fame, and immortality. Dryden had, indeed, recommended its great merits to the public, in the six beautiful lines, "Three poets in three distant ages born," &c. which are generally prefixed to the work, and which are borrowed from the distich which Salvaggi wrote at Rome on the youthful bard; but it was not till the days of Addison that England became sensible of the greatness, of the beauties, and the sublimity of her poet. The critique of the Spectator opened the eyes of the nation, and, in banishing prejudice, liberally proved that however violent the publications of Milton were, however biassed in his love of republican principles, and however blamable in some parts of his political life, yet his merits as a poet cannot be affected; he must shine as the greatest ornament of the British Isles, and, in the ranks of immortality, be placed by the side of Homer, of Virgil, and of Tasso. Milton died at his house near Bunhill fields, in the beginning of Nov. 1674, and was buried near his father, in the chancel of St. Giles', Cripplegate, where a monument has been lately erected to his memory, and another, with greater propriety, among the great departed dead of Westminster abbey, raised in 1737 by Mr. Benson. It is supposed that Milton drew his idea of his great work from an Italian tragedy on the Loss of Paradise, on which he originally intended to compose a tragedy; but as his matter enlarged, his genius gave it the form of an epic poem. His Samson Agonistes was written after the Greek model, but is unfit for representation; the Comus was first acted for the benefit of his grand-daughter, Mrs. Clarke, a widow in indigent circumstances, and the public support was earnestly solicited by a prologue from the nervous pen of Dr. Johnson. His poetical works have been often and elegantly edited; the latest edition is that by Todd, 6 vols. 8vo. To the edition of bishop Newton a well written life was prefixed, and Mr. Hayley has also given a poetical life of the author; but the critique of Johnson can never be surpassed. The smaller poems were edited by Thomas Wharton, 8vo. with valuable notes. The prose works of Milton are numerous and highly respectable. Besides his political tracts, he wrote a History of England, 4to. down to the conquest—Areopagitica, or the Liberty of unlicensed Printing—Letters—History of Muscovy, &c. His political works have appeared in 3 vols. folio, and in 4to. and in 8vo. Dr. Newton's edition of all his works was comprehended in 5 vols. 4to. The person of Milton was fair, so that he was called, at Cambridge, the lady of Christ college; his hair was light brown, and his features exact and pleasing.

He was of the middle size, well proportioned, nervous, and active; but his constitution was tender, and his health consequently weak. In his mode of living he was economical, abstemious, and averse to strong liquors. Though he did not inherit much from his father, yet frugality maintained him in a respectable manner, and at his death he left about 1500*l.* besides the value of his household goods. He had no children except by the first of his three wives. Three daughters survived him, and of these the two youngest were well employed by him to read; and though they could read with ease eight different languages, yet they understood nothing but English, as their father used to say that one tongue was enough for a woman. In his religious opinions, Milton was inconsistent. In his early years he favoured the puritans, afterwards he inclined to the tenets of the independents and anabaptists, whose liberty of worship he greatly admired; but in the latter part of life, he professed no attachment to any particular sect, and he neither frequented any public place of worship, nor observed in his own house any of the religious rites of the times, though it is fully evident that he was sensible of the great truths of revelation, and hoped for salvation through the merits of a Redeemer.

MIMNERMUS, a Greek poet of Colophon, in the age of Solon. His elegies are lost, except a few fragments, preserved in Stobæus.

MINELLIUS, John, a Dutch grammarian, born at Rotterdam. The best part of his life was engaged in teaching the classics, and he facilitated the labours of future instructors, by publishing editions of Virgil, Terence, Sallust, Horace, Florus, and other works, with notes, and adapted to the capacity of school boys. He died 1633.

MINOS, a fabulous son of Jupiter, king of Crete, celebrated for the laws which he established in his country, which are said to have continued in force above a thousand years. He lived 1432 B.C.—The second of that name was king of Crete about 1300 B.C. He made war against the Athenians and Megareans. The history of these monarchs is greatly involved in fable.

MINOT, Lawrence, an English poet, whose works were discovered by Mr. Tyrwhit, in the Cottonian library, and presented by him to the public, 1795. He died about 1352.

MINOT, George Richards, an American lawyer and historian, was born in Boston, Massachusetts, 25th December, 1758, and graduated at Harvard college in 1773. In 1781 he was appointed clerk of the house of representatives, and a few years after published a history of the insurrection in that state, with the particulars of which his office made him accurately acquainted. He was appointed secretary of the convention which assembled, in 1787, to consider the constitution of the United States. In 1792 he received the office of judge of probate, and afterwards of the municipal court of Boston. He was distinguished for amiableness and integrity, and had enriched his mind with useful and ornamental knowledge. He wrote a valuable continuation of Hutchinson's history of Massachusetts, from 1748 to 1765, the last volume of which has been published since his death, and which, as well as his narrative of the insurrection, does much credit to his talents. He died on the second of January, 1802.  L.

MINTO, Walter, LL.D. professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in the college of New-Jersey, was a native of Scotland, and born in 1753. He was educated at Edinburgh, and afterwards travelled as a preceptor into Italy, where he devoted himself with great zeal to the study of mathematics and philosophy. After his return to Edinburgh, in 1782, he wrote, by the persuasion of the earl of Buchan, a volume to prove that the honour of the first discovery of logarithms belonged to Napier. At the instance of the same nobleman he came to America, in 1786, and was soon appointed to the professorship of mathematics and philosophy in the college at Princeton, where he continued much respected till his death in 1796.  L.

MINUTIUS FELIX, a Roman orator in the third century. His Octavius, with Christian and Pagan Disputations, is a work of merit, and in favour of Christianity; edited, Cambridge, 1707, and Leyden, 1709, 8vo.

MIRABAUD, John Baptist, perpetual secretary to the French academy, was born in Provence, 1674, and lived to the age of 86. He published a translation of Tasso's Jerusalem—and also of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso—Alphabet de la Fée Gracieuse, 12mo. 1734. The System of Nature, an atheistical book, published in 1770, was falsely ascribed to him, and has been translated into English.

MIRABEAU, Victor Riquetti, marquis de, of an ancient family of Provence, originally from Naples, was one of the chief institutors of the political assembly called economists. He published, in 1755, l'Ami des Hommes, 3 vols. 12mo. a work of some merit, containing, with much crude and extraneous matter, fine ideas on rural and political economy, and judicious remarks on the interests of society. His Theorie de l'Impôt, in 12mo. proved so offensive to the government, on account of the freedom and boldness of his opinions, that he was confined in the bastille. He wrote, besides,

Hommes Celebres, published by his friend Boscovich, at Bassano, in 2 vols. 8vo. His works, collected together, except the last mentioned, have been published in 8 vols. 12mo. He died at Paris, 1790.

MIRABEAU, Honoré Gabriel Riquetti, count de, son of the preceding, and deputy of Provence to the states general, was born 1749. After serving for some time in the army, during the war of Corsica, he married a rich heiress of Aix; but a fondness for dissipation soon squandered away the property which he had lately acquired, and he left his country, overwhelmed in debts, and in poverty. After being confined for some time in the prisons of If, and of Joux, he had an amour with the wife of Monnier, the president of the parliament of Besançon, and carried away the frail one to Holland. For this crime he was condemned to lose his head, and consequently was doomed to spend the rest of life in a foreign country. He was, however, seized in 1777, and confined in the castle of Vincennes, and three years after, by the power of interest, restored to liberty. Undismayed by reflections on his flagitious conduct, he appeared at Aix, before the Parliament, to demand his wife, who indignantly refused to live with him, and he personally pleaded his own cause, which proved deservedly unsuccessful. The French revolution now arose to give employment to the talents of this depraved and ambitious man; and when rejected by the nobility of Provence, he, in contempt of their order, opened a shop, over which he inscribed, Mirabeau, marchand de draps. This probably recommended him to the populace of Aix, whose deputy he was elected to the third estate, and consequently called, by the court, with contempt, the plebeian count. In the assembly, by his abilities, his eloquence, and his intrigues, he became a leading member; but though he aimed at popularity, he yet wished for power, and secretly planned the destruction of the monarchy, and the regeneration of the state under a new order of things. His ambition displayed itself in spite of his hypocrisy, and when the unfortunate Lewis appeared in the assembly, all covered with diamonds, the aspiring deputy could not help exclaiming to one of his accomplices, behold the victim. Thus, by his intrigues, and by the vast resources of his mind, he was capable of being apparently the friend and the leader of all parties; and while he created, as one of his biographers has observed, volcanoes, for the pleasure of extinguishing their flames, he flattered himself, secretly, with the hope of being one day, like another Cromwell, the protector of France. While the favourite of the multitude, he did not hesitate to accuse the Jacobins, and to denounce vengeance against the factious; but his threats were the signal of his death. He was attacked by a sudden disease, which in a few hours proved fatal, 2d April, 1791, and though the physicians, who opened his body, attributed his death to the violence of a fever, the public believed that he had been cut off by poison. His funeral was conducted with all the pomp of republican pride, and his remains were deposited near those of Des Cartes; but as he had observed that near the capitol was the Tarpeian rock, this same fickle populace dispersed, the following year, his ashes in the air, with every mark of ignominy. Mirabeau wrote, a Comparison between the great Condé and Scipio Africanus—History of Prussia under Frederic the Great, 8 vols. 4to.—Collection of his Labours in the National Assembly, 5 vols. 8vo.—Original Letters, containing an Account of his Life and Amours, 4 vols. 8vo.—Secret History of the Court of Berlin, 2 vols. 8vo. a work burnt by the hands of the hangman—a treatise on Lettres de Cachet, 8vo.—Political Pamphlets, besides some indecent books, &c.

MIRABEAU, Boniface Riquetti, viscount de, brother to the preceding, served with distinction in America, and, at the time of the French revolution, was elected deputy of the nobility of Liousin to the states general. He ably opposed the union of the three chambers, and when the king, in an evil hour, sanctioned it, he, in quitting the room, broke his sword, and declared that the monarchy was at an end. The innovations introduced by the demagogues were resisted by him with equal boldness, and when he found that attachment to the throne became a crime, he emigrated, and raised a regiment, which served with credit under the prince of Condé. He died at the end of 1792, at Friburg, in the Brisgaw. He was author of some songs and other temporary satires, at the beginning of the revolution. He was much addicted to drinking, and was, it is said, a man of little courage. When he paid a visit to his brother, who had been wounded in a duel, he was received with great politeness, and thanked earnestly for his attention, because, observed, with keen satire, the wounded man, I am afraid I shall never have the opportunity of returning your visit.

MIRABELLA, Vincent, an Italian, author of the Ancient History of Syracuse, 1713, folio, Naples, a scarce book. He died 1674.

MIREUS, Aubertus, a learned German, born at Brussels, 1573. He was almoner and librarian to Albert, archduke of Austria, and died, 1640, at Antwerp. He wrote, Opera Historica et Diplomatica, 2 vols. folio—Elogia Illustrium Belgii Scriptorum, 4to.—Vita Justi Lipsii, 8vo.—Ori-gines Benedictinae—Origines Carthusianorum, 8vo.—Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica, 2 vols. folio—Rerum Belgicarum Chronicon—de Rebus Bohemicis.

MIRANDULA, John Picus, earl of, a celebrated Italian nobleman, born 24th Feb. 1463. He lost his father early, but he found in his mother a most attentive guardian, and the care which she took of his education was repaid by the most astonishing improvement. To strong natural powers, Mirandula united unceasing application, and he possessed, besides, a memory so retentive, that nothing which he heard or read was ever forgotten. After studying the law at Bologna, he visited the most celebrated universities of France, and by conversation, and by study, still enlarged the resources of his capacious mind. At his return to Rome, though only 23, he published 900 propositions in logic, mathematics, divinity, physics, &c. drawn not only from classical, but Jewish and Arabian authors, and challenged, through the universities of Italy, any philosopher or divine to enter the lists with him in disputation. This public exhibition of learning was anticipated not only with astonishment but envy, and enemies soon arose, who persuaded pope Innocent VII. that 13 of the propositions were heretical; and the disappointed Mirandula, though he explained in a submissive "Apology," was forbidden to read or dispute upon these theses. In 1491 Mirandula bid adieu to profane literature, to devote himself more attentively to divinity. He declared war against astrologers, because, it is said, they had foretold his death at the end of his 33d year. The prophecy was too true; this amiable scholar died at Florence, 17th Nov. 1494, in his 32d year. He was buried in the cemetery of St. Mark, in the habit of a Jacobin, an order to which he wished, on his death-bed, to belong, and these lines were engraved on his tomb:

Joannes jacet hic Mirandula, cætera narrant Et Tagus et Ganges, forsant et Antipodes.

Though he died so young, he wrote several works, which were printed together at Bologna, 1496, folio, and latterly at Basil, 1601. They are written in elegant Latin, and have been translated into French and Italian, and they display profound learning, acuteness, and vivacity.

MIRANDULA, John Francis Picus, prince of, son of Galeoti Picus, the eldest brother of John, just mentioned, was born 1469. He succeeded in 1499 to his father, as the head of his principality, but he met with opposition in his family, and by the assistance of the emperor Maximilian I. and of the duke of Ferrara, his two brothers, Lewis and Frederic, obliged him to fly from his country. Thus a fugitive in various countries for nine years, he was at last reinstated in 1511, by the assistance of pope Julius II. but the next year the papal troops were defeated at Ravenna, and Mirandula again sent into banishment. The expulsion of the French from Italy in 1515, restored him again to power, and he continued in peaceful possession of his principality till Oct. 1533, when his nephew Galeotti, the son of Lewis, supported by forty assassins, entered his castle in the night, and murdered him, with his eldest son. Though tossed in the troubles of political life, he was a great lover of learning, and was a more voluminous writer than his uncle; and though he was inferior to him in wit, sprightliness, and information, yet he was his superior in solidity. His works have been generally edited with those of his uncle.

MIREVELT, Michael Jansen, a portrait and historical painter, was born at Delft, and died there 1741, aged 53.

Misson, Francis Maximilian, a lawyer, distinguished for his eloquence in favour of the protestants, before the parliament of Paris. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he came to England, and engaged as travelling tutor to an English nobleman, through Italy, in 1688 and 9. He died at London, 16th Jan 1721. He published, a New Voyage to Italy, 3 vols. 12mo. Hague, a work commended by Addison, and translated into English—the Sacred Theatre of Cevennes, or Account of Prophecies and Miracles performed at Languedoc, 1707, a weak performance—Observations of a Traveller, 12mo. a posthumous work.

Mitchell, Joseph, a poet, born in Scotland about 1684. He came to London, and was patronised by lord Stair, and by Sir Robert Walpole; but the liberality of his friends, and particularly of Aaron Hill, was wasted away in extravagance and licentiousness, and thus by his improper conduct, he remained always involved in distress and difficulties. He died Feb. 6th, 1738. He is described by Cibber as a poet of the third rate, whose versification was in a style of mediocrity, and exhibited few marks of genius. He published the Fatal Extravagance, a tragedy, properly belonging to Aaron Hill—the Higiland Fair, a ballad opera—and poems, 2 vols. 8vo. 1729.

Mitchell, John, M.D. a native of England who came to America in 1741, for the purpose of investigating its botanical treasures, and took up his residence at Urbanna, in Virginia. He was a great botanist, and paid particular attention to the Hybrid productions. He wrote a useful work on the general principles of Botany, containing descriptions of a number of new genera of plants, which was published in quarto in 1769, and also in 1743, an "Essay on the Causes of the different colours of people in different climates," which was sent over to

Mr. Collinson and published in the philosophical transactions, volume 43d. He was an eminent physician as well as botanist. He returned to England about the year 1748, having transmitted not only to his friends in Great Britain, but also to Linnæus, much valuable information concerning American plants. The Swedish botanist took care to perpetuate his name by giving it to a beautiful American plant, the Mitchella Repens. It is believed that he was the author of the map of North America published in 1755. ☞ L.

MITHRIDATES, king of Pontus, was surnamed the Great. He made war against the Romans, which continued for several years, and though defeated by Lucullus, Sylla, and Pompey, he still maintained his armies in the field, and threatened to carry invasion into the heart of Italy. He put an end to his life, when his son Pharnaces rebelled against him, B. C. 64.

MITTARELLI, John Benedict, a native of Venice, general of the order of the Calmudenses, of which he published a history, in 8 vols. folio. He wrote other works, and died 1777, aged 69.

MOAVIA, general of the caliph Omar, avenged his master's death, and seized his kingdom, 643 A.D. After taking Rhodes, and destroying the colossus, he attacked Sicily, and afterwards carried devastation to the gates of Constantinople. He was, however, unsuccessful, and after besieging in vain the capital for seven years, he purchased peace by paying an annual tribute to the eastern emperor. He died 680. During this siege the Greek fire is said to have been invented, and to have been used with peculiar effect against the besiegers.

MOCENIGO, Lewis, a Venetian, like many of his family raised to the dignity of doge 1570. Supported by the pope, and by Spain, he attacked the Turks who had seized Cyprus, and their combined fleet defeated the infidels at the celebrated battle of Lepanto, Oct. 7th, 1571, the doge died 1576. One of his family, Andrew, was an able negotiator, and wrote two historical works, de Belio Turcarum; la Guerra di Cambrai.

MODREVIUS, Andreas Fricius, secretary to Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland, was a learned man, and wrote various works, of which that "de Republicâ Emendandâ," in five books, printed 1554, is highly esteemed as a most able political performance. In his religious opinions he showed himself very inconsistent, and while he inclined to the Lutherans he rendered himself suspected by the catholics, and exposed to the resentment of Pius V. He is regarded by Gratius as a person who wished to reconcile the different schemes of religion.

MOEBIUS, Godfrey, a native of Thuringia, and medical professor at Jena, was author of Physiological Principles of Medicine, 4to. ; Abridgment of the Elements of Medicine, fol. ; Anatomy of Camphire, 4to. in Latin. His son of the same name was also a physician, and published Synopsis Medicinæ Practicæ, fol. 1667. He died at Halle 1664, aged 53.

MOEBIUS, George, a native of Lauchan, in Thuringia, professor of theology at Leipsic, where he died 1697, aged 81. He wrote on the Origin, Propagation, and Continuance of Pagan Oracles, against Vandale, 12mo.

MOINE, Stephen le, a learned protestant, born at Caen 1624. He became professor of divinity at Leyden, and died there 1689. He wrote "Varia Sacra," 2 vols. 4to. and other theological works.

MOINE, Peter, le, a French poet born at Chaumon, in Bassigny 1602. He was a Jesuit, and was the first of that society who acquired reputation as a French poet. His greatest work is "St. Lewis," an epic poem in 18 books. His works are not highly approved by Boileau, and are therefore only above mediocrity. He died at Paris 22d Aug. 1672.

MOINE, Francis le, a French painter, born at Paris 1688. He was the pupil of Galloche, and was professor of the academy of painting. His famous apotheosis of Hercules in the grand saloon of Versailles, in which he was engaged four years, was so much approved by the French king that he made him his painter, with a liberal pension. In a fit of lunacy this unfortunate man stabbed himself with his sword, and died 4th June, 1737, aged 49.

MOINE, Abraham le, a French divine, who left France on account of his religion, and became the minister of a protestant congregation in London, where he died 1760. He translated into French Gibson's Pastoral Letters; Sherlock on the Witnesses of the Resurrection, and on the Use and End of Prophecy, with learned and valuable notes and dissertations.

MOIVRE, DE. Vid. DEMOIVRE.

MOLA, Pietro Francesco, a painter born at Lugano, in Switzerland, 1609. He was the pupil of Arpino, and of Albano at Rome, and he afterwards studied the works of Titian, and acquired a peculiar style of his own which ensured him success and reputation. He died 1665. He chiefly excelled in history, and also in landscape.

MOLA, Giovanni Battista, the brother, according to some, of the preceding, was also an eminent painter. He studied under Vouet at Paris, and afterwards under Albano, and was much admired for his landscapes, and the foliage of trees. He was born about 1620; but the year of his death is not known.

MOLANUS, or VERMEULIN, John, an ecclesiastic, professor of theology at Louvaine. He was born at Lisle, and died 18th September, 1585, aged 52. He published Usnard's Martyrology, with notes and an appendix, 8vo. ; Natales Sanctorum Belgii, 12mo. ; Historia S. S. Imaginum et Picturarum, 8vo. and 1771, 4to. with a Supplement by Paquot; de Canoniciis, a work of merit; de Fide Hereticis servandâ; de Piis Testamentis; Theologia Practicæ Compendium; Militia Sacra Ducum Brabant.; Rerum Lovaneng. &c.

MOLANUS, Gerard Walter, a Lutheran divine, abbot of Lockum. He was the correspondent of Bossuet, with respect to an union between the catholics and protestants. He wrote some theological works, and died 1722.

MOLAY, James de, the last grand master of the Templars. The riches, as well as the pride of his order, excited the suspicion and the jealousy of Philip the Fair, who, with the consent of the pope, seized their property, and summoned the master to appear at Paris, to answer for his conduct. Molay came, attended by sixty knights, but they were no sooner in the power of their persecutors, than they were seized, and all burnt alive, falsely accused as being guilty of atrocious crimes. Molay suffered 11th May, 1314, and before the fatal torch was lighted, declared his innocence, and the innocence of his order.

MOLESWORTH, Robert, viscount, an able statesman, descended from an ancient family in Northamptonshire, was born December 1656, in Dublin, where his father who died before his birth had settled as a merchant. He was educated at Dublin, and displayed so much zeal and patriotism at the revolution, that James's parliament sequestered his property. The victorious William, however, rewarded his fidelity, made him one of his privy counsellors, and sent him as his ambassador to Denmark. After a residence of three years Molesworth offended the Danish court by not sufficiently respecting the customs and the privileges of the country, and left the place abruptly, and on his return to England published "an Account of Denmark." The book, though well received and translated into several languages, offended prince George of Denmark, by representing the Danish government as tyrannical, and a memorial of complaint was presented to king William, and an answer prepared to it by Dr. King. But Molesworth disregarded these measures, safe in the public approbation and the friendship of Shaftesbury. He was member of the Commons in several parliaments, but rendered himself obnoxious to the clergy, by an affectation of popularity, and by profane insinuations that religion is a pious craft, a useful state engine, but far inferior to the principles which in the school of Athens and Rome, incited their attentive youth to the love of their country, and to the practice of the moral virtues. As he strongly supported the Hanoverian succession, notwithstanding the eccentricity of his principles, he could not but be acceptable, for his abilities and influence, to George I. by whom he was made a privy councillor, and created a peer of Ireland 1716. He died 22d May, 1725, at his seat near Dublin, leaving by his wife seven sons and four daughters. He published besides, an address to the House of Commons, and translated Hottoman's "Franco-Gallia."

MOLEVILLE, Bertrand de, a French statesman, was born in 1744. He was minister of the Marine in the reign of Louis XVI.; and when the Revolution broke out he sought an asylum in England; where he published Memoirs of the Revolution, and several other works on that subject. He died at Paris, Oct. 19th, 1819.—W. B.

MOLIERE, John Baptist Pocquelin de, a celebrated French comic writer, born at Paris, 1620. His real name was Pocquelin, and his father who was a tapestry maker to the court, intended him for his own business. The boy, however, being frequently taken by his grandfather to the theatre, acquired such a taste for dramatic representations that his contempt for tapestry making prevailed, and he was sent to study under the Jesuits at the college of Clermont. In five years he here completed his education, and further improved his mind by attending with his friends Chapelle and Bernier, the lectures of Gassendi the celebrated philosopher. He afterwards applied himself to the law, but after his father's death, he renounced all other employments for the stage, and uniting himself with one of those small theatrical parties which were now patronised by Richelieu, he assumed the name of Moliere, which he has rendered so illustrious. He joined La Bejart, an actress of some merit, and with her went to Lyons, in 1653, where he produced his first play called P'Etourdi, or the Blunderer, which was received with universal applause. He performed afterwards at Languedoc, was at Grenoble in 1657, and the next year went to settle at Rouen. Some visits to Paris recommended him to the great, he was noticed by the duke of Conti, by the king's brothers, and at last patronised by the monarch himself. He exhibited before the king, and with such success that he received a pension, and continued from that time to entertain the court, by a rapid production of new plays. The last comedy which he produced was le Malade Imaginaire, or the Hypochondriac, and on the fourth night of its being acted, 17th Feb. 1673, the author died. It has been said that he exerted himself much in the chief character, and that as in a part of the play the actor pretends to be dead, Moliere was discovered to be not only a theatrical, but a real corpse. This incident has given occasion to the following beautiful lines:

*Roscius hic situs est, triste Moliereus in urnâ, Cui genus humanum ludere, ludus erat.
Dum ludit mortem, mors indignata jacentem
Corripit, et nimium fingere sæva negat.*

It is, however, certain that during the representation the author had a severe defluxion on his lungs, and that after the conclusion of the piece, he went to bed and expired half an hour after, by the bursting of a vessel in the lungs through excessive coughing. The death of their favourite actor deeply affected the Parisians, and Lewis XIV. interested himself much in the honours to be paid to his memory. Though the archbishop would not permit his body to be deposited in consecrated ground, the severe sentence was reversed by the king's command, and the lamented poet was buried in St. Joseph's chapel. Moliere by his "Tartuffe" had drawn upon himself the indignation of the clergy, and that of the other orders, by the severity with which he lashed their follies and extravagant conduct. He was, says Voltaire, the best comic poet that ever lived in any nation, and it must be confessed that he retrieved comedy out of chaos, as Corneille had tragedy. He married the daughter of his fellow-comedian, La Bejart, who was suspected of being his own child, and with her he led a very unhappy life, ever haunted by jealousy, and too sensible of the fair one's frailties. To his own experience some attribute the great success with which he paints the broils of domestic life, and the varying passions which agitate the jealous breast. Moliere's widow married afterwards a comedian named Guerin, and died 1728, aged 92. The plays of Moliere have frequently been printed, the best edition is that of Paris, 1772, in 6 vols. 8vo. They have appeared also in an English dress, and several of them have been introduced on our stage.

MOLIERES, Joseph Privat de, a French philosopher of noble birth. He was born at Tarascon, and was educated at the oratory, after which he went to Paris. As the friend of Malbranche, and a man of great abilities, he was admitted into the academy of sciences, and in 1723, made philosophical professor of the Royal college. He wrote Mathematical Lessons to understand Philosophy, 12mo.—Lessons of Philosophy, or Elements of Physics, &c. to explain and improve the systems of Des Cartes and Newton, 3 vols. 8vo.—Elements of Geometry, 12mo. He died 1742, aged 65.

MOLINA, Lewis, a native of Cuenza, New Castile, of noble birth. He studied at Coimbra, and was admitted among the Jesuits, and for twenty years was professor of divinity at Eboræ. He died at Madrid, 1600, aged 65. He wrote besides Commentaries on the Summa of Aquinas—a treatise de Justitia & Jure—de Concordia Gratia & Liberi Arbitrii, 4to. a work in which the author is accused by the Dominicans of reviving Pelagianism. A Spanish author of that name, wrote a valuable work on the hereditary property of the Spanish nobles.

MOLINÆUS, Carolus, or Charles du MOULIN, a French lawyer, born at Paris, 1500. An impediment in his speech prevented his displaying his abilities at the bar; but he wrote on jurisprudence with such success that he was called the Papinian of France. In 1552, in consequence of the persecution of the protestants he removed to Basil and other places, and on his return to Paris was confined in the Conciergerie for some severe reflections on the council of Trent, but was restored to liberty by the intercession of the queen of Navarre. In his old age he conformed to the Roman catholic tenets, and died 1566. His works were published 1681, in 5 vols. folio. It is said that he was allied to Elizabeth queen of England.

MOLINÆUS, or du MOULIN, Peter, a protestant minister, of the same family as the preceding, born at Bechny in the Vexin, 1568. He studied at Sedan, and afterwards at Christ college, Cambridge, and obtained the professorship of philosophy at Leyden, where he had among his pupils the celebrated Grotius. In 1599 he became minister of Charenton, and chaplain to Catherine of Bourbon, the sister of Henry IV. whom he preserved in the protestant faith, against all the machinations of the catholics. In 1615 he was invited to England by James I. who greatly honoured him, and gave him a prebend of Canterbury. He was afterwards deputed by the Gallican church to the synod of Dort, where the affairs of the reformed churches were to be discussed, but was prevented by intrigues and menaces. He was offered in 1618, the divinity chair of Leyden, but declined it, though he afterwards settled at Sedan, as theological professor, and minister of the church. He died there 10th March 1658, aged 90. He wrote among other things, a treatise on the Keys of the Church; the History of the Monks; a Defence of the Reformed Churches; the Anatomy of Arminianism, folio; Novitas Papisini.

MOLINET, John, librarian to Margaret of Austria, and canon of Valenciennes, died 1607. He wrote several things, the best known of which are, les Dits et Faits de Molinet, 8vo.; a Paraphrase of the Romance of the Rose. His poems were reprinted, Paris, 1723.

MOLINET, Claude du, canon of St. Genevieve, was born at Chalons 1620, and died 1687. He published the Epistles of Stephen, bishop of Tournay; a Latin History of the popes from Medals, folio; Reflections on the Origin and Antiquity of the Canons; on the Mitre of the Ancients; the cabinet of St. Genevieve, &c.

MOLINETTI, Anthony, a native of Venice, who practised medicine at Padua with great reputation. He wrote a Latin treatise on the Organs of Sense, Padua, 1669, 4to. &c. and died at Venice 1675.

MOLNIER, John Baptist, a native of Arles, distinguished as a preacher at Toulouse, Aix, Lyons, Orleans, and Paris. He was author of some valuable sermons, 14 vols. 12mo.; Penitential Prayers, &c. He died at Paris, 15th March 1745, aged 70.

MOLLINOS, Michael, a Spanish ecclesiastic, born at Saragossa 1627. He was the cause of great controversies in the church by his "Spiritu Alguide," first published in Spanish, and afterwards in other languages. He inculcated in this famous work that man must annihilate himself in order to be united to the deity; and this passive doctrine, called quietism, had many abettors, and among them Fenelon, and Madame Guyon. The author of it, however, fell into the hands of the inquisition, and was forced to abjure his errors, and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in which he died, 1696.

MOLL, Herman, an English geographer, who died 1732. His maps were once in high esteem.

MOLLER, Henry, a protestant Hebrew professor at Wittemberg, and author of Commentaries on the Psalms, and Isaiah, some Latin poems, &c. He was born at Hamburg and died there 1589, aged 59.

MOLLER, Daniel William, a celebrated traveller, professor of metaphysics and history, and librarian in Altorf university, was born at Presburg, and died at Altorf, 1712, aged 70. He wrote Opuscula Ethica, &c. 12mo.; Opuscula Medico-historico-philologica, 12mo.; Men-a Poetica; Indicius Philologorum ex Germania oriundorum, 4to.; Meditatio de Insectis ex Aere delapsis, 12mo. &c.

MOLLER, John, an able writer, born at Fleinsbourg in Sleswick dutchy, died 1725, aged 64. His son has published his life at Sleswick, 1734. He wrote a Latin History of the Dutchies of Holstein and Sleswick, 8vo.; Ciubria Literata, 3 vols. fol.; de Cornutis & Hermaphroditis, 4to.; Isagoge ad Historiam Chersonesi Cimbricae, &c.

MOLLOY, Charles, an English dramatic writer, born at Dublin, and educated at the college there, of which he became fellow. He entered at the Middle Temple, London, and was engaged as the conductor of the periodical paper "Fog's Journal," and afterwards of "Common Sense." He married a lady of fortune, and died 16th July, 1767. He wrote the Perplexed Couple—the Coquet—Half-pay officer, three comedies.

MOLo, a rhetorician celebrated for his learning, and for the number of his pupils, among whom was Cicero. He chiefly resided at Rhodes.

MOLSA, Francis Maria, an Italian poet, born at Modena. He possessed very great talents, but unfortunately his manners and conduct were licentious, and stopped the way of his preferment. He died of a foul disease contracted by his intemperate pleasures, 1544. His poems, both Latin and Italian, possess merit, and are to be found the first in the Deliciae Poetarum Itolorum, and the latter in 2 vols. 8vo. 1750.

MOLSA, Tarquina, granddaughter of the preceding, was deservedly celebrated for her learning, her wit, her beauty, and her virtues. She was highly esteemed at the court of Alphonsus, duke of Ferrara, and honoured with the appellation of singular, by the Roman senators, who bestowed on her and her family the rights of a citizen, Dec. 8th, 1600. Besides some elegant translations from Greek and Latin authors, she wrote some original pieces, and was equally admired for her superior knowledge of music. She was married, but had no children, and losing her husband, she refused, though young, again to marry.

MOLYNEUX, William, an eminent mathematician, born 17th April, 1656, at Dublin, and educated at Trinity college there. He came to London, 1675, and entered at the Middle Temple, and after three years' residence there, he returned to Ireland. The bent of his genius led him to mathematics and Astronomy. He was the correspondent of Flamstead, and other learned men; and to his exertions Ireland was indebted for the establishment of her philosophical society, of which he became the first secretary, and sir William Petty the president, 1683. In 1685, he was elected fellow of the Royal Society of London, and then travelled to Flanders to improve himself in the knowledge of engineering, as he was surveyor of the works, and chief engineer of Ireland. In 1689 he fled from the political and religious disturbances which agitated Ireland, and settled at Chester, where he devoted himself to literature and science. He returned to Dublin in 1692, and was chosen member for the city; and in 1695, for the university. In 1698 he came to England to pay a visit to the great John Locke; but on his return to Ireland he was attacked by a severe fit of the stone, and during his agony broke a blood-vessel, of which he died 11th Oct. 1698. He wrote besides some papers in the philosophical transactions, a treatise on Dioptries, published at Chester, 1692; Sciothericum Telescopium, or a description of the telescope dial he had invented; the Case of Ireland stated as being not bound by acts of parliament in England, &c. Some of his letters to Locke were also published.

MOLYNEUX, Samuel, the only son of the above by Lucy, daughter of sir William Domville, was born at Chester, July, 1689, and lost his mother a few days after. His education was conducted after his father's death by his uncle Dr. Molyneux the physician, and he afterwards became secretary to George II. when prince of Wales. He devoted much of his time to the sciences and to astronomy, and brought to greater perfection the method of making telescopes, one of which he presented to John V. king of Portugal. When appointed one of the commissioners of the admiralty, public affairs superseded private studies, and he gave his papers to Dr. Smith, astronomy professor at Cambridge, by whom they were published in his "Complete Treatise of Optics."

MOLYNEUX, sir William, a gallant soldier in the service of Henry VIII. at the battle of Flodden-field. On his death-bed he gave this advice to his son "let the underwood grow, the tenants are the support of a family, and the commonality are the strength of a kingdom. Improve this fairly, but force not violently either your bounds or rents above your forefathers."

MOMBRIUS, Monimus, a writer of Milan, author of some verses, and of a scarce, but curious work called the Lives of the Saints, printed 1479.

MONALDESCHI, Lewis, a native of Ovi-etta, who settled at Rome, where he died 1380, aged 54. He wrote Roman Annals from 1228 to 1340, in Italian.

MONALDESCHI, John, the equerry of Christina queen of Sweden, was cruelly put to death at Fontainebleau, 10th Oct. 1657, for writing an account of the intrigues and licentiousness of his mistress. The step was rash and vindictive, and Christina was justly blamed, and felt the displeasure of government for such violence in a country where she was but a guest.

MONAMY, Peter, a painter of sea pieces, born at Jersey. He learnt first of a sign painter on London bridge. He died at Westminster 1749. One of his pieces, finished 1726, is preserved in Painter's hall.

MONANTHEUIL, Henry de, professor of mathematics, and dean of physic in the university of Paris, 1577, translated Aristotle's Mechanics, with a Commentary.

MONARDES, Nicholas, a physician of Seville, whose works were greatly esteemed, especially his Treatise on the Virtues of the American Drugs, which have been translated into English, Latin, and Italian. He died 1578.

MONBRON, N. Fougere de, a native of Peronne, known for his virulence as an author. He travestied the Henriade of Voltaire, and wrote besides, the Cosinopolite—Preservation against Anglomania—and some indelicate romances. He died little respected, 1760.

MONCEAUX, Francis de, ambassador from Alexander Farnese, to Henry IV. was born at Arras. He is author of Bucolica Sacra, 8vo. 1589; Aaron Purgatus, sive de Aureo Vitulo, 8vo.; Templum Justitiæ, a poem; Lucubrationes in Cantica Cantic.; and the History of the Divine Apparitions to Moses.

MONCKTON, Robert, governor of New-York, was appointed in 1761, and took on him the administration in June, 1762. He had previously been lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia, appointed in 1755, and had the same year the command of the expedition against the French settlements and forts south of the St. Lawrence. In 1758 he was appointed colonel of the royal American regiment, and was a brigadier general in the expedition against Quebec, under general Wolfe. In 1762 he was engaged in the successful expedition against the French West India Islands, and commanded the land forces on that occasion. He remained governor of New-York but one year, and was succeeded by Sir Henry Moore. In 1765 he was appointed governor of Herbert castle. He died governor of Portsmouth, May 23d, 1782. He was the son of John, lord viscount Monckton, of Ireland, by a daughter of the duke of Newcastle. ¶ L.

MONCONYS, Balthasar de, a native of Lyons, who travelled into the East, and published in 3 vols. 4to. an account of his adventures. He died at Lyons, 1665.

MONCRIF, Francis Augustin Paradis de, member of the French academy, was born at Paris, and died 1770, aged 83. He wrote an Essay on the Means of Pleasing; the Friendly Rivals, a Romance; the Abderites, a comedy, besides poems and smaller pieces, collected, 4 vols. 12mo.

MONDONVILLE, John Joseph Cassanca de, a musician of eminence, born at Narbonne. Besides sonatas, symphonies, operas, he composed Magnus Dominus, the Jubilate, Domini Regnavit, and other religious pieces, and died at Belleville, near Paris, 1772, aged 57. He was an excellent and judicious player on the violin.

MONGAULT, Nicolas Hubert, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris 1674. He studied under the fathers of the oratory, and at Mans, and boldly opposed the philosophy of Aristotle by that of Des Cartes. In 1710, he was appointed by Orleans, regent of the kingdom, to be preceptor to his son, the duke de Chartres, and in consequence of his faithful services he received the abbey of Chartreuve, 1714, and that of Ville-neuve, 1719. He published a valuable edition of Cicero's Letters to Atticus, 6 vols. 12mo. and translated Herodian, and wrote two learned dissertations in the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions. He was member of this society, and also of the French Academy, and died 15th Aug. 1746, aged 72.

MONIX, John Edward du, a native of Gy, in Burgundy, author of some elegant poems, in French and Latin, flourished under Henry III. of France. He was assassinated 1586, aged 29.

MONIS, Judah, a Jew of Italy, who came to America, and was appointed, in 1720, the first teacher of Hebrew in Harvard college. Two years after he embraced Christianity, and was baptized. After sustaining his office nearly forty years, he resigned, in 1761, and died three years after, in his eighty-second year. He published in 1735, a Hebrew Grammar. ¶ L.

MONK, George, duke of Albemarle, celebrated for restoring Charles II. to his throne, was born of an ancient family at Potteridge, Devonshire, 6th Dec. 1605. As he was a younger son, he devoted himself to the profession of arms, and accompanied as a volunteer, sir Richard Grenville in his Spanish expedition, and the following year, 1626, he was made ensign in the expedition against the isle of Rhé. After some campaigns in Flanders, and great experience, he returned to England at the breaking out of the civil wars, and he obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the king's expedition against the Scotch. In the Irish rebellion his services were so meritorious, that he was made governor of Dublin by the lords justices; but afterwards giving offence for making peace with the rebels, he fell under temporary disgrace, and then was appointed major-general, and intrusted with a command at the siege of Nantwich. Here he was surprised by Fairfax, and sent a prisoner to Hull; but in 1646, he subscribed to the covenant, and was employed by the republicans in the Irish station. Though thus a friend to the parliament, it is to be observed that the king's power was now abolished, and that in serving his former enemies he had no other source of promotion or maintenance. He had, in 1648, the chief command of the army in the North of Ireland; but his treaty with the Irish rebel O'Neal, gave great offence to the parliament, yet Cromwell, who knew his abilities, reconciled him to his situation, and left him at the head of the army in Scotland, after the second Charles's invasion. In 1653, he was united with Blake and Dean in the command of the sea forces, and by courage and good conduct he obtained a victory over the Dutch fleet. Though suspected by Cromwell, he was invested still with the chief command of the North, and for five year recommended himself to the love of his army and the affection of the people by his affability, and conciliating manners. His popularity indeed gave uneasiness to the jealous protector, who is said in one of his letters to him to have added this postscript, "there be that tell me that there is a certain cunning fellow in Scotland, called George Monk, who is said to lie in wait there to introduce Charles Stuart; I pray you use your diligence to apprehend him, and send him up to me." Monk, however, knew how to dissemble, and when Charles wrote to him, he sent the letter to the protector, and evinced his devotion to his service by promoting addresses from the army to him. After Cromwell's death he congratulated his successor; but when Richard dropped the reins from his hand, Monk conducted himself with deep and artful caution, and while he listened to some who wished him to seize upon the government, he seemed to pay little attention to those who recommended the establishment of a republic, or to those who sighed for the restoration of royalty. Apparently undecided he marched towards London, and being secure of the affection of his soldiers, and sensible of the general wishes of the nation, he called a free parliament, and ensured the restoration of the exiled monarch, with whom he had long secretly corresponded. Replaced on the throne of his ancestors without bloodshed, Charles showed his gratitude to the illustrious character who had so prudently effected it. Monk was loaded with pensions and honours; he became knight of the garter, privy counsellor, master of the horse, first lord of the treasury, and was created baron Monk, earl of Torrington, and duke of Albemarle, with a grant of 7000*l.* to him and his posterity. His elevation gave pleasure to the whole nation, and the commons in full body attended the new peer to the house of lords, where his modesty and unaffected behaviour were the admiration of all. Deservedly popular, Monk was consulted and employed in every affair of importance. He was placed at the head of the admiralty, and afterwards with prince Rupert contributed much to the defeat of the Dutch fleet. During the plague, the king, who retired to Oxford, intrusted him with the care of London, and when the city was burnt in his absence in 1666, the people, fond of their favourite hero, exclaimed, that if he had been there, the dreadful calamity would have been avoided. This great man was attacked by a dropsy which proved fatal, 3d Jan. 1669-70, in his 62d year, and his remains were honoured by the most magnificent pomp, and after lying in state at Somerset house, were deposited in the royal vault of the chapel of Henry VII. in Westminster. Monk, who displayed so much moderation, and refused to step to a throne, which was within his reach, was fully entitled to all the honours paid to him. In his private character he was amiable, and he possessed also some learning, as is proved by his book, "Observations on Military and Political Affairs," &c. published after his death, in fol. 1671, and a collection of letters which appeared in 1715. He married the daughter of a blacksmith who had been a milliner and his mistress, but who ensured his affection and his gratitude by her attendance upon him when confined by the parliament in the tower. She was a woman of great intrigue, and of so violent a temper that the general, who never dreaded a cannon shot, trembled at the sound of her voice. He had by her a son, Christopher, duke of Albemarle, who died governor of Jamaica, 1668, when the family became extinct.

MONK, Nicholas, brother to the great Monk, was educated at Wadham college, and made rector of Kilkhampton, Cornwall. As he assisted his brother in the restoration of the king, his services were rewarded by Charles with the provostship of Eton, and the bishopric of Hereford. He died 1661.

MONK, the Hon. Mrs. daughter of lord Molesworth, and wife of George Monk, was well acquainted with the Latin, Spanish, and Italian languages, and wrote poetry with elegance and spirit. She died about 1715, and her poems, under the title of "Miranda, Poems and Translations on several occasions," 8vo. appeared 1716, dedicated by her father to queen Caroline.

MONMOUTH, James, duke of, natural son of Charles II. was born at Rotterdam, 1649, and educated among the Roman catholics. On his restoration Charles showed him various marks of kindness, and created him earl of Orkney, knight of the garter, and afterwards duke of Monmouth. He had the care of an expedition in Scotland, and afterwards served in an English regiment in France, and obtained the rank of general. In 1679, he defeated some of the Scotch rebels; but afterwards forgetting his duty, he entered into a conspiracy to dethrone his father. This ingratitude was forgiven by Charles, but Monmouth still intent on schemes of ambition, retired into Holland, and as soon as he heard that James II. had ascended the throne, he determined to invade the kingdom, and he landed in Dorsetshire. He had the rashness with few followers to attack the king's forces, and he was defeated at Sedgmoor, in Somersetshire, and taken afterwards in disguise in a field, with some peas in his pocket for his sustenance. He made the most humiliating petitions to James; but his death was determined upon, and he came out of the tower to ascend the scaffold. He was beheaded 25th July, 1685, and in his last moments showed resignation and fortitude.

MONNIER, Peter le, professor of philosophy in the Harcourt college, at Paris, was author of Cursus Philosophicus, 6 vols. 12mo. and died at Paris, 1757, aged 82. His son Charles was also a man of science. He was professor of philosophy in the royal college, member of the academy of sciences, and was one of those sent by the government in 1736, to measure a degree of the meridian near the pole. He died 1799.

MONNOYE, Bernard de la, a learned Frenchman, born at Dijon, 15th June, 1641. He obtained in 1671 the first prize of poetry offered by the French academy, on the suppression of duelling, and again gained the same honours in 1675, and in 1677. Besides his poetry in French, and also in Greek, Latin, and Italian, in all of which he evinced the greatest elegance, united with sweetness and simplicity, he wrote various other prose compositions. His Remarks on the Menagiana; his Dissertation on the Book de Tribus Impostoribus; his Dissertation on Pomponius Lætus, are well known, and to his extensive information and assiduity, Bayle was indebted for several curious particulars in his dictionary. He left in MS. some dissertations, epigrams, a collection of letters, and other things. His poems were edited at the Hague by Salligne, with an eulogium. He died at Paris, 15th Oct. 1728, aged 87.

MONNOTER, John Baptist, a painter, born at Lisle, and educated at Antwerp. He was admitted into the academy at Paris with great applause, and afterwards came to England, where he was much flattered and approved. Several of his pieces are preserved in the collections of lord Carlisle, the duke of St. Albans, and others. He died in Pall-Mall, 1669.

MONRO, Alexander, an eminent physician, born in Scotland, 1697. He studied at Paris and Leyden, and was the intimate friend of Boerhaave. In 1719 he returned to Edinburgh, and began those lectures on anatomy and on surgical subjects, which have rendered his fame so celebrated as a man of science, and a skilful inquirer after truth. He died 1767. His works are Osteology; Anatomy of the Nerves; Medical Essays and Observations; Success of Inoculation in Scotland, most of which have been republished in one vol. 4to. 1781, by his son, who was also successor in the professorial chair.

MONRO, John, an able physician, of Scotch extraction. He was born 16th Nov. 1715, at Greenwich, in Kent, and educated at Merchant-tailors' and St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was, by the interest which his father possessed with sir Robert Walpole, elected in 1743, to one of Dr. Radcliffe's travelling fellowships, and in consequence of the appointment went abroad, and studied under the famous Boerhaave at Leyden. After visiting France, Germany, and Holland, he returned to England, and in 1751, was elected joint physician with his father, to Bridewell and Bethlem hospitals. In this office he devoted the whole of his attention to cases of insanity, and in 1758, he published Remarks on Dr. Battie's Treatise on Madness, in which, in bold and elegant language he retorted the censures thrown on his predecessors by his adversary, and at the same time paid an honourable and well-merited compliment to the memory of his father. He had by his wife six children. The death of his eldest son, and soon after of his daughter Charlotte, had a powerful influence on his spirits, and brought on a paralytic stroke in Jan. 1783, in consequence of which he gradually withdrew himself from the labours of public business, and retired to the village of Hadley, near Barnet, where he died 27th Dec. 1791, aged 77. Though he published only the work already mentioned, he possessed very extensive information, and great abilities, and from his knowledge of the early history of engraving, Mr. Strutt derived much assistance in his history of engravers.

MONRO, Alexander, D.D. a learned divine, born in Rosshire, 1648, and educated at King's college, Aberdeen, where he became professor of philosophy. In 1686 he was made principal of the university of Edinburgh, but unwilling to comply with the revolution, he was expelled, and became an episcopal preacher. He wrote an Inquiry into the New Opinions, in which he attacked the Presbyterians with such severity that he was obliged to fly from their resentment. He returned afterwards to Edinburgh, where he died 1713, aged 65.

MONSEY, Messenger, an eminent physician of extensive practice, and in his character very singular and eccentric. He was for many years physician at Chelsea hospital, and died 1788, aged 96, ordering, as he disapproved of interment in churches, that his body should be anatomized, and the skeleton hung up in Chelsea hospital, for the benefit of the students.

MONSIGNORI, Francis, a native of Verona, eminent as a portrait and historical painter. He was the disciple of Andrew Mantagna, and died 1519, aged 64.

MONSON, Sir William, a brave admiral, born at South Carlton, Lincolnshire, 1569. He was for two years at Baliol college, Oxford; but the love of adventure, and the participation of danger were more congenial nial to his feelings, and therefore unknown to his friends he enlisted for a common soldier. He was afterwards in the sea service, and engaged in the expedition of the duke of Cumberland against the Azores, and at the taking of Fayal. His bravery and undaunted spirit in the various expeditions in which he was employed strongly recommended him to the notice and favour of queen Elizabeth, by whom he was knighted. Under James I. he was appointed admiral of the narrow seas, and distinguished himself against the Dutch and the French. His services, however, were disregarded, and through the jealousy of the courtiers he was in 1616 imprisoned in the tower, but soon after discharged. He was consulted afterwards by the ministry on naval subjects, and he opposed as impracticable and improper the expeditions against Algiers, 1617, and against Cadiz, 1625, and Rhé, in 1628. In 1635 he was successfully employed against the French and the Dutch, and then retired to privacy. He died at his seat, Kinnersley, in Surrey, February, 1642-3, aged 73. He published "Naval Tracts," a valuable performance, printed 1682, folio.

MONT, Deodate de, a native of St. Fron, celebrated as a painter. He travelled into Italy with his master Rubens, and acquired eminence by copying the beauties of this great painter. He died 1634, aged 53.

MONTAGUE, Richard, an English prelate, born 1577, at Dorney, Buckinghamshire, where his father was minister. From Eton he went to King's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and afterwards he was made chaplain to James I. and in 1616 installed dean of Hereford. He possessed other ecclesiastical preferment besides, and in 1621 he distinguished himself by his Diatribe on the first part of Selden's History of Tithes, which so pleased the king that he engaged him to write his Analecta Ecclesiastica. Exercitationum, which appeared 1622. In 1624 he attacked some popish and Jesuit missionaries who attempted to gain over his flock at Stanford Rivers, Essex, and in consequence of the controversy which took place his enemies selected some passages from his writings, which they threatened they would submit to the parliament as heretical, and inclined to popery and Arminianism. With the king's approbation he withstood their attacks, and published his Appello Cæsarem, 1625, which as being more objectionable, brought him before the first house of commons of Charles I. where he was censured by the speaker, and obliged to give a security of 2000*l.* for his appearance. Though prosecuted by the commons, he, however, found a patron in the king, and he was in 1628, promoted to the see of Chichester, and 10 years after translated to Norwich, where he died 1641. He wrote besides Versio et Notæ in Photii Epistolas, and assisted Saville in his edition of St. Chrysostom's works. He was an excellent scholar, and Selden himself, his great antagonist, owns him to have been a man well skilled in ancient learning.

MONTAGUE, Charles, earl of Halifax, was born at Horton, Northamptonshire, 16th April, 1661, and from Westminster school he went in 1682 to Trinity college, Cambridge. His poem on the death of Charles II. in 1684, recommended him to the notice of the earl of Dorset, and of the learned wits of the time, and the assistance which he gave to Prior in the composition of the Country and City Mouse, 1687, to ridicule Dryden's Hind and Panther, contributed still more to his celebrity. On James I.'s abdication of the throne he was appointed one of the members of the convention, and on William's arrival he was presented to him by lord Dorset, and received a pension of 500*l.* In 1691 he began to display his oratorical powers in the house of commons, and was made that same year one of the lords of the treasury, and three years after chancellor of the exchequer. In 1695 he began the recoinage of the current money of the kingdom, and completed it through all difficulties; and in 1696 he projected the scheme of a general fund, which has proved so essential to modern financiers under the name of the sinking fund. In 1698 he was appointed first commissioner of the treasury, the next year auditor of the exchequer, and in 1700 raised to the peerage by the title of baron Halifax. Though attacked by the commons in 1701, as guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, the accusation was disproved, and he gained in a stronger degree the confidence and protection of the monarch. His zeal in the cause of the Hanoverian succession procured him the favour of George I. on whose accession he was created earl of Halifax, and made knight of the garter, and first lord of the treasury. He did not long enjoy his honours, as he died suddenly, after an illness of four days, May 19, 1715. Halifax owed his elevation and his honours to his merits. As a man of learning he was highly respectable, and the patronage which he extended to Addison, to Steele, Pope, Swift, and the other wits of the age, will extend his fame to the latest posterity. His poems, speeches, &c. and memoirs of his life have been collected among the works of English poets.

MONTAGUE, Edward, earl of Sandwich, an illustrious character, who, though he fought against Charles I. and advised Cromwell to assume the crown, was zealous for the restoration of the royal family. Distinguished as a general and as a statesman, he was equally so as an admiral, and in the Dutch war, which Charles II. undertook by his advice, he behaved with astonishing valour in the battle of Southwold bay. After extricating his fleet, however, from the most imminent danger, his ships caught fire from one of the fire-ships of the enemy, and in the general confusion he leaped overboard, and was drowned, 1672. He had been created an earl by Charles II. He was distinguished also as a writer, and gave to the world Letters to Secretary Thurloe—Letters during his Embassy in Spain—the Art of Metals, &c. translated from the Spanish, a book of merit—original letters, &c. 2 vols. 8vo.

MONTAGUE, lady Mary Wortley, eldest daughter of Evelyn Pierrepont, earl, and afterwards duke of Kingston, was born at Thoresby, in Nottinghamshire, 1690. She received a very learned education, and was instructed with her brother lord Newark in the knowledge of the Greek and Latin classics. She married in 1712, Edward Wortley Montague, a gentleman of great political knowledge and influence, and distinguished not only as an eloquent and upright member of parliament, but as the friend of Addison, and in 1716 she accompanied him in his embassy to Constantinople. In this distant region she examined with accuracy the manners and habits of the natives, and communicated by letter her judicious observations to her friends in England. To her sense and discernment Europe is indebted for the happy introduction of the smallpox; but it is to be remarked that before she recommended it she made the first experiment upon her own son, and its success proved the means of disseminating the blessings and the continuation of life to thousands. In 1718, she returned to England, and settled at Twickenham, where she formed a strong intimacy with Pope. This proved, however, of short duration, the poet was irascible, and he soon vented the severity of his satires against his fair friend, and when charged with the scurrility of his writings he had the meanness to deny them. In 1739, lady Mary went to settle at Brescia near Venice for the benefit of her health, where she continued till 1761, when she returned to England to see her daughter who had married lord Bute. She died the following year. The letters of lady Montague appeared before the public in a surreptitious edition in 1763, in 4 vols. 12mo. under the care of the infamous Cleland, and were read with such avidity that they were translated into several languages. They have made their appearance in a more correct and perfect form under the approbation of her grandson lord Bute, in 5 vols. 8vo. 1803. These letters exhibit her powers in a very pleasing view. The many adventures which attended her in her travels are presented in interesting description, and prove that with a warm and romantic imagination she possessed great talents, and inexhaustible powers of language. Many passages, however, it must be acknowledged, especially in her poetry, cannot be read without a blush by a person of delicacy, and it is to be lamented as much, that such offensive pages should be presented to the public eye, as that they should issue from the pen of a lady of respectable character, of elegant taste, and solid judgment.

MONTAGUE, Edward Wortley, son of the above, born at Warncliffe lodge, Yorkshire, was remarkable for his eccentricities. He ran away from Westminster school to become a chimney-sweeper, and when restored by accident to his parents he again left them to join himself to a fisherman, after which he embarked as a cabin boy for Spain, and hired himself there as a servant to a muleteer. Here again he was discovered and prevailed upon to return to his friends, who placed him under the care of a tutor, and with him he visited the West Indies, and other foreign countries. On his return he was elected member of parliament, and conducted himself with all the propriety becoming his birth and fortune; but soon his fondness for novelty gained its usual ascendancy, and he embarked for the East. At Constantinople he adopted the dress and the manners of the Turks; he kept a numerous seraglio of wives, he sat cross-legged, he wore a long beard, and behaved with all the pomp of oriental consequence. In early life he had married a woman of mean birth, with whom, however, he had never cohabited, and hearing, while at Constantinople, of her death, he determined, by a most extraordinary plan, to alienate his fortune from his relations, against whom he had a particular dislike. He caused, therefore, to be inserted in the English newspapers, an advertisement for a young woman as a wife, who was already advanced in her pregnancy, and a proper person was accordingly provided; but before the romantic hero could return thus to impose on the world his false heir, death arrested his purposes. He died in Italy, 1776, aged about 62. He was author of an Examination into the Causes of Earthquakes—and of Observations on the Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire—Account of the Mountains of Arabia, which possess some merit, besides some interesting papers inserted in the philosophical transactions.

MONTAGUE, Elizabeth, daughter of Matthew Robinson of Horton, Kent, was a lady of great accomplishments, which were much improved under the tuition of Dr. Conyers Middleton. About 1742, she married Edward Montague, of Allertorpe, Yorkshire, son of Charles, the fifth son of the first earl of Sandwich, and by him she had only one son who died in his infancy. She soon became a widow with an ample fortune, and numerous connexions, and respected by the great, the learned, and the gay. She showed now greater attachment to literature than to the amusements of the fashionable world, and she formed among her friends a literary club, which received the singular appellation of the blue stocking club, because one of the members, a gentleman, generally wore stockings of that colour. Her abilities and correct taste were evinced in her essay on the writings and genius of Shakspeare, 1769, a valuable work which acquired deserved celebrity. She was much courted by lord Lyttleton, whom it is said she assisted in the composition of his dialogues of the dead. This very respectable lady died in 1800, much lamented by the tribe of chimney-sweepers in the metropolis, to whom she had for many years, with great humanity, and with some show of ostentatious vanity, given a splendid entertainment yearly on May-day.

MONTAGUE, Charles Greville, governor of South Carolina, arrived in the province and assumed the administration in 1766. In 1773 he was succeeded by lord Campbell, and was appointed governor of Jamaica. He was the second son of the duke of Montague; born May 29th, 1741, and died in January, 1784.  L.

MONTAIGNE, Michael de, a celebrated French writer, born of an ancient family at Perigord, 1533. He was educated under his father, and instructed to speak Latin first as his mother tongue, and afterwards he studied at the college of Guyenne. He was intended for the law, but disregarding the drudgeries of the profession, he travelled for the improvement of his understanding by observations on men and manners. While at Rome he was honoured with the title and privileges of citizen, and in 1581, he was chosen in his absence mayor of Bourdeaux in the room of marshal Biron. He was at the meeting of the states of Blois, 1588, where his conduct merited the approbation of his countrymen, and the notice of Charles IX. who there invested him with the order of St. Michael. He died 1592, at his seat of Montaigne near Bourdeaux, where he had retired to the enjoyment of learned ease, and philosophical society, and his last moments evinced the character of a good and faithful catholic. His essays have been repeatedly published. The best edition is that of Peter Coste, with notes, 1725, or 1739, 3 vols. 4to. They are amusing, and convey much instruction to the heart, though it must be observed that often they abound with skepticism and obscurity. Cardinal du Perron called them the breviary of honest men, and lord Halifax, to whom they were dedicated by Charles Cotton, the translator, declares them to be the book in the world with which he was best entertained. His travels were printed, 3 vols. 12mo. 1772.

MONTALBANI, Ovid, professor of medicine and astronomy at Bologna, died 1672, aged 70. He was author of Index Plantarum, 4to.; Bibliotheca Botanica, 4to.; Arboretum Libri duo, folio; Epistola de Rebus in Bononiensi Tractu Indigenis, &c.

MONTALEMBERT, Mark René, a French general, born at Angouleme, of a respectable family. He served with great credit in the French, Russian, and Swedish armies, and distinguished himself as a man of learning, and as member of the academy of sciences. He was author of Perpendicular Fortification, or the Defensive superior to the Offensive Art, by a new method of employing Artillery, 11 vols. 4to. 1776; Correspondence with Generals, &c. 3 vols.; comedies and poems. He divorced his wife in 1794, at the age of 80, and took another, by whom he had a daughter. He died 1799, aged 85.

MONTAMY, Didier Francis d'Arclais, lord de, a native of Montamy in Normandy, knight of the order of St. Lazarus, employed in the service of the duke of Orleans. Besides a treatise on Colours for Painting on Enamel and Porcelaine, 12mo.—he translated from the German of Pott, Lithoegnosie, 2 vols. 12mo. and died 1765.

MONTANUS, founder of a new heresy in the second century, was born at Or, near Ardabus, in Phrygia. He pretended to be immediately inspired with the Holy Ghost, and was assisted in his prophetic labours by two rich women, Priscilla and Maximilla, who where likewise inspired, but whose gold, says Jerome, succeeded better to gain converts than their working of miracles. He denied the Trinity, and included all the three persons into one indivisible; he regarded second marriages as fornication, and established his authority among his deluded followers by declaring himself sent, like Moses and Jesus, to propagate new doctrines, and to lead the world to salvation. The impostor for a while prevailed, and even Tertullian himself was for a time supporter of the doctrines of the Montanists. It is said that at last Montanus hanged himself, and his coadjutress, Maximilla, followed his example.

MONTANUS, Benedict Arias, a learned Spaniard, born at Frexenal de la Sierra, near Badajos, 1528. After acquiring a perfect knowledge of ancient and eastern languages, he travelled through France, Germany, England, and the Low Countries, to learn the living tongues, and at his return to Spain, was so admired, that Philip II. employed his abilities in the publication of a new Polyglott Bible, after the Complutensian edition. This he completed with great labour and success, and it was printed at Antwerp, 1571. The work was attacked by various critics, but the Spanish king was sensible of the merits of the author, and offered him a bishopric, which he refused, preferring the peace of solitude and retirement to dignities. He died at Seville about 1600. He wrote besides, critical tracts, and commentaries on the Scriptures.

MONTANUS, John Baptist, an eminent physician, born at Verona, 1488. He studied the law at Padua; but though it offended his father, he preferred physic, in which he soon acquired reputation and opulence. He retired to Padua, where he obtained a professor's chair, and though solicited by the emperor, by the king of France, and by the duke of Tuscany, he refused to quit this peaceful abode. He died 1551. He wrote Medicina Universa—Opuscula Varia Medica—de Gradibus et Facultatibus Medicamentorum—Lectiones in Galenum et Avicennam.

MONTARANI, Geminiano, a native of Modena, mathematical professor at Bologna, author of a Dissertation on Comets—on the Fixed Stars—on Astronomical Observations, &c. died at the end of the 17th century.

MONTARRAGO, or MASCARENHAS, Frere de, a learned Portuguese, born at Lisbon 1670. He wrote a Natural, Astrological, and Political History of the World—an Account of Oudenarde and Peterwaradin—Narrative of the Death of Lewis XIV. and other works, and died 1730.

MONTAULT, Philip de, duke of Noailles, renounced the protestant faith by the persuasion of Richelieu, and rose to high rank in the army. He was in 1669 sent to the relief of Candia, but failed in his attempt, though he retired covered with glory. He died at Paris, much respected, 6th Feb. 1684, aged 65. His Memoirs appeared in 1701, but are little interesting.

MONTAUSIER, Charles de Sante Maure, duke de, peer of France, knight of the various orders of the monarchy, and governor of the dauphin, was born of an ancient family of Touraine. During the civil wars of the Fronde, he maintained order in his governments of Saintonge and Angoumois, and when appointed over Normandy, he no sooner heard that the plague infested the country, than he hastened to the relief of the people. His family expostulated, but he replied, that governors were obliged to reside as well as bishops, and if not on all occasions, yet in the time of public calamity. In his conduct towards the dauphin, he behaved like a man of probity, virtue, and integrity, and without flattering his vices, he wished to lead him to the paths of duty and honour. To inspire him with a due sense of the attentions which sovereigns owe to the meanness of their subjects, he one day took the prince to a cottage, where he addressed him in these words; "behold, lodged in this wretched habitation, the father, the mother, and the whole family, who labour incessantly to provide gold, that your palaces may be adorned, and who almost perish with hunger, that your table may be spread with the most exquisite dainties." When his attendance on the prince was completed, he told him, "if you are a man of probity and honour, you will love me, but if you are not, you will hate me, and I shall comfort myself through the disappointment." This virtuous character died 17th May, 1690, aged 80. By his wife, Julia Lucy d'Angennus, of the house of Rambouillet, a woman of great merit and virtue, who died 1671, aged 64, he had only one daughter, who married the duke of Usez.

MONTBEILLARD, Philibert Gueneau de, an eminent naturalist, born at Namur, 1720. He assisted Buffon in his great work, and wrote the History of Birds, and began that of insects, but died before its completion, 1785. He was author of Collection Academique, containing interesting extracts from the various learned societies of Europe.

MONTCALM, Lewis Joseph de St. Veran, marquis de, a native of Candiac, descended from a noble family. He was brought up to the military service, and in various engagements distinguished himself by his valour, particularly at the battle of Placenza, in 1746. He rose by degrees to the rank of field marshal, and in 1756 he was selected to preside over the province of Canada. In this distant province he ably opposed the English general, lord Loudun, and defeated his successor Abercrombie; but the attack of Wolfe proved fatal. The English general, determined on the conquest of Quebec, fell in the attempt, and died in the arms of victory; and Montcalm, who had opposed most valiantly this illustrious chief, also shared his fate, 1759.

MONTCHRESTIEN DE VATEVILLE, Anthony, a French poet, known for his contentious disposition, and his various adventures. He was for some time in England, in consequence of his being accused of murder; but as the accusation seemed false, he was permitted to return home. He was afterwards suspected of coining; and at last, engaged in the civil wars which distracted France, he was killed near Falaise, by a party of his enemies, who attempted to arrest him, after a most determined defence. The tribunal of Domfront ordered that his body should be torn to pieces and burnt, which was done, 21st Oct. 1621.

He wrote some tragedies—besides a pastoral—Susan, a poem, &c.

MONTUCULI, Count Sebastian, an Italian, made cup-bearer to the son of Francis I. of France, whom he is said to have poisoned at Valence. When accused of this horrid crime, and tortured, 1536, he confessed that he had done it at the instigation of the partisans of Charles V. but the bloody deed originated in the criminal breast of Catherine de Medicis, the wife of Henry II. who was brother to the murdered prince.

MONTUCULLI, Raynard de, an able general, born at Modena, 1608. His uncle Ernest made him pass through all the gradations of military life, and enlisted him first as a common soldier. He first distinguished himself against the Swiss, 10,000 of whom he defeated with 2000 men, though he was afterwards taken prisoner by general Bannier. Restored to liberty, after two years of confinement, he gained fresh laurels against the Swedes, and at the peace of Westphalia, began to travel. In 1657 the emperor sent him as field marshal to the assistance of John Casimir, king of Poland, against the Swedes and the Turks, and in this campaign he gained several victories. In 1673 he was employed against Turenne, who fell in the battle, and afterwards against Condé, and in this arduous contest maintained unsullied the glory which he had acquired. He died at Lintz 1680. His Memoirs were published at Strasburg, 1735.

MONTMAYER, George de, a Castilian poet, in the reign of Philip II. of Spain. His poems, called Cancionero, appeared, 2 vols. 12mo. 1554. He wrote also, Diana, a novel, and died 1560.

MONTENAULT, Charles Philip, a French writer, born at Paris. His History of the Kings of the two Sicilies, of the House of France, in 4 vols. 12mo. has been much admired. He wrote also in the Journal de Verdun, and translated into prose Quillet's poem, called Callipædia. He died 1749.

MONTESPAN, Athenais Mortimar, madame de, was wife of marquis de Montespan, and is known as the mistress of Lewis XIV. Her husband ventured indignantly to resist the intrigue, but banishment from the capital, and the fear of despotic power, soon reconciled him to his disgrace, and 100,000 crowns purchased his wife, his silence, and his virtue. From 1669 to 1675, this guilty woman exercised uncontrolled authority, by her wit and by her beauty, over the captivated monarch, and the people of France; till satiety, and the love of madame de Maintenon, alienated the king's regard. She, however, for some time continued at court, treated with respect, but robbed of her personal influence, and she divided her time, which passed on heavily upon her mind, in acts of devotion, and in the drawing up memoirs of whatever passed at court. She had, by the king, a son, created duke de Maine, and two daughters, one married to the grandson of the great Condé, and the other to the duke de Chartres. The last years of her life were spent away from the court, on a pension of 1000 louis d'or a month. She died at Bourbon, 1717. She was rather ashamed of her faults, says her biographer, than penitent for them; half of her life was spent in grandeur, and the rest in contempt. Her reign was so intolerable and fatal, that the French regarded it as a judgment from heaven.

MONTESQUIEU, Charles de Secondat, baron of Brede, a celebrated writer, of a noble family, was born at Brede, near Bourdeaux, 18th Jan. 1689. He devoted himself to literature from his earliest years, and first displayed the strong powers of his mind in the publication of his Persian Letters, 1721, in which he ridiculed the follies and the vices of the French nation with spirit and success. In 1722 he made some eloquent and convincing remonstrances against a tax which was going to be imposed upon the people, and his appeal proved so effectual that the tax was suppressed. He was, in 1728, admitted member of the French academy, after the opposition of cardinal Fleury, who was displeased with the language of his Persian Letters, against religion and government, had been removed by the influence of marshal d'Estrées. Deeply engaged in the completion of his great work, the Spirit of Laws, he visited various countries for information, and after passing through Germany, Hungary, Italy, Switzerland, and Holland, he fixed his residence for two years in England. In this country he was honoured with the attention not only of the learned, but of the great, and of the queen herself; and he wisely observed, that England was the country where to think, and France where to live. On his return home, he finished his work, on the cause of the Grandeur and Decline of the Romans, and in 1748 appeared his Spirit of Laws, 2 vols. 4to. This work, which better deserves the name of the Spirit of Nations, acknowledges three sorts of government, the republican, the monarchical, and the despotic; and in examining these divisions, the author displays astonishing depth of thought, vigour of imagination, and solidity of judgment, and deserves the honourable appellation of the Legislator of the Human Race. He did not, however, escape the censure of the malevolent; and while foreign nations admired this very philosophical performance, some of the French critics pretended to discover strong blemishes in the composition. He succeeded his uncle as president of the parliament of Bourdeaux, and with all the resignation of a true Christian, died at Paris, 10th Feb. 1755, aged 66, universally lamented by the court, as well as by the people. His Letters were published in 1767, 12mo. but his works have appeared together in 3 vols. 4to. His son died 1796. Vid. SECONDAT.

MONTÉZUMA, emperor of Mexico, displayed great firmness and powers of mind in opposing the Spaniards, whom an ignorant people regarded as more than mortals. He was at last seized by Cortes, in a pretended sedition, and ignominiously loaded with chains, and obliged to acknowledge himself the vassal of Spain. The Mexicans resented the indignities offered to their king, and Cortes, apprehensive of a fatal insurrection, made his royal prisoner appear before his irritated subjects on the top of a house, and arrayed in his robes, attempt to repress their violence. His sight for a moment checked the popular fury; but the monarch, wounded by two arrows, and by the blow of a stone, fell to the ground, and soon after, refusing all aliment, and rejecting every invitation of becoming a Christian convert, expired, to the great regret of the Spaniards, and of his subjects, 1520. He left two sons and three daughters, who became Christians. The eldest son was enriched, and made by Charles V. a count of Spain, where his posterity still live in splendour. He died 1608.

MONTFAUCON, Bernard de, a learned Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, was born 17th Jan. 1655, at Roquetaillade, in the diocess of Alet. He first became a soldier, but the death of his parents affected him so powerfully, that he renounced the world, and commenced Benedictine monk, 1675. He now devoted himself to literature with astonishing labour, and in 1698 travelled to Italy to consult libraries and learned men. He was received with respect wherever he went, and treated with kindness by the Roman cardinals, and by Innocent XII. In 1701 he returned to Paris, and published an account of his journey, called Diarium Italicum, 4to. The rest of his life was dedicated to literature, for which he was so well qualified by his extensive erudition, and his great knowledge of history and antiquity. He died at the abbey of St. Germain, 21st Dec. 1741, aged 87. His works are, Græca Analecta, 4to.—St. Athanasius's works, Greek and Latin, with notes, 3 vols. fol.—A Collection of Ancient Greek Fathers, 2 vols. folio—Palæographia Græca, folio—Remains of Origen's Hexapla, 2 vols. folio—Chrysostom's works, Greek and Latin, with Notes, 13 vols. folio—Monumens de la Monarchie Française, 5 vols. folio—Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum, &c. 2 vols. folio—Dissertation on Judith—and Antiquity Explained, a most valuable work in French and Latin, illustrated with figures engraved on copper, 10 vols. folio, with a supplement of 5 vols. more.

MONTFLEURY, Zachary Jacob, a native of Anjou, who was page to the duke of Guise. He afterwards, under the name of Montfleury, joined a strolling company in Burgundy, and was one of the first players engaged in the Cid. He also wrote the death of Asdrubal, a tragedy, and became the instructor of Baron, who outshone him as a theatrical hero. He died Dec. 1667. His son Anthony Jacob, was born at Paris, and left the profession of the law, against his father's inclination, for the stage. He wrote several comedies, which possess little merit, and which have been collected in 4 vols. 12mo. 1775. He died 1685, aged 45.

MONTFORT, Simon count de, a great French general, whose cruelty, however, in his crusades against the Albigenses, 1209, deeply tarnished his character. In 1213, he defeated Peter, king of Arragon, and was killed in 1218, at the siege of Toulouse, by a woman who threw a stone upon his head from the ramparts. His younger brother was the earl of Leicester, so celebrated in English history.

MONTGAILLARD, Bernard de, a mendicant friar, born 1553. He was called the petit feuillant of the league, and acquired so much celebrity as a preacher, that the scripture expression of "happy is the womb that bare thee," was applied to him. He prostituted his powerful eloquence to the meanest and most bloody purposes of the league, and even excited de Rougemont to become the assassin of Henry IV. He was abbé of Orval, a rich appointment, and died of a dropsy, 1623.

MONTGERON, Lewis Bassille Carre de, a Parisian, who pretended to be converted from infidelity to Christianity, at the tomb of the deacon Paris, an account of which he presented to the king. He was sent to the Bastile for the wildness of his conduct, and the fanaticism of his writings, and died in the citadel of Valence, 1754, aged 67.

MONTGOLFIER, James Stephen, a native of Annonai in France, eminent as an ingenious paper manufacturer, and as the first who made vellum paper, so much admired for its beauty and smoothness. A higher degree of celebrity still awaited him: in 1783, as he was boiling water in a coffee-pot, the top of which was covered with paper, folded in a spherical form, he observed that the paper gradually swelled, and rose up in the air, and from this simple incident, reflection and experiment proved to him that a light machine, filled with gas, not so heavy as atmospheric air, might float in the upper regions. The experiment was exhibited to the eyes of astonished Europe, and by this extraordinary invention, the bold aeronaut presumed to commit himself to the air, and claim as his own the regions which seemed assigned only to the feathered race. For this singular service to science, Montgolfier was made member of the academy of sciences, created knight of the order of St. Michael, and rewarded with a pension from the king of 2000 livres. He died in the autumn of 1799. His elegy was pronounced by Boissy d'Anglas, at Paris, and by Duret, at Annonai.

MONTGOMERIE, John, governor of New-York, was a native of Ayrshire, Scotland. He was bred a soldier, and was at one period aid to George II. He was a court favourite, groom of the bed-chamber, and master of the mint. For several years he was a member of parliament for Ayrshire. In 1727 he was appointed governor of New-York and New-Jersey, in the place of Burnet, and continued in the office from the time of his arrival in April, 1728, to his death at New-York, July 1st, 1731.  L.

MONTGOMERY, Gabriel de, count of, a French nobleman of Scotch origin. In a tournament given by Henry II. of France, in honour of his daughter Elizabeth's marriage with the king of Spain, the young knight unwillingly entered the lists against the monarch, and had the misfortune to wound him so severely in the eye, that he died eleven days after. After this melancholy event, Montgomery retired to his estate in Normandy, and then travelled into Italy, till the civil wars recalled him home to support the cause of the protestants, and to defend Rouen. When at last the city surrendered after a brave defence, he escaped to Havre, and in 1569 he flew to the assistance of Bearne, which was attacked by the catholic army under Terrides. Here he was victorious, and pursued his flying enemy, whom he besieged in Orthez, a place which he took by assault. This gallant chief was at Paris during the general massacre, and he escaped by the swiftness of his horse. From France he passed to Jersey with his family, and then took refuge in England, from which he sailed the following year to the relief of Rochelle, but without success. In 1573 he again went to France, and joined at St. Lo, the protestant nobles of Normandy. Here he was suddenly besieged by Matignon, the commander of Normandy, but he escaped to Domfront, where he was quickly pursued by his enemy, and obliged to surrender. This valiant nobleman was then conducted to Paris, and there beheaded, 26th June, 1574, by order of Catherine de Medicis.

MONTGOMERY, Richard, a major-general in the army of the American revolution, was a native of Ireland, and born in 1737. He possessed a fine genius, and enjoyed the advantages of an excellent education.

He entered the British army, and fought with Wolfe at the battle of Quebec, in 1759. After his return to England he left his regiment and came to the colony of New-York, where he settled. In 1775 he was appointed a general in the northern army, and on the indisposition of general Schuyler received the chief command, and soon reduced fort Chamblee, and took St. John's and Montreal. Uniting with colonel Arnold at Quebec, they assaulted that city on the 31st December, where he fell in the 39th year of his age. He was an officer of great bravery, judiciousness, and vigour. An elegant monument was erected to his memory by congress, in front of St. Paul's church, New-York.  L.

MONTGON, Charles Alexander, a French ecclesiastic, born at Versailles, 1690. He was spy to the duke of Bourbon, near the person of Philip V. of Spain, to whom he was confessor; and when slighted by Fleury, his successor, he published "Memoirs," 8 vols. Svo. in which he reflected with great severity upon the minister's conduct. He died 1770.

MONTI, Joseph, professor of botany at Bologna, was author of a Catalogue of Plants, 4to.—Plantarum Varii Indices, 4to.—Exoticorum Simplicium Indices, 4to. &c. He died about 1750. His son, Cajetan, translated into Latin the Italian History of Plants by Zannoni, 1742, folio.

MONTICELLI, Andrew, a native of Bologna, admired as a painter. His flowers, fruits, vases, carpets, &c. were painted in a very pleasing style. He died 1716, aged 75. Another painter of that name was eminent for his landscapes and battle pieces.

MONTIGNI, Stephen Mignol de, a native of Paris, member of the academy of sciences, and eminent as a mechanic. The memoirs of the academy contain various ingenious communications from him on mechanics, on mathematics, &c. He introduced into France the manufacture of some stuffs from England, and he improved also the method of printing cottons, of making carpets, and of dying thread and stuffs. He died 6th May, 1782, aged 68.

MONTJOSIEU, Lewis de, author of "Galus Romæ Hospes," in 4to. a curious book, which treated of the sculpture and paintings of the ancients, reprinted with Vitruvius, at Amsterdam, 1649, was born at Rouergne, and was the attendant of the duke of Joyeuse, in his travels to Rome, 1583.

MONTLUC, Blaise de, a brave Frenchman, born 1500, in a village near Condour, of a noble family. He first served in the army in Italy, and gradually rose to the rank of marshal of France. He was at the battle of Pavia, 1525, where he was taken prisoner, and afterwards in the expedition to Naples, and he assisted in the brave de-ence of Marseilles against the attacks of Charles V. He next distinguished himself in Piedmont, and retook Boulogne from the English in 1547, and in 1551 raised the siege of Berne, which was attacked by the Spaniards. He was in 1554 intrusted by Henry II. of France, with the defence of Sienna in Tuscany, which had driven out the Imperial garrison, and implored the assistance of the French; and so determined was his opposition, that for eight months he withstood undaunted the judicious and well-directed attacks of Marignan, and surrendered at last on honourable terms, only after his troops had been obliged to feed upon the flesh of their cats and dogs. Tuscany, Piedmont, and Thionville afterwards witnessed his valour; and during the religious wars which desolated Guienne, he maintained his usual character; and was rewarded with the place of king's lieutenant over the country, for the signal victory which he obtained at Ver, in 1562, over the Calvinists. He was wounded in the cheeks at the siege of Rabastens, and so disfigured, that he always afterwards wore a mask to hide his deformity. His meritorious services were rewarded with the rank of marshal in 1574. He died three years after, aged 77, at his seat d'Estillac, in Agenois. He was author of a Memoir of his own Life, written when he was 75, and it was published at Bourdeaux, 1592, in folio, and has often been reprinted. Though brave in the field, and so successful that he never was defeated, when at the head of the army, Montluc deserves censure for the cruelties which he exercised towards the protestants; and to his discredit it must be observed, that he regarded little his promises of quarter, or of safety, when they were made to persons who differed from him in religious opinions.

MONTMAUR, Peter de, Greek professor in the royal college of Paris, was born in the Limousin, and educated among the Jesuits, whose society he left to become a druggist at Avignon. He afterwards practised as an advocate, and then turned poet, and became the companion of the great and the opulent, whom he pleased and amused with his wit and jocularity, while he shared the profusion of their tables, to which he was so partial. Though very satirical in his observations, he met with many enemies, who wielded his own weapons against him with vigour and effect. Of those who entertained themselves and the public at his expense, Menage was the keenest, and the most able satirist. Montmaur, who was a polite scholar in Greek and Latin, died 1648, aged 74. The satires written against him were published 1715, by Salengre, under the title of the History of Montmaur.

MONTMORENCY, Matthew de, constable of France under Louis the Younger, was of one of the most illustrious families of Europe. He married a natural daughter of Henry I. king of England, and for his second wife, the widow of Lewis VI. of France. He died 1160. His grandson of the same name, deserved the title of Great by his courage and prudence. He distinguished himself at the battle of Pont-a-Bouvines in 1214, and the following year he fought with such bravery against the Albigenes in Languedoc, that he was made constable of France, and general of the army. He behaved with equal valour at the sieges of Niort, Rochelle, &c. in 1224, and against the English; and when intrusted by Lewis VIII. on his death-bed, with the care of the minority of his infant son, the ninth Lewis, he discharged his new duties with all the fidelity and zeal of a good subject, and an honourable man, and protected Blanche the queen mother, against the machinations of some of the insurgent nobles. This brave man died 24th November, 1230. His great grandson of the same name was in the service of Philip the Bold, and of Philip the Fair, and was engaged in the Flemish wars, and died 1304.

MONTMORENCY, Charles de, of the same family, was made marshal of France for his military services. He was at the battle of Cressy in 1346, and ably promoted the treaty of Bretigny, 1360. He died 11th September, 1381.

MONTMORENCY, Anne de, of the same family, displayed the valour of his ancestors at the battle of Marignan, and in 1521, bravely defended the town of Mazieres against the forces of Charles V. and obliged his general, count Nassau, to raise the siege. He was made marshal of France, and accompanied Francis I. into Italy, where, against his advice, the battle of Pavia was fought and lost, 1525. He shared the captivity of his master on that fatal day; but though rewarded for his services with the sword of constable of France, he was afterwards disgraced by the court. Restored to favour under Henry II. he took the Boulenois 1550, and Metz, Toul, and Verdun 1552; but the intrigues of Catherine de Medicis at last drove him from the court. Under Charles IX. he was recalled to head the armies, and after a reconciliation with the Guises, he defeated the Calvinists at Dreux in 1562; but though victorious, he was unfortunately taken prisoner, and the next year set at liberty. He afterwards retook Havre-de-Grace from the English, and he again defeated the Calvinists under Condé, at the battle of St. Denis, 10th November, 1567, but was himself slain, after performing prodigies of valour, and receiving eight dreadful wounds. When a cor-delier exhorted the dying hero to prepare for his dissolution, he answered fiercely,

"what, think you that after living nearly fourscore years in the field of honour, I know not how to terminate the short quarter of an hour which remains to me of life?" He died, aged 74. His eldest son, Francis, was ambassador in England, and honoured with the collar of the garter by queen Elizabeth. He died of an apoplexy, 1579, aged 49, highly respected. His other brother, Charles, was general of Paris, and gained great reputation by his services under the reign of five kings of France. He died 1612, aged 75.

MONTMORENCY, Henry de, second son of Anne, distinguished himself at the battle of Dreux, where he took Condé prisoner, and also at the battle of St. Denis. He was made governor of Languedoc, and marshal of France; but when disgraced by the arts of Catherine de Medicis, he retired to Savoy, and made successful war against his country. He was reconciled to Henry IV. and obtained the sword of constable. He died 1st April, 1614. His son Henry, born 1595, was made admiral of France at the age of 18, and he supported the honours of his house by his valour and prudence. He defeated the Calvinists in Languedoc, and obtained another victory by sea near the Isle of Rhé, which submitted to his arms. He distinguished himself in 1628 against the Huguenots, and afterwards in Piedmont; but puffed up with his conquests, he determined to resist the power of Richelieu, and joining himself to Gaston, the discontented duke of Orleans, he took up arms against his sovereign in Languedoc, where he was governor. The marshals de la Force and Schomberg were sent to reduce them to obedience, and at the battle of Castelnaudari, the rebels were defeated, and Montmorency taken prisoner. His former services pleaded loudly in his defence, and the voice of the people was raised for his preservation, but the court was inexorable, and Richelieu put the law into execution. He was beheaded at Toulouse, 30th October, 1632, aged 37. His sister Charlotte Margaret, who married the prince of Condé, is famous for her beauty, which captivated the hoary Henry IV. and exposed him to the ridicule of his courtiers. To avoid the importunities of this aged but powerful lover, her husband removed her to Brussels, from which she returned to France after Henry's death. She died 2d Dec. 1650, aged 57, four years after the death of her husband. Her son was the great and illustrious Condé.

MONTPENSIER, Anne Marie Louisa d'Orleans dutchess de, daughter of Gaston, duke of Orleans, was born 1627. She inherited boldness, intrigue, and impetuosity from her father, and during the civil wars of La Fronde, she not only embraced the party of the duke of Condé, but she made her adherents fire the cannon of the bastille on the troops of Lewis XIV. This rash step against the authority of her sovereign and relation, ruined her hopes, and after in vain aspiring to the hand of an independent prince, and among others of Charles II. of England, she in 1669 married the count de Lauzun. The king, however, who had permitted the union, threw difficulties in the way of the lovers; but after some sacrifices, and the cession of Dombes and of Eu, of which she was the sovereign, this disappointed woman was allowed to see her husband. Happiness, however, did not prove her portion. She was violent and jealous, and her husband ungrateful and faithless; and she at last retired from the dreams of conjugal felicity to obscurity, and the austerities of a convent. She died 1693, aged 66. Her memoirs were published at Amsterdam, 8 vols. 12mo. and are curious. She wrote two romances, and some books of devotion. She was best known by the name of Mademoiselle.

MONTFER, Josse, a painter of the Flemish school, born about 1580. Though he affected a studied negligence in his characters, and was too profuse of yellow colours, his pieces are interesting, and appear to advantage when viewed at a distance.

MONTPETIT, Arnold Vincent, a native of Macon. After studying at Dijon he left the profession of the law for painting and mechanics, and in 1759 he discovered the eludoric method of painting, in which water colours were covered with a coat of oil. Some of his horological machines were constructed with great ingenuity, and he not only attempted to improve the wheels of watches, but contributed to the increase of the powers of steam engines. He in 1779 presented a memoir to the academy of sciences, on iron bridges, and proposed to the king of France the erection of one, of which the single arch was to be of 400 feet span. This ingenious man died at Paris, 1800, aged 87.

MONTPEZAT, Anthony de, a Frenchman, who was taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia, and rose to consequence by the attention which he paid to Francis I. in his captivity. The monarch intrusted him with affairs of importance, and at last raised him to the rank of marshal of France. He died 1544.

MONTROSE, James, marquis of, a celebrated hero in the annals of Scotland, who by his genius, valour, and perseverance during the civil wars, reduced the kingdom to the king's obedience, but was compelled to abandon his conquest for want of proper support. After the death of Charles I. he served with honour in Germany, and on the landing of Charles II. in Scotland, he sallied forth from his retreat, and might, with a few followers, again have acquired the ascendancy, had he not been defeated by superior forces, and unfortunately betrayed into the hands of his enemies by the treachery of lord Aston. This heroic chief was now exposed to every indignity of triumphant barbarism. The book which related his exploits was hung in derision around his neck; but he regarded it as an honour, and suffered with the same magnanimity which marked his life. He was hung on a gallows, 30 feet high, May 21st, 1650, at Edinburgh, and his quartered remains exposed over the city gates.

MONTUCLA, Joseph de, a native of Lyons, associate of the national institute, and member of the Berlin academy. He studied at Toulouse and Paris, and went as secretary and astronomer to Cayenne, with Turgot, and was appointed, on his return, first commissioner of buildings. Devoting himself to mathematical studies he had the good fortune to escape through the storms of the revolution, and the wants of his old age were relieved by a liberal pension from Buonaparte. He died at Versailles, 1800, aged 75. He wrote the History of Mathematics, 2 vols. 4to. 1758, a valuable work, translated into English—History of the Researches about the Quadrature of the Circle, 12mo.—Collection of pieces on Inoculation.

MOORE, Philip, rector of Kirkbridge, and minister of Douglas, in the Isle of Man, was the chaplain, friend, and companion of the pious bishop Wilson, whose funeral sermon he preached. He superintended the revision of the translation of the Bible into the Manks, and other theological works. He was in his character a most exemplary and amiable man, and he died 22d Jan. 1783, aged 78, universally regretted. He was buried in Kirk Braddon church, and his remains were attended by all the clergy of the island.

MOORE, Sir Jonas, an able mathematician, born at Whitby, Yorkshire, 1620. He was noticed and patronised by Charles I. and during the civil wars he taught mathematics. At the restoration, Charles II. made him surveyor-general of the ordnance, and by his influence and interest with the monarch he obtained the foundation of a mathematical school at Christ hospital, and the appropriation of Flamstead house for an observatory. He wrote Arithmetic, in 2 books, &c.—Mathematical Compendium—General Treatise on Artillery, and a System of Mathematical Education, for the Hospital, published after his death, 1681, in 4to.

MOORE, Robert, an eminent penman, successor to Ayres, as writing master in St. Paul's churchyard. He published the Writing Master's Assistant, and other similar works, and died about 1727.

MOORE, Edward, an English poet, author of Fables for the Female Sex—Gil Blas, a comedy—the Gamester, a tragedy, and other pieces, died 1757.

MOORE, Francis, an ingenious mechanic, whose inventions in machinery have been of great service in the improvement of the manufactures of Great Britain. He died 1787.

MOORE, John, M.D. son of a Scotch clergyman, was born at Stirling, 1730, and educated at Glasgow, where he studied medicine. He went in 1747 with the English army in Flanders as surgeon's mate, and after the peace he came to London to improve himself in medical knowledge. He afterwards passed to Paris, where the English ambassador, lord Albemarle, engaged him as surgeon to his household. He next settled at Glasgow, as partner with Dr. Gordon, but in 1773 he travelled abroad for five years, as tutor to the young duke of Hamilton and his brother. On his return he settled in London, and published in 1779 his View of Society and Manners in France, Switzerland, and Germany, 2 vols. 8vo. which was received with universal approbation, and encouraged him to publish, two years after, Views of Society and Manners in Italy. His Medical Sketches, in 8vo. 1785, possessed merit, but were said to give offence to the medical world, because they betrayed some of the secrets of the profession. In 1792 Dr. Moore accompanied lord Lauderdale to Paris, and was an eyewitness to some of the atrocious scenes which so much disgraced the French revolution, of which he published an account in 2 vols. 8vo. 1795, with a map to show the situation of the armies of Prussia, and of those of France under Dumourier. Dr. Moore died in London, 1802, highly respected as a man of letters, and of general information. His two sons have distinguished themselves greatly in the service of their country, Graham in the navy, and sir John in the army. Besides the above works, Dr. Moore published Zeluco, a novel, 2 vols. 8vo. a work of merit, and abounding with interesting scenes, but of which the principal character is so flagitious as to raise in the reader sentiments of terror rather than attention or amusement. His Edward, intended as a contrast to Zeluco, appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. 1796, but it does not excite equal interest. Mordaunt was published in 1800, 2 vols. 8vo. and contains pleasing sketches of life, characters, and manners in various countries, and deserves to be read for its favourable views of virtue, and for the instruction which it imparts.

MOORE, John, D.D. archbishop of Canterbury, was son of a grazier at Gloucester. From the grammar-school of that town he entered at Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his degrees, and from which he was recommended to the duke of Marlborough as tutor to his sons. In this employment Dr. Moore conducted himself with great propriety and zealous activity, and he was rewarded for his attentive services by a prebendal stall at Durham, and in 1771 was made dean of Canterbury, and in 1776 raised to the see of Bangor. On the death of Cornwallis, 1783, he was recommended to the king by bishops Lowth and Hurd, who declined the honour, as the most proper person to succeed on the archiepiscopal throne of Canterbury, and he did honour to the appointment, as his authority was never exerted to excite dissatisfaction in the minds either of the friends, or of the enemies of our venerable church establishment. He died 18th Jan. 1805, aged 74, at Lambeth, and was buried in Lambeth church, with great funeral pomp. He never published but two sermons, preached on public occasions. He married Miss Eden, sister of lord Auckland, who survived him with four sons, two of whom are in the church.

MOORE, James, governor of South Carolina, succeeded Blake in 1700, and continued in office until Sir Nathaniel Johnson assumed it in 1703. The provocations of the Spaniards induced governor Moore in 1702, to propose to the Assembly an expedition against St. Augustine. The measure was adopted, but proved unsuccessful and entailed a heavy burden on the colony. To answer the public exigence on this occasion the first paper money was issued in South Carolina, under the name of bills of credit. In 1719, when the revolution took place, and governor Robert Johnson was deposed, colonel Moore, who had early and zealously espoused the cause of the people, was chosen governor. He was well qualified by his prudence and enterprise for the crisis, and when the transfer of the government to the king was effected, and general Nicholson was placed at the head of the government, colonel Moore was elected speaker of the assembly, and continued to be re-chosen until 1725. ¶ L.

MOORE, Sir Henry, governor of New-York, was appointed in 1765, and arrived in the colony in November following. He had previously been governor of Jamaica, to which office he was appointed in 1756. He was like many of his predecessors only nominally a governor. Colden the lieutenant-governor continued to do the business, and enjoy the power in its most essential branches. He was gay, good-natured, and well bred, affable and courteous in a high degree, and a favourite with the people. He continued governor until his death, September 11th, 1769, aged 56. ¶ L.

MOORE, Benjamin, episcopal bishop of New-York, was born at Newtown, Long-Island, October 16th, 1748, and educated at King's college. He was settled assistant minister of Trinity church, New-York, and became its rector on the death of Dr. Provost, and not long after was consecrated bishop. From 1784 to 1787 he occupied the chair of professor of rhetoric and logic in Columbia college, and from 1801 to 1811 was president of that institution. He died February 27th, 1816. He was an accomplished scholar, and highly esteemed as a preacher. ¶ L.

MOORE, Zephaniah Swift, D.D. first president of the collegiate institution at Amherst, Massachusetts; was born at Palmer in that state, November 20th, 1770, and educated at Dartmouth college, where he was graduated in 1793. He studied theology under the tuition of Dr. Backus, of Somers, Connecticut, and settled over the congregational church at Leicester, Massachusetts, in 1796, where he laboured with much acceptance and success till 1811, when he was appointed professor of languages in Dartmouth college. He employed himself in the duties of that station until September 1815, when he was elected president of Williams college, and in 1821, on the establishment of the collegiate institution at Amherst, was appointed to preside over that seminary, and after somewhat more than two years residence there died June 25th, 1823, in the fifty-third year of his age. His talents and learning were highly reputable, his manners pleasing, his method of instructing popular, and his life exemplarily pious. ¶ L.

MOORE, Sir John, was born at Glasgow in the year 1761. At the age of fifteen he obtained an ensigny in the fifty-first regiment of foot; of which, in 1790, he became lieutenant-colonel, and served with his corps in Corsica, where he was wounded in storming the Mozello fort at the siege of Calvi. In 1796 he went out as brigadier-general to the West Indies, under Sir Ralph Abercrombie, who appointed him to the government of St. Lucie, in the capture of which he had a principal share. On his return home, in 1797, he was employed in Ireland during the rebellion, and was raised to the rank of major-general. In 1799 he went on the expedition to Holland, where he was again wounded severely; notwithstanding which he soon afterwards went to the Mediterranean; and at the battle of Alexandria received a cut from a sabre on the breast, and a shot in the thigh. On his return to England he was made a knight of the Bath; and in 1808 was appointed to command an army in Spain, where, after a signal retreat before a superior force, he fell under the walls of Coruna, January 16th, 1809.—W. B.

MORAEIN, James, author of a Life of Cicero, 2 vols. 4to. and of translations of some of that great orator's works, and of Boethius de Cousol. died at Paris, 1762. He was secretary to the lieutenant-general of police at Paris.

MORALES, Ambrose, historiographer to Philip II. of Spain, and professor in the university of Alcalá, wrote a Spanish Chronicle, 2 vols. folio, and other works, and died 1590.

MORAND, Sauveur Francis, a native of Paris, who came in 1729 to England, to study surgery under the well-known Cheselden. His reputation procured him the place of surgeon-major to the French guards, and of director to the academy of surgeons, with the ribband of the order of St. Michael. He wrote a Treatise on the Operation for the Stone—a Discourse on the Necessity of Learning in the Surgical Profession—Eloge on Marechal—Experiments on the Stone—Miscellanies, 2 vols. 4to. He was made member of the Royal Society, London, and of the academy of sciences, at Paris, and died 1773, aged 76. His son John Francis, was physician to Stanislaus, king of Poland, and author of some medical and chymical works, and died 1784, aged 58.

MORAND, an architect of Lyons of great ingenuity. The wooden bridge which he built over the Rhone, and which bears his name, is much admired for its neatness, elegance, and mechanical lightness. This amiable man perished among those who were cruelly devoted to the guillotine after the siege of Lyons, 1793.

MORANDE, N. Thevenot de, a French writer. After being for some time in the military profession, and then escaping from the prison of Armentieres, where his extravagance and dissipation had confined him, he came to England, and procured money by his libel on the French court, called Le Gazetier Cuirassé. His intended publication against Mad. du Barry was purchased for a handsome sum, and the Courier de Londres was then undertaken, and gained the public favour by the satirical reflections which it contained. At the revolution this unprincipled libeller returned to Paris, and was one of those who were massacred in Sept. 1792. He was concerned in some other periodical works.

MORANDI, John Maria, a native of Florence, eminent as a painter, and patronised by the imperial family, of whom he painted the portraits at Vienna. His historical pieces were also admired. He died 1715, aged 90.

MORANT, Philip, M.A. and F.S.A. was born at St. Saviour's, in the isle of Jersey, 6th Oct. 1700, and educated at Abingdon school, and Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He was chaplain to the English church, Amsterdam, and afterwards obtained some livings in Essex, the last of which was Aldham, 1745. He was in 1768, appointed to prepare for the press a copy of the rolls of parliament, the completion of which was unfortunately prevented by his death, 23d Nov. 1770, occasioned by a cold, caught on the river as he passed from the Temple to Vauxhall. This work was afterwards finished by Th. Astle, Esq. who married his daughter. Morant wrote a History of Gloucester, 1748, of which 200 copies only were printed—Beausobre's Introduction to the New Testament, translated—a Summary of the History of England—Geographia Antiqua et Nova, from Duresnoy—the History of Essex—the Life of Edward the Confessor—150 sermons—those lives in the Biographia Britannica, marked C. and other works.

MORATA, Olympia Fulvia, a learned Italian lady, born at Ferrara, 1526. Her father, who taught belles lettres in some of the universities of Italy, saw and improved her natural talents, and she made such progress that she was called to be the companion and instructress of the dutchess of Ferrara, in polite literature, and she declaimed in Latin, and spoke Greek to the astonishment of her auditors. She soon after left the court, and married a young German physician, called Grunthler, whom she followed, 1548, to Schweinfurt, in Franconia. The siege and the burning of this town, soon after left her and her husband in great distress; they escaped with difficulty to Heidelberg, where Grunthler became professor of physic; but the hardships they had endured were too great for Morata's constitution. She sunk under them, and died 1555, and was soon after followed to the grave by her husband, and her brother, who had come with her to Germany. She died a protestant. The greater part of her works perished at Schweinfurt; but some of her orations, dialogues, letters, and translations, appeared at Basil, 1562, 8vo.

MORDAUNT, Charles, earl of Peterborough, born 1658, succeeded his father John lord Mordaunt, 1675. He early distinguished himself in the naval service, especially in the African expedition under lord Plymouth, to the relief of Tangier, besieged by the Moors. He was afterwards in Holland, and attended William III. when he invaded England, and for his services he was created, in 1689, earl of Monmouth, sworn of the privy council, and made first commissioner of the treasury, which office, however, he retained only one year. In 1697 he succeeded his uncle as earl of Peterborough, and under queen Anne was appointed commander of the forces sent against Spain. In this expedition he acquired great renown. He took Barcelona with a handful of men, and not only gained possession of Catalonia, Valencia, Arragon, and other provinces, but with an inferior force, drove out of Spain the duke of Anjou and the French army. Though these extraordinary successes, which resemble romance rather than history, did not effectually establish Charles III. on the Spanish throne, yet Peterborough was deservedly honoured abroad and at home. He was afterwards employed as ambassador to Sicily, and to negotiate with some Italian princes; and in 1714 he was made governor of Minorca, and under George I. general of all the marine forces of Great Britain. This great man died in his passage to Lisbon, 25th Oct. 1735, aged 77. To bravery and heroism he added a penetrating genius, and a mind highly polished, and well instructed in ancient and modern literature, as his "Familiar Epistles," preserved among those of his friend Pope, fully evince.

MORE, Sir Thomas, chancellor of England, was son of Sir John More, one of judges of the king's bench, and was born in London, 1490. From the free-school in London he passed into the household of cardinal Morton, and in 1497 entered at Canterbury college, Oxford, now part of Christ church. After two years' residence he was admitted at New Inn, London, and afterwards at Lincoln's Inn, where he studied the law with great attention. When of age he was elected member of parliament, and distinguished himself in 1503 by an opposition to a subsidy demanded by Henry VII. with such eloquence, that the house refused the application. This conduct was so resented by the king, that young More was marked for persecution by the court, and his father was imprisoned in the tower till he paid a fine of 100*l*. The death of Henry freed him from further persecution, and he now became law reader at Furnival's inn, and upon being called to the bench he was appointed, in 1508, judge of the sheriff's court in London, an honourable and lucrative office. Though much engaged in his profession, he devoted some time to literature, and wrote his Utopia in 1516. He also held a correspondence with other learned men, especially Erasmus, who came to England to visit him. These two illustrious scholars, it is said, met by accident at the lord mayor's table without knowing one another, and after some argument at dinner, Erasmus, feeling the power of his friend's wit, exclaimed, Aut tu Morus es aut nullus! to which More replied, Aut tu es Erasmus, aut diabolus! His celebrity for learning and abilities was now so firmly established, that he was introduced by Wolsey to Henry VIII. who made him master of requests, and soon after knighted him, and appointed him privy counsellor. In 1520 he was made treasurer of the exchequer, and gained so much of the king's attention and confidence that he assisted him in his attack upon Luther in defence of the seven sacraments. He was in 1523 chosen Speaker of the house of commons, and supported his office with such dignity, that he prevailed on the house to reject an oppressive subsidy proposed by Wolsey. This offended the favourite, and was reported to the king; but the abilities of More were too respectable to be despised, and in 1527 he was sent as joint ambassador with other lords to France, and afterwards to Cambray, and in 1530, on Wolsey's disgrace, he was intrusted with the great seal. This elevation, it seems, was intended to gain him over to the opinion of the king, who wished to divorce his queen; but the diligence, fidelity, and integrity which he displayed in this new office proved how well he deserved the royal confidence. Afraid, however, of the storm which hung over his head, because he resisted the king's iniquitous measures, he resigned his new dignity in 1533, and determined to live the rest of life in retirement at Chelsea. He found, nevertheless, the emissaries of the court intent to injure him, and after various fruitless accusations, he exposed himself to the royal displeasure by refusing, in 1534, to take the oath of supremacy. He was, upon this, arrested and sent a prisoner to the tower, but in this season of danger his friends stepped forward, and among them Cranmer, and by every argument of prudence, reason, and interest, they exhorted him to acknowledge the king's supremacy. So great, however, was his attachment to Rome, that he refused, though death was the consequence, and, therefore, rather than abjure what he considered as the test of his faith, he suffered himself to be tried and condemned as a traitor. He was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, and his head to be fixed on London bridge; but the ignominious punishment was changed by the king into beheading, and he suffered on Tower-hill, 5th July, 1535, showing even in his last moments, resignation, and that innocent mirth and pleasantry which had in happier days adorned his conversation. Sir Thomas was twice married, but had children only by his first wife, three daughters and a son. The eldest daughter was a woman of great character, and well skilled in the learned languages. She married Mr. Roper, a gentleman of Kent, and wrote some things, which possessed merit. She died 1544, and was buried in St. Dunstan's church, Canterbury, with her father's head, which she had procured after its exposure on London bridge, between her arms. The son, who was little better than an idiot, was imprisoned after his father's death, for refusing to take the oaths of supremacy; but afterwards liberated. He had five sons, and the son of the eldest of these proved a violent catholic, and at last took orders at Rome, and wrote the life of his great grandfather, dedicated to Henrietta, the first Charles's queen. Besides the Utopia, a kind of romance, in which he gives an account of a country, said to be discovered by the companions of Americus, with an artful insertion of his own political opinions, Sir Thomas More wrote in part an History of Richard III.—some polemical works, and other things in Latin as well as in English. The English works were published by order of queen Mary, 1557, and the Latin at Basil, and Louvain, 1563 and 1566. The Utopia was translated into English by Dr. Burnet.

MORE, Henry, an able divine, born at Grantham, Lincolnshire, 12th Oct. 1614. As his parents were Calvinists, he was strictly educated in their principles, but, much against their wishes, he rejected those rigid tenets, and after being three years at Eton, he entered at Christ college, Cambridge, and assiduously applied himself to the study of Aristotle, and other more modern philosophers. These pursuits, however, yielded not the mental satisfaction which he expected, he left philosophy for platonic writers, and found in the "Theologia Germanica" of Taulerus, the instruction and information which formerly proved so agreeable to the celebrated Luther. In 1639 he was made fellow of his college, and afterwards became tutor to some persons of distinction, and among them, to Sir John Finch, and his sister lady Conway, a woman whose powers of mind were of a singular cast, and at last brought her to quakerism. By means of these powerful friends he obtained, in 1675, a prebend at Gloucester, which he soon after resigned in favour of his friend Dr. Fowler, and satisfied with a small, but independent competence, he declined the offers of high preferment at home and in Ireland, which he might have obtained. After thus devoting himself to laborious study, and the writing of books, he died 1st Sept. 1687, aged 73, and was buried in the chapel of his college. His Mystery of Godliness—Mystery of Iniquity—Philosophical Collections, and other works, were at one time in high reputation, and were collected and published together in 1679, in three large folio volumes.

MORE, Alexander, a protestant divine, born 1616, at Castres, Languedoc, where his father, a native of Scotland, was principal of the college. He studied at Geneva, and obtained there the Greek professorship, and three years after, the divinity chair, in the room of Spanheim. As he was a very eloquent and popular preacher, and consequently envied by his associates at Geneva, he, in 1649, became divinity professor at Middleburg, and afterwards removed to Amsterdam, and thence to Paris, where he was appointed minister of the reformed church. He died at Paris, Sept. 1679. Though great as a preacher, his private character has been severely censured, and he has been accused not only of irregularity in his morals, but of inconsistency in his faith. He published "De Gratia," et Libero Arbitrio—De Scripturâ Sacrâ—a Reply to Milton's Second Defence of the People of England—Orations and Poems in Latin, &c.

MORE, sir Francis, an English lawyer, born at East Ilsley, Berks, and educated at St. John's college, Oxford, and at the Middle Temple. He was at one time member of parliament, and died 1621. He wrote Cases collected and reported, 1633, fol.—Readings on 4 Jacob I. in the Middle Temple, 1676, folio.

MORE, John, a learned prelate, born at Harborough, Leicestershire, and educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge, where he was fellow, and took his degree of D.D. 1681. He was patronised by the chancellor, lord Nottingham, and was made bishop of Norwich, 1691, and translated to Ely, 1707. He died, July 31st, 1714. His sermons were published by his chaplain, Dr. Samuel Clark, and his valuable library purchased for 6000 guineas, by George II. and presented to the university of Cambridge.

MORE, St. Antonio, a painter, born at Utrecht, was the pupil of John Schorel, but imitated the works of Holbein with great success. He was in the service of Philip II. king of Spain, whose portrait he painted, and also those of John III. of Portugal, of Catharine of Austria, of Mary the Infanta, and of Mary, queen of England. He was afterwards receiver of the revenues of West Flanders, and died at Antwerp, 1575, aged 56.

MORE, or MOORE, James, an English writer, educated at Worcester college, Oxford. He wrote the "Rival Modes," a comedy, condemned in the acting, but yet submitted to the public in 1727. He was the friend of the duke of Wharton, and joined him in writing a sarcastic periodical paper, called "the Inquisitor." He quarrelled with Pope, and, in consequence, was made one of the heroes of the Dunciad. He was a polite writer, the companion of the great, but imprudent in his conduct, and too fond of being called a man of wit. He died at Whister, near Isleworth, 1734.

MORE, Henry, a native of Devonshire, pastor of a dissenting congregation at Liskeard, Cornwall, where he died, 1802. His poems, which possess some merit, have appeared since his death, in a vol. 4to.

with a short account of his life by Dr. Aikin.

MOREAU, James, a French physician, the friend and disciple of Guy Patin, was born at Chalons sur Saone, 1647. He wrote Consultations on Rheumatism—a Treatise on the Knowledge of Continual Fevers—a Dissertation on the Dropsy, &c. and excited the envy of other practitioners by the boldness of his writings. He died 1729.

MOREAU, Jacob Nicholas, historiographer of France, librarian to the queen, censor royal, and counsellor of the court of aids, was born at St. Florentine. He wrote Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Carouacas, 12mo.—Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de notre Temps, 2 vols. 12mo.—Observateur Hollandois—Principes de Morale, de Politique, et de Droit Publique, ou Discours sur l'Histoire de France, 2 vols. 8vo. &c. This able writer suffered on the scaffold, 27th March, 1794, aged 77.

MOREELSE, Paul, a painter, pupil to Michael Mirevelt, was born at Utrecht, 1575, and died 1638. Some of his woodcuts in chiaro oscuro, are much admired.

MOREL, the name of some learned and ingenious printers in France. William was professor of Greek, and director of the king's printing-house, Paris, and died 1674. Frederick was also professor of Greek and Latin, and king's printer, and died 1583. His son Frederick was also a printer, and the authors he printed prove him to have been a very learned man. He died 1630, aged 78. His descendants followed his steps, as distinguished in literature, and as elegant printers.

MOREL, Andrew, an eminent antiquary, born at Bern, in Switzerland. He was a diligent and curious collector of medals, and, in 1683, published, at Paris, in 8vo. his "Specimen Universæ Rei Nummariæ Antiquæ," in which he promised to give an account of 20,000 medals exactly designed. He was placed in the cabinet of antiques at Paris by Lewis XIV. but in consequence of some imprudent speech, he was sent to the bastille by the minister, Louvois, and after three years' confinement, was with difficulty liberated. He afterwards went to Arnstadt, in Germany, where he was employed as antiquary at the court of Schwartzburg. He died there, of an apoplexy, 10th April, 1703. His "Thesaurus Morellianus," &c. in which he gave an account of 3539 medals, was part of his great work, and was published 1734, by Havercamp, 2 vols. folio.

MORELL, Thomas, D.D. an able divine, known as the editor of Ainsworth's Dictionary, and of Hederic's Lexicon. He wrote, also, Annotations on Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, and assisted Hogarth in the completing of his Analysis of Beauty, and selected the passages of Scripture for Handel's oratorios. He died 1784, aged 83.

MORELY, lord, son of sir Thomas Parker, of Hallingbury, Essex, was a great favourite with Henry VIII. by whom he was raised to the peerage. He signed, with other peers, the letter to the pope, in favour of the divorce of Catharine of Arragon, and this more firmly secured the kindness of his master. He spent the last part of his life in retirement, and was author of some Latin poems. He died 1547.

MORERI, Lewis, D.D. the learned author of the great historical dictionary, was born at Bargemon, in Provence, 1643. He studied at Draguignan, under the Jesuits, and at Lyons, and after publishing some inferior things, undertook his great work, the first edition of which appeared at Lyons, 1674. This valuable book soon spread his reputation, and gained him friends; he was patronised by the bishop of Apt, and by De Pomponne, secretary of state, and might have obtained distinguished preferment, had his health permitted it. His great application, however, ruined his constitution, and he died July 10th, 1680, at the early age of 37. The second edition of his dictionary appeared soon after his death, 1681, 2 vols. and few alterations took place in the third, fourth, and fifth. The sixth was improved by Le Clerc, and the book received no alterations till the eleventh, which was corrected by Bayle. The 13th, in 5 vols. folio, was improved by Du Pin. The best editions are those of 1749, and 1759, enlarged to 10 vols. folio.

MORES, Edward Rowe, an able antiquary, born 13th Jan. 1730, at Tunstall, in Kent, where his father was rector. He was educated at Merchant Tailors' school, and Queen's college, Oxford, where, in 1748, he published an ancient fragment, called "Nomina et Insignia Gentilitia Nobilium Equitumque sub Edwardo Primo Rege Militantium," and also a new 8vo. edition of Dyonysius's treatise, De Claris Rhetoribus. In 1752 he was elected fellow of the Antiquarian Society, and about this time spent much labour in making collections relative to the antiquities of Oxford, and especially of his own college, and All-Souls, and also Godstow nunnery. Though he was whimsical in his religious notions, and affected to follow the tenets of Erasmus; it is certain that he took deacon's orders; but it was said, that it was with the intention of escaping civil offices. He was equally singular in the education of his daughter, to whom he early talked, principally in Latin. He was the original promoter of the equitable society for assurance on lives and survivorship, of which he was nominated perpetual director, with an an-nity of 100l. In the latter part of life he lost the industry and steadiness of his younger years, and sunk into indolence and dissipation, which at last occasioned a mortification, of which he died at his house at Low Layton, 28th Nov. 1778, in his 49th year. The History of the Antiquities of Tunstall, in Kent, with plates, was the only work which he left completed for the press. He published a Dissertation on Typographical Founders and Founderies, of which only 80 copies were printed.

MORETT, an ingenious artist, goldsmith to Henry VIII. He executed many curious works from the designs of Holbein.

MORGAGNI, John Baptist, an eminent anatomist, born at Forli, in Italy, 1682. He studied at Bologna, where his abilities were displayed with such success, that he was early placed in the medical chair. He was afterwards appointed by the senate of Venice to a professorship at Padua, and was enrolled by the royal societies of London and Paris among their members. He died 1771, much respected. He published Adversaria Anatomica—Nova Institutionum Medicarum Idea—De Sedibus et Causis Morborum per Anatomiam Indigatis—Epistolæ Anatomicae, &c. His works were published together, 1765, in 5 volumes.

MORGAN, William, a native of Wales, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He was afterwards vicar of Welch-pool, and, in 1595, raised to the see of Landaff, and in 1601 translated to St. Asaph, where he died, 1604. He was a learned prelate, and zealously employed in completing the translation of the Bible into Welch, which appeared in 1588.

MORGAN MWYNVAWR, or the Courteous, a Welch prince, who died 1001, aged 129. He was the friend of Edgar, king of England, and though an able warrior, was strongly attached to peace.

MORGAN, prince of Powys, son of Cadwgan, atoned for the violent conduct of his youth by going on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. He died on his return, at Cyprus, 1126.

MORGAN, George Cadogan, a native of Bridgend, Glamorganshire, educated under his uncle, Dr. Price. He became teacher of a dissenting congregation at Norwich, and died 1798. He wrote Lectures on Electricity—Observations on the Light of Bodies in a state of Combustion, &c.

MORGAN, John, M.D. F.R.S. a distinguished American physician, who was born at Philadelphia in 1735, and graduated at the college in that city in 1757. Having prepared himself for the practice of medicine, he entered the army in the French war, both as a surgeon and lieutenant. In 1760 he went to Europe, to complete his studies in medicine, and spent several years in Edinburgh, Paris, and other places. He returned to America in 1765, a fellow of the Royal Society, and with a diploma of doctor of medicine, and was immediately elected professor of the theory and practice of medicine in the medical school at Philadelphia, the plan of which he had assisted in concerting while in Europe. In 1769 the first honours in medicine, bestowed in America, were conferred in that school on five young men. In October, 1775, he was appointed director general and chief physician to the general hospitals of the American army, and immediately repaired to Cambridge, but in 1777 he was removed from his office, on some charges made against him by inferior surgeons, from which, however, he afterwards honourably vindicated himself. He died in 1789.  L.

MORGAN, Daniel, brigadier general in the army of the American revolution, was a native of New-Jersey, but removed in early life to Virginia. Having neither the advantages of wealth, nor of a good education, he was dependent for his support on hard labour. In 1755 he entered the army of general Braddock, it is supposed, as a private soldier. At the close of the campaign he returned to his former occupation, and at length established himself on a farm in Frederick county. At the commencement of the war of the revolution, he was appointed to the command of a troop of cavalry, and joined the army under general Washington at Boston. He was detached under general Arnold to the expedition against Quebec, and when, at the attack in that city, Arnold was wounded and carried from the field, he took the command of his division, and succeeded in passing the first and second barriers, but the retreat of the other division, after the fall of Montgomery, left Morgan to contend against the whole force of the enemy, and he fell with his corps into their hands. On his being exchanged, soon after, he joined the army under general Washington, and being appointed to command a select rifle corps, was detached to assist general Gates, on the northern frontier, and rendered the most important services by his distinguished courage, skill, and activity, in the operations which led to the capture of Burgoyne. His services, however, were not recognised by general Gates, in the official report which he made of that event, in consequence that general in his attempts to supplant general Washington in the command; but they were appreciated by his countrymen. He soon after joined the main army, and during the winter of 1777 and 1778 commanded a corps on the Schuylkill, to cut off supplies from the British in Philadelphia. After the defeat of general Gates at Cambden, he joined the southern army under general Greene, being advanced to the rank of brigadier general; and in January, 1781, while detached with a considerable body of troops from the main army, he fought the famous battle of the Cowpens, in which he defeated the superior force of colonel Tarleton. He soon after returned to the main body, and resigned his command in consequence of being disabled for service by ill health. In 1794 he was appointed to command the militia of Virginia, called out to suppress the insurrection in Pennsylvania, and continued in the service till the spring of 1795. He was afterwards elected to a seat in congress. Toward the close of his life he removed from his seat in Frederick county to Winchester, where he died in 1799. He was amiable in his disposition, of an enterprising spirit, collected and daring in danger, and always enjoyed the affection of his soldiers, and the confidence of his superior officers. He would have enjoyed a wider sphere of influence had his education been less imperfect. ¶ L.

MORGUES, Matthew de, sieur de St. Germain, preacher to Lewis XIII. and almoner to Mary de Medicis, was born at Vellai, in Languedoc, 1582. He entered among the Jesuits, but soon relinquished their society, and acquired universal reputation by his preaching. Upon the disgrace of Mary de Medicis he made his escape, as he had drawn upon himself the resentment of cardinal Richelieu, by the severity of his reflections upon his conduct and ministry. After the cardinal's death he returned to Paris, where he died, 1670, aged 88. He wrote a "History of Lewis the Just," besides a vindication of the queen-mother against the malevolent insinuations of Richelieu.

MORHOFF, Daniel George, a learned German, born at Wismar, in the dutchy of Mecklenburg, 6th Feb. 1639. He studied at Stettin and Rostock, and visited Holland and Oxford, and in 1665 was invited by the duke of Holstein to become professor of poetry, eloquence, and history, and librarian in the university of Kiel. He married in 1671, and it is supposed, that the death of his wife, in 1687, hastened his own dissolution. He died 1691. His principal works are Polyhistor, sive de Notitiâ Auctorum et Rerum, 2 vols. 4to.—Disserationes, 4to.—Orationes—besides Principes Medicus, 4to. in which he spoke of the pretensions of the kings of England and France, to cure the king's evil—and a translation of his learned friend Boyle's philosophical works into Latin.

MORICE, Sir William, a learned Englishman, raised through the influence of his friend and kinsman, general Monk, to the office of secretary of state, for which he was not fully qualified, as unacquainted with foreign affairs. He held it, however, for seven years, and without reproach, and resigned in 1668. He died Dec. 12th, 1676. He wrote the "Common Right of the Lord's Supper asserted," printed 1651, 4to. and 1660, folio.

MORILLO, Bartholomew, a Spanish painter, born at Seville, 1613. He studied in Italy, and his compositions were so much admired, that he was compared to Paul Veronese. After his return to Spain, Charles V. wished to make him his first painter, which honour, through modesty, he declined. He died 1685.

MORIN, John Baptist, a French physician, born at Villefranche, in Beaujolois, 1583. He studied philosophy at Aix, and physic at Avignon, where he took his doctor's degree, and then came to Paris. He began in 1617 to apply himself to astrology, and lived in the retinue of several dignitaries, where the accidental fulfilment of some of his prophecies gave him great celebrity. In 1630 he was chosen professor royal of mathematics, and so well established was his astrological reputation, that he was consulted by the cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin, and liberally rewarded for his calculation of the influence of the stars. He was also consulted in the affairs of Lewis XIII. and as in examining the monarch's horoscope, he had the good luck to foretell that his approaching illness would be severe, but not fatal, he was very royally rewarded. He died at Paris, 6th Nov. 1656. He wrote various books, the best known of which are his treatise against the Præadamites, and his Astrologia Gallica, the labour of 30 years, printed at the Hague, 1661, in folio, and dedicated to Jesus Christ, and to Louisa Maria, queen of Portugal, at whose expense it was printed, as the author had foretold, she was to be a sovereign princess.

MORIN, John, a learned Frenchman, born at Blois, 1591. He studied at Rochelle and Leyden, and afterwards settled at Paris, where by the conversation of cardinal du Perron, he was converted from the protestant to the catholic faith. He then was admitted into the congregation of the oratory, and distinguished himself by his writings. He resided for nine years at Rome, where he was much courted by the pope and cardinals, and then was recalled by Richelieu to France. He died of an apoplexy at Paris, 1659. His works are very numerous, but the best known are, Exercitationes on the Samaritan Pentateuch—an edition of the Septuagint—a History of the Deliverance of the Church by Constantine, &c.

MORIN, Simon, a fanatic, born at Richemont, near Aumale. He published in 1647, a foolish book, called "Pensées de Morin dedicés au Roi," in which he conceived himself to be Jesus Christ, the second Messiah. This book, which drew around him many followers, proved at last his ruin; he was imprisoned, but afterwards liberated as a visionary, till one of his disciples, Desmarts, from envy and malice, called him the Son of God risen again, and thus revived a fanatical sect, which the arm of the law immediately repressed. The unhappy Morin was condemned to be burnt alive, which sentence he suffered with great resolution, 14th March, 1663, and his accomplices were whipped and branded, and sent to the galleys for life.

MORIN, Stephen, a protestant divine, born at Caen, 1st Jan. 1625. He studied at Caen, and afterwards at Sedan, under du Moulin and Rivet, and after acquiring a very extensive knowledge of classical and oriental literature, he returned to his native place, and married. In 1664 he was made minister of Caen, and at the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685, he retired to Holland, and fixed first at Leyden, and then at Amsterdam, where he became professor of oriental languages. He died May 5th, 1700. His Latin Dissertations on various subjects of Criticism and Antiquity, were highly esteemed, the best edition of which is that of Dort, 1700, 8vo.

MORIN, Henry, son of Stephen, was author of several dissertations in the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions at Paris, of which he was member. He left the protestant for the Roman catholic religion, and died at Caen, 1723, aged 73.

MORIN, Peter, a learned critic, born at Paris, 1531. He was for some years in the printing office of Paul Manutius, at Venice, and was afterwards employed by Gregory XIII. and Sextus V. to superintend the editions of the Septuagint, and of the Vulgate. He wrote a Collection of General Councils, and several learned works besides. He died at Rome, 1603.

MORIN, Lewis, a French physician, born at Mons, 1635. He was member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and made himself known by his accurate index to the works of Hippocrates in Greek and Latin. He died 1715.

MORIN, John, professor of philosophy at Chartres, and author of "Mechanisme Universel," and of a "treatise on Eternity," was born at Meung, near Orleans, 1705, and died 1764.

MORINIERE, Adrian Claude le Fort de la, author of "Choix des Poesies Morales"—"Bibliotheque Poetique—Passe-tems Poetiques, Historiques," &c.—and some comedies, was born at Paris, 1696, and died 1768.

MORISON, Robert, a physician, born at Aberdeen, 1620. He studied in his native university, and took his master's degree; but the civil wars disturbed his pursuits, and after he had distinguished himself for his loyalty and bravery, especially in a battle on Aberdeen bridge, between the people of the town and the republican forces, where he was wounded in the head, he retired to France, in expectation of better times. At Paris he applied himself to botany and anatomy, and took his degree of M.D. at Angers, 1648, and obtained, two years after, the care of the royal gardens at Blois. At the restoration he followed Charles II. to England, and was made physician to the royal family, professor royal of botany, and afterwards was elected botanical professor at Oxford. He was unfortunately bruised by the pole of a coach, as he crossed the street near Charing-cross, and died the day after, 1683, aged 63. He published, 1669, Præliudium Botanicum, 2 vols. 8vo.—Plantarum Umbelliferarum Distributio, folio—Historia Plantarum, folio, a valuable work, which he left incomplete. It was finished by Jacob Bobart.

MORISOT, Claude Bartholomew, a French writer, born at Dijon, 1592. He was author of Peruviana, or the Secret History of Cardinal Richelieu, Mary of Medicis, and the Duke of Orleans, 4to. 1645—Orbis Maritimus, &c. and died 1661.

MORLAND, Samuel, an eminent statesman, born in Berkshire. He was under secretary to Thurloe, and his abilities were employed by Cromwell in embassies to Geneva, Savoy, and other states. In 1660 he waited on Charles II. at Breda, and so recommended himself by his extensive knowledge and faithful services, that he was created a baronet. He published Urim of Conscience, 8vo. 1695. The time of his death is not mentioned. His son was master of mechanics to Charles II. and invented the drum-head capstan, for weighing heavy anchors, the speaking-trumpet, a fire engine, an arithmetical instrument, &c.

MORLAND, George, an eminent painter, born in London. His father was an able artist, and the son, being early employed in making drawings, acquired great ease and expedition. These essential advantages were aided by strong powers of genius; but the celebrity which these promising talents might have ensured, was prevented by vicious habits, and an unconquerable propensity for low and dissipated society. In proportion as his abilities expanded, and his pieces commanded the public esteem, his foibles increased, and his wants became more urgent. While the employment of his pencil, in hours of sobriety and retirement, might have procured independence and general esteem, the efforts of his genius were never or seldom called forth but to extricate him from the grasp of persecuting creditors, the riotous company of a spunging house, or the horrors of a prison. Thus ever poor and ever exposed to the filthy temptations of an alehouse, or an intemperate party, he produced no historical piece, truly sublime for grandeur of conception, or vastness of execution. The scenes of rural and domestic life, indeed, received from his hand the most finished and captivating charms; and his farms, horses, rural views, shepherds, fishermen, smugglers on the sea-coast, dogs, pigs, &c. were delineated with the most striking and the happiest effect. This singular genius, whose pieces were generally the effect of accident, and fell into the hands of those who induced him to work with the selfish view of profiting by his extravagance, died in a spunging house, 1804, aged 40, leaving a wife, who survived him but two days. His life has been written, and a curious account of all his pieces given by Mr. Hassell, 1806.

MORLEY, George, a learned bishop, born in Cheapside, London, 1597. He was educated at Westminster school, and made student of Christ-church, 1615. He was afterwards chaplain in lord Carnarvon's family, and to Charles I. who gave him a canonry of Christ-church, 1641. Though chosen one of the assembly of divines, he adhered firmly to the interests of his master, and assisted him at the treaty of Newport, in the isle of Wight. After being imprisoned for some little time for loyalty, he left England, 1649, and officiated as minister to his fugitive countrymen at the Hague, Antwerp, and Breda. At the restoration, his zeal in the royal cause was not forgotten; he was restored to his canonry, 1660, made dean of Christ-church, and nominated to the see of Worcester the same year, and in 1662 translated to Winchester. In this bishopric he showed himself a most munificent prelate; he spent 8000*l.* on the repairs of Farnham castle; purchased with 4000*l.* Chelsea, for the residence of his successors, and among other benefactions, left five scholarships of 10*l.* per annum, to the natives of Jersey and Guernsey. By temperance he reached a good old age, and died in October, 1684. He wrote some religious tracts, in 1 vol. 4to. besides sermons and various other treatises.

MORLIERE, James Augustis de la, a native of Grenoble, who acquired some celebrity by his romances, the best of which is his Angola, 2 vols. 12mo. He wrote also Mirza-Nadir, 4 vols. 12mo.—some comedies, and other things, which obtained a temporary fame. He died at Paris, 1785.

MORLIN, Joachim, a Lutheran divine, born 1514. He was engaged in the various theological disputes of the times, and was made bishop of Sambia, by Sigismund king of Poland, where he died. He was author of several religious tracts, &c.

MORNAC, Anthony, an eminent French advocate. He wrote 4 folio volumes on law subjects, and also an octavo volume of excellent poetry, called Ferix Forenses. He died much respected, 1619.

MORNAY, Philip de, lord of Plessis Marly, an illustrious nobleman, born at Buih in Vexin, 1549. He was carefully educated by his mother in the protestant faith, and afterwards served in the army during the civil commotions of the times, but soon quitted the military life for literary pursuits. He passed to Geneva, and through Switzerland went to Heidelberg in Germany, where he applied himself to the civil law. He afterwards visited the most remarkable places of Italy, Germany, and Flanders, and also came to England, where Elizabeth received him with cordiality and interest. In 1576 he went to the court of the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France, by whom he was kindly treated, and made counsellor of state. He greatly distinguished himself by his abilities and negotiations in the king's service; but when he saw him inclined to become a convert to the catholic tenets, he gradually withdrew from the court to devote himself to literature. He had been made governor of Saumur by his master, but he was deprived of the office by Lewis XIII. in 1621, and died at his seat of la Forest, near Poitou, 1623. Du Plessis was an extraordinary character; though the heir of rank, dignity, and opulence, he cultivated literature with taste and success; and in an age when religious opinions were guided by interest, and altered by political connexions, he remained a protestant, firm and unshaken in his principles, virtuous in his conduct, and respected even by his enemies. His publications are numerous and valuable. The best known are, a Treatise on the Church, 1578—upon the Truth of the Christian Religion, begun 1579—upon the Eucharist, 1598, a celebrated treatise, which procured an interview between him and cardinal du Perron, and which obtained for him among the protestants, the title of protestant pope—the Mystery of Iniquity, or the History of Papacy, 1607—an Exhortation to the Jews concerning the Messiah, &c.

MOROSONS, Francis, a native of Venice, who distinguished himself by his valour against the Turks, at the siege of Candia. He long maintained himself against an invading army of 120,000 men, with hardly a fourth part of the number; but though allured by promises from the enemy, and offered the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, he continued firm to his country; and when the place surrendered, he was treated with great humanity. His countrymen afterwards, though for a moment displeas'd, appointed him procurator of St. Mark, and enabled him again to attack the Turks, whom he defeated in a dreadful naval battle near the Dardanelles. He was in 1688, elected doge of his country, and died six years after, aged 76.

MORRIS, Lewis, a native of Anglesea, engaged in the service of the admiralty in 1737, to survey the coast of Wales. He published in 1748 an account of his observations, and died at Pembryn, Cardigan-shire, 1765, aged 63. He possessed some abilities as a poet, and several of his pieces in Welch have appeared. Above 80 MS. volumes of antiquities, &c. collected by him, are preserved in the Welch charity school, London.

MORRIS, Richard, brother to the preceding, was clerk in the navy pay-office, and was eminent as a critic, and as a poet, and was engaged in the publication of two editions of the Welch Bible. He died 1779. His brother William was known as a curious collector of Welch MSS. He died 1764, comptroller of the customs at Holyhead.

MORRIS, Lewis, governor of New-Jersey, was early left an orphan, and was reared by an uncle who lived at Morrisania, New-York. He possessed a mind of unusual penetration, and became distinguished for his knowledge of letters and law. He resided most of his life in New-Jersey, where he signalized himself both in the service of the proprietors and assembly. He was employed by the latter to draw up their complaint against lord Cornbury, and present it to the queen. In 1692, he was a member of the council and judge of the supreme court. In 1710, he resided in New-York, and was one of the most influential men in the colony. He was appointed chief justice about the year 1720, and held the office till 1732. After that he again lived in New-Jersey, and in 1738 was appointed governor of that colony. He died in 1746. In giving directions respecting his funeral he displayed a singularity of mind that had always characterized him, by prohibiting his friends from wearing mourning, and wishing that no sermon should be preached. ¶ L.

MORRIS, Robert, superintendent of the finances of the United States, was a native of Manchester, England, and after migrating to America, established himself as a merchant in Philadelphia. He was distinguished for his enterprise in that employment, and gained very extensive credit. In 1776, he was elected to a seat in congress, and as a member of that body affixed his name to the declaration of independence, and the articles of confederation formed in 1778. He was also a member of the convention which formed the constitution of the United States, in 1787. In 1781 he was intrusted with the management of the finances, and rendered incalculable services by his wealth and credit, at that period when the public funds were exhausted. He pledged himself, personally, to a great extent for his purchases, and such was his reputation for talents, wealth, and integrity, that he succeeded, to a great extent, in procuring supplies for the army. He proposed the plan of the National Bank, which was incorporated at the close of that year. After filling the office for about three years, he resigned it. He died at Philadelphia, May 8th, 1806, in the seventy-second year of his age. ¶ L.

MORRIS, Gouverneur, an eminent political character, was a descendant from the distinguished family of that name of Morrisania, New-York. He was born in 1751, and graduated at the college in New-York, in 1768. He was called into public life at an early age, being elected a member of the provincial legislature of New-York in 1775. In 1777 he was a member of the convention which formed the constitution of that state, and was appointed one of the delegates to congress. He was a decided friend of independence, and when the overtures for reconciliation were made known to congress by the British commissioners, in 1778, their rejection was advocated with great force of argument and poignancy of wit by Mr. Morris and William Henry Drayton. Residing afterwards in Pennsylvania, he was a delegate from that state to the convention which framed the constitution of the United States. He was one of the committee who revised the draught, and to whom it was indebted for the beauty and perspicuity of its style. In 1792 he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to France. In that period of enthusiasm, an ardent attachment to the principles, and a cordial sympathy with the friends of the revolution was esteemed an indispensable qualification in the minister of the United States. But although a decided republican, he had too much wisdom not to doubt the ultimate utility of some of the measures then pursuing in that kingdom, or to participate in the sanguine anticipations of the leaders who directed them. In consequence, although his conduct was marked by the utmost prudence and urbanity, he failed to secure the confidence of the Directory, and when a request was made for the recall of Mr. Genet, by the American government, it was met by a similar one from that of France, in relation to Mr. Morris, who returned to the United States in 1794. In 1797, he was elected a senator from the state of New-York, in congress. He was a leading member of the federal party, and exercised a degree of influence which few other men possessed.

His powers of eloquence were of the highest order. In the celebrated debate on the subject of abolishing the judiciary system, in 1802, he took an active part in conjunction with Mr. Bayard and other distinguished statesmen, in opposition to that measure, and his speeches on that occasion were among the most powerful and impressive which have been known in the annals of American legislation. After his term as a senator expired, he retired to private life, to the enjoyment of an ample fortune, and the indulgence of a liberal hospitality. He married in 1809, a daughter of Thomas Randolph of Virginia, and died at his seat at Westchester, November 6th, 1816, aged 65. In addition to his speeches in congress, several of his orations on various occasions were published. Among these the most celebrated were, One delivered before the corporation of New-York, in 1800, occasioned by the death of Washington; and another delivered before an assembly of citizens convened to celebrate the downfall of the Emperor, and the restoration of the Bourbons to the throne of France. He also published an Oration before the New-York Historical Society in 1816.

MORTIMER, John Hamilton, an English painter, born 1739, at East Bourne, Sussex, and descended from Mortimer, earl of March. He learnt his art under his uncle, but afterwards improved himself under Hudson, and Sir Joshua Reynolds, and greatly corrected his taste by studying attentively the graces and sublime beauties of the duke of Richmond's gallery. He honourably obtained the prize of the society for the encouragement of arts, by his picture of Paul preaching to the Britons, a valuable piece, preserved in Chipping-Wycombe church, Bucks. He was, in 1779, without his solicitation, created royal academician by the king, but unfortunately died before he could enjoy the honour, after an illness of 12 days, at his house, Norfolk-street, 4th Feb. 1779. His Magna Charta, Battle of Agincourt, &c. are eminent proofs of his great genius; but it is remarkable that while his feelings and taste seemed to lead him to the delineation of savage scenes, and all the horrid tortures of inquisitorial fury and suffering martyrdom, he possessed the most benevolent heart, susceptible of tender impressions, and easily moved by the cries of distress.

MORTON, Thomas, an English bishop, born at York, 1564, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he was chosen fellow, 1592. He was in the service of lords Huntingdon and Sheffield, and in 1603 went as chaplain to lord Eure, ambassador to the Emperor of Germany, and the king of Denmark. In 1606, he was made chaplain to king James, the next year dean of Gloucester, 1609 dean of Winchester. In 1615, he was made bishop of Chester, 1618, translated to Lichfield and Coventry, and in 1632, to Durham. During the civil wars, though esteemed for benevolence, piety, and moderation, he was exposed to much trouble from the parliament, and the republican forces, and after suffering imprisonment and persecution, he at last was permitted to retire to the house of his friend sir Henry Peyton, in Northamptonshire, where he died, 22d Sept. 1659, aged 95. He was the author of some practical books of divinity.

MORTON, James, earl of, was born at Dalkeith, 1530, and educated under Buchanan, who was professor of philosophy at Paris. He returned to Scotland, 1554, and ably promoted the reformation, but the murder of Darnley, in which he was called an accomplice, obliged him to fly into England. On his return he was made chancellor of Scotland, and in 1574, succeeded Mar as Regent, an office which he resigned 1579. His enemies prevailed at last against him, and, in 1681, he was condemned for high treason, and lost his head by a machine called maiden, said to resemble the modern French guillotine, which it is reported, he had brought from Halifax, Yorkshire, for the execution of some of his opponents.

MORTON, William, a barrister, who distinguished himself during the civil wars, and obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel of horse. He was after the restoration made king's serjeant, and in 1665, appointed justice of the king's bench.

MORTON, John, a native of Dorchester, who rose by his abilities, his knowledge of law, and the favour of Henry VI. to places of dignity and consequence. He was privy counsellor to the king, and his successor, and from the see of Ely he was translated to Canterbury, and was also raised by Henry VII. to the office of lord chancellor, and by the pope to the dignity of cardinal. He died 1500.

MORTON, Nathaniel, one of the first settlers of Plymouth, New England, and a magistrate and secretary of the colony, wrote a brief history of the church at Plymouth, and also a volume denominated "New England's Memorial," which is an invaluable depository of the facts forming the history of that colony for the first forty-seven years. The latter was published in 1669.

MORTON, Charles, minister of Charlestown, Massachusetts, was born at St. Mary Overy's, England, in 1626, and educated at Oxford, where he was afterwards chosen a fellow, and became distinguished by his learning. He entered the ministry and was ejected in 1662, after which he taught an academy for a number of years at Newington-green. In 1685 he came to America, and was the next year settled at Charlestown, where he remained till his death, in 1698. He was for some time vice president of Harvard college, and drew up a system of logic which was long used in that seminary. ¶ L.

MORTON, Joseph, governor of South Carolina under the proprietors, was appointed in September, 1682, and again, as the successor of Robert Quarry, in 1685. He was succeeded by Colleton, in 1686. ¶ L.

MORTON, John, one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, resided in Chester county, Pennsylvania; was a practical surveyor, and for some time a judge of the superior court of Pennsylvania. His death took place a day or two after the declaration of independence. ¶ L.

MOSCHOPULUS, Emmanuel, a native of Crete, in the 14th century, known as the author of a Treatise on Grammar, first printed in 4to. 1545. His nephew of the same name was an able mathematician and antiquary, and composed a Greek Lexicon, published 1545.

MOSCHUS and BION, two Greek Poets, who both flourished in the reign of Philadelphus. Their works are generally printed together, and though short, abound with great beauties.

MOSELEY, Benjamin, a physician, was born in Essex, and bred to the business of a surgeon and apothecary, which he practised several years at Kingston in Jamaica. On his return to Europe he took his doctor's degree at Leyden, and by the interest of lord Mulgrave obtained the situation of physician to Chelsea hospital. He gained some credit by "Observations on the Dysentery of the West Indies;" and "Two Treatises on Coffee and Sugar;" but disgraced himself by his virulence against the vaccine inoculation. He died June 15, 1819.—W. B.

MOSES, the great legislator of the Jews, was born in Egypt, 1571 B. C. and providentially saved by the daughter of Pharaoh, when exposed on the waters of the Nile. He was commissioned by God at the burning bush to deliver the people of Israel from their Egyptian bondage, and after he had performed miracles, and marched through the Red Sea, he promulgated his laws during the residence of his countrymen in the wilderness. He was not permitted to enter the land of Canaan, but died at the age of 120.

MOSES, Mendelshon. Vid. MENDELSHON.

MOSES, Miconti, a Spanish rabbi of the 14th century. His "Great Book of Precepts," explanatory of the Jewish law, was published at Venice, folio.

MOSHEIM, John Laurence, an able German divine, born 1695 of a noble family at Lubeck. He distinguished himself in the German universities, and was invited to honourable situations by the king of Denmark and other princes. He became divinity professor at Helmstadt, and was afterwards appointed chancellor of the university of Gottingen, where he died, universally lamented, 1755. This very learned man wrote Dissertations Sacrae, 4to.—Sermons—Cudworth's Intellectual System of the Universe, translated into Latin, with notes: but the best known and most useful of his works is an Ecclesiastical History, written in Latin, and translated into English by Dr. Maclaine.

Moss, Robert, an English divine, born at Gillingham, Norfolk, 1666. He was brought up at Norwich school, and Benet college, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He was a popular preacher, and much followed in London, and became chaplain to king William and his two successors. He was made, 1712, dean of Ely, and held other ecclesiastical preferments. In the latter part of life he was much afflicted with the gout, and died 26th March, 1729. His sermons have been published in 8 vols. 8vo. He wrote also some poetry, and small tracts.

Moss, Charles, an English prelate, was the nephew of the preceding. He received his education at Caius-college, Cambridge, where he took his doctor's degree in 1747. He became successively archdeacon of Colchester, prebendary of Salisbury, rector of St. Andrew, Undershaft, and of St. George, Hanover-square. In 1766, he was consecrated bishop of St. David's, from whence, in 1774, he was translated to Bath and Wells. He died in 1802. Besides some sermons, and a charge, he published a tract, entitled, "The Evidence of the Resurrection cleared from the Exceptions of a late Pamphlet." This was a vindication of bishop Sherlock's "Trial of the Witnesses," against Chubb. Dr. Moss also preached the Boyle's Lecture. His son became bishop of Oxford, and died in 1811.—W. B.

MOTHE LE VAYER, Francis de la, counsellor of state, and preceptor to the duke of Anjou, only brother to Lewis XIV. was born 1588, at Paris. He distinguished himself early by his learning, and in 1639, was admitted member of the French academy. He enjoyed the friendship and patronage of Richelieu, and Mazarine, and was appointed to places of honour and distinction. Though very regular and exemplary in his conduct, it has been observed that he was occasionally licentious in his writings. The death of an only son at the age of 35 afflicted him very severely, but he, however, soon after, though 75 years old, took a second wife. He died 1672. His works, collected by his son, and dedicated to Mazarine, appeared in 1663. The best edition is that of 1669, in 15 vols. 12mo. No French writer, more than he, says Bayle, approaches nearer to Plutarch. Beautiful thoughts and solid arguments are every where interwoven in his writings.

MOTHE LE VATER, de Boutigni, of the same family as the preceding, was master of requests, and wrote a dissertation on the Authority of Kings—a tragedy,—and Thersis and Zelie, a popular romance. He died 1585.

MOTHERBY, George, an English physician, best known by his popular work, the Medical Dictionary, fol. He died 1793, aged 62.

MOTTE, Anthony Houdart de la, an ingenious Frenchman, member of the French academy, was born at Paris, 17th Jan. 1672. He studied the law, but quitted it for poetry and literature, and at the age of 20 he produced "les Originaux," a comedy, ill received by the public, which so disgusted him with the world, that he retired to the abbey of la Trappe, with the intention to live in retirement and devotion. Other ideas, however, soon prevailed, and his other productions met with a more favourable treatment from the public. He had many friends, but his literary enemies were more numerous than his admirers, and if he had not acquired celebrity by his writings he would have obtained it from the attacks of Racine, Boileau, Rousseau, and others. His "Discours sur Homere," is a masterly performance, but it was attacked by Madame Dacier, and with great spirit, but with moderation defended by the author in his "Reflexions sur la Critique." He became blind in his old age, and died 26th Dec. 1731, universally regretted. His works, consisting of epic poetry, tragedy, comedy, lyrics, &c. besides critical and academical discourses, and other prose compositions, were edited in 11 large vols. 8vo. 1754. He was, says Voltaire, of a solid and comprehensive rather than of a sublime genius. His prose possessed delicacy and method, but his poetry often is destitute of fire and elegance.

MOTTEUX, Peter Anthony, a French writer, born at Rouen, in Normandy, 1660. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes he came to England, where he became a respectable merchant, and acquired such a perfect knowledge of the language that he wrote in it various things, among them a translation of Don Quixote, poems, and dramatic pieces. He was found dead in a disorderly house in the parish of St. Clement Danes, on his birthday, 19th Feb. 1717-8, and was supposed to have been murdered.

MOTTEVILLE, Frances Bertrand, dame de, a French lady, born in Normandy, 1615. She was patronised by Anne of Austria, and though for a while banished from court by the jealousy of Richelieu, she was afterwards restored to favour, and wrote the "Memoirs" of her mistress, in 5 vols. 12mo. which have frequently been reprinted. She died at Paris, 1689.

MOTTLEY, John, an English gentleman, whose father followed the fortunes of James II. was born in England, 1692. He was early disappointed of some places under government, which though solemnly promised to him, were bestowed, through greater interest and favour, on others; and in the midst of his wants he applied to his pen for support. He wrote five dramatic pieces, which were received with some applause, and also the life of the Czar Peter. He died 30th Oct. 1750.

MOUCHERON, Isaac, a painter, born at Amsterdam, where he died 1744, aged 74. His landscapes, especially those of Italy, were much admired.

MOUFET, Thomas, a medical writer, the first who introduced chymical medicines in England. He studied for some time at Cambridge, but took his doctor's degree abroad, and settled at Ipswich. The latter part of his life was spent at Bulbridge, near Wilton, in the retinue of the Pembroke family. He died about 1600. He is known for his "Theatrum Insectorum," fol. 1634, a work praised by Ray, though censured by Lister.

MOUHY, Charles de Fieux, a native of Metz, member of the academy of Dijon. He wrote several romances of no great merit, but to excite the public attention he gave to his works the title of some celebrated composition, as la Paysanne Parvenue, 4 vols. 12mo. after Miravaux's Paysan Parvenu—Mille et une faveurs, 8 vols. 12mo. after Mille et une Nuits, &c. He wrote besides, Memoires d'une Fille de Qualite, 4 vols. 12mo.—Tablettes Dramatiques, &c. and died at Paris, 29th Feb. 1784, aged 82.

MOULIN, Charles du. Vid. MOLINÆUS.

MOULIN, Peter du, a protestant divine. Vid. MOLINÆUS.

MOULIN, Peter du, son of the preceding, was chaplain to Charles II. and prebendary of Canterbury. He died 1684, aged 84. He was author of "The Peace of the Soul," 12mo.—Clamor Regii Sanguinis, ascribed by Milton to Alexander More—a Defence of the Protestant Religion.

MOULIN, Lewis, brother to the preceding, wrote Parænesis ad Ædificatores Imperii, dedicated to Cromwell—Patronus Bonæ Fidei, against the church of England. He was a violent independent, and died 1680, aged 77.

MOULIN, Gabriel, a catholic minister of Maneval, in the diocess of Lisieux. He wrote the History of Normandy, under the Dukes, 1631, folio—History of the Norman Conquests in Naples and Sicily, 1658, folio.

MOULTRIE, William, governor of South Carolina, and a major-general in the army of the revolution, entered the service of his country as early as the Cherokee war in 1760, in the last campaign of which he commanded a company. At the opening of the war of the revolution he was appointed to the colonelcy of the second regiment of South Carolina. He commanded the fortifications at Sullivan's Island at the memorable assault by the British on the 28th of June, 1776, when he repulsed their forces. In reward for his eminent services on that occasion he received the thanks of congress, and the fort was afterwards called by his name. In the battle near Beaufort, in 1779, he gained a victory over the British, and in 1780 was the second in command in Charleston during its siege. After the close of the war he was repeatedly chosen governor. He died on the 27th September, 1805. He published memoirs of the revolution in the Carolinas and Georgia, consisting chiefly of official letters. ☞ L.

MOUNTFORT, William, a native of Staffordshire, known as an actor and as a dramatic writer. He possessed great comic powers, and once displayed them with effect before lord Jefferies, and the court of London aldermen, by mimicking the gestures, manners, and delivery of the great lawyers of the times. Cibber speaks with great approbation of his successful exertions in comedy as well as in tragedy, which had not even yet attained their highest excellence at his death. He was basely murdered by captain Hill and lord Mohun, in Norfolk-street in the Strand, in the winter of 1692. Hill immediately escaped, and Mohun, when tried by his peers, was acquitted, as the evidence against him was not sufficiently strong and connected. Mountfort was author of six dramatic pieces.

MOURET, John Joseph, a musician, composer of some very elegant works, was born at Avignon, 1692, and died 1738, at Charenton, near Paris.

MOURGUES, Michael, a French Jesuit, author of a treatise on French Poetry, and on Geometry—and a collection of French bon-mots. He died 1713.

MOURGUES, Matthew de, an ex-jesuit, who wrote in favour of Richelieu, but afterwards deserted him to support the cause of the queen-mother. He died in the hospital of incurables at Paris, 1670. His works are chiefly controversial.

MOUVANS, Paul Richard, a protestant officer, surnamed the Brave. He distinguished himself much in the civil wars of France, and was slain in battle, 1568.

Moxon, Joseph, a native of Wakefield, Yorkshire, who became hydrographer to the second Charles, and died about 1700, aged 73. He wrote several books on navigation, mathematics, astronomy, Mechanical Exercises, or the Doctrine of Handy-work, &c. and for some years taught mathematics in Warwick-lane, London, where he constructed globes, maps, &c.

MOYLE, Walter, an ingenious writer, born in Cornwall, 1672. He was for some time at Oxford, and then entered at the Temple, where he studied the law, and acquired a strong bias in favour of the protestant succession. He was for some time in parliament, where he conducted himself in a very honourable and independent manner, and ably supported the bill for the encouragement of seamen. Retirement, however, was more congenial to him than the bustle of political life, and therefore he removed to his seat at Bake, in Cornwall, and devoted himself assiduously to literary pursuits. He died 9th June, 1721, aged 49, and in 1726 his works appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. edited by Th. Serjeant, esq. and dedicated to his brother, Joseph Moyle. A third volume was added 1727, by his friend, Mr. Hammond. These volumes contain chiefly political pamphlets—dissertations on some of the works of Xenophon and Lucian—besides Remarks on Prideaux's Connexion—letters—and a treatise on the Miracles of the Thundering Legion, &c.

MOYSE, Henry, page to James I. and one of the gentlemen of the privy chamber, was born at Lanerk in Scotland, 1573. He accompanied his master to England, and as he was so near the royal person, he wrote a diary of what he saw and knew, which was published, 1753. He lived in retirement the latter part of life, and died at Edinburgh, 1630.

MOZART, Wolfgang, a German musician, born at Saltzburg, where his father, also an eminent musician, was master of the chapel. He possessed such strong natural powers, that when a child he played before the emperor, and he, in approbation of his great merits, called him the Little Sorcerer. He was in 1763 in London with his father and sister, and after being heard with equal approbation by the king and the English nobility, he returned home three years after, and in 1769 went to Italy, where the pope honoured him with the order of the golden spur. In 1781 he settled at Vienna, where he was liberally patronised by Joseph II. and the court, and where he died 1791, aged 35. Among his popular works, his six sonatas for the harpsichord, published in London, are particularly admired.

MUDGE, John, an ingenious physician, and able mechanic, who settled at Plymouth, where he died 1793, author of a treatise on Catarrhus Coughs, 12mo. &c. He also improved the construction of the reflecting telescope. His brother Thomas acquired celebrity as an ingenious watch and clock maker, on which profession he wrote a treatise. Their father Zachary was minister of St. Andrew's, Plymouth, and an able divine. He wrote a volume of admired sermons—an Essay for a new version of the Psalms, &c.

MUDGE, Zachary, an English divine, was born at Exeter, where he was educated for the ministry, among the dissenters, whom he left, and took orders in the church of England. In 1716 he became master of the grammar-school at Bideford, in Devonshire, where he remained till 1736, when he was elected to the rectory of St. Andrew, Plymouth, with which he held a prebend in the cathedral of Exeter. He died in 1769. Mr. Mudge published a visitation sermon, and a volume of excellent discourses. He left four sons, of whom Thomas, the second, was born at Exeter in 1715, and died in 1794. He served his apprenticeship to Graham, the watchmaker, and became equally eminent in that line with his master; and for his time-keepers, which were adjudged superior to any that had ever been invented, he obtained a parliamentary grant of three thousand pounds. Dr. John Mudge was born at Bideford, and the fourth son of Mr. Zachary Mudge, became a physician at Plymouth. He published "A Dissertation on the inoculated Smallpox;" and a "Treatise on the Catarrhus Cough." He had also a mechanical genius, and received the Copleyan medal from the Royal Society for improvements in the specula of reflecting telescopes. His son, major-general Mudge, was employed on a trigonometrical survey of Great Britain, a considerable portion of which he completed before his death, in 1820. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, in whose Transactions are some of his papers on the great work in which he was engaged.—W. B.

MUDO, Hernandez, a Spanish painter, the pupil of Titian. Though deaf and dumb, he acquired eminence, and was in the service of Philip II. of Spain, who employed him in ornamenting the Escorial, and his other palaces.

MUEHLENBERG, H. M., D.D. was a native of Germany, and came to Pennsylvania in 1742, where he founded the first Lutheran church, and officiated as its senior pastor. He was eminent for his learning and piety. He died at Philadelphia in 1787, aged 76.  L.

MUEHLENBERG, G. Henry Ernest, D.D. son of the preceding, was born at New-Providence, Pennsylvania, Nov. 17, 1753, and was educated at the university of Halle, in Germany. He returned in 1770, and was ordained an assistant pastor of the Lutheran church in Philadelphia. He removed in 1780, and assumed the pastoral care of the Lutheran church in Lancaster, where he continued, distinguished for his talents, piety, and usefulness until his death, May 23, 1815. He was a man of extensive science, and particularly eminent for his knowledge of botany. He enjoyed a correspondence with many of the most distinguished cultivators of natural science, and was a member of several learned societies at home and abroad. His chief works are—Catalogus Plantarum, Gramina Americae Septentrionalis, and Flora Lancastriensis.  L.

MUET, Peter le, a French architect, born at Dijon, 1591. His abilities were employed in fortifying several of the towns of Picardy, and also in the erection of the church of Val de Grace, at Paris, under the auspices of Anne of Austria. He wrote some valuable treatises on architecture, and died at Paris, 1669.

MUGGLETON, Lodovick, an English fanatic, originally a tailor. He pretended to be inspired by inward light, and while he collected followers after him, he made no scruple of damning all those who opposed or differed from his tenets. His fame began to spread about 1650. His books, which were replete with nonsense and impiety, were burnt by the common hangman, and himself pilloried and imprisoned, but not reformed. He died 12th March, 1697, aged 90, and left behind him a sect, which, from the fondness of innovation and mysterious singularity in the vulgar, still subsists.

MUIS, Simeon de, an eminent orientalist, professor of Hebrew at Paris, and author of a Latin Commentary on the Psalms, in 2 vols. 4to. died 1664, aged 57.

MULGRAVE, Constantine Phipps lord. Vid. PHIPPS.

MULLRE, John, an eminent astronomer, called also Regiomontanus. Vid. REGIOMONTANUS.

MULLER, John, a famous Dutch engraver, brought up under Goltzius, whose manner he successfully imitated. His works are much esteemed. He flourished 1600.

MUMMIUS, Lucius, a Roman consul, known for his triumph over Corinth, Thebes, Chalcis, &c. He conveyed the famous pictures and ornaments of the conquered cities to Rome, and died in exile at Delos.

MUNCER, Thomas, a Saxon fanatic, born at Zwickaw, in Misnia. He was one of Luther's disciples, but afterwards preached against him with equal violence as against the pope, and became the leader of the anabaptists. In conjunction with Storck he destroyed the images in the churches, and being, with all his followers, re-baptized naked, he began to regard all things in common, and to abolish all distinctions. Backed by 40,000 enthusiasts, he commanded the sovereign princes of Germany to resign their authority to him, as armed not only with temporal force but with directions from heaven. His devastations were great, till the landgrave of Hesse took up arms. Muncer, with the title of king, met him in the field, promising his associates a complete victory, but after losing 7000 of his followers, he fled to Franchausen, where he was seized, and afterwards executed at Mulhausen, 1525.

MUNCKER, Thomas, the learned author of Mythographi Latini, of an edition of Hyginus with notes, &c. died 1680.

MUNDAY, Antony, a comic poet in the 16th century, of whom little is known. He was in the retinue of the earl of Oxford, and messenger of the queen's bed-chamber. His plays were said to possess merit, but none of them are come down to the present times.

MUNDINUS, a celebrated anatomist, whose work on that subject was published at Paris 1478. He was born at Florence, and died at Bologna 1318.

MUNICH, Burchard Christopher, a native of New Huntorf in Oldenburgh. He learned the art of war under Marlborough and Eugene, and for his bravery at Malplaquet, was made lieutenant-colonel. He was afterwards in the Polish, and then in the Russian service, but after being distinguished by the Czar Peter I. and made marshal by the empress Anne, and acquiring military glory in the wars against the Turks, he was disgraced by Elizabeth in 1741, and sent to Siberia. After 20 years' exile, he was recalled by Peter III. and appeared at court in the same sheep-skin dress which he had worn in his captivity. After being restored to the favour of Peter and Catharine, he lived in retirement, and died 1767, at Riga.

MUNNICKS, John, professor of physic, botany, and anatomy, at Utrecht, and author of a dissertation "de Urinis," &c.; of Chirurgia ad Praxim hodiernam adornata; and de Re Anatomica, died 1711, aged 59.

MUNSTER, Sebastian, a German divine, born at Inghelheim 1489. He studied at Heidelberg and Basil, but after being in the society of the Cordeliers, he attached himself to the tenets of Luther. He published a "Chaldee Grammar and Lexicon; a Talmudic Dictionary;" a Universal Cosmography, folio; and a Latin Version of the Old Testament, for which two last works he was called the Strabo and the Esdras of Germany. He wrote besides other valuable works, but though living in controversial times, he never engaged in theological disputes. He died of the plague at Basil, 1552, aged 63.

MUNTING, Abraham, a learned botanist, author of Phylographia Curiosa, folio; de Herbâ Britannicâ, 4to.; Aloes Historia, 4to. He was born at Groningen, and died 1683, aged 57.

MURALT, Bealt Lewis de, a native of Berne, who died 1760. He travelled over various parts of Europe, and is author of Letters upon the French and English, 2 vols. 12mo. 1726; Fables, 8vo. 1753, &c.

MURAT, Joachim, marshal of France, and king of Naples, was born in 1767, in the department of Lot, France. His father was an innkeeper, and sent him to Thoulouse, with a view to his education for holy orders. But he soon returned and employed himself as an assistant in the inn till about the commencement of the revolution, when he entered the army as a private soldier, and joining the Jacobins, was soon advanced to a lieutenant-colonelcy. He was not long after cashiered, with Buonaparte, and it was at that time that their intimacy commenced. He first distinguished himself in the campaign of Italy, under Buonaparte, where he rose to the rank of general. The reputation which he gained in the campaigns of 1796, 1797, and 1798, led to his being nominated governor of Rome. He attended Buonaparte in the expedition to Egypt, and commanded a division. In 1799, he married a sister of the First Consul. In the war with Austria, which took place soon after, he commanded the vanguard of the army of Italy. In 1801, he was placed at the head of the army of observation, and in 1804, became governor of Paris, and marshal of the empire. He commanded the cavalry in the campaign of 1805, and distinguished himself in the great battles of that year, and afterwards in those of Austerlitz, Jena, and Eylau. In 1806, he became duke of Berg. In 1808, he commanded the French troops in Spain, and on the accession of Joseph Buonaparte to the throne of that kingdom, succeeded him in the sovereignty of Naples with the title of Joachim I. He commanded the French cavalry in the Russian campaign of 1812. In 1814, he joined the cause of the Allies against France, and on their refusing to fulfil the conditions of their treaty, he, at the time of Buonaparte's return from Elba, attempted to revolutionize Italy, and obtain its independence. But his army being defeated, he was at length taken prisoner in Calabria, and being condemned by a court martial, was shot on the 1st of October, 1815, in the 48th year of his age.  L.

MURATORI, Lewis Antony, an Italian writer, born at Vignola in the Bolognese, 1672. He was invited, when only 22, by Charles Borromeus, to be librarian at Milan, and in 1700 he was recalled to Modena by the duke, to take care of his library and to arrange his archives. Thus in the enjoyment of ease and retirement he devoted himself to literature, but he met, like all others, persecution and trouble from his enemies. He was accused of heresy and atheism, and was obliged to justify himself before the pope Benedict XIV. who received his apologies with humanity and friendship, and wrote him a letter of approbation. He died 1750. His works have appeared in 46 vols. folio, and possess great merit. The best known are Anecdota quæ ex Ambrosianæ Bibliothecæ Codicibus nunc primum eruit Notis et Disquisitionibus, &c.; Anecdota Græca, quæ ex MSS. nunc primum eruit; Rerum Italicarum Scriptores ab Anno 500, ad 1500; Antiquitates Italiæ Medii Ævi; Novus Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum; Annali d'Italia; Della Perfetta Poesiana Italiana; le Rime del Petrarca; Italian Poems, &c.

MURETUS, Mark Antony, a learned critic, born at Muret, near Limoges, 11th April, 1526. His abilities early displayed themselves, he read lectures on Cicero and Terence, at Auch, and afterwards visited Agen, Villeneuve, Paris, Poitiers, and Bourdeaux, where he occasionally taught Latin authors for his maintenance. In 1552, he returned to Paris, but while he distinguished himself here by his oratorical and poetical talents, he was accused of an unnatural crime. He fled to Toulouse, where he read lectures on civil law, but here again it is said he forgot his character, and was condemned in 1554, say the registers of Toulouse, to be burnt in effigy with Memmius Fremiot, of Dijon, his associate, as being a huguenot and a sodomite. He escaped from the public indignation to Italy, and after instructing youth for several years at Padua and Venice, he was invited 1560, by cardinal Hippolite d'Est to Rome. Here he led a life of regularity, was honoured with the title of citizen of Rome by pope Gregory XIII. and was so much noticed by his patron that he attended him in 1562, in his office of legate to Paris. At Paris, Muretus acquired celebrity by his lectures on Aristotle's Ethics, and on civil law. In 1576, he became an ecclesiastic and obtained some preferment, and in the latter part of life it is said entered into the society of the Jesuits. He died at Paris 4th June, 1585. His works are numerous, and consist of valuable orations, various readings and translations from Greek authors, especially Aristotle, poems, epistles, &c. all written in a pure, polished, and elegant style. They were collected together and published at Verona, in 5 vols. 8vo. Muretus was the friend and correspondent of various learned men, especially J. C. Scaliger, Lambinus, and others.

MURILLO, Bartholomew, a Spanish painter, born at Seville, 1610. His landscapes and historical pieces were much admired, and compared to those of Paul Veronese, and they obtained for him from the king of Spain a patent of nobility. He died at Madrid, 1682.

MURPHY, Arthur, a dramatic writer of eminence. He was born in Ireland of respectable parents, and educated at the school at St. Omer's, and on his return home he was placed under the care of a relation in London, engaged in commercial pursuits. Business, however, had no attractions for him, and he soon left the house of his friend to devote himself to the labours of a literary life. He had a strong partiality for the stage, but after trying his powers in Othello and other characters, he resigned all pretensions to eminence on the theatre, and he determined to support himself by his pen. He studied the law at Lincoln's-inn, and was called to the bar, but did not practise, as the dramatic muse engaged the whole of his attention. He was particularly successful in his performances; of the 22 pieces which he wrote, most of them were received with the most flattering applause, and several of them are still retained on the stage, and at certain seasons exhibited to the public with increasing celebrity. As a man of letters, he was intimate with the wits of the times, with Foote, Garrick, Johnson, Burke, and others. Of his dramatic pieces, the best known are the Orphan of China; the Grecian Daughter; All in the Wrong; the Way to keep Him; Know your Own Mind; Three Weeks after Marriage; the Apprentice; the Citizen, &c. which procured him with public esteem, both opulence and independence. He wrote besides the Gray's Inn Journal, a weekly paper; the Test; and the Auditor, in favour of government; a Reply to Churchill's illiberal attack upon him; and he evinced his abilities as a learned scholar by his elegant translation of Tacitus, in 4 vols.; and Latin versions of the Temple of Fame; of Gray's Elegy, &c. He wrote also Garrick's Life. The three last years of his life his services to government were rewarded by a pension of 200*l.* a year, and he was also a commissioner of bankrupts. In his manners he was affable and polite, and his urbanity was seasoned by an inexhaustible fund of anecdote. He died at his house in Brompton-row, Knightsbridge, 18th June, 1805, aged 78.

MURRAY, James, earl of, natural son of James V. of Scotland, by the daughter of the earl of Mar, was born in 1529, and created earl of Murray by Mary queen of Scots. He proved the ingratitude of his heart by his barbarous conduct towards this unhappy princess, against whom he excited the nobles of the kingdom. On the flight and disgrace of Mary he was appointed regent of the kingdom during the minority of the young king, 1567, and he was shot four years after at Linlithgow, by Hamilton, a gentleman whose wife he had seduced.

MURRAY, Thomas, a Scotch portrait painter. He possessed abilities, and was patronised by the royal family and the nobility, and died 1724, aged 58.

MURRAY, William, a Scotch divine, who settled at Birmingham as a dissenting minister. He wrote Closet Devotions, 12mo. and died 1753, aged 62.

MURRAY, James, a native of Dunkeld, educated at Aberdeen, where he took the degree of M.A. He refused preferment at home, and settled in London, where he preached to a congregation in Swallow-street. He was author of Aletheia, or System of Moral Truths, 4 vols. 12mo. and he died 1753, aged 55. Another dissenting divine of that name wrote History of the American War, 4 vols. 8vo.; Sermons to Asses, 12mo.; History of the Churches of England and Scotland, 3 vols. and died 1782.

MURRAY, William, earl of Mansfield, a celebrated lawyer, fourth son of David, viscount Stormont, was born 2d March, 1705, at Perth, in Scotland. He was educated at Westminster school, and in 1723, was elected to Christ Church, Oxford. He took his master's degree in 1730, and then went on his travels, and at his return, entered at Lincoln's inn, and was called to the bar. He gradually rose to eminence, and distinguished himself as an eloquent orator, both at the bar and in the house of commons. He was in 1742, appointed solicitor general, and during the trial of lord Lovat before the peers, he displayed so much candour and liberality, that he received the thanks of the accused as well as of the president of the court, lord Talbot. In 1754 he succeeded to the office of attorney general, and two years after was raised to the dignity of chief justice of the king's bench, and soon after created baron Mansfield. In the unsettled state of public affairs in 1757, he held for a little time the office of chancellor of the exchequer, till by a coalition of parties, an efficient ministry was formed, whose vigour and wisdom upheld the glory of the British arms, and the honour of the nation. For some years after the accession of George III. this upright magistrate was attacked by malevolent insinuations, but the slanders of malice, and the virulence of party, failed to influence his conduct, or to interrupt that sedulous attention which he paid to the affairs of his office. To this unworthy treatment he alluded in pathetic, but firm language, on the business of Wilkes' outlawry, and concluded by observing that he honoured the king, respected the people, but that many things acquired by the favour of either were not worth his ambition, and that he wished popularity, but such popularity as followed not that which is run after. He was three times offered the great seal, which he declined, and in 1776, he was created an earl, with remainder to his nephews by lady Stormont. In 1780, when London exhibited a scene of tumult, devastation, and plunder, his house in Bloomsbury-square became an object of popular fury, and was burnt down by the mob, and together with it a very large collection of books and valuable manuscripts. For these, however, when offered an honourable compensation by a vote of the commons, he refused to accept any thing, but devoted himself with increasing assiduity to the labours of his high office. After filling with unusual activity and unshaken integrity this elevated situation for many years, the infirmities of age became so great that he resigned it in January, 1783, and in his honourable retirement was accompanied with the respect not only of the bar, but of the whole nation. This venerable man retained his faculties to the last, amidst the gradual decay of nature, and expired at his seat at Caenwood, 20th March, 1793, in the 89th year of his age. He was buried privately, according to his desire, in Westminster-abbey. As he had no children, his title descended to his nephew lord Stormont, who also inherited his immense fortune. The character of lord Mansfield stands high in the records of fame, for integrity, wisdom, and sagacious discernment. Whilst he presided in the king's bench, the court was remarkable for the regularity, the punctuality, and the despatch which his attentive mind introduced. With such impartiality were his decisions given, that only in two cases, where the opinions of the judges were very discordant, the judgment of the court has been reversed, and therefore among those who have devoted the energies of their mind to promote the happiness and the good order of society, few will appear more entitled to the reverence and homage of applauding posterity, than lord Mansfield.

MURRAY, Joseph, was for some time one of his Majesty's council and attorney-general in New-York, and at his death bequeathed his whole property, amounting in value to about 25,000 dollars, to King's college.  L.

MURRAY, William Vans, minister of the United States to the republic of Batavia, was born in Maryland about the year 1761. In 1783 he went to London and entered a student of law at the Temple, where he remained three years. On returning to his native state he engaged in the practice of law, but was, in 1791, appointed to a seat in congress, which he held for a number of years, and became greatly distinguished by his eloquence. Near the close of general Washington's administration, he was appointed minister to the Batavian republic, where he discharged the duties of his situation with ability, and procured from the French charge d'affairs at the Hague, some advances toward a restoration of harmony between this country and France, on the communication of which to the American government, Mr. Murray was appointed envoy extraordinary to France to negotiate a treaty. He was soon joined by Mr. Ellsworth and general Davie, and co-operated with them in forming the treaty of 1800. He afterwards returned to the Hague, but was soon recalled from its having become unnecessary to maintain a minister at that place. Soon after his return to Maryland, his health declined, and his death took place on the 11th December, 1803. He possessed great keenness of wit, brilliancy of fancy, and delicacy of taste, and had well stored his mind with science and literature.

MURRAY, James, major in the British service in India, was born in Rhode-Island about the year 1765. His original name was Lillibridge, which he changed for that of Murray, on account of some dissatisfaction with his relatives. He went to sea in early life, and after pursuing that occupation several years, about the year 1790 visited Tranquebar on the Coromandel coast. Learning that the Mahratta chiefs were desirous of obtaining foreigners to discipline their troops, he passed into their territory, and, meeting with a flattering reception, engaged in their service, and soon distinguished himself by his courage and activity. He continued there fifteen years, during which he was engaged in a great variety of enterprises, and encountered every species of hardship and peril. He at length collected a large body of cavalry in his own name, took possession of a considerable district of country, and established himself as an independent sovereign. On the breaking out of the war between the British and India, he joined the British with his forces, and rendered them the most important services. At the close of that war, having accumulated a large fortune, he resolved to return to his native country, and proceeded with that design to Calcutta, where he died in 1806.

MURRAY, John, jun. a philanthropist, was born in the city of New-York, on the 3d of August, 1758, and was a brother of Lindley Murray, of York, England, the distinguished grammarian. He received a respectable education, and established himself in merchandise at an early age in New-York. After a few years he withdrew from business, satisfied with his accumulations, and nobly devoted his income and life to the cause of philanthropy. He was for thirty-seven years a governor of the New-York Hospital, took an active part in procuring the formation of the society for the manumission of slaves, in promoting the instruction of the aboriginal inhabitants in the state of New-York, and in procuring the repeal of the criminal code of that state, and the establishment of the penitentiary system of punishment. He was the principal means of founding the New-York Free-school society, and was for some time its vice-president, and co-operated in the establishment of most of the charitable institutions which exist in that city, and to them, and a variety of other charitable objects, made liberal benefactions. He was characterised by great modesty, amiableness of disposition and manners, the most scrupulous integrity, friendliness to Christians of every denomination, and great benevolence. He belonged to the society of Friends, and gave happy evidence of practical piety. He died on the 4th of August, 1819.

MURTOLA, Gaspard, an Italian poet, born at Genoa. His poem on the creation of the world, exposed him to the censures of Marini, a contemporary poet; but after mutual abuse, Murtola at last attacked personally his antagonist, and fired a pistol at him, and nearly killed him. He wrote besides, a Latin poem, Nutriciarum Libri tres—a poem on Janus, &c. and died at Rome, 1624.

MUSA, Antonius, a Greek physician in the service of Augustus. He acquired some reputation by first recommending the use of the cold bath, till the death of Marcellus brought this salutary plan into disrepute. Two tracts de Herbâ Botan.—de Valetudine tuendâ, are ascribed to him.

MUSEUS, a celebrated poet of Greece before the age of Homer. The loves of Hero and Leander, preserved under his name, was the work of a more modern poet.

MUSCHENBROECK, Peter de, a celebrated natural philosopher and mathematician, born at Utrecht, 1692. He was professor of philosophy and mathematics in his native town, and afterwards at Leyden, and was honoured with a seat in the Royal society of London, and the academy of sciences at Paris. He died at Leyden full of reputation and literary honours. He wrote Tentamina Experimentorum, 4to.—Institutiones Physicæ, 4to.—Compendium Physicæ Experimentalis, 12mo. and a course of natural and experimental philosophy very much esteemed, and translated into English by Colson, 2 vols. 8vo.

MUSCULUS, Wolfgangus, a famous divine, born at Dieuze, in Lorraine, 1497. He was very poor, and taken out of charity among the Benedictines, whose society he forsook on embracing the tenets of Luther. He retired to Strasburg, where he married, but the narrowness of his circumstances obliged him to work for his bread, and while he gained applause as a preacher on a Sunday, he was under the necessity of labouring the rest of the week in transcribing the works of Bucer, who kindly entertained him in his house. From Strasburg he went, in 1534, to Augsburg, where his eloquence was so powerful that the magistrates expelled their popish ministers. In 1548, however, Charles V. restored the catholic rites at Augsburg, and Musculus fled to Switzerland, where the magistrates of Bern promoted him to the divinity chair in their city. He died there August 30th, 1563. He was a man of great learning, though he was 32 years old before he became acquainted with Greek, and 40 with Hebrew, and his abilities as a disputant were also successfully employed in ecclesiastical conferences. He wrote commentaries on some of the Scriptures, and translated some of the works of the fathers into Latin.

MUSCULUS, Andrew, a Lutheran divine, professor at Frankfort on the Oder. He was born at Schneberg, in Misnia, and died 1580. He wrote various books, and affected to understand well the prophecies of Scripture.

MUSGRAVE, William, a physician and antiquary, born at Charlton Musgrave, Somersetshire, 1657. He was educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, where he became fellow, and took his degree of M.D. 1689. He was made secretary to the Royal Society 1684, and member of the college of physicians, and in 1691 he settled at Exeter, where he practised with great reputation, and died 23d Dec. 1721. His works were de Arthritide, &c.—de Legionibus Epistola—de Aquilis Romanis—Geta Britannicus, &c.—Belgium Britannicum, &c. His son was also a physician at Exeter, and wrote some critical pieces. He brought himself into public notice by charging the ministry with bribery, at the peace of 1763, which he could not substantiate when brought before the commons. He died 1777.

MUSIUS, Cornelius, professor of belles lettres and languages in Flanders, was born at Delft, 1503. He was afterwards placed at the head of a convent at home, and put to an ignominious and barbarous death, on account of his religion, by William Lumei, 1572. He was author of some poems much admired.

MUSSASA, a warlike princess, who succeeded her father Dongy as sovereign of Congo. She dressed herself in a male habit, and often conducted her soldiers to battle and to victory, and extended far the boundaries of her empire. She flourished in the 17th century.

MUSSATI, Albertin, a historian and poet, of Padua, minister to the emperor Henry VII. was author of de Gestis Henrici VII. Imperat.—de Gestis Italorum post Henricum, and died 1329. His works were edited at Venice, 1636, folio.

MUSO, Cornelius, a famous preacher, made bishop of Bitonto by Pope Paul IV. and sent to assist at the council of Trent. He was born at Placentia, 1511, and died at Rome, 9th Jan. 1574. His sermons are curious, and contain quotations from Homer, and other mythological writers, as much as from the Scriptures.

MUSTAPHA I. succeeded his brother Achmet as emperor of Turkey, 1617, and was at last strangled, 1623, by his janissaries, after being deposed, and again reinstated, during a turbulent reign of six years.

MUSTAPHA II. son of the fourth Mahomet, succeeded after his uncle Achmet II. 1695. He was an able warrior, and after defeating the Imperialists at Temeswar, he attacked the Venetians, Poles, and Russians with success, till a change of fortune rendered him unpopular, and obliged him to make peace. He retired to Adrianople, where he forgot himself in luxury and lascivious pleasures, till a dreadful revolt of his subjects compelled him to descend from the throne, 1703. He died of melancholy six months after.

MUSTAPHA III. son of Achmet III. succeeded to the Turkish throne, 1757. He spent his time in the pleasures of his seraglio, and left the cares of government to his ministers and favourites. He died 1774, before the conclusion of that fatal war which had been kindled between him and the Russians.

MUSURUS, Marcus, a learned native of Candia, who taught Greek in the universities of Venice, Padua, and Rome, and contributed much to the revival of letters. He was made bishop of Malvazia, in the Morea, by pope Leo X. and died of a dropsy soon after, 1517. He was the intimate friend of Erasmus, and to his critical knowledge the public was indebted for the first edition of Aristophanes and Athenæus. He published also, Etymologicum Magnum Græcorum, a valuable work, printed at Venice, folio, 1499, and Heidelberg, 1594.

MUTIAN, Jeremy, a painter, born at Brescia, 1528. He studied the manner of Titian, and his landscapes and historical pieces were much admired. He died at Rome, 1590.

MUTIUS, Cælius Scævola, an illustrious Roman, distinguished for his attack on Porsenna, who had threatened the destruction of Rome.

MUTIUS, Hulric, historical professor of Basil, was author of a History of Germany, printed at Basil, 1539.

MUY, Louis Nicolas Victor count de, a native of Marseilles, who acquired celebrity in the military profession, and signalized himself by his valour in the battles of Fontenoy, of Hastenback, of Crevelt, and of Minden. He was raised for his services to the rank of marshal of France, and of war minister, but died soon after of the stone, 10th Oct. 1775, aged 64.

MUYS, William, a native of Sleenvick, Over-yssel, who was successively promoted to the chairs of medicine, chymistry, and botany, at Franeker, where he died 1744. He was an able writer, and gave to the world, besides orations, &c. Elements of Natural Philosophy, 4to.—Inventio Fabricæ quæ in Partibus Musculos componentibus extat, 4to.—de Virtute Seminali quæ Plantæ et Animalia Generi suo propagand. sufficiunt.

MUZIO, Jerome, a native of Padua, author of Della Vergeriane, lib. 4, 1559. 8vo.—di Fesa Della Messa, &c.—Lettere Catoliche—le Mentite Ochiniane against Olpinus—il Duello et la Faustina—Notes on Petrarch, &c. He also wrote against the protestants, and died 1576.

MYDORGE, Claude, a native of Paris, eminent as a mathematician. He ably defended his friend Des Cartes, against the Jesuits, and published four books on Conic Sections, and other works. He died 1647, aged 62.

MYLNE, Robert, an architect, was born 1734, at Edinburgh, where his father was of the same profession, and a magistrate of the city. The son went to Rome for improvement, and during his residence there gained the first prize in the architectural class at St. Luke's academy, of which he was elected a member. He was also chosen a member of the academies of Florence and Bologna. On his return home he settled in London, and was selected to build Blackfriar's bridge. He was also appointed surveyor of St. Paul's cathedral, and built a number of fine seats in different parts of the country. He died in 1811.—W. B.

MYN, Herbert Vander, a Dutch painter of Amsterdam. His flowers, &c. as well as his portraits and historical pieces, were deservedly admired. He died 1741, aged 57.

MYREPSUS, Nicolas, a physician of Alexandria in the 13th century. He collected a "Pharmacopœia," from the writings of Greek and Arabic physicians, which was for some time much followed among medical men in Europe. It was translated from the Greek into Latin, by Fusch, and published, 1658.

MYSON, a celebrated Greek philosopher, placed by some among the seven wise men.

MYTENS, Arnold, a native of Brussels, eminent as a painter. His best pieces adorn the churches of Italy. He died 1602, aged 61.

MYTENS, Martin, a native of Stockholm, known as a painter. Though liberally invited by Peter the Great, whose portrait he took, to settle in Russia, he refused it, and after visiting Italy and other parts of Europe, he lived at Vienna, highly and deservedly respected by the emperor Charles VI. and by the court. He died there 1755, aged 60.

NÆV

NABI-EFFENDI, a Turkish poet of great merit. He was well acquainted with the classic writers of Greece and Rome, and gained applause by his poems. He flourished in the 17th century.

NABIS, king of Lacedæmon, disgraced himself by his cruelties and extortions. He was put to death B.C. 194.

NABONASSAR, a king of Babylon, supposed to be the Baladan of Scripture. His name is celebrated in history as the founder of that epoch which began B.C. 747.

NABOPOLOSSAR, king of Babylon, invaded and divided the kingdom of Syria with Astyages, B.C. 626. He was afterwards defeated by Necho, king of Egypt, and died after a reign of 21 years.

NÆVIUS, Cneius, a Latin poet, banished from Rome by the consul Metellus, who was offended by the satire of his comedies. He died at Utica, B.C. 230.

NAI

NAHUM, one of the minor prophets, born at Elkost in Galilee. He prophesied in the reign of Hezekiah, and directed his predictions against Nineveh. His language is bold and animated, possessing fire and sublimity.

NAIRON, Faustus, a Maronite, nephew of Ecchelensis, and professor of Syriac in the Sapienza college, at Rome, where he died, 1711, aged 80. He wrote Euoplia Fidei Catholicæ, &c. 1694—Dissertatio de Maronitarum Origine, &c. 1679. He maintains, in these books, that the Maronites have preserved inviolate the Christian faith from the time of the apostles, and that that they derive their name not from Maro, the Monothelite, who died 707, but from St. Maro, an Anachoret of the fourth century.

NALSON, Valentine, a native of Malton, Yorkshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and made prebendary of York, and rector of St. Mary there. He wrote a volume of sermons, &c. and died 1724, aged 83.

NALTON, James, minister of St. Leonard's, Foster-lane, was concerned in Love's plot, and fled to Holland. He was afterwards ejected for nonconformity, 1662, and died the next year of a dreadful melancholy. Some of his sermons were published.

NANCEL, Nicholas de, a native of Nancel, near Soissons, who became a physician of some eminence, and after practising in several towns, settled at the abbey of Fontevault, where he died, 1610. He wrote Stichologia Græca Latinaque, &c. 8vo.—The Life of Peter Ramus—De Immortalitate Animæ, 8vo. &c.

NANFAN, John, governor of New-York under the earl of Bellamont, was a kinsman of that nobleman, and assumed the administration after his death in May, 1701. Lord Cornbury succeeded him in 1702. During the short period that he was in power great dissensions existed in the colony.

NANI, John Baptist, a Venetian noble, proctor of St. Mark, was born 30th Aug. 1616. He was, through his abilities, admitted into the college of senators, 1641, and went as ambassador to France, and in that capacity had such influence upon Mazarine, that he obtained from the French court succours in men and money, to continue the war against the Turks in Candia. He was afterwards ambassador to the emperor, and received the highest approbation from his fellow-citizens, who appointed him, for his services, proctor of St. Mark, and captain general of the marine. He died, much respected, 5th Nov. 1678. He was the author of a History of Venice, undertaken at the request of the senate, the best edition of which is that of 1679, 2 vols. 4to. He wrote also an account of his embassy in France.

NANNIUS, Peter, born at Alcaer, 1500, was professor at Louvain, and died 1557. He wrote Learned Notes on Classic Authors—Miscellaneorum Decas, &c. 8vo.—Dialogues on Heroines, 4to. an excellent work—Paraphrase on the Canticles—a translation of the Psalms into Latin verse.

NANQUIER, Simon, a French poet in the 16th century. He chiefly excelled in Latin composition, and his epigrams—his poem De Lubrico Temporis Curriculo, &c. possess merit.

NANTIGNI, Lewis Chazot de, a French writer, author of Historical Genealogies of Kings, Emperors, and other Sovereigns of Europe, 4 vols. 4to.—Geographical Tables. 12mo.—Genealogies in the Supplement to Moreri, 1749—Historical, Genealogical, and Chronological Tables, 9 vols. He died at Paris, after being blind three years, 1755, aged 65.

NANTUEIL, Robert, a French painter and engraver of eminence, born at Rheims, 1630. He was well educated, though his father was poor, but his exertions were not sufficiently rewarded at home, and therefore he went to Paris, in quest of employment and patronage. He particularly excelled in taking likenesses in crayons, and his portrait of Lewis XIV. was executed with such dexterity and elegance, that the monarch liberally rewarded him with 100 louis, and gave him a pension, with the new appointment of designer and engraver to his cabinet. Thus patronised, he soon gained a considerable fortune, and in the gratitude of his heart, sent for his aged father to share his honours and his independence. He died at Paris, Dec. 18th, 1678. His works have been collected, and consist of about 240 prints.

NAOGEORGUS, Thomas, a native of Straubingen, in Bavaria, 1511. His real name was Kirchmayer, but was altered according to the fashion of the times. His satires, which possessed merit, were chiefly directed against the papists, and their many irregularities. His best work is Regnum Papisticum, 1559, 8vo. He died 1578.

NAPIER, or NEPER, John, baron of Merchiston, was born near Edinburgh, 1550. He studied at the university of St. Andrews, and after making the tour of France, Italy, and Germany, he returned to Scotland, and devoted himself assiduously to mathematical pursuits. His abilities were of a superior cast, and he has rendered his name immortal by the discovery of logarithms, published 1614. This science was afterwards further improved by himself, and also by Mr. Briggs, geometrical professor of Gresham college. Lord Napier published also a useful work, called Rabdology and Promptuary. His invention of the five circular parts in trigonometry, and the mode of calculation by rods, called Napier's rods, or bones, were very ingenious contrivances. He is also author of an "Essay on the Apocalypse," which proves his knowledge of theology in a very honourable degree. He died at Manchester, 1617. His life has been written by lord Buchan.

NARES, James, doctor of music, and brother to judge Nares, was born at Stanwell, Middlesex, 1715. He was one of the choristers of the royal chapel, and studied under Mr. Gates, and afterwards Dr. Pepusch, and in 1734 became organist at York. In 1755 he was appointed organist and composer to the king, in the room of Dr. Green, and the next year he took his musical degree at Cambridge, and in 1757 was made master of the choristers, which he resigned, in 1780, to his pupil and friend, Dr. Ayrton. He died, 10th Feb. 1783. He was highly respected by the great, and by men of learning, and his works are much admired, especially the Royal Pastoral, an ode, the words of which were written by Mr. Bellamy.

NARSES, king of Persia after his father Varanes, was successful against the Romans, but afterwards was defeated. He died A. D. 303.

NARSES, a Persian eunuch, in the service of the Roman emperors. He bravely headed their armies against the Goths, whom he defeated, A. D. 552.

NASH, Thomas, an ingenious writer, born at Leostoff, in Suffolk, and educated at Cambridge. He took orders, but his irregularities were in the way of his preferment. His poems, chiefly directed against the puritans, and especially his "Pierce Pennyless," possess merit, but with their satire, breathe nothing but disappointment and disgust at the ingratitude of mankind. He died about 1600.

NASH, Richard, an extraordinary character, born at Swansea, Glamorganshire, 18th Oct. 1674. From Caermarthen school he went to Jesus college, Oxford, where he became known more for his love of pleasure, and his intrigues, than for his application or industry. From college, where his extravagances gave offence to his superiors, he entered the army, and obtained a pair of colours; but this profession he soon relinquished for a town life, and the study of the law at the Temple. Admired and courted as a jovial companion, he became the arbiter elegantiarum of the fashionable world, and when the Middle Temple, according to custom, exhibited an entertainment for king William, Nash had the management of the ceremony, which was so well conducted that the monarch offered him the honour of knighthood, which he declined. In 1704 Nash went to Bath, which now began to be a place of resort, and being elected master of ceremonies, by the influence of his friends, and the popularity of his own character, he soon made that city the resort of the gay, the fashionable, and the opulent. Under his direction the greatest regularity was made to prevail in the public rooms, and Bath, lately known to few, became the centre of attraction for persons in the higher rank of life. In the midst of this gay assemblage, Nash supported his expenses chiefly from the gaming table; but with this vicious propensity predominant in his character, he was humane, generous, and charitable, and though persecuted by creditors, he has often been known to bestow on the cravings of indigence, what was due from him to patient industry. Flattered with the appellation of the king of Bath, and called, in his gayer days, beau Nash, this empire of fashion continued his career of genteel dissipation, though his income was precarious, and his resources depended on chance. In the decline of life it is said that he became very poor, and that the presents which formerly he had received from the partiality of the great, and the favour of the opulent, were all disposed of to support his necessities. His last moments brought with them unpleasing reflections, and he expired in great agitation of mind, 3d Feb. 1761, aged 87. As he had so much contributed to the celebrity of Bath, and had been the chief promoter of the building of a hospital, the people of the city showed due respect to his remains, which were conveyed with becoming funeral pomp to the abbey church, and there interred.

NASH, Francis, a brigadier general in the revolutionary army, was a captain in Fanning's regiment, in the expedition of governor Tryon against the Regulators of North Carolina in 1771. He distinguished himself by his firmness and address in maintaining his position in the battle of the 16th May, when the whole of the regiment with the exception of his company gave way. It was to a few men of bravery, of which number he was one, that the colony was indebted for the suppression of that insurrection. In September, 1775, he was appointed colonel of a regiment by the convention of North Carolina, and brigadier general of the troop of that state on the continental establishment in Feb. 1777. He was killed at the head of his brigade in the battle of Germantown, October 4th, 1777.

NASINI, Joseph Nicholas, a native of Siena. He studied painting under Ciro Ferri, and his abilities were employed in historical works by the grand duke of Tuscany. He died 1736, aged 76.

NASMITH, James, a divine, was born at Norwich in 1740, and educated at Bene't-college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1773 he was presented to the living of St. Mary Abchurch, which he exchanged for Snailwell in Cambridgeshire. He took the degree of doctor in divinity in 1797; and his last preferment was the rectory of Leverington, in the isle of Ely, where he died in 1808. Dr. Nasmith published "A Catalogue of Bene't college Library;" an edition of the "Itineraries of Simon and William of Worcester," Svo.; a new edition of Tanner's "Notitia Monastica;" a pamphlet entitled "An Examination of the Statutes relating to the Assize of Bread," &c.—W. B.

NATALIS, Michael, an engraver of Liege,

From the house of his father, who instructed him in the art of engraving, he went to Rome, and studied under Joachim Sandraart. His engraved representations of statues, after the paintings of Rubens, Titian, &c. from the Justinian gallery, were much admired. He died 1670, aged 61.

NATHAN, a prophet in the age of David. The pathetic parable of the poor man's lamb, by which he reproved that monarch's cruel and unmanly murder of Uriah, and his adulterous intercourse with Bathsheba, his wife, is well known.

NATHAN, Isaac, or Mordecai, the first who published a Hebrew Concordance, which he completed 1448, after 10 years' labour. It was first printed at Venice, 1523, and afterwards improved by Buxtorf, and edited Basil, 1632.

NATTIER, John Mark le, a French painter, born 17th March, 1685. His designs for the Luxemburg gallery have been engraved and printed, 1 vol. fol. 1710. He was professor in the academy of painting, and was patronised by Lewis, but he declined the liberal invitations of the Czar Peter to settle in Russia. He died 1766, leaving three daughters.

NATTIER, Lawrence, a native of Bilberach, in Swabia, who engraved entaglios, and published a book of ancient gems. He died at Petersburg of an asthma, 27th Dec. 1763.

NAVAGERO, Andrew, a noble Venetian, whose abilities were employed as ambassador to Francis I. He died of a fever at Blois, 1529, aged 44. He was engaged in writing the History of Venice, but burnt the work in his last illness. His poems are preserved in the "Carmina Poetarum Italarum," and his other works were printed at Padua, 1718, 4to.

NAVAGERO, Bernard, of the same family as the preceding, was bishop of Verona, and a cardinal. He assisted at the council of Trent, and died 1565, aged 58. He wrote the Life of pope Paul IV.

NAVARE, Peter, a famous warrior in the 16th century. He was born in Biscay, of an obscure family, and after being for some time a seaman, he entered into the service of cardinal Aragon as valet. He next served in the army of the Florentines, and then engaged in the sea service, where he distinguished himself by his valour. Known for his bravery, he was employed by Gonsalvo de Cordova in the Neapolitan wars as captain, and he contributed much to the taking of Naples by the judicious management of a mine. His services were rewarded by the emperor, who gave him the domains of Alveto, in Naples, from which he assumed the name of Navarre. He afterwards sailed in an expedition against the Moors of Africa, and took possession of Oran, Tripoli, and other fortified places ; but part of his army was defeated by the Moorish cavalry. His campaigns in Italy afterwards were unfortunate, and he was taken at the battle of Ravenna, 1512, and for two years endured captivity in France. The ill treatment of the Spanish king determined him to enter into the service of Francis I. and he distinguished himself in several expeditions, but in his attempt to relieve Genoa he was taken by the imperial troops. For three years he languished in the dungeons of Cef, till the treaty of Madrid set him free. He was at the siege of Naples in 1528 under Lautrec, and was taken prisoner at the retreat of Aversa, and again sent to the dungeons of Cef. Here his life was spared by the duke of Orange, and either in compassion for his misfortunes and his valour, or because he was labouring under a severe illness, he was not beheaded with the rest of the captives who were devoted to destruction. He died soon after, though some assert that he was strangled in his bed, in an advanced age. An account of his life has been published by Paul Jovius, and by Philip Tomasini. His remains were honoured in the 17th century by a splendid monument in the church of St. Mary the Neuve, in Naples, by the duke of Sessa.

NAVARETTA, Ferdinand, a Spanish Dominican of Old Castile, whose eloquence was employed as a missionary in China, 1659. He was well acquainted with the language of the country, and on his return to Spain 1672, he went before the pope to account for his mission. He was made by Charles II. archbishop of St. Domingo, where he died 1689. He printed at Madrid, in Spanish, his treatise, Historical, Political, and Moral, of China, but only one folio volume appeared, as the two others were suppressed by the inquisition.

NAVARETTA, Balthasar, a Spanish Dominican, at the end of the 16th century, who published 3 vols. folio, Controversiæ in D. Thoma ejusque Scholæ Defensionem, 1634.

NAUCLERUS, John, a native of Swabia, who changed the name of Vergeau into that of Nauclerus, and became professor of law at Tubingen, and provost of the cathedral. He died at the beginning of the 16th century. His Chronicle from the Creation to the year 1500, is a work of merit, of which the best edition is that of Cologne in folio, 1570.

NAUDE, Gabriel, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris, 12th Feb. 1600. After studying with great assiduity at Paris, he went further to improve himself to Padua, where he took his degrees in physic. In 1631 he was made librarian to cardinal Bagni, at Rome, and after his death he was with equal liberality patronised by Barberini. He was invited by Richelieu to Paris, and was treated with great kindness by his successor Mazarine, over whose library he presided, and from whom he received several benefices. He attended Christina at the court of Sweden, but did not remain long there; and the fatigues of his journey threw him into a fever, of which he died at Abbeville, 29th July, 1653. He wrote, Apology for great Men who have been accused of Magic, 12mo.—Advice for forming a library—Addition to the life of Lewis XI.—Bibliographia Politica—Syntagma de Studio Militari—de Studio Liberali—a Discourse against Libels, &c.

NAUDE, Philip, a mathematician, born at Metz, 1654. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he went to Berlin, where he became professor of mathematics, and member of the academy. He died there 1729, much respected. He published a "treatise on Geometry," in German, 4to. and was succeeded in his professorship by his son, who died 1745.

NAVIER, Peter Toussaint, a native of St. Dizier, who died at Chalons-sur-Marne, 1779. He practised as a physician, and is eminently known for his discovery of nitrous ether, and the combination of mercury with iron, hitherto regarded as impossibilities. His knowledge in epidemical disorders was very great, and his prescriptions very successful; and to the truest meekness and modesty, he united the highest humanity and benevolence. He wrote a Dissertation on common diseases—Observations on the Softening of the Bones—Reflections on the Danger of Hasty Burials, and the Abuses of Interments in Churches—Antidotes against Arsenic, 2 vols. 12mo—on the Use of Burgundy in putrid fevers—de Thermis Borboniensibus, 4to. &c.

NAYLER, James, a quaker, born at Ardsley, near Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1616. He was in 1641, a private in the parliamentary army, and rose to the office of quartermaster under Lambert, but quitted the military life in 1649. The preaching and conversation of George Fox converted him to quakerism, 1651, and thinking himself now divinely inspired, he became an itinerant minister of his persuasion. In 1656 he was imprisoned for his extravagant conduct at Exeter, where his followers addressed him as the prince of peace; and afterwards, when liberated from confinement, he went to Bristol, he was accompanied by an enthusiastic cavalcade, who sang before him, holy, holy, holy is the Lord God of hosts, Hosanna in the highest. This fanatic zeal was noticed by the parliament; Nayler was accused and condemned, as guilty of blasphemy, and as an impostor, he was exposed in the pillory, and whipped, and branded on the forehead, his tongue was bored through with a red hot iron at the Old Exchange, and he was then imprisoned in Bridewell for life. After two years imprisonment he was set at liberty, and in 1660 he left London to return to Wakefield, to his wife and family, but died by the way, and was buried at King's Ripon. His writings have appeared in an 8vo. volume, 1716.

NEAL, Daniel, a native of London, educated at a dissenting academy, and afterwards at Utrecht and Leyden. He was chosen pastor of a congregation of independents in Aldersgate-street, and afterwards in Jewin-street, and died 1743, aged 65. He wrote a History of the Puritans, 4 vols. 8vo.—History of New-England, 2 vols. 8vo.—Sermons, &c.

NEANDER, Michael, a learned protestant, born at Soza in Silesia, 1523. He was made rector of the university of Ilfeldt, and presided over it for forty years, and at Pfortsheim, where he died 26th April, 1595. He was author of Erotemata Linguae Græcæ, 8vo.—a Hebrew Grammar—Pindarica Aristologia—Gnomologia, &c.—There was a physician of the same name, who died at Jena 1531, author of Synopsis Mensurarum et Ponderum, 4to. 1555.

NEARCHUS, one of Alexander's officers, who was employed by his master to examine the Indian seas in a voyage of discovery. His voyage from India to Ormus, still extant, has become particularly interesting by the valuable annotations and ingenious remarks of Dr. Vincent.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR I. or NABUCHADONOSOR, king of Nineveh, and Babylon, supposed to be the Nabopolassar who founded the kingdom of Nineveh.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR II. king of Babylon, is supposed to be the son of the preceding. He invaded Judæa, and carried the inhabitants into captivity. He afterwards, according to the relation of Scripture, was banished from the society of men, and herded among the beasts of the field. After seven years, he was restored to his dignity, and died about 562 B. C. in the 44th year of his reign.

NECHO, or the PHARAOH NECHO of Scripture, was king of Egypt after his father, Psammeticus. The expedition which his ships undertook from the Red Sea round the coast of Africa to the entrance of the Mediterranean, is famous, and was completed in three years. Necho marched against Assyria, and in his way defeated the Jews under Josiah, but was afterwards routed, and returned in disgrace. He died about 600 B. C.

NECK, John Van, a native of Naarden, eminent as a painter. His naked figures were particularly admired. His best piece is Simeon holding in his arms the infant Saviour, preserved in a church at Amsterdam. He died 1714, aged 79.

NECKER, Noel Joseph, a native of Flanders, who applied himself to botany and to medicine, in which sciences he obtained celebrity. He wrote Deliciae Gallo-Belgicae Sylvestres, 2 vols. 12mo.—Physiologia Muscorum, 8vo.—Methodus Muscorum, 8vo.—Hist. Nat. du Tassilege, &c. 8vo.—Elementa Botanica—Eclaircissements sur la Propagation, &c. 8vo. He died at Manheim 1793, aged 61.

NECKER, James, a native of Geneva, known as a financier. He was at first member of the council of 200 at Geneva, and then went as ambassador from the republic to France, where in 1765 he obtained the office of syndic to the East India company, and in 1775 was made director of the Royal treasury. His abilities were so highly respected, that he was, though a foreigner, twice elevated to the rank of prime minister of France; but the revolution, to which, as some imagine, his financial schemes had imperceptibly contributed, destroyed his popularity, and he yielded to the storm and retired to Switzerland, where he died at Copet, 1804, aged 72. He is author of a work on the Finances of France, 3 vols.—a treatise on the Influence of Religious Opinions, &c. His wife was the daughter of a protestant divine, and she rendered herself known not only by her writings, but by the amiable virtues of her character. When her husband was raised to the highest offices of France, she did not assume the manners of supercilious pride, but continued the friend of the learned, and the protectress of the poor, whose necessities she relieved with a liberal hand. Among her illustrious friends were Thomas and Buffon. She followed her husband's disgrace to Copet, where she died 1795. Her works are a treatise on Hasty Burials, 8vo.—Memoir on the Establishment of Hospitals—Reflections on Divorce—Miscellanies from her MSS. published after her death. Her daughter by Mr. Necker, married baron de Stael Holstein, the Swedish ambassador at the court of France, and she has acquired some celebrity not only by the intrigues which she carried on during the revolution, but by "Delphine," a romance, full of indecent and irreligious sentiments.

NECKHAM, Alexander, canon of Exeter, and Abbot of St. Mary's, Cirencester, was admired as a learned man, and as a poet, and therefore called Miraculum Ingenii. He wrote commentaries on the Psalms—a treatise de Nominibus Utensilium, &c. and died 1227.

NECTARIUS, a pious native of Tarsus, made patriarch of Constantinople, 381. He died 397.

NEEDHAM, Marchamont, an English writer, born at Burford, Oxfordshire, Aug. 1620. He was educated at All-Souls college, and St. Mary's hall, Oxford, then accepted the place of usher in Merchant-tailors' school, and at the breaking out of the civil wars, became writer to an attorney at Gray's Inn. Here he engaged in the publication of a periodical paper, called Mercurius Britannicus, in which he favoured the republican party; but afterwards he was reconciled to the royalists, obtained the king's pardon, and began to serve his cause by his Mercurius Pragmaticus. This, however, soon endangered his safety; he was imprisoned by the parliament in Newgate, and then persuaded to embrace the cause of the independents, which he again did with warmth in his new paper, called Mercurius Politicus. He had in the mean time studied physic, and taken his degrees, and on the return of Charles II. he obtained his pardon under the great seal, and practised as a physician, much respected among the dissenters. He died suddenly 1678. He was a man of great abilities, but his change of principles according to the prevalence of party, rendered him suspected and despicable. Besides his Mercuries, he wrote various political pamphlets, which, though read with avidity in his time, are not now worth recording.

NEEDHAM, John Tuberville, a Roman catholic, born in London, 1713, and educated at Douay. His abilities recommended him to be professor of philosophy in the English college at Lisbon, and afterwards he became travelling tutor to several English and Irish noblemen. He was fellow of the London Royal Society, and was appointed rector of the academy of sciences at Brussels, where he died 1781. Though a learned, he was a very superstitious character. He wrote Inquiries on Microscopical Discoveries, and Organized Bodies—Observations on Spallanzani's Discoveries—Inquiries on Nature and Religion—besides some Observations inserted in Buffon's Natural History.

NEEDLER, Benjamin, a native of Lalam, Middlesex, educated at Merchant-tailors', and St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was afterwards minister of Margaret Moses, Friday-street, from which he was ejected for nonconformity, 1662. He then settled at North Warnborough, Hants, where he died June, 1682. He wrote an Exposition of the first five chapters of Genesis.

NEEDLER, Thomas, an English writer of the Navy office, author of some prose and poetical works, published by Duncombe, 1724, 12mo. He was of amiable manners, and died 1718, aged 28.

NEEFS, Peter, a Flemish painter, educated under Steenwick. His paintings in perspective, and especially the inside of churches, are much admired. His son also possessed merit as a painter, but inferior to his father.

NEER, Arnold Van der, a native of Amsterdam, celebrated as a painter of landscapes and moonlight scenes. He died 1683, aged 64. His son, called Hendric, was eminent as a historical and portrait painter, and died 1703.

NEHEMIAH, a Jew, son of Hachaliah, born at Babylon during the captivity. He was cup-bearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus, by whom he was permitted to return to Jerusalem, to rebuild the city and temple, which he effected 454 B.C. He died at Jerusalem 430, after governing his nation with justice and integrity 30 years.

NELLER, George Christopher, a learned divine, belonging to the cathedral of Treves, and counsellor to the elector. He wrote Dissertation de Decretis Basilensibus—de Primatu S. Ecclesie Trevirensis—Hermania inauguralis in Balduani Trev. Documentum, &c.—de Juribus Parochi Primitivi—de Genuina Idea et Signis Parochialitatis, &c.—de Solido Fictio, de Solido Speciei Argento, &c. He died at Treves, 1784, aged 74.

NELSON, Robert, a celebrated Englishman, generally called the Pious Nelson, was born in London, 22d June, 1656. He was educated at St. Paul's school, and afterwards privately, by Dr. G. Bull, of Saddington, Gloucestershire, and then sent to Trinity college, Cambridge. In 1680 he was admitted fellow of the Royal Society, and in the same year he began his travels in the company of his friend Dr. Halley. He visited Paris, and afterwards proceeded to Rome, where he became acquainted with lady Theophila Lucy, the rich widow of Sir Kingsmill Lucy, bart. and daughter of Lord Berkeley, whom he married on his return to England. This lady soon after declared herself of the catholic persuasion, but though she spoke and wrote in favour of her principles, against what her husband published, their mutual affection was never diminished by controversy, or embittered by religious disagreements. Firm in his principles, Nelson remained attached to his creed, and to his sovereign, and he not only refused to transfer his allegiance to William, but declared himself a nonjuror. This conduct did not render him less dear to his many respectable friends; he was still regarded by Tillotson, though they disagreed in political opinions, and such was their attachment, that the venerable prelate was attended in his last illness by his worthy friend, and died in his arms. About the end of 1709, he returned to the communion of the church of England, and in this he yielded to the arguments of some able and pious divines. He was, about 1713, attacked by an asthma and dropsy in the breast, of which he died at Kensington, 16th January, 1714-15. He was the first person buried in the cemetery of St. George's church, where a Latin inscription by bishop Smalridge records his virtues. This great, learned, and amiable man wrote various works, the best known of which are his Companion for the Festivals and Fasts of the Church of England, 8vo. a useful work, often reprinted. He wrote besides, the Practice of True Devotion, 12mo.—Transubstantiation contrary to Scripture, 4to.—the Great Duty of frequenting the Christian Sacrifice, 8vo.—the life of his friend bishop Bull, 8vo.—a Letter to Dr. Clarke on his Doctrine of the Trinity—Address to Persons of Quality, &c.—the Whole Duty of a Christian, in question and answer—a Letter on Church Government, &c.

NELSON, Valentine, author of some sermons. Vid. NALSON.

NELSON, Horatio Viscount, an illustrious English seaman. He was the fourth son of the Rev. Edward Nelson, and was born 29th September, 1758, at Burnham Thorpe, Norfolk, of which his father was rector. He began his education at Norwich school, afterwards removed to North Waltham, and at the age of 12, when the nation was threatened with war, in consequence of the disputes about the Falkland islands, he entered on board the Raisable of 64 guns, under his maternal uncle captain Maurice Suckling. Soon after that ship was put out of commission, and the young seaman went to the West Indies, in the merchants' service, but again joined his uncle on board the Triumph, and in 1773 was permitted to accompany the expedition which was sent under the command of captains Phipps and Lutwidge on a voyage of discovery to the North pole. In this voyage he, as coxswain to captain Lutwidge, gained great reputation for boldness, zeal, and perseverance, and on his return he went to the West-Indies, on board the Sea-horse under captain Farmer. He rose to the rank of lieutenant in April, 1777, and was immediately employed as second of the Lowestoffe, of 32 guns, on the Jamaica station, from which he was removed to the command of a schooner, and thus was enabled to acquire a perfect knowledge of the intricate navigation of the seas near Hispaniola. In June, 1779, he obtained, under admiral Peter Parker, the appointment of post-captain, and the command of the Hinchinbroke, and when an attack was expected in Jamaica from the French forces under D'Estaing, the youthful hero was intrusted with the care of the batteries of Port Royal, and the defence of Kingston and Spanish Town. In the attack made in 1780, upon Fort Juan, in the gulf of Mexico, his perseverance was of infinite benefit to the public service, and by his intrepidity the outposts were gallantly stormed, and the place reduced. The next ship which he commanded was the Janus, of 44 guns, and soon after he was removed to the Albemarle, and continued on the American station with

Sir Samuel Hood till the peace. In 1783 he visited France, and the next year he was appointed to the Boreas of 28 guns, at the Leeward islands, and during his continuance in this station he married, March, 1787, Frances Herbert Nesbit, widow of Dr. Nesbit, of Nevis, and daughter of W. Herbert, Esq. senior judge of that island. He returned to England, Nov. 1787, and retired to Burnham Thorpe, in the bosom of domestic happiness, till 1793, when the war with France called upon him for the exertion of his great talents. He obtained the command of the Agamemnon, of 64 guns, and joined lord Hood in the Mediterranean, where he assisted at the taking of Toulon, and at the siege of Bastia, in which he superintended the disembarkation of the troops, and ably commanded the batteries. He afterwards had a gallant encounter with five French ships of war, and then supported the siege of Calvi, where he lost the sight of his right eye, in consequence of some particles of sand being violently driven against it by one of the shots of the enemy's batteries. Under the next commander, lord Hotham, he continued to distinguish himself, particularly in the engagements with the French fleet, 15th March and July, 1795, and in the blockade of Genoa. When admiral Jervis succeeded in the Mediterranean command, the brave hero removed from the Agamemnon to the Captain, of 74 guns, and soon after obtained a commodore's pendant, and was employed in the blockade of Leghorn, and the taking of Porto Ferrajo. On his passage to Gibraltar, in the Minerva frigate, he fell in with two Spanish frigates, one of which, the Sabine, of 40 guns, he took, and sailing immediately to join admiral Jervis, he was pursued by two ships of the Spanish fleet, a circumstance which was quickly communicated to the commander in chief, and in a few hours produced a general action. In this memorable fight, on the 14th February, 1797, in which 15 English ships defeated a Spanish fleet of 27 ships, and took four three-deckers, the commodore behaved with his usual gallantry. In the Captain, to which he had shifted his flag, he attacked the Santissima Trinidad, of 136 guns, and passing to the Saint Nicholas, of 80 guns, and then to the San Joseph, of 112 guns, he had the happiness to see both these ships strike by his superior valour. For his gallant conduct on this occasion, he was created knight of the Bath, and in April, 1797, he was made rear admiral of the blue, and appointed to the command of the inner squadron in the blockade of Cadiz. After making some vigorous, but unsuccessful attacks on the town, he was sent by lord St. Vincent, to take the town of Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriffe, but though he obtained possession of the place for seven hours, he was unable to reduce the citadel, and therefore was permitted to retire unmolested to his fleet. During this desperate attack he lost his right hand, which was shattered by a shot, but his life was preserved by the attention of his son-in-law, captain Nesbit, who during the darkness of the night, missed him from his side, and returning, found him exhausted on the ground, and carried him safe on his back to the shore, where a boat conveyed him to his ship. In consequence of his wound, the gallant admiral received a pension of 1000*l.* and in the memorial which, according to custom, he presented to his majesty on the occasion, he declared in the simple language of truth, that in the glorious services in which he had been employed, he had been engaged with the enemy upwards of 120 times. Among other marks of public favour, he received the freedom of the city of London in a gold box, worth 100 guineas; but these honours excited him to greater exertions, and he soon after joined in the Vanguard, lord St. Vincent, and was sent up the Mediterranean to watch the motions of the French ships, which were ready to convey Buonaparte to the invasion of Egypt. Notwithstanding his vigilance, the fleet escaped, but he sailed in its pursuit, and after returning from the Egyptian shores to Sicily, almost in despair, he again hastened to the mouth of the Nile, and to the general joy of his fleet, perceived the enemy moored in an advantageous situation in the bay of Aboukir, flanked by strong batteries, and supported by gun-boats. The attack immediately began, and by a bold manœuvre on an unknown shore, part of his ships sailed between the enemy and the land, and thus exposed them to a double fire. The action continued with increasing violence during the night, and the sudden explosion of the French admiral's ship, the Orient, of 120 guns, added to the terrors of the scene. The rising day exhibited to the British seamen, the pleasing sight of dismasted and submissive ships; and of the whole fleet only two men of war, and two frigates were able to escape. The fame of this glorious victory, which thus captured or destroyed eleven sail of the line, was received with general exultation by the people of England; the rest of Europe re-echoed the praises of the British hero, and the emperor of Germany was, in consequence, prevailed upon to renew the war, by breaking off the insidious conferences of Radstadt, and the Porte declared itself an open enemy against the unprincipled invaders of Egypt. In the mean time these services did not pass unrewarded; the brave admiral was created a baron, by the title of Nelson of the Nile, with the grant of a pension of 2000*l.*

more; the sultan honoured him with an aigrette, or plume of diamonds, and pelisse, and the king of Naples conferred on him a valuable estate in Sicily, with the title of duke of Bronte. On his return to Naples the naval hero removed the royal family from the violent popular commotions which seemed to threaten their safety, and even their life, and in July, 1799, in consequence of the success of the Russian arms in Italy, he had the satisfaction to convey them back from Palermo to their capital, and to replace the monarch on his throne. Soon after his return home, where he was received with enthusiastic joy by every rank of society, lord Nelson was called away to break that confederacy which the capricious politics of the emperor of Russia had formed with Denmark and Sweden against this country. In consequence of this, the gallant admiral embarked as second in command, under Sir Hyde Parker, and after passing through the Sound in defiance of the batteries, he volunteered to make an attack on Copenhagen, 2d April, 1801. After a most vigorous defence, the Danes saw their strong batteries silenced, and 17 of their men of war either sunk, burnt, or taken. A conference with the crown prince immediately succeeded this glorious victory, and after peace was restored by the heroic admiral, between the two countries, the fleet sailed to complete its triumph over the hostile squadrons of Sweden and Russia; but the sudden death of the emperor Paul rendered further exertions unnecessary. For these services, which were chiefly attributed to him, and not to the commander-in-chief, lord Nelson was created a viscount, and his honours made hereditary in his family, even in the female line. In Aug. 1801, he made an unsuccessful attack on Boulogne, but the negotiations for peace prevented the destruction of the armament in that harbour, which his ardent mind would, no doubt, have accomplished. The short-lived peace of Amiens restored him, for a little time, to retirement; but on the recommencement of hostilities, 1803, he was summoned from his beloved retreat at Merton, to take the command of the fleet in the Mediterranean. Notwithstanding his active vigilance, the French fleet escaped from Toulon, and from the Mediterranean, and after being joined by the Cadiz squadron they sailed to the West Indies, but he pursued them with rapidity, and nearly came up to them near Antigua. Such, however, was the terror of his name, that they returned in consternation, back to Europe, and before their entrance into Cadiz, had a partial action near Ferrol, with Sir Robert Calder. Thus baffled in his attempts to overtake his terrified enemy, lord Nelson returned to England for the re-establishment of his health, but in a few weeks he was again prevailed upon to take the command of the fleet with very unlimited powers. On the 19th of October, 1805, Villeneuve, with the French fleet, and Gravina with the Spanish, sailed from Cadiz, and on the 21st, about noon, the English squadron had the satisfaction to close with them off Cape Trafalgar. The most precise orders had been previously given by the enlightened commander, so that the fleet was not distracted by signals; and showing the first example of heroism, the admiral ordered his ship, the Victory, to be carried along side of his old friend, the Santissima Trinidad. The carnage on both sides was dreadful, and the heroic chief, unfortunately not covering the star, and other insignia, which he wore on his person, became a marked object to the musketeers who were placed in the tops of the enemy's ships. A musket ball, from one of the riflemen of the Bucentaur, struck him in the left breast, and in about two hours after, he expired in the arms of victory, retaining to the last his firmness and heroism, and rejoicing in the glorious triumphs which his death ensured to his country. On his lamented fall the chief command devolved on admiral, now lord Collingwood, who improved the high advantages already obtained, and in his despatches paid an honourable tribute, in the language of nature and of affection, to the meritorious services of the departed hero. Of the 33 ships of the line in the combined fleet, which thus engaged the inferior number of 27 English ships, sixteen were destroyed, four were carried to Gibraltar, six escaped into Cadiz, mere wrecks, and four which retired from the action, were 13 days after captured by Sir R. Strachan's squadron. The remains of the illustrious hero of Trafalgar, were brought in his own ship, the Victory, to the mouth of the Thames, and conveyed to Greenwich, and on the ninth of the following January, they were deposited in St. Paul's cathedral, with all the pomp and solemnity, the tributes of regret and of affection, which a grateful and independent nation could pay to a departed conqueror. His brother, the heir of his honours, was raised to the dignity of an earldom, and a handsome sum of money was liberally voted by parliament, for the purchase of an estate to perpetuate the memory of the conqueror, and the gratitude of England. As a professional character, lord Nelson possessed a mighty genius, an ardent spirit, and a resolute mind; cool, prompt, and discerning in the midst of dangers, he roused all his powerful energies into action, and the strong faculties of his soul were vigilantly exerted in the midst of the fury of battle, to make every accident contribute to the triumph of his crew, and to the glory of his country. So highly established was his reputation, that his presence was a talisman to the courage of his sailors, who fought under him as sure of victory, and regarded his approbation as the best solace for their fatigues and their sufferings. In his manners he was polished and gentle; he was no stranger to the mild charities of human nature, and in his heart he felt all the emotions of a devout and pious Christian. His despatches from Aboukir, in which he attributed his success to the interference of Providence, excited sentiments of respect and admiration through the nation, and it was on that memorable occasion, that his venerable father exclaimed Oh, my great and good son!

NELSON, William, president of the council of Virginia, and one of the judges of that colony, was at the head of the administration from the time of the death of lord Botetourt in 1771 until the arrival of lord Dummore in 1772, and died at Williamsburgh, November 19th, 1772.

☞ L.

NELSON, Thomas, governor of Virginia, held a high rank among the distinguished patriots who adorned that state during the revolution. When Virginia was threatened with invasion he was appointed general, and enjoyed high popularity as an officer. In 1781 he was appointed governor of that state. He died in 1789.

☞ L.

NEMESIANUS, Aurel. Olymp. a Carthaginian poet, who wrote, in Latin, Cynegetica, a poem, and four eclogues, published among the poets Rei Venaticæ, 1730. He lived about 281 A.D.

NEMESIUS, a Greek philosopher, who became bishop of Emessa in the fifth century, and wrote De Naturâ Hominis, &c.

NEMOURS, Mary d' Orleans, daughter of the duke de Longueville, was born 1625. Her Memoirs of the War of the Fronde are valuable, as containing anecdotes of the principal characters and events of her time, under the minority of Lewis XIV. They are printed with those of de Retz and Joli, and have been translated into English, in 8 vols. 12mo. She died 1707.

NENNIUS, author of the History of Britain, flourished in the ninth century. A MS. of this history is preserved in the British museum, among the Cotton papers.

NEPER, John lord. Vid. NAPIER.

NEPOS, Cornelius, a Latin historian, patronized by Augustus. Of all his works there only remain the lives of illustrious Greek and Roman generals, a composition of singular elegance, and highly interesting.

NEPOS, Flavius Julius, a Dalmatian, who, by his marriage with the niece of Leo the emperor, obtained the Western empire. He was assassinated in Dalmatia, 480.

NERI, Philip de, an eminent historian, born of an honourable family at Florence, 1485. He was one of the 48 magistrates called senators, chosen by duke Alexander 1532, and after a life devoted to public services, he died at Florence, 17th Jan. 1556. His History of Florentine Affairs from 1214 to 1537, appeared at Augsburg, 1728, in folio.

NERI, St. Philip de, a native of Florence, celebrated as the founder of the congregation of the priests of the oratory in Italy, whose duties were to administer to the wants of the poor, to attend the sick, and to relieve strangers and distressed pilgrims. He died 1595, aged 50, and was canonized by Gregory XV. in 1622.

NERI, Pompeo, a Florentine, law professor at Pisa, eminently distinguished in the affairs of Maria Theresa, and of the duke of Lorraine. He was founder of the botanical academy at Florence, and died there, 1776, aged 69. He was the learned author of Observations on the Tuscan Nobility—on the Imports of Milan—on the Legal Value of Coin, and the difficulty of settling it. Anthony, the author of the Art of making Glass, printed at Florence, 1612, was also of this family.

NERO, Claud. Domit. Cæsar, a Roman emperor after Claudius, A.D. 50. The beginning of his reign was marked by humanity and virtue, but soon after, Nero showed himself vindictive, cruel, and licentious; his mother was inhumanly murdered, and every species of oppression and debauchery was indulged. Rome was set on fire, that the tyrant might behold the disasters of which he had read in the conflagration of Troy, and the virtue and honour of the senate and the people were insulted and trampled upon. At last, a conspiracy was formed to rid the world of the bloody tyrant, who in the moment of his distress, when deserted by his flatterers, destroyed himself, A.D. 68.

NERVA, Cocceius, a Roman emperor after Domitian, A.D. 96. After a short, but glorious, mild, and virtuous reign, this excellent monarch appointed Trajan his successor, and died 98, aged 72.

NESBIT, Thomas, son of the lord president Nesbit, of Dirlton, was born at Edinburgh, 1672. He was well skilled in antiquities and heraldry, and wrote a Vindication of Scottish Antiquities, preserved in MS. in the advocates' library, Edinburgh. He died at Dirlton, 1725.

NESLE, N. de, a native of Meaux, known by his writings. His poem, called Sansonnet, in imitation of Vert Vert, is much admired. He wrote besides, the Modere

Arristippus—the Prejudices of the People, 2 vols.—the Prejudices of the Ancients, &c. He died in indigent circumstances at Paris, 1767, in an advanced age.

Nesse, Christopher, a native of Yorkshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. When ejected from his church at Leeds, in 1662, for nonconformity, he opened a school for 10 years, and afterwards, in 1675, came to London, where he preached to a dissenting congregation. He wrote the Christian's Walk and Work on Earth, 8vo.—the Christian's Crown and Glory, 12mo.—Church History from Adam—Antidote against Popery—a Divine Legacy—the History and Mystery of the Old and New Testament, 4 vols. fol. &c. He died 1705, aged 84.

Nestor, a Russian monk, author of a Description of Russia, and of a Chronicle from 858 to 1113, in a simple and unadorned style, of which Muller published a translation in German, 1732, died 1115, aged 59.

Nestorius, a Syrian, who became bishop of Constantinople, 431. He was deposed for refusing to assent to the doctrine of the incarnation of the Redeemer, and his followers are still found in the eastern parts of the world.

Netscher, Gaspard, a portrait painter, born at Prague, 1636. After a series of accidents, he settled at the Hague, where he acquired reputation and opulence. There was scarce a family in Holland but what could boast of a miniature from his pencil. He died at the Hague, 1684.

Neubauer, Ernest Frederic, a native of Magdeburg, author of Academic Dissertations—Explanations of Scripture—Lives of the Divinity Professors of Giessen—sermons, &c. died at Giessen, where he was professor of antiquities, and of theology, 1748, aged 43.

Neubauer, Francis, a native of Bohemia, educated at Prague and Vienna. He was celebrated for his skill in music, and was musician to the chapel of the prince of Nassau. His compositions were much admired, but he unfortunately disgraced himself by immoderate intoxication. He died 1795.

Neve, Timothy, a native of Wotton, near Ludlow, Shropshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He afterwards kept a school at Spalding, and became successively canon of Peterborough, prebendary of Lincoln, archdeacon of Huntingdon, and rector of Alwalton, Huntingdonshire, where he died about 1740. He communicated, in 1727, to the Spalding Society, of which he was the joint founder, an essay on the invention of printing, and on our first painters. His son Timothy, who was born at Spalding, was of Merton college, Oxford, and Margaret professor there. He died 1798, author of some sermons.

Nevers, Philip Julian Mazarine Mancini, duke de, nephew of Mazarine, was born at Rome, and acquired some reputation by supporting Pradon against Racine. He wrote some sonnets, poetical pieces, &c. which were admired as the compositions of a duke, but possessed little merit. He died 1707, aged 76.

Nevisan, John, an Italian lawyer, born at Asti. He studied at Padua, and taught at Turin. He is known by his work Sylvæ Nuptiales, &c. 8vo. in which he asserts curious things, but without order or connexion. It is said that the women of Turin were so offended against him on account of this book, in which he spoke with disrespect of the sex, that they drove him in disgrace with stones from the city, and would not suffer him to return before he entreated pardon on his knees. He died 1540.

Neuhoff, Theodore Baron, king of Corsica. Vid. THEODORE.

Neuville, Charles Frey de, a Jesuit of Coutances, long known as an eloquent preacher in the capital. After the banishment of his order he retired to Compeigne, where he lived in privacy, and died 13th July, 1774, aged 81. He wrote sermons, 8 vols. 12mo. la Morale du Nouveau Testament, 3 vols. 12mo. &c. His brother, Peter Claude, was also a Jesuit, and author of 16 sermons. He died at Rennes, 1773.

Neuville, Didier Peter Chicanau de, a native of Nancy, in the service of Stanislaus, king of Poland. He afterwards became professor of history at Toulouse, and died there Oct. 1781, aged 61. The best known of his writings is Dictionnaire Philosophique, &c. 8vo.

Newcomb, Thomas, son of a clergyman in Herefordshire, was educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford. In 1734 he became rector of Stopham, Sussex, and afterwards lived at Hackney, it is said, in distressed circumstances. He was author of various original poems, and among other things turned Hervey's Meditations into blank verse, and also the Death of Abel from the German. The school which he established at Hackney has long continued to enjoy celebrity.

Newcome, William, a learned prelate, born at Abingdon, Berkshire, where his father was vicar. He was educated at the grammar-school of his native place, and then elected on the foundation of Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He was afterwards appointed tutor to Mr. Fox, at Hertford college, and to this connexion he was indebted for his elevation in the church. He became successively bishop of Ossory and Waterford, and was afterwards translated to Armagh, by lord Fitzwilliam, when lord lieutenant. This venerable prelate was a man of amiable manners, and as a scholar was eminent for his learning, and his extensive acquaintance with biblical knowledge. He died in Ireland, 1799, aged 70. His publications were very respectable, and particularly a letter to Dr. Priestley, on the Duration of our Lord's Ministry, 8vo.—Observations on our Lord's Conduct, 4to.—an improved Version of the 12 Minor Prophets, 4to.—Another Version of Ezekiel—a Review of the Chief Difficulties in the Gospel History relating to our Lord's resurrection—a Historical Review of the English Biblical Translations, &c. and after his death his Version of the New Testament appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. He was member of the Royal Irish academy.

NEWCOMEN, Matthew, a nonconformist divine, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. As member of the Westminster assembly of divines, he assisted in the drawing up of their catechism, and he was one of the five divines who attacked bishop Hall's Vindication of Episcopacy. This curious work was called Smectymnus, from the initials of the authors' names, Stephen Marshal, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, William Spurstow. He was ejected from the living of Dedham, Essex, in 1662, and then retired to Leyden, where he died, 1666.

NEWELL, Samuel, missionary at Bombay, was graduated at Harvard college in 1807. He pursued his theological studies at the seminary at Andover, Massachusetts, and attended a course of medical lectures at the college in Philadelphia. He was a member of the first mission sent to the East by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and embarked at Salem for Calcutta in February, 1812. Being ordered by the government soon after reaching Bengal to leave that country, he proceeded to the Isle of France, and after a short residence there, during which the death of Mrs. Newell took place, he removed to Ceylon, where he remained some time, and prepared the way for the mission which was afterwards established there. He at length joined the mission at Bombay, and continued there a faithful labourer till his death, on the 30th of May, 1821. His talents were highly respectable, and he was distinguished for modesty, tenderness of feeling, and an enlightened and ardent zeal in the cause of evangelizing the heathen.

NEWELL, Harriet, the wife of the preceding, was the daughter of Mr. Moses Atwood, of Haverhill, Massachusetts, and born there, October 10th, 1793. She possessed a superior mind, enjoyed an excellent education, and early became a professor of religion. On the arrival of the missionaries at Calcutta, being directed by the government to leave that country, Mr. and Mrs. Newell proceeded to the Isle of France, where she died on the 30th Nov. 1812. She was a woman of uncommonly amiable disposition, and interesting manners, and by her intelligence, piety, and devotedness to the cause in which she was embarked, rendered herself an object of unusual interest and respect to all who became acquainted with her character and history.

NEWLAND, Peter, a learned Dutchman, son of a carpenter at Dimmermeer, near Amsterdam, where he was born, 1764. He was possessed of strong natural powers, so that at the age of 10 he wrote poetry with elegance, and could resolve, without the instruction of a master, some of the most difficult problems of geometry. These great talents were happily encouraged by the government; the young prodigy was made one of the commissioners of longitude, and afterwards he filled with great ability the chairs of mathematics and philosophy at Utrecht and Amsterdam. He wrote poems in Dutch, on the Means of enlightening a People—on the General Utility of Mathematics—on Lavoisier's System—on the form of the Globe—on the Course of Comets, and the Uncertainty of their Return—on ascertaining the Longitude at Sea—a Treatise on Navigation, &c. He died 1794.

NEWMAN, Francis, governor of the colony of New-Haven, Connecticut, was in 1653, with several others, appointed an agent to governor Stuyvesant at Manhaes, to obtain satisfaction for the injuries which the Dutch had inflicted on the colony. He was afterwards one of the commissioners of the United Colonies, and for a long time secretary during the administration of governor Eaton. In 1658 he was appointed governor of the colony, and continued in the office till his death in 1661. He was a man of great piety and prudence.

NEWMAN, Samuel, was a native of Bombay, England, and born in 1600. He was educated at the university of Oxford, and for many years was an able minister of the established church. In 1638 he came to Massachusetts, and after spending several years at Dorchester and Weymouth, settled at Rehoboth, where he remained greatly esteemed for his talents and piety till his death in 1663. He compiled a concordance of the Bible, superior to any which had before appeared. It was published in London in 1643, and on being republished in England with considerable improvements, was called the Cambridge Concordance. His poverty compelled him, while labouring at it in the evening, to use pine knots for light.

NEWTON, John, an English mathematician, born at Oundle, 1622. He entered, in 1637, at Edmund hall, Oxford, where he applied to astronomy and mathematics. After the restoration he was rewarded for his loyalty, and made chaplain to the king, created D.D. and appointed rector of Ross, in Herefordshire, where he died Christmas day, 1678. He wrote Astronomia Britannica, in three parts, 4to.—Help to Calculation, with Tables of Declination, Ascension, &c.—Trigonometria Britannica, fol.—Geometrical Trigonometry—Chiliades Centum Logarithm.—Mathematical Elements—Perpetual Diary—Ephemerides—Introduction to Rhetoric—Cosmography, &c.

NEWTON, Sir Isaac, a most illustrious philosopher, born of a very ancient family, settled at Woolstrop, Lincolnshire, where he was born Christmas day, 1642. He early lost his father, but his mother, though she soon after took a second husband, bestowed particular care on his education. From Grantham school, where he was placed at the age of 12, he was removed at 18 to Trinity college, Cambridge, as he seemed to prefer studious pursuits to the management of his estate. At Cambridge, under the care of the famous Isaac Barrow, he began to apply to mathematics, but his powerful mind so easily comprehended the elements of Euclid, that he quickly passed to higher pursuits, and paid attention to Des Cartes's analytical method, which then was very popular, and as he proceeded in his studies he made marginal notes. In 1664 he discovered a new method of infinite series and fluxions, which he afterwards greatly improved, and the same year he took his bachelor's degree. His next pursuit was the grinding of optical glasses in one of the figures made by the three sections of a cone, for the improvement of telescopes, but not succeeding as he expected, he procured a glass prism, to make experiments on the phenomena of colours, lately discovered by Grimaldi; and the result of his skilful researches gradually matured his new theory of light and colours. Whilst he reflected on this discovery that light was not homogeneous, but a heterogeneous mixture of refrangible rays, he was obliged to quit Cambridge in 1665, by the plague, and he retired to his house, where, though deprived of the assistance of his books, new truths were to be opened to his active mind. Whilst he was sitting alone in his garden, the falling of some apples from a tree led his thoughts to the subject of gravity, and considering that this power is not sensibly diminished, at the remotest distance from the centre of the earth, even at the top of the highest mountains, he thought that it must be extended much farther.
